THE BATTLE ROLL.

ABANCAY, A.D. 1537.—The battle of Abancay was fought near a river in Peru of that name, on the 12th of July, 1537, between the Spanish troops of Alvarado on the one side, and those of Almagro on the other. The battle occurred during the civil war which broke out among the Spaniards after their conquest of Peru; and the forces on both sides were nearly equal, each consisting of about five hundred men. The loss in killed and wounded, on either side, was trifling; but Alvarado and his whole army were made prisoners by the victorious troops of Almagro.

ABENSBURG, A.D. 1809.—This place, a small town of Bavaria, was the scene of an engagement on the 20th of April, 1809, between the Austrian and the French armies, the latter under Napoleon Bonaparte. The Austrians were defeated with considerable loss.

ABOUKIR, A.D. 1799.—Aboukir is situated on the Egyptian coast, 10 miles east from Alexander. It is at present a village with 100 Arabian inhabitants. It has a strong castle on the western side of the spacious bay of Aboukir, protected by a projecting point of land, and several small islands.

On the twenty-fifth day of July, 1799, Napoleon arrived within sight of the peninsula of Aboukir. Before him lay the intrenched camp of the Turks, and although the force of the enemy exceeded nine thousand men, while his army consisted only of eight thousand men all told, he determined to make an immediate attack. The Turks occupied the peninsula of Aboukir, and had covered the approach to it with two lines of intrenchments. The first ran directly across the neck of land, about one mile in front of the village of Aboukir. At either extremity of this line were two mounds of sand, each of which was garrisoned by two thousand men. The second, a mile in the rear, was strengthened in the center by the fort constructed by the French, and terminated at one extremity in the sea, and at the other in the lake. Between the two lines was placed the camp. The first line was guarded by four thousand men; the second by five thousand men, and supported by twelve pieces of cannon besides those mounted on the fort.

The French general, Lannes, with two thousand men, attacked the right of the first line. General D'Estaing, with a like number of men, attacked the left, while Murat, whose cavalry was arranged in three divisions, charged upon the center, with the view of piercing through, so as to turn both wings of the first line, and thus prevent all communication with the second. The Turks fought with desperate valor; and although their right wing gradually gave way before the impetuous charge of the French, their left maintained its position, until Murat, with one vigorous charge, drove his cavalry through the center of the line, and then, dividing his force, rushed on to the destruction of the two wings. At that moment the Turks fled in confusion to the second line. The French cavalry followed in hot pursuit, and, unable to reach the second intrenchment, the Turks rushed tumultuously into the lake, where almost the whole were either drowned or cut down by the grape-shot which was constantly poured upon them by the French artillery. The other extremity of the line met with the same fate. General Lannes attacked the mount on the right; the cavalry charged it, after piercing the center, and the Turks, flying at the first onset, were driven into the sea, and met the fate of their unfortunate comrades on the right. Now Lannes and D'Estaing united their forces and attacked the village in the center. The janizaries defended themselves bravely, hoping to be supported by the second line: but no sooner did Murat perceive a column of Turks advancing for that purpose, than he charged them with his cavalry, and completely routed them. The village was then carried with the bayonet, and its defenders, refusing all quarter, were put to the sword, or escaped and rushed into the water, and were drowned.

Inspired by this success, Napoleon hoped by repeating the same maneuver with the second line, to destroy the whole remainder of the Turkish army. He established a battery to protect the operations of his troops, and after allowing his army a few hours for repose, he commenced an attack upon the interior and more formidable line of defense. On the right a trench joined the fort of Aboukir to the sea; but on the left a trench which was to have joined it to Lake Maadich, was not completed, leaving a small open space between the intrenchment and the lake. It was decided by Napoleon that D'Estaing's division should attack the intrenchment on the right, while the principal effort was to be directed to the left, where the whole of the cavalry, under cover of Lannes's division, were to enter at the open space between the trenches and the lake, and take the Turkish line in the rear. At three o'clock the charge was made. D'Estaing's division, arranged in echelon of battalions, advanced gallantly; but the Turks, transported by their ardor, rushed from behind their intrenchments upon them, and a bloody conflict took place on the plain. Discharging their fusils, the infuriated janizaries rushed to the attack, wielding their formidable sabers in the air; but Turkish valor at length yielded to the steady pressure of the European bayonet, and they were borne back, fighting for every inch of soil, to the foot of the intrenchment. The French were here arrested by the plunging fire of the redoubt, and the sustained discharges of musketry from the top of the works. Letourcy was killed, Fugurres wounded, and the French column, broken and disordered, recoiled from the field of carnage toward the exterior line. Murat also signally failed in his attempt on the left. True, Lannes forced the intrenchments toward the extremity of the lake, and occupied some of the houses of the village; but when the cavalry attempted to pass through the narrow defile between the works and the lake, they were assailed by such a terrible fire from the gun-boats that they were repeatedly forced to retire. The attack had failed at both extremities, and Napoleon was doubtful whether he should continue the combat or rest contented with the advantage already gained.

But the Turks themselves relieved Napoleon from this perplexity. No sooner did they see the column which had assailed their right retire, than they rushed out of the fort of Aboukir, and began to cut off the heads of the dead bodies which lay scattered over the plain. Napoleon instantly saw his advantage, and quickly turned it to the best account. Advancing rapidly with his reserves in admirable order, he arrested the sortie in the center, while Lannes returned to the attack of the intrenchments, now, in a great measure, denuded of their defenders, and D'Estaing re-formed his troops for another effort on the lines to the right. All these attacks proved successful; the whole line of redoubts was captured almost without resistance, while several squadrons penetrated through the narrow opening on the margin of the lake, and entered the rear of the second line. The Turks now fled in the wildest confusion toward Aboukir; but Murat's cavalry, which now occupied the space between the second line and the fort, charged them so furiously in flank, that they were driven into the sea, and almost all perished in the waves. Murat penetrated into the camp of Mustapha Pacha, where he made that commander prisoner with his own hands. The remnant of the Turkish army, about two thousand men, fled to the fort of Aboukir. A heavy cannonade was immediately opened on the fort, which surrendered, July 30th. Five thousand Turkish corpses floated in the bay of Aboukir, two thousand perished in battle, and two thousand were made prisoners of war in the fort. Hardly any escaped—a circumstance almost unexampled in modern warfare.

ABYDOS, B.C. 201.—Philip, king of Macedon, father of Perseus, who proved last monarch of that country, was at war with the Rhodians. The inhabitants of Abydos made common cause with that commercial people, who often came to visit the shores of the Dardanelles. Philip was successful in his passage through Thrace and the Chersonesus, where many cities surrendered to his arms, but Abydos shut its gates against him, and prepared for a bold resistance. Nothing of what is usually practiced in such warlike proceedings was omitted in this siege. No place was ever defended with more bravery; but this bravery, in the end, degenerated into brutality and fury. Confiding in their own strength, the Abydenians repulsed the first attacks of the Macedonians with the greatest vigor. On the side next the sea, the machines no sooner came forward than they were immediately either dismounted by the balistæ or consumed by fire. Even the ships on which they were mounted were in danger, and were saved with difficulty. On the land side they also defended themselves for some time with great courage, and did not despair even of defeating the enemy. But, finding that the outer wall was sapped, and that the Macedonians were carrying their mines under the inner one, they sent deputies to Philip, offering to surrender upon the following terms: That such forces as had been sent to them by the Rhodians and King Attalus should return to their respective sovereigns, under his safe conduct; and that all free citizens should retire whithersoever they pleased, with the clothes they had then on. Philip answered coolly, that the Abydenians had only to choose whether they would surrender at discretion, or continue to defend themselves bravely. This report being made by the deputies, the besieged, in transports of despair, assembled to debate what was best to be done. They came to the following resolutions:—First, that the slaves should be all set free, to animate them to defend the city; secondly, that all the women should be shut up in the Temple of Diana, and all the children, with their nurses, in the Gymnasium; that they should bring into the great square all the gold and silver in the city, and carry all the rest of the valuable effects to the vessels of the Rhodians and the Cyzicenians. These resolutions having passed unanimously, another assembly was called, in which they chose fifty of the wisest and most ancient of the citizens, but who at the same time had vigor enough left to execute what might be determined on; and they were made to take an oath, in presence of all the inhabitants, that the instant they saw the enemy masters of the inner wall, they would kill the women and children, set fire to the galleys laden with their effects, and throw into the sea all their gold and silver, which they had heaped together: then, sending for their priests, they took an oath either to conquer or die, sword in hand; and, after having sacrificed the victims, they obliged the priests and priestesses to pronounce before the altar the greatest curses on those who should break their oath. This being done, they left off countermining, and resolved, the instant the wall should fall, to fly to the breach, and to fight till the last. Accordingly, the inward wall tumbling down, the besieged, true to the oath they had taken, fought in the breach with such unparalleled bravery, that, though Philip had perpetually sustained with fresh soldiers those who had mounted to the assault, yet when night separated the combatants, he was still doubtful with regard to the success of the siege. Such Abydenians as marched first to the breach, over heaps of slain, fought with fury, and not only made use of their swords and javelins, but after their arms were broken to pieces, or forced out of their hands, they rushed headlong upon the Macedonians, knocked some down, and broke the long spears of others, and with the pieces struck their faces and such parts of their bodies as were uncovered, till they made them absolutely despair of the event. When night put an end to the slaughter, the breach was quite covered with the dead bodies of the Abydenians; and those who had escaped were so overwhelmed with fatigue, and had received so many wounds, that they could hardly support themselves. Things being come to this dreadful extremity, two of the principal citizens, being unable to bring themselves to execute the awful task they had undertaken, and which now came before them as a horrid reality, agreed that, to save their wives and children, they should send to Philip by daybreak all their priests and priestesses, clothed in their pontifical habits, to implore his mercy, and open the gates to him. Accordingly, next morning, the city was surrendered to Philip, while the greatest part of the Abydenians who survived vented millions of imprecations against their two fellow-citizens, but more particularly against the priests and priestesses for delivering up to the enemy those whom themselves had devoted to death with the most solemn oaths. Philip marched into the city, and seized, without opposition, all the rich effects which the Abydenians had collected together. But now he beheld a spectacle which might have terrified even an ambitious monarch or a conqueror. Among these ill-fated citizens, whom despair had made furious and distracted, some were smothering their wives and children, and others stabbing them with their own hands; some were running after them to strangle them, others were plunging them into wells, whilst again others were precipitating them from the tops of houses; in a word, death appeared in all its variety of terrors. Philip, penetrated with horror and grief at this spectacle, stopped the soldiers, who were eager to plunder, and published the strange declaration that he would allow three days to all who were resolved to lay violent hands on themselves. He was in hopes that in that interval they would change their determination: but their resolution was fixed. They thought it would be degenerating from those who had lost their lives in defending their country, if they should survive them. The individuals of every family killed one another, and none escaped this murderous sacrifice but a few whose hands were tied, or were otherwise kept, by force, from destroying themselves. And Philip, during the three days, satisfied his ideas of humanity by refraining from plundering the city he saw burning, and by beholding a people destroy each other, whom he might have saved with a word!

B.C. 190.—In the year 190 B.C. the city of Abydos was besieged by Livius the Roman prætor, and the inhabitants, after sustaining a siege of many days, were about to capitulate to the Romans. The only point of difference related to the soldiers of the garrison of Abydos, whom Livius would have allowed to quit the place, but without arms, while they insisted upon keeping them. The affair, however, was about to be settled, when Livius hearing of the victory of Polyxenidos over the Rhodians, and fearing that the former, flushed with success, would come to surprise and attack the fleet he had left at Canae, he abandoned the siege and put to sea.

ACRE, ST. JEAN D'; known in the middle ages as Ptolemais, is a city and harbor on the coast of Syria. It is the capital of a Turkish pachalic, between the pachalics of Damascus and Tripoli. The city is situated at the foot of Mount Carmel, and at present contains about sixteen thousand inhabitants.

A.D. 1191.—The ill success of the first Crusaders appeared to redouble the zeal of the Christians for the recovery of the Holy Land. Great misfortunes had attended many of the enterprises, but vast numbers had been enriched by the plunder of magnificent cities, and some of the leaders had acquired territorial possessions. France and England for a moment laid aside their quarrels; and their kings, Philip and Richard, levied armies for the delivery of the Holy Land.

Followed by their numerous battalions, accompanied by their most powerful vassals, the two kings embarked and met at Messina. The French directed their course toward St. Jean d'Acre, which city, having an excellent port, was equally necessary to the Christians to preserve Tyre and Tripoli, as it was to the Saracens to secure a communication between Egypt and Syria. For more than two years, Guy of Lusignan, King of Jerusalem, had besieged this important place with forces much less numerous than were employed in defending it. With an army increased by torrents of Crusaders, with which the West constantly inundated the East, and the wreck of the army of the Emperor Frederic, Guy ventured to march against Saladin, who was advancing to succor Acre. Never had the Christian legions evinced more ardor: the combat was bloody, but the success doubtful. Each claimed the honor of the victory; but certainly the loss was least on the part of the Crusaders; they resumed the siege, and the besieged continued to defend themselves with the same vigor, when Philip Augustus arrived in the camp. His presence added greatly to the hopes of the besiegers; the walls of Acre were falling fast beneath the attacks of its numerous assailants; the victorious soldiers would speedily have achieved the long-delayed conquest, if the King of the French had not checked their courage out of courtesy for the English monarch: he thus lost the great opportunity of which the infidels made good use; they repaired their breaches; and with the strength of their walls their spirits revived also. At length Richard arrived, dragging in his train, bound in chains of silver, Isaac Comnenus, King, or as he ostentatiously styled himself, Emperor of Cyprus, which island he had conquered during his voyage. A happy harmony presided over the first proceedings of the Kings of France and England, who shared by turns both honor and danger. The army calculated upon seeing Acre yield to the first general assault. When the French monarch attacked the city, Richard mounted the trenches. On the following day the King of England conducted the assault, and Philip in his turn provided for the safety of the besiegers. The emulation which prevailed between the two nations and their kings produced extraordinary acts of valor. Ptolemias saw indeed beneath its walls all the illustrious captains and warriors that Europe could then boast, and that in an age excelling most others in chivalric bravery. The tents of the Franks covered a vast plain, and their army presented a noble aspect. The presence of the two monarchs had re-established discipline, and Acre must soon have surrendered, if discord, that eternal enemy of the Christians, had not entered their camp with Richard.

Conrad of Montferrat, and Guy of Lusignan, both claimed the poor honor of being King of Jerusalem; and the Kings of England and France took opposite sides. Whenever Philip took the field, Richard played Achilles, and remained in his tent. The besieged had never more than one of the monarchs to contend with at a time. Amid their disputes, both monarchs fell dangerously ill; and their hatred and suspicion were so great, that each accused the other with having made an attempt upon his life. As Saladin sent them refreshments and physicians, and as they addressed frequent messages to him, each monarch reproached the other with keeping up an impious understanding with the Saracens.

They, however, began to be convinced that such dissensions jeopardized the safety of the army and the interests of the cause; the Jerusalem monarchy was amicably arranged, and the siege was resumed with fresh vigor. But the besieged had taken advantage of the respite granted to them by the Christian cabals, and had strengthened their fortifications, and the besiegers were astonished at the opposition they met with. Saladin, with a numerous army, was on the heights above Acre, so that the Christians were between the two fires of his forces and the garrison of the city, and whenever the Crusaders attacked Acre, Saladin made a skirmishing dash at their camp. But time must exhaust the resources of a city so strongly beleagured: the walls began to crumble under incessant attacks, and war, famine, and disease weakened the garrison; there were not soldiers enough to defend the walls and move about the cumbrous machines; the place wanted provisions, munitions of war, and Greek fire. The troops and the people began to murmur about Saladin and the emirs; and the commander of the garrison at length proposed a capitulation to Philip Augustus; but he swore by the God of the Christians that he would not spare a single inhabitant of Ptolemais if the Mussulmans did not restore all the cities that had fallen into their power since the battle of Tiberias.

Irritated by this determination, the chief of the emirs retired, saying that he and his companions would rather bury themselves beneath the ruins of the city than listen to such terms. On his return into the place, he communicated his courage, or rather his despair, to every heart. When the Christians resumed their assaults, they were repulsed with a vigor that astonished them. In one general assault a Florentine knight of the family of Buonaguisi, followed by a few of his men, fought his way into one of the towers of the infidels, and got possession of the Mussulman banner that floated from it. Overpowered by numbers and forced to retreat, he returned to the camp, bearing off the flag he had so heroically won. In the same assault, Alberic Clement, the first marshal of France of whom history makes mention, scaled the ramparts, and, sword in hand, penetrated into the city, where he found a glorious death. Stephen, count of Blois, and several knights were burnt by the Greek fire, the boiling oil, the melted lead, and heated sand which the besieged poured down upon all who approached the walls.

The obstinate ardor of the Mussulmans was sustained during several days; but as they received no succor, many emirs, at length despairing of the safety of Ptolemais, threw themselves by night into a bark, to seek an asylum in the camp of Saladin, preferring to encounter the anger of the sultan to perishing by the swords of the Christians. This desertion, and the contemplation of the ruined towers, filled the Mussulmans with terror. While pigeons and divers constantly announced to Saladin the horrible distresses of the besieged, the latter came to the resolution of leaving the city by night, and braving every peril to join the Saracen army. But their project being discovered by the Christians, they blocked up and guarded every passage by which the enemy could possibly escape. The emirs, the soldiers, and the inhabitants then became convinced that they had no hope but in the mercy of the Christian leaders, and promised, if they would grant them liberty and life, to give up sixteen hundred prisoners, together with the wood of the true cross. By the capitulation, they engaged to pay two hundred byzants of gold, and the garrison, with the entire population, were to remain hostages for the execution of the treaty.

The terms of the capitulation remained unexecuted; Saladin, under various pretexts, deferring the payments. Richard, irritated by a delay which appeared to him a breach of faith, revenged himself upon his prisoners. Without pity for disarmed enemies, or regard for the Christians he exposed to sanguinary reprisals, he massacred five thousand Mussulmans before the city they had so bravely defended.

Such was the conclusion of this famous siege, which lasted nearly three years, in which the Crusaders shed more blood and exhibited more bravery than ought to have suffered for the subjugation of the whole of Asia.

During this siege, six archbishops, twelve bishops, forty earls, five hundred barons, and three hundred thousand Christian soldiers were slain, and the loss on the part of the Saracens, equaled, if it did not exceed, this number.

Second Siege. A.D. 1291.—In the year 1291, it was retaken from the Christians by the Saracens, and of the followers of the cross, sixty thousand were slain. The Saracens rushed into the city, slaying all that came before them, and cruelly murdered a number of nuns, who, to repress the lust of the infidels, had mutilated their faces.

Third Siege, A.D. 1799.—On the 16th day of March, 1799, the French army under Napoleon Bonaparte, appeared before Acre, a town celebrated for its long siege, and the heroic deeds it witnessed in the Holy Wars. It is situated on a peninsula, which enables the besieged to unite all their means of defense on the isthmus which connects it with the mainland. The Pasha of Syria, Kara Yussuf, with all his treasures, arms, and artillery, had shut himself up in Acre, with the determination of making a desperate resistance. Sir Sidney Smith, at that time commander of the English squadron in the bay of Acre, immediately made preparations to assist the Turks in its defense. He had been apprised of its danger by the Pasha of Syria, and he arrived there two days before the appearance of the French army, with the Tiger of eighty-four, and Theseus of seventy-four guns, and some smaller vessels. On the 14th of March he captured a whole French flotilla, dispatched from Alexandria with the heavy artillery and stores for the siege of the town. The guns taken were immediately mounted on the ramparts of the town, and contributed in a most important manner to the defense of the place, The battering cannon of the French was thus reduced to four bombs, four twelve and eight eight pounders. The French, however, commenced and continued their operations with great activity. They repulsed a sally of the garrison on the 26th with great vigor, and two days afterward they exploded a mine which they had run under one of the principal towers, and a practicable breach was effected. The grenadiers immediately advanced to the assault. They were arrested, however, by a ditch fifteen feet deep, which was only partially filled by the ruins of the wall. But inflamed by their ardor they sprang into the ditch, mounted to the other side, and entering the breach, they effected a lodgment in the tower. But they were not adequately supported, and the Turks, returning to the charge, succeeded in driving them from that part of the ramparts after a desperate struggle, and great slaughter, back into their own trenches. A second assault was made on the 1st of April, with no better success, and the French general-in-chief determined to await the arrival of the heavy artillery from Damietta. In the mean time the Ottomans on the other side of the Jordan were collecting all their forces, with the intention of coming to the assistance of the besieged city. Napoleon saw the necessity of prompt action to prevent a general concentration of the hostile forces by sea and land against the camp before Acre. He at once marched a portion of his army to join the troops which he had stationed at Nazareth under command of Junot, and completely routed the enemy in the battle of Mount Tabor, after which he returned to the siege of Acre.* The French at length succeeded in adding three twenty-four and six eighteen pounders to their batteries, and they now opened a furious fire upon the tower which had been the scene of such vehement contests. They run mines under the walls, and exhausted all their resources of art to reduce the place, but in vian. The vigor and resolution of the garrison increased with every hour the siege continued. By a desperate effort, on the 6th of May, the French succeeded in effecting a lodgment in the nearly demolished tower, but they were driven back with immense loss, and the Turks regained possession of all their fortifications. For two months had the breach been practicable and the trenches open, but no sensible progress was as yet made in the reduction of the place. On the evening of the 7th of May, a few sails were seen from the tower of Acre, on the furthest verge of the horizon. The French quickly made the same discovery, and both the besiegers and besieged rejoiced in the hope that succor was at hand. The English cruisers in the bay stood out to reconnoiter this unknown fleet, and the hearts of the brave defenders of Acre rejoiced when they beheld the two squadrons unite, and saw the English cross and the Ottoman cresent unite and float from one masthead. Soon a fleet of ninety sail entered the bay with seven thousand men, and abundance of artillery and ammunition from Rhodes. Napoleon, calculating that this reinforcement could not be disembarked for at least six hours, resolved to anticipate its arrival by an assault during the night. At ten o'clock that night the division of Bon drove the enemy from the exterior works. The artillery approached the counterscarp and battered the curtain. At daybreak another breach in the rampart was declared practicable, and an assault ordered. Lannes's division renewed the attack on the tower, while General Rambaud led the column to the new breach. Bravely marched on the grenadiers; they made their way through all opposition to the summit of the rampart, and the morning sun fell upon the French banner floating from the tower. The fire of the place was now sensibly slackened. The French intrenched themselves in the lodgments they had formed, with sandbags and with the corpses of the slain. And over this bloody parapet could be seen their bristling baynots gleaming in the light. Although the troops in the roads were embarked in boats, still several hours must elapse before they could arrive to the assistance of the besieged. In this extremity Sir Sidney Smith landed the crews of the ships and led them, armed with pikes, to the breach. This sight reanimated the courage of the besieged; they mounted the long-disputed tower amid shouts from the heroes who still defended it, and they hurled down huge stones upon their assailants—the French, at half pistol shot, fired at them; muzzle touched muzzle; standards clashed together, and in a bloody hand to hand struggle they contested for victory. The French at length gave way before the united strength of the British and the Mussulmans. The grenadiers were driven from the tower, and a body of Turks rushed through the gates, attacked them in flank, and drove them across the ditch with great loss. The French division under Rambaud, however, was more successful. The soldiers reached the summit of the rampart, and, leaping down into the tower, attained the very garden of the pasha's seraglio. But suddenly Sir Sidney Smith, at the head of a regiment of janizaries, disciplined to the European method, rushed to the spot. A tremendous fire was opened upon the French from the housetops and the barricades which surrounded the seraglio; and at length the assailants were cut off from the breach at which they had entered, and driven into a neighboring mosque, where their lives were spared by the intercession of Sir Sidney Smith. In this bloody affair the loss of lives was very great on both sides. Rambaud was killed, and Lannes severely wounded. But Napoleon was not dismayed by this disaster. He resolved to make a last effort with the division of Kleber, which had been hastily recalled from its advanced post on the Jordan. On the morning of the 10th May, he advanced to the breach, in person, and seeing that it was greatly enlarged by the fire of the preceding days, he ordered a new assault. Again was the summit of the ruined wall attained; but the French were there arrested by the murderous fire which issued from the barricades and intrenchments with which the garrison had strengthened the interior of the tower. Kleber's division arrived in the evening, and, proud of their triumph at Mount Tabor, they demanded to be led to the assault. "If St. Jean d'Acre is not taken this evening," said one of the colonels, as he was marching at the head of his regiment to the assault, "be assured Vernor is slain." He kept his word: the fortress held out, but Vernor lay dead at the foot of the walls. A little before sunset a dark massy column issued from the trenches, and solemnly and firmly marched to the breach. They ascended unmolested to the summit, they descended uninjured into the pasha's garden, but when they had reached that point, they were assailed with irresistible fury by a body of the janizaries, who, with the saber in one hand and the dagger in the other, speedily reduced the whole column to headless trunks. In vain other columns, and even the Guides of Napoleon, his last reserve, advanced to the attack; they were repulsed with dreadful loss. Among the killed in this last encounter was General Bon; Crosier, aide-de-camp to the general-in-chief, and a large proportion of his staff were wounded. Napoleon now despaired of success, and preparations were made for a retreat. A proclamation was issued to the troops, announcing that their return was required to withstand a descent which was threatened from the isle of Rhodes, and on the 20th of May, for the first time in his life, Napoleon ordered a retreat.

Fourth Siege, A.D. 1840.—On the 3d of November, 1840, the city of Acre was bombarded by the British fleet under Admiral Sir Robert Stafford. The cannonading began from the ships and vessels at 2 P. M.; and endured three hours. The town was completely demolished, and the fortifications damaged so materially that the Egyptians evacuated the place during the night. During the cannonade, about 4 o'clock of the third, a large powder magazine in the city exploded with a tremendous concussion. Many lives were lost by this explosion. The entire British force employed on this occasion, consisted of about three thousand men. The Egyptians numbered at least 5,000. The British lost only fifty-nine men killed and wounded; while the Egyptian loss was two thousand men killed and wounded and three thousand made prisoners.

ADDA, B.C. 223.—In this year the Roman consuls, Flaminius and Furius entered the country of the Insubrians, at that portion of it where the river Adda empties into the Po. It was the first time that the Romans ever passed this river, and they were so roughly handled in their passage, by the Insubrians, that they made a treaty with them and quitted their country.

ADDA, A.D. 1799.—The Adda is a rapid stream in Italy, which, descending from the lake of Lecco, runs in a deep and swift torrent, over a surface of twenty-four leagues to the Po. The right bank is in almost all places higher than the left; and the bridges at Lecco, Cassano, Lodi, and Pizzighitone, are defended either by fortified towns or têtes-du-pont. On the 25th of April, 1799, the allied forces of Austria and Russia, approached the French army which had retired to the line of the Adda. A sharp skirmish ensued between the Russians, under Prince Bagrathaor, and the French, before the walls of Lecco, resulting in the defeat of the former. Suwarroff, the Russian marshal, now prepared to force the passage of the Adda. To frustrate this intention, General Moreau, commander of the French army, accumulated his troops in masses on that part of the river, which seemed chiefly threatened. But while entirely engaged in this design the Austrian division succeeded in throwing over a bridge during the night at Trezzo, and before morning his whole troop had crossed over to the right; while, at the same time, Wukassowich surprised the passage at Brivio. The French line was thus divided into three parts. General Serrurier's division, eight thousand strong, was not only cut off from all support, but even from receiving any orders from the remainder of the army. The divisions of Ott and Zoph commenced a furious attack on the French under Greneir. The French met the assault with the utmost bravery; but the overwhelming force of the enemy gradually drove them back toward Milan, leaving a bloody track of corpses behind them. In this affair they lost two thousand four hundred men, including eleven hundred prisoners. Serrurier's division, whose communication with the balance of the French army, was entirely cut off by the passage of Wukassowich at Brivio, established itself in a strong position at Verderio and the brave general determined to defend himself to the last extremity. General Grillet's brigade escaped destruction by embarking on the lake of Como and steering for Menagio. Serrurier's division was soon surrounded on all sides by the allies; his retreat was cut off, and his division threatened with destruction, for the enemy's force was three times stronger in numbers than his own. At length after an obstinate, but vain resistance, he laid down his arms, and surrendered, delivering into the hands of the enemy seven thousand men as prisoners of war. In the mean time General Melas carried the tête-du-pont at Cassano, and pursued the fugitives as far as Gorgonzelo, on the road to Milan. In these engagements the French lost eleven thousand men, and unable to meet the great army of the allies, sixty thousand strong, which was advancing in pursuit, they abandoned Milan, and withdrew behind the Tessino.

ADRIANOPLE, A.D. 323.—This celebrated city of Turkey in Europe, is situated on the Marizar, anciently called Hebrus, where that river is formed by the Toonza and the Arda, 134 miles north-west from Constantinople. It is beautifully located in one of the richest and finest plains in the world, on the sides and base of a low hill, and, when viewed at a distance, presents a magnificent appearance. In early times it was the capital of the Bessi, a people of Thrace.

In the year 323, Constantine gathered together his forces at Thessalonia, for the purpose of wresting all power from the hands of Licinius. The Roman world was now divided between Constantine and Licinius, the former of whom was master of the West, and the latter of the East. Constantine's army consisted of 120,000 horse and foot. His legions were levied in the warlike provinces of Europe: action had confirmed their discipline, and victory had elevated their hopes. The naval preparations of Constantine were in every respect inferior to those of Licinius. Licinius, although old and feeble, called forth a spirit which animated all those around him, and prepared himself for the contest; collecting the forces of the East, and filling the plains of Adrianople with his troops, and the straits of the Hellespont with his fleet. This army consisted of 150,000 foot and 15,000 horse; but it contained fewer soldiers, though more men, than that of Constantine. His fleet consisted of 350 galleys of three banks of oars. The fleet of Constantine consisted of only 200 small vessels. Licinius awaited the approach of his rival in a camp near Adrianople, which he had fortified with an anxious care, that betrayed his apprehension of the event. Constantine directed his march from Thessalonia, toward that part of Thrace, till he found himself stopped by the broad and rapid stream of the Hebrus, and discovered the numerous army of Licinius, which filled the steep ascent of the hill from the river to the city of Adrianople. Many days were spent in doubtful and distant skirmishes; but at length the obstacles of the passage and of the attack were removed by the intrepid conduct of Constantine. We are assured that the valiant emperor threw himself into the river Hebrus, accompanied only by twelve horsemen, and that by the effort or terror of his invincible arm, he broke, slaughtered, and put to flight a host of 150,000 men. The credulity of Zozimus prevailed so strongly over his passion, that, among the events of the memorable battle of Adrianople, he seems to have selected and embellished, not the most important, but the most marvelous. The valor and danger of Constantine are attested by a slight wound which he received in the thigh; but it may be discovered even from an imperfect narration, and, perhaps, a corrupted text, that the victory was obtained no less by the conduct of the general than by the courage of the hero; that a body of 5,000 archers marched round to occupy the thick wood in the rear of the enemy, whose attention was divided by the construction of a bridge; and that Licinius, perplexed by so many artful evolutions, was reluctantly drawn from his advantageous post, to combat on equal ground in the plain. The contest was no longer equal. His confused multitude of new levies was easily vanquished by the experienced veterans of the West; 34,000 men are reported to have been slain. The fortified camp of Licinius was taken by assault the evening of the battle; the greater part of the fugitives, who had returned to the mountains, surrendered themselves the next day to the discretion of the conqueror; and his rival, who could no longer keep the field, retired to Byzantium, and confined himself within its walls. Constantine immediately undertook the siege of Byzantium.—Gibbon.

AGRA, A.D. 1803.—Agra is a city of Hindostan, and the capital of the province and district of Agra. It is built on the south-west bank of the river Jumna, and is distant from Calcutta 950 miles, and from Bombay 850. After the capture of the city of Delhi, the ancient capital of Hindostan, by the British under General Lake, the Mahratta forces retired toward Agra. Thither they were speedily followed by General Lake, and on the 10th October, 1803, he came within sight of their army, which was posted in a strong position intersected by ravines, in the front of the city. He immediately attacked them; and the Sepoys, under Lieutenant Colonel Gerard, succeeded in dislodging them after some severe fighting. Following up his advantage, Lake ordered up fresh troops, who pursued the enemy over the glacis, and entered the city with the fugitives. But as the garrison still held out, it was necessary to besiege the ramparts in form. On the 12th October, two thousand five hundred of the enemy came over, and entered the British service. On the 15th the breaching batteries were finished, and commenced a heavy fire on the ramparts, the garrison of which, amounting to 6,000 men, finding the breach practicable, on the morning of the 17th surrendered at discretion.

By these decisive means, the last stronghold of the enemy fell into the hands of the British. The results of this victory were immense. One hundred and sixty pieces of brass and iron cannon were taken, besides all their ammunition and military stores.

AGRIGENTUM, B.C. 409.—Ambition and thirst of plunder having led the Carthaginians into Sicily, their general opened the campaign by laying siege to Agrigentum, an opulent and well-fortified city. In order to construct terraces and causeways, the besiegers destroyed the tombs which environed the city, which sacrilege cost both parties very dear, for the effluvia which escaped the violated graves bred a most destructive pestilence. Thousands of soldiers were carried off daily, and, among them, Hannibal, the general of the Carthaginians, fell an early victim to the disease. We need not remind our readers that this was not the great Hannibal. The multitude beheld, in this affliction, a punishment from the gods for the profanation of the ashes of the dead. To render them again propitious, prayers and offerings were made, and even a young child was sacrificed to Saturn. Notwithstanding these pious vows, famine, a no less redoubtable scourge, was added to the calamities of the besieged, who, without hope, and without resources, began to speak of surrendering. The Carthaginians refused to make any terms with them. Only one resource was left to the unfortunate Agrigentines; that of abandoning their city and taking refuge in the neighboring states. They must either leave their aged and sick to the mercy of a barbarous enemy, or remain and perish all together. Necessity prevailed over humanity; never was exhibited a stronger scene of desolation than of the Agrigentines, so recently happy and wealthy, departing forever from their homes, abandoning their sick or aged relations, their property, and all they held dear. In their misfortunes they received a friendly welcome from their neighbors, the inhabitants of Gela, whilst the cruel Carthaginians pillaged the city, and massacred every inhabitant who had been left behind.

SECOND SIEGE, B.C. 262.—In 262, B.C., the Romans laid siege to the city of Agrigentum. The Carthaginians had foreseen that the Romans, emboldened by the assistance which they should have from Hiero, would probably attack Agrigentum. They had, therefore, chosen it as their place of arms, and had strongly fortified it. The Romans encamped within a mile from Agrigentum, and compelled the enemy to shut themselves up within the walls of the city. As it was evident that the siege was to be of long continuance, the Roman soldiers dispersed themselves for the purpose of cutting and bringing in grain, which was now ripe. While thus separated, the Carthaginians suddenly fell upon them; the Roman foragers could not sustain such an attack, and were put to flight. The Carthaginians advanced to the Roman camp, and, dividing their troops into two bodies, the one commenced to pull up the palisades, whilst the other attacked the guards posted there for the defense of the camp. But, although the Carthaginians far outnumbered the Romans, the latter sustained the charge with the greatest bravery and resolution, for they knew that to desert their posts, was death by the laws of Rome. Aid soon arrived, and the Carthaginians were driven back with great slaughter.

This action rendered the Carthaginians less disposed to make sallies, and caused the Romans to be more cautious in their foraging. The siege continued without a decided movement on either side for nearly five months. But the Carthaginians, meanwhile, suffered greatly. At least fifty thousand individuals were shut up within the city, and they had consumed nearly all their provisions. Hannibal, the commander of the Carthaginian forces, sent courier after courier for aid and provisions, and at length Hanno, a Carthaginian general, arrived in Italy with fifty thousand foot, six thousand horses, and sixty elephants. Erbessus was placed in his hands by the inhabitants, and thus the Romans, also, became in want of provisions, as all their convoys were obliged to pass through that city. They were at length reduced almost to the last extremity, and Hanno, being informed that the Romans were greatly afflicted both by famine and disease, and seeing that his own troops were in good condition, marched with his whole army, and fifty elephants, toward the encampment of the Romans. He sent in advance of his army a body of Numidian cavalry, that they might draw the Romans from the camp before they learned the full extent of his army. As he expected, no sooner did the Roman cavalry see the Numidians approach than they charged upon them. The Numidians fled precipitately toward the spot from whence Hanno was advancing. The Romans hotly pursued them, and rushed directly into the trap which Hanno had laid for them. They were surrounded by Carthaginians, and a great number, unable to escape, died fighting to the last. The main body of the Romans were discouraged by the fate of their cavalry and Hanno was somewhat intimidated by the boldness so strongly evinced by the Romans, and although the two armies were so near each other, no important action was taken within two months. At length the Roman consuls were apprised by Hanno that he had appointed a time for the battle. They remained silent. Hanno now offered them battle with more haughtiness, reproaching them with their abject timidity. The Romans contented themselves with defending their camp. At last, one day, Hanno as usual attacked the intrenchments, and the Romans, according to custom, marched out only to repulse him. But when Hanno's troops, fatigued and harassed by a continual round of skirmishes from six in the morning till noon, were retiring, the Roman consul charged upon them with all his legions. Hanno's men, although surprised, fought with desperate valor; but they were equally matched with the Romans, who had come into the field fresh from repose. The mercenary soldiers of the first line of the Carthaginian army, first began to waver. They not only abandoned their posts, but throwing themselves into the midst of the elephants, and upon the second line, disordered all the ranks, and in a few moments the whole army was flying. Hannibal also made a sally from the city; but he was repulsed by the Romans with great loss. The Carthaginian camp was taken; thirty elephants were killed, three were wounded, and eleven fell into the hands of the Romans. The Carthaginian soldiers were either cut to pieces or dispersed, a few only escaped with their general to Heraclea. The Romans gave themselves up to the joy of their victory, and Hannibal, hoping to take advantage of their fatigue and neglect, at night quitted the city. He was pursued, however, the next morning by the Romans; but he had accomplished such a distance that only his rear guard was overtaken. The inhabitants of Agrigentum seeing themselves abandoned by the Carthaginians, slew many of those who remained in the city, either to avenge themselves on the authors of their miseries, or to win the favor of their conquerors. But they fared no better on that account; twenty-five thousand men of them being made slaves. Thus, after a siege of five months, Agrigentum was taken by the Romans, and a great number of other places surrendered themselves, in consequence, to the victors.

Some years afterward the Carthaginians retook Agrigentum in a few days, and completely razed it to the ground. It was afterward rebuilt, however, and is now called Gergenti.

AI, B.C. 1451.—Ai was a small city about twelve miles from Jericho; and Joshua, who considered it weak and illy defended, endeavored to capture it with only a detachment of 3,000 men. But the Israelites were totally defeated, and driven back into their own encampment. A crime had been committed, and, until the offender was punished, God withheld his protection. Achan, a man of the tribe of Judah, had, against the strict injunction of Joshua, secured and appropriated to himself, at the sacking of Jericho, a rich Babylonish garment, with two hundred shekels of silver, and a wedge of gold of fifty shekels weight. The culprit, after being discovered, was taken to a valley, with his family, his cattle, and his tent, and all his newly-acquired treasure. The goods were burned, and the culprit and his family were stoned to death. Now, a second attempt was made against Ai, with divine aid. After planting an ambuscade on the western side of the town, the main body of the army advanced on the northern. The King of Ai, at the head of his troops, immediately marched out to meet them; the Israelites feigned to retreat until they had drawn the enemy some distance from the town. Then, the 30,000 men who constituted the ambuscade, sallied forth, and entered the city. They instantly applied the torch, and soon the city was enveloped in flames. Now, Joshua, at the head of the main body of the army, turned upon the enemy, who, unable to contend against them, turned and fled. The Israelites, pursuing, cut them down, and not a man escaped. Every man, woman, and child was given to the sword, and the King of Ai was hung, and his body, after hanging until sundown, was buried at one of the gates, beneath a pile of stones.

AIGUEBELLE, A.D. 1742.—Near this place, which is situated on the left bank of the Arc in Savoy, a battle was fought, in 1742, between the troops of the King of Savoy and the allied armies of France and Spain, which resulted in the defeat of the former.

AIGUILLON, A.D. 1345.—The fortress of Aiguillon, a town of France, at the junction of the Lot with the Garrone, was garrisoned by the English in 1345, who resisted an attack from a numerous French army in that year.

ALBUERA, A.D. 1811.—The battle of Albuera was a bloody battle: 15,000 men were slain in four hours. Of these, 8,000 were Frenchmen, and 7,000 English. On the 16th day of May, 1811, the French forces, amounting to 20,000 men, under command of Soult, advanced on the English and Spanish army, under Beresford, who occupied the heights before Albuera, and then followed the most terrible battle of the Peninsular War. The French army, in solid columns, steadily moved over the field, and firmly ascended the heights. The artillery of the enemy poured forth their messengers of death upon these columns with fatal effect. The French returned the fire with equally terrible precision, and continued steadily to advance, vomiting fire and death upon their enemies as they proceeded. They gained the heights occupied by the Spanish. The English rushed to retake and maintain these heights; but the French crowded upon them with the bayonet, and drove them from the contested ground with great slaughter. The third brigade of the English army, which thus far had been unemployed, now came to the rescue; but the havoc committed by Soult's artillery upon the British ranks held them in check, and victory seemed to be within the grasp of the French. But now came on, like a whirlwind, the gallant British brigade, the Fusiliers. Soult's cannon still spat forth death upon the English ranks, and the French infantry showered mitrailles in murderous succession upon them. Up came the Fusiliers, they dashed against the opposing ranks of the French, and, with the force of a hurricane, they bore onward through all opposition. The French line faltered, they gave way, they broke, and, in disorder, flew rapidly down the hill. The Fusiliers pursued, and, with triumphant shouts, battled with the few who still desperately endeavored to oppose them; until all resistance was overthrown by the death of the gallant resisters, and the English stood, proud conquerors, on the heights. The following extract from the "Reminiscences of a Subaltern," vividly depicts the horrors of the battle: "About 6 o'clock, A.M., we came in sight of our troops on the field of battle, at Albuera; the French were discerned near a wood about a mile and a half in their front. We now advanced in subdivisions, at double distances, to make our number as formidable as possible, and, arriving on the field, piled our arms, and were permitted to move about. With awful astonishment we gazed on the terrific scene before us. * * * Before us lay the appalling sight of 6,000 men dead, and mostly stark naked, having, as we were informed, been stripped during the night by the Spaniards; their bodies disfigured with dirt and clotted with blood, and torn by the deadly gashes inflicted by the bullet, bayonet, sword, or lance, that had terminated their mortal existence."

ALCANIZ, A.D. 1809.—Alcaniz, a town of Spain, in the province of Ternel, in Arragon, is built on the side of a hill, on the right bank of the river Guadaloupe.

On the 23d of May, 1809, Blake, who commanded the Spanish forces, occupied this town with 12,000 men. General Suchet, who had been recently appointed by Napoleon to the command of the French in Arragon, determined to march against him. His troops consisted of 8,000 infantry, and 700 horse, but the superior quality and discipline of these troops, gave him hopes of an easy victory.

Suchet commenced the action by directing an attack of 3,000 of his best men against the center of the Spanish line which rested on the Mount of Las Horcas. These men boldly advanced, but they were steadily repulsed by Blake's infantry and artillery; against the fire of which they found it impossible to advance. The French troops were greatly discouraged by this check, and Suchet, who was apprehensive of greater disasters, had he continued the action, gave orders for his troops to withdraw, after a short combat. Such was the disorder which prevailed among them, that although they were not pursued, they were, by a false alarm, thrown into confusion, and fled, as if routed, to Semper.

In this action, Suchet lost nearly 1,000 men, while the Spaniards were only weakened by the loss of 300.

ALEXANDRIA, B.C. 46.—This celebrated city derives its name from Alexander the Great, by whom it was either founded, or raised from obscurity, 332 years B.C. Alexandria is situated on the ridge of land between the sea and the bed of the old Lake Mareotis, about 14 miles W. S. W. of the Canopic, or most westerly mouth of the Nile, in Egypt. The two main branches of the Nile are to the east of Alexandria—the first in this direction being that on which is placed Rosetta, and that still further east being that on which Damietta is situated. Between Alexandria and Rosetta is Aboukir Bay.

B.C. 46.—After having defeated Pompey, Cæsar entered Alexandria, to endeavor to regulate the affairs of Egypt, then embroiled by the ambition of Cleopatra. During his abode there, Achilles, minister of King Ptolemy, disgusted at his proceedings, raised an army of 20,000 disciplined Egyptian troops, and offered battle to the great dictator. Cæsar had only 3,000 thousand foot and 8,000 horse. Without giving a moment's consideration to his weakness, and relying entirely on his constant good fortune, he made a sortie from Alexandria, where the Egyptians besieged him, and drove them to a distance from the walls. He fought several battles with the same results, but, weakened in the end by his own successes,—for, though victorious, he in each conflict necessarily lost some men,— he ceased to be the conqueror. It was in the course of this war that the celebrated Alexandrian library was burnt, the collecting of which had been the work of many kings, and consisted of more than four hundred thousand volumes. It was likewise after a contest in which he had been worsted, that he had to swim for his life, which he did with one hand, holding, it is said, his "Commentaries" in the other. Cæsar did not escape the fascinations of Cleopatra: as she did by all who came within the circle of her machinations, she made him subservient to her ambitious views. She had one son by him, named Cæsarion, afterward sacrificed to the jealousy of Augustus. After passing through many dangers, he received succor, and was triumphant; he defeated the Egyptians, under their king Ptolemy Bacchus, who drowned himself in the Nile.

In the year A.D. 213, Caracalla, the cruel Emperor of Rome, in the midst of peace, and upon the slightest provocation, issued his command for a general massacre at Alexandria. From a secure post he viewed and directed the slaughter of many thousand citizens as well as strangers, without distinguishing either the number or the crime of the sufferers; since, as he coolly informed the Roman senate, all the Alexandrians, those who had perished, and those who had escaped, were alike guilty.

SECOND SIEGE, A.D. 260.—Under Gallus, Alexandria, whose population amounted to 300,000 freemen, and as many slaves, became the theater of a frightful civil war, which lasted twelve years. All communication was cut off between the different parts of that unfortunate city; every street was inundated with blood; the major part of the better sort of houses were converted into citadels, and these horrible disorders were not appeased till after most of the inhabitants had perished by the sword, pestilence, or famine.

THIRD SIEGE, A.D. 296.—In the year 296, Alexandria was besieged by Diocletian, Emperor of Rome. He cut off the aqueducts which conveyed the waters of the Nile into every quarter of that immense city, and rendering his camp impregnable to the sallies of the besieged multitude, he pushed his reiterated attacks with caution and vigor. After a siege of eight months, Alexandria, wasted by the sword, and by fire, implored the clemency of the conqueror, but it experienced the full extent of his severity. Many thousands of the citizens perished in a promiscuous slaughter, and there were few obnoxious persons in Egypt who escaped a sentence of death, or at least of exile.

Ancient Alexandria must have been far different from the Alexandria of the present day. According to Pliny, it contained a population of 300,000 individuals. Much of its grandeur perished when, in the year 389, the Emperor Theodosius ordered all the heathen temples throughout the Roman dominions to be destroyed. But there yet remained a magnificent library of several hundred thousand volumes, including all the Greek and Latin literature, of which we now only possess fragments.

FOURTH SIEGE, A.D. 611.—Chosroës, eleventh King of Persia, after having conquered Syria, Palestine, and the greater part of Asia, attacked Egypt, surprised Pelusium, and advanced as far as Alexandria without obstacle. The city might certainly have been supported by its fleet, but the archbishop and prefect had employed all the vessels in carrying themselves and their enormous wealth to a place of safety in the isle of Cyprus. Chosroës entered this second city of the Greek empire in triumph, and found in it almost incalculable riches. Heraclius sued for peace, which Chosroës granted, but only with a view of preparing for a fresh war. This recommenced in 627. The haughty Chosroës was conquered; his own son caused him to be killed, and restored to the Emperor Heraclius all his father's conquests. Thus Egypt returned, but for a very short time, under the Roman domination.

FIFTH SIEGE, A.D. 640.—Mahomet, who was destined to subdue, by his arms and his religion, half the globe as then known, had made himself master of Arabia. His successors thought it their duty to extend his opinions and his conquests. Amrou, the lieutenant of the Caliph Omar, took possession of Palestine, and entered Egypt. He employed thirty days in the siege of Pelusium, and then advanced to the ruins of Heliopolis. Thence he proceeded to ancient Memphis, called the Widow of her Kings, after she was eclipsed by her rival Alexandria: her palaces and temples were sinking into ruins. The two banks of the Nile, here three thousand feet wide, were united by two bridges of sixty-three boats, connected by the little isle of Ronda, standing in the middle of the river, and covered with gardens and delightful habitations. At the eastern extremity of the bridge was the city of Babylon, and the camp of a Roman legion defended the passage of the river and the second city of Egypt. Amrou laid siege to this fortress, which might be considered as a part of Memphis. After a siege of seven months the place was carried by assault. The Greeks, on retiring from Upper Egypt, occupied all the important places of the Delta, but were driven out of them in twenty-two days by Amrou. At length Amrou commenced the siege of Alexandria. This first commercial city in the world was abundantly supplied with all the means of defense and subsistence: the sea was always open to it. If Heraclius could have been roused from his lethargy, considerable reinforcements might have been sent to support the besieged. Alexandria itself furnished excellent means of defense; the two great sides of the long square which it forms being covered by the sea and the lake Mareotis, the fronts of attack were narrow, and easily defended. Amrou, however, never ceased to excite the courage of the besiegers by sending them fresh reinforcements daily. The Moslems had carried their war into Egypt, with the determination to exterminate all vestiges of the Christian religion. The Saracens fought with the courage of lions: they repulsed the frequent and almost daily sallies of the besieged, and soon, in their turn, assaulted the walls and towers of the city. Alexandria was abundantly provided with the means of subsistence and defense. The numerous inhabitants fought for the dearest of human rights, religion and property. But the Moslems, animated by the cause for which they contested, the spread of their beloved religion, and by their hatred of the Christians, fought with a desperate valor, which at length conquered. In every attack, the sword, the banner of Amrou, glittered in the van of the Moslems. On a memorable day he was betrayed by his imprudent valor: his followers, who had entered the citadel, were driven back, and the general, with a friend and a slave, remained a prisoner in the hands of the Christians. When Amrou was conducted before the prefect, he remembered his dignity, and forgot his situation: a lofty demeanor, and resolute language, revealed the lieutenant of the caliph, and the battle-axe of a soldier was raised to strike off the head of the audacious captive. His life was saved by the readiness of his slave, who instantly gave his master a blow on the face, and commanded him, with an angry tone, to be silent in the presence of his superiors. The credulous Greek was deceived: he listened to the offer of a treaty, and his prisoners were dismissed, in the hope of a more respectable embassy, till the joyful acclamations of the camp announced the return of their general, and insulted the folly of the Christians. At length, after a siege of fourteen months, and the loss of 23,000 men, the Saracens prevailed; the Greeks embarked their dispirited and diminished numbers, and the standard of Mahomet was planted on the walls of the capital of Egypt. The conquerors were astonished by the greatness of the prize; and Amrou, in acquainting the caliph with its capture, said: "We have taken the great city of the West. It is impossible for me to enumerate the variety of its riches and beauty; and I shall content myself with observing, that it contains 4,000 palaces, 4,000 baths, 400 theaters, or places of amusement, 12,000 shops for the sale of vegetable food, and 40,000 tributary Jews. The town has been subdued by force of arms, without treaty or capitulation." It was on this occasion that the famous library is said to have been destroyed, conformable to the fanatical decision of the caliph, that "if the writings of the Greeks agreed with the word of God, they were useless, and need not be preserved; if they disagreed, they were pernicious, and ought to be destroyed." This barbarous judgment being carried into effect, the books and manuscripts were distributed among the 4,000 baths belonging to the city; and so prodigious was their number, that six months are said to have been required for the consumption of this precious fuel! Such is the tale which has so often aroused the pious indignation of every scholar, and admirer of the learning and genius of antiquity. Gibbon denies both the fact and the consequences, because the whole occurrence rests on the solitary statement of Abulpharogius; but, since Gibbon's time, several new authorities have been adduced to support the authoritiy of Abulpharogius. The fact of the burning of the library by the command of Omar, is considered by many of the Oriental scholars, beyond question.

Sixth Siege, A.D. 645.—Alexandria was tranquil under the government of its conqueror, but after the death of Omar, Amrou was recalled. The Greek emperors feeling keenly the loss of Egypt, took advantage of this circumstance to make a descent upon its coasts. At the sight of their ancient compatriots, the Alexandrians rose, took up arms, drove out the infidels, and opened their gates to the Greeks. Amrou, being informed of this revolt, returned from Libya, chastised Alexandria, and drove the Christians from its walls. Persuaded that such an example would be sufficient to restrain the Egyptians, he again set out for Tripoli; but the Greeks returned once more, and took possession of the port and the city of Alexandria. Amrou, exceedingly irritated, came back; but he had sworn, this time, to dismantle this indocile city. He kept his word; he protected the Alexandrians as much as he could from the fury of the soldiery; but he razed the walls, diminished its extent, and left the inhabitants to exist amid the ruins of their country.

Seventh Siege, A.D. 1171.—Egypt belonged for three centuries to the Fatimite caliphs; but this race degenerated: divided among themselves for the possession of power, one of its two branches had the imprudence to call in the Sultan of Damascus to its aid. After several battles, the latter was the conqueror, but he kept his conquest for himself. Saladin, his son, became, in 1171, Sultan of Egypt.

The descendants of this great man were, in their turn, displaced by the Mamelukes and their beys, a singular kind of militia, continually recruited by slaves from Mount Caucasus; themselves choosing their sultans, as the Prætorian Guards had done, and, like them, disposing of power. Egypt was conquered by the Ottomans. Selim I. contented himself with weakening, for the time, the influence of the Mamelukes; but, always ambitious, they resumed, by degrees, their authority under his weak successors, and only left the Ottoman Porte a shadow of power in the provinces over which they tyrannized.

Eighth Siege, A.D. 1798.—Napoleon, immediately after landing in Egypt, advanced, at the head of 5,000 men, toward Alexandria. The shouts from the ramparts, and the discharge of some pieces of artillery, left no doubt as to the hostile intentions of the Mamelukes; an assault was immediately ordered, and in a short time the French grenadiers reached the top of the walls. Kleber was struck by a ball on the head, and Menou thrown down from the top of the rampart to the bottom; but the ardor of the French soldiers overcame every resistance: and the negligence of the Turks having left one of the principal gates open during the assault, the defenders of the wall were speedily beaten in rear by those who rushed in at the entrance, and fled in confusion into the interior of the city. Shortly afterward, Napoleon issued a proclamation to the Egyptians, with the endeavor to conciliate them, and then, at the head of his army, commenced his march through the country toward Cairo.

ALEXANDRIA, battle of, A.D. 1801.—On the morning of the 21st of March, 1801, two magnificent armies were drawn up in battle array, within sight of the city of Alexandria. French valor and English courage were about to meet and strive for the supremacy. The French army consisted of 11,000 men, of whom 1,400 were cavalry, with 46 pieces of cannon. The French troops were posted along a high ridge of hills which extended from the sea to the canals of Alexandria. In the rear of the left wing of the French army stood Fort Caffarelli, and in the center arose Fort Cretin. The position occupied by the British was by nature strong; their right wing advanced before the rest of the line nearly a quarter of a mile on high ground, and extended to the large and magnificent ruins of a Roman palace, within fifty yards of the sea; their left rested on the Lake Maadieh; the intervening space, about a mile in breadth, consisted of a succession of low sand-hills. In front of the position was a level sandy surface, which commenced before the left, and extended as far as the French lines. On this plain cavalry could act; but as they approached the British videttes, they found the ground strewed with large stones, the remains of Roman edifices which formerly had covered all that part of the shore. Gun-boats in the sea and the lake, protected each flank; on the left, in front of the lines occupied by the troops, was a redoubt, mounted by twelve pieces of cannon; two were placed on the ruins of the Roman palace, and, in the center, slight works were thrown up, to aid the fire of the musketry. In this position, the English army, consisting of 11,500 men, with thirty-six pieces of cannon, awaited the attack of the enemy. The morning was gloomy and sad. A mist covered the entire plain. Both armies were buried in the obscurity of the fog. Suddenly, the report of a musket, followed by two cannon shots, was heard on the right wing of the French army; the English officers, thinking the attack was to commence there, galloped hurriedly in that direction, when a sharp rattle broke out on the left wing of the enemy, which, with the loud shouts that followed, too surely announced that the attack had commenced in that quarter. The French, under Lanusse, in great force, were advancing against the Roman ruins, where the 58th and 23d British regiments were posted. The English no sooner saw the glazed caps of the republicans emerging through the mist, than they poured a fire, by platoons, upon them, and the French were compelled to swerve to the left. In this movement the gallant French general, Lanusse, received a mortal wound. His division was so disconcerted by this event, and the fire of the English, that they broke, and fled in confusion behind the sand-hills. But, at this instant, General Rampon advanced at the head of a fresh column, 2,000 strong, and, joining the broken remains of Lanusse's division, renewed the attack with greater force, and succeeded in turning the Roman ruins, so as to take the troops which defended them, both in front and flank. Sir Ralph Abercromby, the English general, immediately advanced, with the 42d and 28th regiments, from the second line, to the support of the menaced wing; but soon after it arrived in the fire, the first of these corps was suddenly charged in flank by the republican cavalry. Notwithstanding this, the brave Highlanders formed in little knots, and, standing back to back, resisted the cavalry when they endeavored to cut them down. The 28th regiment was maintaining a severe action in front, when they were startled by hearing French voices behind their line; the rear rank had just time to face about when it was assailed by a volley from a French regiment which had got round, under cover of the mist; and these gallant troops, without flinching, stood back to back, and maintained this extraordinary contest for a considerable time. But this bold irruption of the French soon exposed them to the same dangers with which they had threatened the English. The British reserve advanced, and threw in a well-directed fire upon the attacking column; the French, in their turn, were assailed at once in front and flank. They fought with the utmost courage; but, overwhelmed with numbers, they retired into the ruins, where a battalion which, by their great bravery and success in the Italian wars, had acquired the name of the Invincibles, were obliged to lay down their arms, after having fought with astonishing intrepidity, and losing more than two thirds of their men. The French cavalry, now having lost half their force by the close and murderous fire of the English infantry, prepared to cut their way back to their own lines. For this purpose they charged the English reserve with the utmost fury; but the English, opening their ranks, allowed the French squadrons to sweep through. Then, instantly closing their ranks again, they wheeled about and poured so deadly a fire upon the disordered horsemen, that they almost all, with their commander, Roize, perished on the spot. The remnant, both foot and horse, of the force which had made this formidable attack, escaped, and regained the French position. The defeat of this desperate attack terminated the operations of this day. The right wing of the French army confined itself to a distant cannonade on the left of the English. The French made a desperate attack on the center of the English, but were repulsed by a close and destructive fire. At length the French commander, Menou, finding all his efforts unsuccessful, ordered a general retreat, which was effected in the best order, to the heights of Nicopolis, on his rear, under cover of the cannon placed on that formidable position. The English loss, on this occasion, amounted to 1,500, killed and wounded. Sir Ralph Abercromby, the English general, received a mortal wound in the early part of the day. He died a few days after the battle. The French lost 2,000, killed and wounded. The battle of Alexandria decided the fate of Napoleon's expedition into Egypt.

ALESSANDRIA, A.D. 1799.—The battle of Alessandria occurred on the 17th of May, 1799, between the Austro-Russian army, under Suwarrow, and the French under Moreau. The French were defeated, losing 4,000 men. Alessandria is an important town of the Sardinian states, on the Tanaro, near where that river is joined by the Bormida. The French took possession of Alessandria in the year 1798; but lost it by their defeat in 1799. After the battle of Marengo, which took place the following year, Alessandria was again delivered up to the French.

ALFORD, A.D. 1645.—General Baillie, with a large body of covenanters, was defeated by the Marquis of Montross, at Alford. Montross, weak in cavalry, lined his troops of horse with infantry; and after putting the enemy's horse to rout, fell with united force upon their foot, who were entirely cut to pieces, though with the loss of Lord Gordon on the part of the royalists.—Hume.

ALIGHUR, A.D. 1803.—The name of a British fortress in British India, 50 miles north of Agra, which was taken by the British on the 4th of September, 1803.

ALGIERS, A.D. 1816.—This country of north Africa, now frequently called Algeria, was, till recently, the most powerful of the Barbary states, comprising the Numidia proper of the ancients. Forty-four years before Christ, it was reduced to a Roman province. It afterward became independent, till dreading the power of the Spaniards, the natives invited the famous pirates, the brothers of Barbarossa, to assist it, and in the year 1516, they seized the government. It afterward fell to the lot of Turkey. The survivors of Barbarossa in 1520 obtained from Sultan Selim, the title of Dey, and a reinforcement of 2,000 troops. Since then the Algierines have carried on almost incessant hostilities against the powers of Christendom, capturing their ships, and reducing their subjects to slavery. Attempts have been made at different periods to abate this nuisance. In 1541, the Emperor Charles V., who had successfully achieved a similar enterprise, at Tunis, arrived with a powerful fleet and army in the vicinity of the city of Algiers; but the fleet having been immediately overtaken and nearly destroyed by a violent storm, the troops, without provisions or shelter, underwent the greatest privations; and the emperor was compelled forthwith to re-embark such of them as had escaped the fury of the elements and the sword of the Turks. This great disaster seemed for a lengthened period to have checked all attempts to capture Algiers. In 1653, Blake, the English admiral, with a fleet of thirty ships, sailed to Algiers, and compelled the Dey to make peace, and to restrain his piratical subjects from further violence on the English. He presented himself before Tunis; and having there made the same demands, the Dey of that republic bade him to look to the castles of Porto Fariro and Golleto, and do his utmost. Blake needed not to be roused by such a bravado: he drew his ships close up to the castles, and tore them in pieces with his artillery. He sent a numerous detachment of sailors in their long boats into the harbor, and burned every ship which lay there. This bold action was executed with little loss, and terrified both countries to make peace with the English; but they repulsed the occasional attacks of other European powers, who, in general, preferred negotiating treaties with the Dey, and purchasing an exemption from the attacks of the Algerine crusers.

The atrocities committed by the Algerines, and particularly their barbarous massacre of the crews of more than 300 small vessels at Bona, induced the British government to prepare an expedition to act against the forts and shipping of Algiers. Accordingly, on the 28th of July, 1816, a fleet consisting of the following ships of the line, set sail from Plymouth Sound, with a fine northerly wind:

100 guns,	Queen Charlotte,	50 guns,	Leander,
98 "	Impregnable,		Severn,
	Superb,	40 "	Glasgow,
74 "	Minden,		Granicus,
	Albion,	36 "	Hebrus.

The fleet also contained five brigs and four gun-boats, and was under the entire command of Admiral Lord Exmouth. On the 9th of August, at 2 o'clock P. M., Lord Exmouth anchored the fleet in Gibraltar bay, where he found the 74 gun ship Minden, which had been ordered on ahead, when off Falmouth; and also the following Dutch ships under Vice Admiral Baron Van de Cappellen:

40 guns,	Melampus,	40 guns,	Amstis,
	Fredrica,		Dogeradt,
	Diana,		Ecendrag.

The baron immediately volunteered the co-operation of his squadron; and the offer being readily embraced, Lord Exmouth made every preparation for an attack upon the Algerine batteries. On the 13th of August, the 18 gun brig Satellite, Captain James Murray, arrived from off Algiers, and on the same day, the captain of each ship received a plan of the fortifications with instructions for their guidance. On the 14th, early in the forenoon, the wind having shifted to the southward, the whole fleet, except the Jasper, which was sent to England with dispatches, amounting to 23 sail, with five gun-boats, and a sloop fitted up as an explosion vessel, under the direction of Lieutenant Fleming, weighed and proceeded on their destination. On the 16th the wind blew from the eastward; in the evening the 18 gun corvette Prometheus, Captain Dashwood, joined from Algiers, having on board the wife and children of Mr. M'Donnell, the British consul; but the Dey, had detained the consul, the surgeon, and several of the officers and crew of the Prometheus.

The fortifications of Algiers were of considerable strength. Upon the various batteries on the north side, 80 pieces of cannon and eight heavy mortars were mounted; but the water was so shoal that a large ship could not approach within reach of them. Between the north wall of the city, and the commencement of the pier (which is about two hundred and fifty yards in length and connects the town with the light-house) were about 20 guns; and a semicircular battery, mounting 44 guns, in two tiers, stood on the north projection of the wall. To the south of that, and nearly in a line with the pier, was the light-house battery of three tiers, mounting 48 guns, next to which was the "eastern battery," mounting 66 guns in three tiers, flanked by four other batteries of two tiers, mounting 60 guns; and on the wall-head were two long 68 pounders, described as being 20 feet long. The total number of guns on the wall amounted at least to 220, of 32, 24, and 18 pounders. The fish-market battery, 3000 yards west of the south mole-head mounted 15 guns in three tiers. Between them and the southern extremity of the city were two batteries of five guns each. Beyond the city in this direction was a castle and three other batteries, mounting together about 70 guns. In the rear of the city and on the heights were several other batteries; so that the total number of guns to defend this fastness of robbery, oppression, and cruelty, exceeded 1,000 guns.

On the 27th, at day-break, the city was seen, the ships at this time lying nearly becalmed. Lieutenant Burgess was then dispatched to the Dey, to demand compliance with the following conditions:—The abolition of Christian slavery; the release of all Christian slaves; the repayment of the money recently exacted for the redemption of the Neapolitan and Sardinian slaves; peace with the King of the Netherlands, and the immediate liberation of the British consul, with the officers and boats' crews of the Prometheus. At nine o'clock, Lieutenant Burgess, with a flag of truce flying, pushed off from the Severn frigate, which had towed the boat in shore; and at eleven A. M., when near the mole, was met by a boat in which was the captain of the port, by whom an answer was promised to the demand in two hours. Meanwhile the sea-breeze having sprung up, the fleet stood into the bay, and hove to about a mile from the city. At two P. M., no answer having been received, Lieutenant Burgess made a signal to that effect; and pulled off toward the Severn. Lord Exmouth immediately demanded, by signal, if all the ships were ready, and being answered in the affirmative, the fleet bore up for the attack in the prescribed order. At half-past two, the Queen Charlotte anchored with springs, about fifty yards from the mole-head, and while in the act of making a rope fast to an Algerine brig on shore at the mouth of the harbor, a shot was fired at the ship; and at the same moment two shots were fired at the Impregnable and other ships as they were advancing to take their stations. Lord Exmouth, anxious to save the mass of people standing on the parapet of the wall, waved his hand to them to descend; and immediately afterward commenced firing, and the action became general as the ships brought their guns to bear. The cannonade from the ships was incessant; and was replied to from the Algerine gun-boats, row-galleys, and batteries with the utmost vigor. At four o'clock the Algerine frigate lying across the mole was set on fire by Lieutenant Richards of the Queen Charlotte, who returned with his barge, losing only two men. At seven in the evening, the fire continued to rage on both sides; the British mortars and rockets had set all the vessels in the harbor on fire; and the flames soon reached the arsenal, and storehouses on the mole. The city also was set on fire in several places, by the shells thrown from the bomb-boats. The ordnance sloop, fitted out as an explosion vessel, was now run on shore close under the semicircular battery to the northward of the light-house; and, at about nine o'clock, this vessel, charged with 143 barrels of powder, exploded. The fleet continued a tremendous cannonade till 10 P. M., when the upper tier of the batteries on the mole being nearly destroyed, and the lower tier almost silenced, the Queen Charlotte cut her cables, and stood out from the land, directing the other ships to follow. The breeze was so light that the Superb and Impregnable in standing off shore, suffered much from the raking fire of a fort on the upper angle of the city. The blaze of the Algerine fleet and burning houses, illumined the whole bay. The rain commenced falling in torrents; and for three hours the lightning played in vivid flashes, while peal after peal of thunder rolled athwart the sky, adding to the grandeur of the spectacle. During this heavy day's work the allies lost 883 men, killed and wounded, of whom 65 were Dutch. No ship lost a spar; but the Impregnable, Leander, Superb, Granicus, and Severn, had their masts and yards much damaged.

At daylight in the morning the bombs were ordered to return to their stations, and to be in readiness to renew the bombardment of the city, and Lieutenant Burgess was dispatched with a flag of truce to repeat the demands made on the preceding day. The Algerine officers, who came out to meet the flag of truce, declared that an answer had been sent the day before; but no boat was found to receive it. On the 29th, at ten A.M., the captain of the port came off, accompanied by Mr. M'Donnell, the British consul. In the afternoon, Captain Brisbane, of the Queen Charlotte, had a conference with the Dey, after which several other conferences were held, and the final result was, the delivery to the British of 1,200 Christian slaves, the restoration of $382,500, for slaves redeemed by Naples and Sicily; peace with the Netherlands, and $30,000 to the British consul, in compensation for the loss of his property, and a public apology for detention of his person. Having thus completed the object of the expedition, the ships weighed on the 3d of September, on their return to England, leaving the Prometheus only to attend the British consul.

ALIWAL, A.D. 1846.—On the morning of the 28th of January, 1846, a battle was fought by the British and the Sikhs of India, near the small town of Aliwal. The native forces, whose numerical strength far exceeded that of the British, contended against the enemy with vigor; but, after a most obstinate struggle, they were at length defeated with great loss. The British troops expelled the enemy from every village they attempted to hold, by rapid charges, at the point of the bayonet. Their horsemen were driven from every part of the field by repeated charges, in which the superiority of the European cavalry over that of the natives was most conspicuous. Fifty-two pieces of cannon fell into the hands of the victors, whose loss was trifling in comparison to that of the enemy.

ALKMÆR.—The town of Alkmær is situated on the great ship canal from Amsterdam to the Helder, in North Holland. It is strongly fortified and well built. In 1573 Alkmær was invested by the Spaniards; but having been repulsed with great loss in an attempt to take the town by storm, they abandoned the siege.

A battle occurred near Alkmær on the 19th of September, 1799, between the Anglo-Russian army, consisting of 30,000 men, of whom 12,000 were British, and the combined armies of the French and Dutch, which consisted of 22,000 men, of whom 7,000 were French. The Anglo-Russian army was commanded by the Duke of York, and the French and Dutch were under the orders of General Brune. The battle was obstinate and bloody, and resulted in the defeat of the forces of the Duke of York, who drew back his troops to their fortified line. The loss of the British was 500 killed and wounded, and 500 taken prisoners. The Russians lost 3,500 killed and wounded, 26 pieces of cannon, and 7 standards. The republican army was weakened by 3,000 men, in killed, wounded, and prisoners.

On the 2d of October, the Duke of York, not discouraged by the issue of the attack on the 19th of September, again advanced toward the French lines. He had been reinforced by a fresh brigade of Russians and several English detachments. His army on this occasion was about 30,000 strong; the republican army was nearly of equal force. The battle resulted in the defeat of the republicans, who, with a loss of 3,000 men, killed and wounded, and seven pieces of cannon, abandoned Alkmær, and all their former line, and took up a fresh position. The allies lost about 1,500 men. Yet the Duke of York's position was far from encouraging. The enemy's force was daily increasing, while, on his part, no further reinforcements could be expected. The insalubrity of the climate at that period of the year, was already beginning to affect the health of his soldiers. In these circumstances, it was evident that unless some important place could be captured, it would be impossible for the allies to hold their footing in North Holland. Haarlem, a large city on the Spaarn, ten miles west of Amsterdam, was pitched on as most likely to furnish the necessary supplies. But the position occupied by the French, on the isthmus between Beverwick and the Zuyder Zee, commanded the approach to Haarlem. The Duke of York decided on an immediate attack. Accordingly, on the 6th of October, he led his army against the French. The action commenced at seven in the morning, and was obstinately contested on both sides during the whole day, with equal success. The carnage ceased with the night. The republicans lost 2,000 in killed, wounded, and prisoners. The allied armies lost about the same number, of whom 1,200 were English. The action was indecisive; but Brune, shortly after the battle, received strong reinforcements, and took the offensive. The British commander, perceiving the dangers which surrounded his army, at first retired, and at length capitulated, and evacuated the country.

ALMA, A.D. 1854.—This little stream has been rendered famous by the sanguinary conflict which occurred on its borders, between the Russians and the allied armies of England, France, and Turkey. This river is in the Crimea, and flowing west, empties into the Black Sea, about twenty miles north of Sebastopol. It is a tortuous little stream, which has worked its way down through a red-clay soil, deepening in its course as it proceeds seaward, and drains the steppe-like lands on its north bank, making at times pools and eddies too deep to be forded, though it can generally be crossed by waders who do not fear to wet their knees. Along the north bank of the Alma, are a number of Tartar houses, at times numerous, and close enough to form a cluster of habitations deserving the name of a hamlet, at times scattered wide apart amid little vineyards, surrounded by walls of mud and stone of three feet in height. A village of some fifty houses stands in the vicinity of the bridge over which the post road from Bouljinanak to Sebastopol passes. This village is approached from the north by a road winding through a plain nearly level till it comes near to the village, where the ground dips, so that at a distance of three hundred yards, a man on horseback can hardly see the top of the near and more elevated houses, and can only ascertain the position of the stream by the willows and verdure along its banks. At the south side of the Alma, the ground assumes a very different character—smooth where the bank is deep, and greatly elevated where the shelve of the bank occurs. It recedes for a few yards at a moderate height above the stream, pierced here and there by the course of the winter's torrents, so as to form small ravines, commanded, however, by the heights above. A remarkable ridge of mountains, varying in height from 500 to 700 feet, runs along the course of the Alma, on the south side with the course of the stream, and assuming the form of cliffs, when close to the sea. This ridge is marked all along its course by deep gullies, which run toward the river at various angles.

On the 14th of September, 1854, the English, French, and Turkish forces landed at Eupatoria, and became an army of occupation in the Crimea; the English force consisting of 27,000 men, and that of the French 23,600. The destination of these armies was Sebastopol. To oppose this mighty host, the Russians had concentrated about 40,000 men, on the heights on the south bank of the Alma. At the top of the ridges, between the gullies, they had erected earth-work batteries, mounted with 32 pound and 24 pound brass guns, supported by numerous field-pieces and howitzers. These guns enfiladed the tops of the ravines parallel to them, or swept them to the base, while the whole of the sides, up which an enemy, unable to stand the direct fire of the batteries, would be forced to ascend, were filled with masses of skirmishers, armed with an excellent true-grooved rifle, throwing a large, solid, conical ball, with force at 700 or 800 yards. The principal battery consisted of an earthwork of the form of two sides of a triangle, with the apex pointed toward the bridge, and the sides covering both sides of the stream, corresponding with the bend of the river below it, at the distance of 1,000 yards, while, with a fair elevation, the 32 pounders were able to throw beyond the houses of the village to the distance of 1,400 and 1,500 yards. This was constructed on the brow of a hill about 600 feet above the river, but the hill rose behind it for another fifty feet, before it dipped away toward the road. The ascent to this hill was enfiladed by the fire of these batteries of earthwork on the right, and by another on the left, and these batteries were equally capable of covering the village, the stream, and the slopes which lead up the hill to their position. In the first battery were thirteen 32 pounder brass guns; in the other batteries were some twenty-five guns in all. On the 18th of September the allied army, the English on the left, and the French and Turks on the right, advanced in columns of brigades toward the Russian position. The French army was commanded by MM. Marshal St. Arnaud and General Canrobert; the English, by Lord Raglan, and the Turks, by Suliman Pasha. The Turkish troops numbered 7,000. The right of the allied forces was covered by the fleet which moved along with it in magnificent order, darkening the air with innumerable columns of smoke, ready to shell the Russians should they attack the right wing of the army, and commanding the land for nearly two miles from the shore. The scheme of operations concerted between the allied generals, was, that the French and the Turks on the right, were to force the passage of the river, and establish themselves on the heights over the stream at the opposite side, so that they could enfilade the position to their right and opposite the British left and center. When that attack was sufficiently developed and had met with success, the British army was to force the right and part of the center of the Russian position. These operations, successfully carried out, would ensure victory. When the allied army had arrived within about three miles from the village, near the bridge which crosses the Alma, the French steamers ran in as close as they could to the bluff of the shore on the south side of the Alma, and commenced throwing bombs into the midst of the Russians on the heights. Their fire was so effective that the Russians were driven from their position on the right, within 3,000 yards of the sea. The Russians returned the fire of the French steamers from the heights; but without effect. They finally abandoned their efforts against the steamers, and withdrew from the sea-side, confining their endeavors to the defense of the gullies and heights beyond the fire of the heavy guns of the steamers. About one o'clock in the afternoon the French columns commenced to ascend the hills, covered by a cloud of skirmishers, who maintained a constant fire. The Russians, in a black mass, showed themselves to oppose the assailants, and poured forth volley after volley among them. The French paused for an instant; then rushing forward, they charged furiously into the Russians, scattering them like chaff, and driving them up the hill in disorder. At half past one o'clock the British line of skirmishers got within range of the Russian battery on the hill, which opened upon them with terrible effect. About this time the Russians set fire to the village, and the smoke of the conflagration arose like a vail between the combatants, completely hiding the Russians on the right from the view of the British on the left. It was a well executed exercise of military skill, and succeeded in giving the British a great deal of annoyance. The British halted when they neared this village, their left extending beyond it by the verge of the stream; their right behind the burning cottages, and within range of the batteries. The Russians now opened a furious fire on the whole of the British line, which remained stationary, for the French had not yet made sufficient progress to justify it in advancing. In the midst of a terrific tempest of round-shot, which did bloody execution, the British troops calmly awaited the signal to advance. Although the infantry was inactive, yet the British artillery was not silent. Their cannons and mortars poured forth an unceasing fire of round-shot and shells, and fiery rockets streamed through the air, plowing through the Russians with fearful effect. The Russians, however, replied manfully, their shot falling among the British soldiers, who were lying flat on the ground to avoid the missiles, killing, crushing, and shattering at every round. Lord Raglan at length became weary of this inactivity; and gave orders for the whole line to advance. The British troops rose to their feet, and rushing through a fearful shower of round, case-shot, and shells, they dashed into the Alma, and floundered through its waters, which were literally torn into foam by the deadly hail. At the other side of the river were a number of vineyards which were occupied by Russian riflemen. They saluted the advancing columns with destructive volleys. Three of Lord Raglan's staff were shot down; but led on by Lord Raglan in person, they advanced cheering on the men. Raglan dashed over the bridge, followed by his staff. The British line struggled through the river, and advanced in masses up the heights, through a whirlwind of grape, round-shot, shells, canister, case-shot, and musketry which was hurled down upon them by the Russian batteries and a compact mass of infantry. The British advanced with the utmost order. The second division, led by Sir De L. Evans, crossed the stream on the right. The 7th Fusileers, led by Colonel Yea, entered into the storm of iron, and were swept down by hundreds. The 55th, 30th, and 95th, led by Brigadier Pennefeather, who was in the thickest of the fight, steadily advanced through the storm, occasionally faltering, but never falling back; and Brigadier Adams, with the 41st, 47th and 49th, bravely charged up the hill, and aided Pennefeather in the battle. The light division, under Sir George Brown, displayed equal valor. But their progress was slow; the Russians, hurling down hurricanes of iron, swept down hundreds of the assailants, and compelled the 7th British regiment, diminished by one half, to fall back to reform their columns lost for the time; the 23d, with eight officers dead, and four wounded, still advanced in the front aided by the 15th, 33d, 77th, and 88th. Down went Sir George in a cloud of dust in front of the battery. He was soon up; but his fall had produced a shock which paralyzed his regiment for a moment, and in their pause the British troops suffered fearfully from the point-blank fire of the Russian battery. Meanwhile the Guards on the right of the light division, and the brigade of Highlanders were storming the heights on the left. They rapidly approached the Russians, when suddenly a tornado of round and grape-shot rushed through from the terrible battery, and a roar of musketry from behind, thinned their ranks by scores. It was evident that they were just able to contend against the Russians; and at this very time an immense mass of Russian infantry moved down toward the battery. They halted. It was the crisis of the day. Sharp, angular, and solid, they looked as if they were cut out of the solid rock. It was beyond all doubt that if the British infantry, harassed and thinned as it was, got into the battery, they would have to encounter again a formidable fire, which they were but ill calculated to bear. The British general saw the difficulties of the situation, and got a couple of guns to bear on the Russian masses. The first shot missed, but the next, and the next, and the next, cut through the ranks so clearly, and so keenly, that a clear lane could be seen for a moment through the square. After a few rounds the columns of the square became broken, wavered to and fro, broke, and fled over the brow of the hill, leaving behind them six or seven distinct lines of dead, lying as close as possible to each other, marking the passage of the fatal messengers. The Highlanders, under Sir Colin Campbell, and the Guards, dashed forward at full run, and took the battery at a bound. The Russians rushed out, and left a number of dead behind them. The second and light divisions crowned the heights. The French turned the guns on the hill against the flying masses. A few faint struggles from the scattered infantry; a few rounds of cannon and musketry, and the Russians fled to the south-east, leaving three generals, drums, three guns, 700 prisoners, and 4,000 wounded behind them. The Russian retreat was covered by their cavalry. The British lost 310 killed, 1,818 wounded; the French 318 killed, 1,033 wounded, and the Turks, 256 killed, and 1,230 wounded. The Russians lost 2,480 killed, and 4,680 wounded. Among the English dead were 96 officers, 114 sergeants and 24 drummers. The French loss in officers was about the same.

ALMANZA, A.D. 1707.—Almanza is situated in the province of Murcia, in Spain, 56 miles north-west of Alicant. On the 4th of April, 1707, it was witness to an obstinate battle between the French army, under the Duke of Berwick, and the allied forces in the interest of the Archduke Charles, of Austria, which were commanded by Lord Galway. The conflict began about two in the afternoon. The whole front of each army was fully engaged. At first the center of the allied armies, which consisted chiefly of British and Dutch battalions, seemed victorious; but, at the first charge of the enemy, the Portuguese horse, on the wing, were routed and dispersed, and the English troops were flanked and surrounded on every side. In this dreadful emergency they formed themselves into a square, and retired to an eminence, where, being ignorant of the country, and entirely destitute of supplies, they were obliged to surrender, prisoners of war. The Archduke lost 5,000 men, killed on the field of battle, and nearly 10,000 taken prisoners on the eminence. The victory was decisive; all Spain, except the province of Catalonia, returned to their allegiance to Philip, their native sovereign.

ALMARAZ, A.D. 1812.—Almaraz, in Spain, was, on the 18th of May, 1812, the scene of a battle between the French, and the English army, under Lord Hill, in which the former were defeated. From this victory Lord Hill took the title of Almaraz.

ALMEIDA, A.D. 1810.—From the position of Almeida, on the frontier of Portugal, it has always been deemed a military post of the utmost importance. It is a well-fortified town, and is situated in the province of Beira, in Portugal, 24 miles west of Ciudad Rodrigo. In the year 1762, during the war between England and Spain, Almeida was reduced and garrisoned by the English and Portuguese soldiers. Shortly afterward it was retaken by the Spaniards, after a long siege, and its fortifications dismantled. In the year 1810, Almeida was besieged and taken by Marshal Massena, whom Napoleon had placed over the French army in Portugal. Having reduced Ciudad Rodrigo, after a long siege, Massena, with 20,000 infantry, and 4,000 cavalry, with 30 guns, advanced on the Duke of Wellington, who, abandoning Almeida to its fate, retreated with his army to the Torres Vedras. Before the investment of Almeida took place, however, a very gallant action occurred between the French advanced guard and General Crawford, who commanded the British rear-guard, 4,500 strong, on the banks of the Coa. Crawford, during the whole siege of Ciudad Rodrigo, had maintained his position on the French side of the stream, and he maintained it even when Massena approached Almeida. On the 24th of July he was assailed by the French. The British suffered considerable loss in the assault, and retreated across the bridge over the Coa; but, forming themselves on the opposite shore, they opened a destructive fire of musketry and artillery upon the French, who, with the utmost gallantry, dashed over the bridge. The terrible fire of the British swept away the head of the advancing column; and, after a bloody conflict of two hours, a heavy rain separated the combatants, and Crawford, with his division, retreated to the main body of the English army. All obstacles being now removed, the French completed the investment of Almeida, on the following day. On the 15th of August, the trenches were opened. The fire of the place was extremely well sustained. The garrison consisted of 4,000 Portuguese, regulars and militia. The French kept up an incessant and heavy fire upon the town from 65 guns, to which the garrison vigorously replied. But at five o'clock in the evening of the 26th, a bomb was thrown from the French lines which fell into the great magazine of the fortress, containing 150,000 pounds of powder. A terrible explosion followed; the cathedral, the principal edifices, and a great number of the houses of the city were blown up, and several large breaches were made in the ramparts. Almeida was now surrendered to the French, and the garrison, now reduced to 3,000 men, were made prisoners, and fifteen pieces of heavy cannon fell into the hands of the victors. Almeida remained in the possession of the French till the 10th of May, 1811, when its governor, the gallant General Bernier, by Massena's directions, blew up its fortifications, and abandoned the place to the Duke of Wellington.

ALMONACID DE ZORITA, in Spain, was the scene of a battle between the French and Spanish armies, on the 11th of August, 1809, in which the former were victorious.

ALNEY, A.D. 1016.—In the year 1016, two years after the invasion of England by the Danes, a single-handed combat was fought at Alney by Edmund Ironsides, of England, and Canute, King of Denmark, in sight of their armies. Canute was severely wounded, and proposed a division of the British empire, reserving to himself the northern portion, consisting of Mercia, East Anglia, and Northumberland. The southern districts were left to Edmund. But this prince, one month after the treaty, was murdered at Oxford by two of his chamberlains, accomplices of Edric Steon, and, in 1017, Canute was left in peaceable possession of the entire kingdom.

ALNWICK, A.D., 1092.—Alnwick is situated on a declivity near the river Alne, in England, 275 miles north-west from London. In the year 1092, during the reign of William Rufus, King of England, a rupture ensued between the English and the Scotch; in which Malcolm, King of Scotland, was ultimately surprised and slain by a party from Alnwick castle. A cross, called Malcolm's cross, stands on the spot where Malcolm is said to have been killed by a soldier who came to offer him the keys of the castle on the point of a spear.

AMBERG, A.D. 1796.—On the 24th day of August, 1796, the Austrian army under the Archduke Charles, advanced with the corps under Wartensleben, to attack the French republicans at Amberg. The Austrians, numbering nearly 20,000 men, advanced in three columns on the south, while Wartensleben's corps, nearly as strong, attacked the city on the north. The French made but a feeble resistance; assailed at once in front and flank, they retreated to the plateau in the rear of their position, and the enemy entered the city without opposition.

AMBRACIA, B.C. 198.—In the year 198, B.C. the Roman consul Fulvius, arrived in Greece, and began the war against the Ætolians, by besieging the city of Ambracia which at that time was in possession of the Ætolians. This city was defended on one side by the river Arethon, and on the other by an exceedingly steep mountain, and was surrounded by a solid stone wall three miles in circumference. The attack was of the most vigorous kind, and the defense no less so. A reinforcement of 500 chosen men, whom the Ætolians found means to throw into the place, notwithstanding the vigilance of the Romans, much augmented the courage and confidence of the besieged. They employed new inventions every day for burning the machines of the enemy; they made frequent sallies, in which they generally had the advantage, and their defense was so obstinate and vigorous, that the consul almost repented having undertaken the siege. At length he was released from his anxiety by the Ætolians themselves, who after vainly soliciting for peace from him, finally opened their gates to the Romans, after receiving the consul's promise that the Ætolian garrison might retire unmolested.

AMFING, A.D. 1322.—Near Amfing, in Bavaria a battle was fought, on the 28th September, 1322, between Louis, Duke of Bavaria, emperor of Germany, and Frederic, Archduke of Austria, when the latter was entirely defeated and made prisoner.

AMISUS, a royal city of Mithridates, King of Pontus, was blockaded, in the year 73 B.C., by Lucullus, a Roman consul. In the year 71 B.C., after a long siege, it was assaulted by the same consul, and the wall forced. The governor of the city Callimachus, and the inhabitants immediately fled, after setting fire to the city, either to prevent the Romans from enriching themselves, or to secure their retreat. Lucullus would fain have saved the city, for it was not only a beautiful city, but was of Grecian origin, and a colony of Athens; but his soldiers, raging for plunder, were ready to mutiny, and hoping that their desires for booty would tempt them to extinguish the flames, he suffered them to plunder. But the Romans not only refused to extinguish the fire, but aided it by applying torches to such buildings as they supposed concealed things of value, and the greater portion of the city was laid in ruins.

AMOY, A.D. 1841.—This is a sea-port town of China, on an island of the same name. On the 27th of August, 1841, after a severe bombardment, the British fleet captured Amoy. On taking possession of the island, the British found a battery 1,100 yards long, mounting 90 guns, constructed with great skill. By this victory the English opened Nankin, and other ports, to their trade, and a British consul was established there.

ANCRAM, A.D. 1545.—During a war with Scotland, the English, under command of Lord Evers invaded Scotland, in the year 1545. Evers's army consisted of 5,000 men, whom he led into Teviodale, and was employed in ravaging that country, when intelligence was brought him that a Scottish army had made its appearance near the abbey of Melrose. The neighboring counties had been aroused, and the inhabitants, flying to arms, had proceeded to this place, determined to drive back the invaders. Norman Leslie, son of the Earl of Rothe, had also joined the Scots, and he inspired them with new bravery, as well by his own personal valor and daring, as by the troop of volunteers from Fife, whom he commanded. In order to compel their forces to make a steady defense, the Scottish leaders ordered all their cavalry to dismount, and then with their entire army they awaited the assault of the English. No sooner did the English perceive that the Scottish horses were being led from the field, than supposing that the whole army was retreating, they rushed on to the attack, assured of an easy victory. The Scots received them without flinching, and with yells of triumph they drove back the English, who had expected no resistance, with great slaughter. The English desperately contested every inch of soil, fighting hand to hand with the enemy; nor did they fairly fly till both Evers and Latoun were slain. The loss of the English at this battle far exceeded that of the Scots. The victory of the latter was complete; more than 1000 men of the invading army were made prisoners, while the balance were either dispersed or destroyed.

ANET, A.D. 1590.—Near Anet, in France, the army of Henry IV. of France gained a decisive victory over the troops of the League, under Mayence, in 1590.

ANJOU, A.D. 1421.—The battle of Anjou was fought between the English and French armies, at Beague, in France, on the 3d of April, 1421. The French troops were commanded by the Dauphin of France, who defeated the English, on whose side 1,500 men were slain. The Duke of Clarence, general of the English forces, was killed by Sir Allan Swinton, a Scotch knight, who commanded a company of men-at-arms in the French army, and the Earls of Somerset, Dorset, and Huntingdon were taken prisoners.—Hume.

ANTIOCH.—Antioch, now Anthakia, was a celebrated city, the capital of Syria. It was seated on the river Orontes, now called Assi, fifteen miles east of the Mediterranean, and forty miles south-west of Aleppo.

FIRST SIEGE, A.D. 540.—Chosroes, King of Persia, having spread terror and dismay throughout Syria by the capture of Sour (ancient Tyre) and other places, presented himself before Antioch. The attack and defense were equally warm and terrible in their results. The besieged surrendered, after having exhausted all their resources, and admitted the Persians within their walls. The confusion was horrible in this populous and unfortunate city. Men, women, and children crowded over each other to escape the sword of the conqueror; the streets could not afford passage wide enough for the multitude. The soldiers of the garrison, mingled with the fugitives, overthrew the unhappy citizens, trampled them under their horses' feet, and crushed them to death in their own city and by their own troops. The conquerors, spread throughout all the quarters, indulged in a license almost unheard of even in such scenes: they pillaged and sacked the houses; they pulled down and burned all the public edifices; they profaned and plundered the churches; they insulted and violated the virgins consecrated to God; and the maidens and women whose virtue they outraged were immolated before the eyes of their husbands and parents. Chosroës himself animated his troops to the carnage, and excited them to plunder. He took possession of the gold and silver vases of the great church, and sent into Persia all the valuable statues, rare pictures, and precious objects that decorated that superb city. When despoiled of all its ornaments and deprived of its wealth, he ordered it to be reduced to ashes. This cruel order was so punctually obeyed, that only one single quarter escaped the flames.

Second Siege, A.D. 638.—Antioch, however, soon arose again from its ruins, under the protection of the emperors of the West. It was again besieged about a hundred years after the above-stated catastrophe, by the Saracens, before the eyes of Prince Constantine, son of the Emperor Heraclius. The infidels approached a bridge at a short distance from Antioch, called the Bridge of Iron. The towers, each furnished with 300 soldiers, were intrusted with the defense of it. These degenerate Romans surrendered their posts to the enemy; Constantine, in despair, could trust neither the courage nor the fidelity of his troops. Very unlike the Romans of the days of Pyrrhus, who would have thought themselves dishonored by taking advantage of a crime, this prince resorted to the baseness of assassination as the surest means of averting the storm which threatened Antioch. He hoped to terminate the war by assassinating the caliph who directed the enterprises of the Saracens. An assassin was sent to Medina. Trembling at the sight of Omar, the wretch confessed his intentions, and the name of the person who employed him. Omar, so far from losing his life, acquired the honor of pardoning the man who attempted it: the Christian prince acquired the disgrace of having attempted a crime, and failed in it. The two armies encamped near Antioch. A general, named Nestorius, commanded the Romans: endowed with the valor of a soldier, he for a moment forgot that his life belonged to his army, and challenged the bravest of the Mussulmans to single combat. Dames, who had acquired the reputation of being invincible at the siege of Aleppo, presented himself. His horse stumbling while he was engaged with his enemy, Dames was seized and conveyed a prisoner to the tent of the challenger. Nestorius, proud of this chance victory, was desirous of a fresh triumph. He offered a fresh challenge, which was accepted by Dehac. The two champions fought for a long time with equal success; when, exhausted by fatigue, and their horses being jaded and breathless, they separated to recruit their strength. During the second conflict, Dames, having deceived the slaves who guarded him, contrived to escape, and rejoined his comrades. A few days after, the two armies engaged, and the Romans were cut to pieces after a severe and bloody battle. A fresh perfidy of Youckinna, formerly Governor of Aleppo, contributed greatly to the defeat of the Romans. This traitor guarded in Antioch Derar and 200 other Mussulman prisoners. At the moment of the combat, he set them at liberty, joined them to the troop he commanded, and ranged himself under the standard of Mahomet. At the sight of these new enemies, the Roman legions lost all courage; they fancied the whole population of Antioch was pouring out upon them. The field of battle was strewed with dead. The inhabitants of Antioch, finding themselves without resource, capitulated; to avoid being pillaged, they paid the conqueror 300,000 pieces of gold, amounting to about £850,000—a sum which seems to us incredibly small from such a city so circumstanced. Abou-Obéidah, entered Antioch on the 21st of August. As he dreaded for his soldiers the pleasures of this voluptuous city more than he feared the Roman armies, he only allowed them to remain there three days.

Third Siege, A.D. 1097.—After a disastrous march, in which they had met with many unexpected accidents and reverses, as well as triumphs, the great army of the Crusaders, under Godfrey of Bouillon and his chivalrous companions, advanced toward Antioch. As we have seen in a former siege, the approach to this great city of the East was guarded by a bridge over the Orontes, on which were placed two towers covered with iron. But nothing could resist the van led by the Duke of Normandy: the Normans soon took the bridge and passed the river. Terror was spread among the Mussulmans, who all flocked to the city as a place of refuge. The whole Christian army drew up in battle array, with trumpets sounding and ensigns flying, and then encamped within a mile of Antioch.

The aspect of this city, so celebrated in the annals of Christianity, revived the religious enthusiasm of the Crusaders. It was within the walls of Antioch that the disciples of Christ had first assumed the name of Christians, and that the Apostle Peter was named the first pastor of the nascent church. Antioch was as much celebrated in the annals of the Roman empire as in those of the church.

The walls inclosed four hills, separated by a torrent, which threw itself into the river. Upon the western hill was built a very strong citadel, which dominated the city. The ramparts of Antioch, which were as solid as a rock, were three leagues in circumference, and along them were built no less than 360 strong towers. Broad ditches, the river Orontes, and marshes, still further protected the inhabitants of Antioch, and prevented all access to the city. At the approach of the Christians, most of the inhabitants of the neighboring provinces and cities sought refuge in Antioch, with their families and their property. Accien, the grandson of Malek-Schah, who had obtained the sovereignty of the city, had shut himself up in it with 20,000 foot and 7,000 horse.

The siege of Antioch presented so many obstacles and dangers, that the Crusaders deliberated whether they ought in prudence to undertake it. The first who spoke in the council thought it would be rash to commence a siege at the approach of winter. But Godfrey and the legate, Adhemar, were both in favor of immediate attack, and the council decreed that the siege of Antioch should be immediately commenced, and that same day the whole Christian army advanced to the walls. Now, our readers, in contemplating the army of the Crusaders, must not suppose that, like any other army so joined, there was any spirit of unity in it. It was assembled on various principles: a few, and very few, were brought so far on their way to Jerusalem by a purely religious motive; many, like Robert of Normandy, were seduced by a wild chivalric love of adventure, and a thirst for that military renown which was so great an object with the age; but the bulk of this host were men who had cast their all in an expedition which promised unbounded wealth —the leaders looked for dominions and states, the soldiers for booty. They had, literally, emigrated; their desire was to establish themselves in the fabulously-represented rich countries of the East, and they had neither hope nor intention to revisit Europe. There was no acknowledged leader to direct proceedings or to check want of discipline. We have an idea that Godfrey of Bouillon was the leader; but in no point of fact was he so; the leaders were all governed by their own interests; and if Godfrey had thwarted those of Bohemond, Raymond de St. Gilles, Robert of Normandy, Robert of Flanders, or any other chief of rank, they would have paid no more attention to his authority than to that of one of his horse-boys. From this want of unity in the body, and unity of purpose, arose almost all the disasters of the Crusades, of which silly and wicked enterprises the reader will find an excellent epitome in the account of this interesting siege.

Bohemond and Tancred took their posts at the east, opposite the gate of St. Paul, to the right of the Italians, the Normans, the Britons, the Flemings, and the French, commanded by the two Roberts; the Count de Vermandois and the Count de Chartres encamped toward the north, before the gate of the Dog; the Count de Toulouse, the Bishop of Puy, and the Duke of Lorraine, with their troops, occupied the space from the gate of the Dog to the spot where the Orontes, turning toward the west, approaches the walls of Antioch. The Crusaders neglected to cover the southern part, defended by the mountain of Orontes, as they likewise did the western side of the city, which the river defended, and by which the besieged could make sorties or receive succors.

The Turks shut themselves up close within their walls; all was quiet, all was silent. The Crusaders attributed this to terror, and heedlessly spread themselves over the delightful country, enjoying all the sweets of its climate and productions.

Whilst thus forgetful of discipline, as well as of their purpose, they were attacked by the garrison of Antioch, which surprised them, some lounging luxuriously in their camp, and others wandering about the country. All whom the hopes of pillage, or the love of pleasure, had seduced into the neighboring villages and orchards, met with slavery or death.

The desire of repairing this error led them into another. They resolved to scale the walls of Antioch, before they had provided themselves with either ladders or machines of war. Vengeance and fanaticism animated both leaders and soldiers, but they could make no impression upon the walls of the city, or disturb the security of its inhabitants. Several other assaults proved equally useless. Experience, for whose lessons they always paid so dearly, taught them that they must invest the place, and prevent the arrival of any foreign succor.

They established a bridge of boats across the Orontes, and passed over some troops toward the western side of the city. All methods were had recourse to, to check the sorties of the enemy; sometimes fortresses of wood were erected close to the ramparts, sometimes they planted balistæ, which launched large stones at the besieged. To close the gate of the Dog they were obliged to heap large beams, stones, and pieces of rock against it. At the same time they intrenched their camps, and took every precaution against surprise from the Saracens.

The blockade of the city was now their object; but, as in all such cases, the tediousness of a siege did not accord with the impatience of warriors with an ulterior object in view. On their arrival before Antioch, they thought they should never again know want, and they wasted in a few days provisions for several months; they thought about nothing but meeting the enemy in the field of battle, and, confident of victory, they neither provided against the rigors of winter nor against a fast-approaching want of provisions.

The latter was not long in arriving. As soon as winter set in, the unfortunate Crusaders found themselves a prey to all sorts of calamities. Torrents of rain fell every day, and the plains, which had recently been so delightful, were almost covered with water. The camp, particularly in the valley, was submerged several times; tempests and rains carried away the pavilions and tents; humidity relaxed the bows; rust gnawed the lances and swords. Most of the soldiers were left destitute of clothes. Contagious complaints carried off men and animals.

Amid the general distress, Bohemond and the Duke of Normandy were charged with the task of scouring the country in search of provisions. In the course of their incursions they beat several detachments of the Saracens, and returned to the camp with considerable booty. Fresh incursions were made every day, and every day they became less fortunate. All the countries of Upper Syria had been ravaged by the Turks and the Christians. The Crusaders on these parties often put the Saracens to flight; but victory, which was almost always their only resource in the moment of want, could not bring back abundance into the camp. As a completion of their misery, all communication with Constantinople was cut off; the Pisan and Genoese fleets no longer coasted along the shores occupied by the Christians. The port of St. Simeon, situated at three leagues from Antioch, now saw no vessel arrive from Greece or the West. The Flemish pirates who had taken the cross at Tarsus, after gaining possession of Laodicea, had been surprised by the Greeks, and several weeks before had been made prisoners.

It was related that the son of Sweno, King of Denmark, who had taken the cross, and who was leading to the holy war 1,500 knights, had been surprised by the Turks while advancing rapidly across the defiles of Cappadocia. Attacked by an enemy superior in numbers, he had defended himself during a whole day, without being able, by his courage or the axes of his warriors, to repulse the attack of the infidels. Florine, daughter of Eudes I., Duke of Burgundy, who accompanied the Danish hero, and to whom he was to be married after the taking of Jerusalem, had valiantly fought by his side. Transpierced by seven arrows, and fighting still, she was endeavoring, with Sweno, to open for herself a passage to the mountains, when they were overwhelmed by their enemies. They fell together upon the field of battle, after having seen all their knights and faithful servants perish around them.

Famine and disease increased; the Syrians who brought provisions were so extortionate in their prices, that the common soldiers could not purchase any. And not the smallest of their griefs was the daily, almost hourly loss of companions, countrymen, partakers of toils and dangers, to whom a common lot and object had endeared them. Desertion was soon added to the other evils. Most of the army began to lose all hope of reaching the Holy City, or even of subduing Antioch; and some went to seek an asylum under Baldwin, in Mesopotamia, while others stole away to the cities of Cilicia, subject to the Christians.

The Duke of Normandy retired to Laodicea, and did not return until he had been thrice summoned by the army, in the name of the religion of Christ. Tactius, the general of Alexius, left the camp with his troops, promising to return with reinforcements and provisions. His departure was not regretted, and no hopes were built upon his promises. The desertion became common, even with the most brave and the most zealous; not only did the stout warrior, the Viscount de Melun, whose use of the axe in battle had gained him the name of "the carpenter," turn his back upon famine and his suffering comrades, but even the devotion of Peter the Hermit, the great cause of this monstrous removal of the West to the East, was not proof against the misery all endured, and he fled away secretly. But the indefatigable Tancred, the truest knight of all the Crusades, pursued them, and brought back both the carpenter and hermit. Peter was bitterly reproached, and was compelled to swear on the Gospel never to repeat his offense.

But Peter might have urged a better plea than fear for his flight; the Christian camp was the resort of all the vices. "Strange and inconceivable spectacle," says an eye-witness, "beneath the tents of the deliverers of Sion, were strangely grouped famine and voluptuousness, impure love, a mad passion for play, and all the excesses of debauchery mingled with the most horrid images of death."

Syrian spies, likewise, stole into the camp, who circulated in the neighboring cities exaggerated accounts of the distress, the despair, and the vices of the Christians. In order to deliver the army from this annoyance, Bohemond, whom Mr. Gibbon too favorably styles the Ulysses of the Crusades, devised a plan fit even to disgust barbarians. He commanded some Turks, who were his prisoners, to be brought to him. These he ordered to be immediately executed, and their bodies to be roasted over a large fire, like meat preparing for the supper of himself and his people; directing it to be answered, if any one asked what was the cause of the preparations and the smell: "The princes and governors of the camp have decreed in council that, from this day forward, all Turks or spies found in the camp, shall in this manner, be forced to make meat of their bodies, as well for the princes as the army." Bohemond's servants followed his instructions, and the strangers in the camp were soon attracted by the report and the stench to the Prince of Tarentum's quarters. "When they saw what was going on," says an ancient author, "they were marvelously terrified, and fled away to circulate through Syria an account of the cannibalism of the Christians." Bohemond's plan, however, succeeded: no more spies were seen in the camp.

The Bishop of Puy carried into execution, about the same time, a ruse of a much more agreeable nature. He caused the neighboring lands to be plowed and sown with corn, not only for the benefit of the army, but to prove to the Saracens that they had no intention of abandoning the siege.

Winter at length departed; the contagious diseases abated, the princes and monasteries of Armenia sent in provisions; with the departure of famine hope revived, and, strange to say, all these ameliorations were looked upon as the fruits of their own amendments!

Embassadors from Egypt then made their appearance, and the Crusaders had recourse to all sorts of expedients to impose upon their visitors. Their most splendid habiliments, their most costly arms were exhibited, and the nobles and knights displayed their skill and courage in jousts and tournaments, and their graces in the dance—behind lingered want and privations; in the eyes of the strangers all was joy and festivity. The Egyptians professed great friendship for the Crusaders, with admiration of their military virtues: their master made vast promises, and said they had liberty to enter the Holy City, provided they went without arms, and only staid one month. If the Crusaders submitted to these conditions, the Caliph of Egypt would be their firmest support; but if they scorned his friendship, the people of Ethiopia and Egypt, all who inhabit Asia and Africa, from the Strait of Gades to the gates of Bagdad, would rise at the voice of the legitimate Vicar of the Prophet, and show the warriors of the West the power of their arms.

To this speech a spirited reply was instantly made, rejecting all Mussulman favors, expressing a reliance upon God for the delivery of the Holy Places, of which, they said, the Christians were determined to be the guardians and the masters.

This was the sentiment of the Crusaders; but they, nevertheless, did not entirely reject alliance with the caliph. They sent deputies and presents back with the embassadors.

Scarcely had they departed, when the Christians gained a fresh victory over the Turks. The Sultans of Aleppo and Damascus, with the Emirs of Cæsarea, Emessa, and Hierapolis had raised an army 20,000 horse, to succor Antioch. This army was already approaching the city, when it was stopped and cut to pieces by Bohemond and the Count de St. Gilles, who had gone out to meet it. The Turks lost two thousand men and a thousand horses; and the city of Harem, in which they endeavored to find safety, likewise fell into the hands of the Christians. At the moment the Egyptian embassadors were embarking at Port St. Simeon, four camels brought them the heads and the spoils of two hundred Mussulmans. The conquerors threw two hundred other heads into the city of Antioch, the garrison of which was anxiously looking out for succors. A number of heads were also stuck on pikes round the walls. This they did in revenge for some gross insults the Saracens had lavished upon an image of the Virgin which had fallen into their hands.

The Crusaders had soon occasion to display their valor in a much more perilous and sanguinary combat. A fleet of Genoese and Pisans entered the port of St. Simeon; this caused the greatest joy, and the soldiers rushed in crowds toward the port, to get news from Europe and obtain necessaries and provisions. As they returned, laden with what they had acquired, and mostly unarmed, they were attacked by a body of four thousand Saracens, who laid wait for them on their passage. In vain Bohemond, the Count de St. Gilles, and Bishop Adhemar, hastened to their assistance; the Christians could not sustain the shock of the infidels, and retreated in great disorder

The report of this defeat soon reached the camp, and Godfrey immediately summoned all to arms. Followed by his brother Eustace, the two Roberts and the Count de Vermandois, he crossed the Orontes, and went in pursuit of the pursuers. When he came up with the Saracens, he shouted to his companions "to follow his example," and fell, sword in hand, upon the ranks of the Mussulmans. Accustomed to distant fight, and to employ the bow and arrow, these could not stand against the sword and the lance of the Crusaders: they took to flight some toward the mountains, and some toward the city. Accien, who, from the towers of his palace, had beheld the victorious attack of the Crusaders, sent a numerous detachment to assist his flying troops. He accompanied them to the gate of the bridge, which he caused to be shut after them, telling them it should not be reopened till they had gained the victory.

This fresh body of Saracens was quickly beaten in its turn. The Turks had no other hope but that of regaining the city; but Godfrey had placed himself upon an eminence between the fugitives and the gates. It was there the carnage began; the Christians were animated by their victory, the Saracens by their despair and the cries of the inhabitants assembled on the ramparts. Nothing can paint the tumults of this fresh combat. The clash of arms and the shouts of the soldiers drowned the voices of the commanders; they fought hand to hand, in perfect disorder, while clouds of dust hung over the field of battle. Chance directed the blows of both the conquerors and the conquered; the Saracens pressed upon each other, and embarrassed their own flight. The confusion was so great that many Crusaders were killed by their companions in arms. A vast number of Saracens fell beneath the swords of the Christians, almost without resistance; more than 2,000 were drowned in the Orontes. The slaughter lasted the whole day, and it was not till toward evening that Accien allowed the gates to be opened to the miserable remains of his troops.

Notwithstanding these prodigious exploits, the Christians sustained a considerable loss. While celebrating the valor of the Crusaders, cotemporary history is astonished at the multitude of martyrs whom the Saracens sent to heaven.

The Saracens passed the night in burying their dead near a mosque without the walls. Their sad duty performed, they retired. The Christians, however, knew that the Mussulmans never despoiled the bodies of their countrymen before they inhumed them, and flocked in crowds to the plunder of them. They tore up the bodies, and stripped them of the arms and clothes with which they were covered. They then returned to exhibit to their fellows in the camp the silk stuffs, bucklers, lances, javelins, and rich swords found in the graves. This spectacle did not in the least disgust the knights and barons. The day after the battle, among the spoils of the vanquished, they contemplated with pleasure fifteen hundred heads separated from their trunks, which were paraded in triumph through the army, and reminded them of their victory and of the loss of the infidels.

All these heads, cast into the Orontes with the bodies of the Mussulmans who the preceding day had been drowned in the river, went to convey the news of the victory to the Genoese and Pisans at Port St. Simeon.

The leaders now thought of nothing but taking advantage of the terror with which they had inspired the Mussulmans. Masters of the cemetery, they pulled down the mosque, and employed the stones, even of the tombs, to build a fortress before the gate of the bridge by which the besieged made their sorties. Raymond, who had been accused of want of zeal for the holy war, constructed this fort and took charge of the perilous post. It was proposed to raise a new fortress near the first, and as none of the leaders came forward to erect it, Tancred offered his services—a generous and loyal knight; he had nothing left but his sword and his renown. He asked his companions for money, and undertook the danger of the enterprise. All were eager to second his courageous devotion; the works he directed were soon finished; and from that time the besieged were closely shut up within the inclosure of their walls.

The Crusaders having thus blockaded the city, seized the Syrians who had been accustomed to bring provisions to Antioch, and only spared their lives upon their swearing to supply the Christian army. Learning that Accien had sent away a great many of his horses to a valley some leagues from the city, they repaired thither by by-roads, and gained possession of the rich booty. Two thousand horses and as many mules were led in triumph to the Christian camp.

Many of the Genoese and Pisans were skillful engineers, and they were employed in directing the labors of the siege. Machines of war were built, and Antioch was threatened on all sides. While despair supplied the place of courage with the Saracens, zeal and emulation increased among the Crusaders; many whom want or fear had driven away, returned to their standards, and sought every opportunity of wiping out the disgrace of their desertion. The besiegers no longer thought of repose, and breathed nothing but fight. The women seconded the valor of the warriors; some fought by their sides in the ranks, while others supplied them with food and munitions when they were engaged. The children even formed bands, and went through their military exercises. The inhabitants of Antioch opposed their children to those of the Christians, and several times these young combatants engaged in the presence of the besiegers and the besieged, who took an interest in the fight, and animated their party by voice and gesture when they appeared to give way.

There was formed at the same time another militia, much more formidable to the Saracens. The mendicants and vagabonds who followed the army were employed in the labors of the siege, under the orders of a captain who took the title of Truand King, or King of the Beggars. They received pay from the general chest; and as soon as they were in a condition to purchase arms and clothes, the king denied them as his subjects, and made them enter into one of the corps of the army. This measure, while removing the vagabonds from their dangerous idleness, made useful auxiliaries of them. As they were accused of violating graves and feeding on human flesh, they inspired great horror and fear among the infidels, who fled away at their approach.

Antioch was so warmly pressed, and the garrison had so little means of defense, that the Crusaders expected every day to be masters of it. Accien demanded a truce, and promised to surrender if not speedily succored. The Crusaders, always full of blind confidence, had the imprudence to accept the proposals of the governor. As soon as they had made a truce with the Saracens, the leaders of the army, who seldom agreed anywhere but in the field of battle, and whom danger even could not always unite, were on the point of declaring war among themselves.

Baldwin, Prince of Edessa, had sent some magnificent presents to Godfrey, the two Roberts, the Count de Vermandois, and the Counts of Blois and Chartres; he had distributed sums of money to the whole army; but in bestowing his largesses, he had purposely left out Bohemond and his soldiers. This was quite enough to create a division. While the Christian army was loud in the praises of the liberality of Baldwin, the Prince of Tarentum and his warriors breathed nothing but complaints and murmurs.

At the same time, a richly ornamented tent, which an Armenian prince destined for Godfrey, and which, falling into the hands of Pancratus, and was sent to Bohemond, became a fresh subject of trouble and discord. Godfrey haughtily claimed the present which had been intended for him; Bohemond refused to give it up. Both parties proceeded to abuse and threats; they were eager to have recourse to arms, and Christian blood was about to flow in a contemptible quarrel. But at length the Prince of Tarentum, abandoned by the greater part of the army and conquered by the prayers of his friends, surrendered the tent to his rival.

While these quarrels occupied the Christian army, the inhabitants of Antioch received reinforcements and prepared for a fresh resistance. When they had obtained all they stood in need of, they broke the truce and recommenced the war with all the advantages a foolishly granted peace had given them.

Antioch, after a seven months' siege, would have escaped the hands of the Christians, if cunning, policy, and ambition had not done more for their cause than patience and valor had been able to do. Bohemond, whom the hopes of bettering his fortune had drawn into the Crusade, was always on the watch to realize his projects. The success of Baldwin had roused his jealousy. He ventured to cast his eyes upon Antioch, and was sufficiently favored by circumstances to find a man who had it in his power to place the city in his hands. This man, who was named Phirous, was the son of an Armenian, a maker of cuirasses. Of a restless, uneasy character, he was constantly in hopes of changing his condition. He had abjured the Christian religion in a spirit of inconsistency and with the expectation of advancing his fortune. To satisfy his ambition and avarice, nothing appeared unjust or impossible. Being active, cunning, and insinuating, he had obtained the confidence of Accien, who admitted him to his councils. The Prince of Antioch had confided the command of three of his principal towers to him. He at first defended them with zeal, but without any advantage to his fortune: he grew weary of a sterile fidelity as soon as he was brought to think that treacher ymight be more profitable to him.

In the intervals between the battles he had had frequent opportunities of seeing the Prince of Tarentum. These two men divined each other's character at first sight, and were not long in coming to an understanding. They afterward saw each other several times, but always with the greatest secrecy. At every interview, Bohemond told Phirous that the fate of the Crusaders was in his hands, and that it only remained with himself to obtain an immense recompense from them. On his side, Phirous protested that he had a great desire to serve the Crusaders, whom he looked upon as his brothers; and to assure the Prince of Tarentum of his fidelity, or to excuse his treachery, he said that Christ had appeared to him and advised him to give Antioch up to the Christians. Bohemond had no need of a similar protestation. He had no trouble in believing what he wished for with so much ardor; and when he had agreed with Phirous upon the means by which the projects they had a long time meditated should be executed, he called an assembly of the principal leaders of the Christian army. He dwelt with great warmth upon the evils which to that period had desolated the Crusaders, and the yet greater evils with which they were still threatened. He added that a powerful army was advancing to the succor of Antioch; that they could not retreat without shame and danger; and that there was no safety for the Christians but in the conquest of the city. The place, it was true, was defended by inexpugnable ramparts; but they must be aware that all victories are not gained by arms or in the field of battle; that those which were obtained by address were neither the least important nor the least glorious. They who could not be conquered might be seduced, and enemies might be overcome by an adroit and generous enterprise. Among the inhabitants of Antioch, widely differing in morals and religion, opposite in interests, there must be some to be found who would be accessible to baits of gold or to brilliant promises. It concerned a service of so much importance to the Christian army, that all sorts of attempts were justifiable. The possession even of Antioch itself did not appear to him to be too much to hold out as a reward to him who should be skillful or fortunate enough to throw open the gates to the Crusaders.

Bohemond did not explain himself more clearly, but several of the leaders, who, perhaps, entertained the same views, easily fathomed his meaning. Raymond, in particular, spoke strongly against the artful insinuations of the Prince of Tarentum. "We are all," said he, "brothers and companions in arms, and it would be unjust, that having all run the same risk, one alone should gather the fruit of our labors. "As for myself," added he, casting a look of anger and contempt upon Bohemond, "I have not traversed so many countries, and braved so many perils; I have not been prodigal of my blood, my soldiers, and my treasures, to pay with the price of our conquests some gross artifice, some disgraceful stratagem, the invention of which should be left to women." As none of the Crusaders were actuated by a more palpable ambition, or by meaner or more sordid views than Bohemond of Tarentum and Raymond of Toulouse, they were upon all occasions at variance, and by their wrangling laid their characters open to the whole army. Raymond's vehement words produced all the effect that might be expected among warriors accustomed to conquer by arms, and who valued no advantage that was not purchased by bravery. Most of the leaders rejected Bohemond's proposals, and joined their railleries to those of Raymond. Bohemond, with his Ulyssian tact, did his best to conceal his vexation and malice. He left the council with a smile on his lip, perfectly satisfied that necessity would soon bring the Crusaders to his opinion.

He made it his first business to spread, by means of emissaries, the most alarming reports throughout the camp. Some of the leaders went out to reconnoitre, and to learn if there were any foundation for these rumors. Thy speedily returned, announcing the approach of Kerbogha, Sultan of Mossoul, with an army of 200,000 men. This army, which had threatened Edessa and ravaged Mesopotamia, was within seven days' march of Antioch. At this account the fears of the Crusaders were redoubled. Bohemond went among the ranks, exaggerating the peril. The leaders again assembled to deliberate upon the measures that ought to be taken under such perilous circumstances. Two opinions divided the council. Some proposed that they should raise the siege, and go and meet the Saracens; others, that the army should be divided into two bodies, one of which should march against Kerbogha, and the other remain in charge of the camp. This last advice was about to prevail, when Bohemond demanded permission to speak. He had not much difficulty in demonstrating the difficulties of both plans. If they raised the siege, they would be placed between the garrison of Antioch and a formidable army. If they continued the blockade, and half the army only went to meet Kerbogha, they would certainly risk a double defeat. "The greatest perils," added the Prince of Tarentum, "surround us. Time presses; to-morrow, perhaps, it will be too late to act; to-morrow we shall have lost the fruit of all our labor and all our victories. But no, I can not think so; God, who has conducted us hither, will not permit that we should have fought in his cause in vain. If you will listen to the proposal I am about to make to you, to-morrow the standard of the cross shall float over the walls of Antioch, and we shall march in triumph to Jerusalem."

On finishing these words, Bohemond exhibited the letters of Phirous, in which he promised to surrender the three towers he commanded. Phirous declared that he was ready to fulfill his promises, but that he would have nothing to do with any one but the Prince of Tarentum. He required, as the price of his services, that Bohemond should remain master of Antioch. The Italian prince affirmed that he had already given considerable sums to Phirous; that he alone had obtained his confidence, and that a reciprocal confidence was the surest guaranty of success in so difficult an enterprise. "As to the rest," added he, "if a better means of saving the army can be found, I am ready to approve of it, and will willingly renounce my share of a conquest upon which the safety of all the Crusaders depends."

The peril daily became greater; it was disgraceful to fly, imprudent to fight, and dangerous to temporize. Fear put all the interests of rivalry to silence. The greater the opposition the leaders had at first shown to the proposals of Bohemond, the more abundant did they now find the reasons for adopting them. A divided conquest was no conquest; besides, a partition of Antioch might give birth to a thousand differences in the army, and lead to its ruin. They only gave away that which they did not possess, and they gave it to secure the lives of the Christians. Better one should profit by the labors of all, than that all should perish out of opposition to the good fortune of one. Besides, the taking of Antioch was not the great object of the Crusade; they had taken arms to deliver Jerusalem. Every delay was contrary to what religion hoped for from its soldiers, and to what the West expected from its bravest knights. All the leaders, except the inflexible Raymond, united in granting the principality of Antioch to Bohemond, and conjured him to press the execution of his project.

The moment he left the council, Bohemond informed Phirous of what had taken place, and the latter sent him his son as a hostage. The execution of the plan was fixed for the next day. To leave the garrison of Antioch in the greater security, the Christians were to quit their camp and direct their march toward the route by which Kerbogha's army was expected, and were to return to the walls of Antioch during the night. The next day, at dawn, the troops received orders to prepare for their departure; they left the camp a few hours before nightfall, with trumpets sounding and ensigns flying, and after a short march retraced their steps, and came in silence toward Antioch. At a signal given by the Prince of Tarentum, they halted in a valley west of the city, near the tower of the Three Sisters, commanded by Phirous. It was there that the secret of the great enterprise which was to open the gates to them was revealed to the Christian army.

These deeply-laid plans, however, were very near failing. At the moment the army left the camp, a report was circulated in Antioch that a plot was on foot. The Christians and newly-converted Mussulmans were suspected, and the name of Phirous was heard coupled with accusations of keeping up an intelligence with the besiegers. He was obliged to appear before Accien, who interrogated him sternly, with his eyes fixed upon him, to read his purpose in his countenance: but Phirous dispersed all suspicions by his self-possession. He himself proposed measures for detecting the traitors, if there were any; and advised his master to change the commanders of the principal towers. This advice was highly approved of, and Accien said he would follow it the next day. At the same time orders were issued to place all the Christians in the city in chains during the darkness of night. The renegade was then sent to his post, loaded with praises for his exactitude and fidelity. As night approached, every thing appeared tranquil in Antioch, and Phirous, thinking his danger was over, awaited the Crusaders in the tower he had engaged to surrender.

As his brother commanded a tower next to his, he went to him, and endeavored to draw him into the plot, but his brother refused with threatening words, and the renegade saw that he was at least suspected. He acknowledged no brother in the man who refused to be his accomplice, and, as his only reply, plunged his dagger into his heart.

The decisive moment arrived. The night was dark, and a storm which had risen, considerably augmented the obscurity. The wind, which shook the roofs of the houses, together with the incessant peals of thunder, prevented the soldiers from hearing any noise round the ramparts. The sky looked inflamed toward the west, and the sight of a comet, which appeared above the horizon, seemed to announce to the superstitious minds of the Crusaders the moment destined for the destruction of the infidels. They awaited the signal with impatience. A Lombard, named Payen, sent by Bohemond, ascended the tower by a ladder of leather. Phirous received him, told him all was prepared, and, to convince him of his fidelity, pointed to the dead body of his brother. While they were talking, an officer of the garrison came to visit the posts. He presented himself with a lantern before the tower. Phirous, without showing the least fear, concealed Bohemond's messenger, and went forward to meet the officer. He received praises for his vigilance, and then hastened to send back Payen. The Lombard rejoined his comrades, and conjured Bohemond, on the part of Phirous, not to lose a moment.

But all at once a panic seized the soldiers: at the moment of execution, they perceived the full extent of the danger. Not one came forward to mount the ladder. In vain Godfrey and the Prince of Tarentum employed by turns promises and threats: both leaders and soldiers remained motionless. Bohemond then ascended by a rope ladder, with the hope that his example would be followed by some of the bravest, but nobody felt it his duty to meet the risk. He arrived alone on the tower, where Phirous reproached him warmly for his tardiness. Bohemond redescended in haste, and told the soldiers all was ready to receive them. His words, but still more his example, at length revived the courage of the men. Sixty Crusaders prepared for the escalade. Encouraged by one Foulcher of Chartres, they seized the ladder of leather and ascended the tower. Among these sixty was the Count of Flanders, with many of the principal leaders. Sixty others soon followed the steps of the first, and these were followed by such numbers, and so precipitately, that the parapet to which the ladder was fastened gave way, and fell with a crash into the ditch. Those who were near the summit of the walls fell upon the lances and swords of their companions. All was confusion and disorder among the assailants; the leaders of the enterprise, nevertheless, looked on with a tranquil eye. Phirous, over the bloody body of his brother, embraced his new companions, gave up to their swords another brother who was with him, and put them in possession of the three towers confided to his command. Seven other towers soon fell into their hands. Phirous then called upon all the Christian army to advance; he fastened a fresh ladder to the rampart, by which the most impatient ascended, and pointed out to others a gate they could break in, and by which they entered the city in crowds.

Godfrey, Raymond, and the Count of Normandy were soon in the streets of Antioch with their battalions. All the trumpets were sounded, and the four hills of the city resounded with the terrible cry, "Dieu le veut! Dieu le veut!" At the first report of the tumult, the Christian inhabitants of Antioch believed their last hour to be come, and that the Mussulmans were about to cut their throats. The latter, half-asleep, crawled from their houses to inquire the cause of the noise they heard, and died without knowing who were the traitors, or by what hand they were struck. Some, when aware of the danger, fled toward the mountain upon which the citadel was built; whilst others rushed out at the gates of the city. All who could not fly fell beneath the swords of the conquerors.

Notwithstanding the confusion, Bohemond did not fail to take possession of Antioch; and when day appeared, his red flag was seen floating over one of the highest towers of the city. At sight of this, the Crusaders left in charge of the camp uttered loud shouts of joy, and flocked to the city to partake of the new conquest. The slaughter of the Mussulmans was pursued with fury. The Christians, who had suffered much, exhibited their chains to their liberators, and increased their thirst for blood: the public places were covered with dead bodies, and blood flowed down all the streets. Every house and thing that was not marked with a cross was the object of their fury; all who did not pronounce the name of Christ were massacred without mercy.

In a single night, more than ten thousand of the inhabitants of Antioch perished; many who attempted to escape were brought back to either death or slavery. Accien, finding he was betrayed, and not daring to place confidence in any of his officers, resolved to fly toward Mesopotamia, and meet Kerbogha. After leaving the gates, he was proceeding without any escort, through forests and over mountains, when he fell in with some Armenian woodcutters. These men recognized the Prince of Antioch, and as he was without a train, and bore upon his countenance the marks of depression and grief, they judged the city must be taken. One of them went up to him, snatched his sword from him, and plunged it into his heart. His head was brought to the new masters of Antioch. After having received great wealth as the reward of his treachery, Phirous re-embraced the Christianity he had abandoned, and followed the Crusaders to Jerusalem. Two years after, his ambition not being satisfied, he returned to the religion of Mahomet, and died abhorred by both Mussulmans and Christians.

When tired of slaughter, the Christians turned their attention toward the citadel; but that, being situated upon an almost inaccessible mountain, set their efforts at defiance. They satisfied themselves with surrounding it with machines of war and soldiers, and proceeded to indulge in all the intoxication inspired by their victory. The pillage of Antioch yielded immense treasures; and, although provisions did not abound, they gave themselves up to intemperance and debauchery.

These things took place in the early part of June, 1098; the siege had commenced in the month of October, the preceding year. After this success, for we can not call it a victory, three days quickly passed away in rejoicings and festivity; but the fourth was a day of fear and of mourning.

A formidable army of Saracens approached Antioch. All the powers of the East were roused by the success of the Christians, and Asia Minor seemed to be in arms to repel the attack of Europe. Kerbogha, Sultan of Mossoul, commanded the Mussulman forces. This formidable leader had gained great experience in civil wars. Three sultans, the Governor of Jerusalem, and twenty-eight emirs, marched in his train. Animated by the thirst of vengeance, the Mussulman soldiers swore by their prophet to exterminate the Christians; and, three days after the taking of Antioch, the army of Kerbogha pitched their tents upon the banks of the Orontes. Their approach was announced to the Christians by the appearance of three hundred horsemen, who came under the walls to reconnoitre. Anxiety and alarm instantly succeeded to joy and excess; for they at once perceived that they had not provisions for a siege. Troops were sent to forage in all directions, but as the territory of Antioch had been ravaged for several months, they returned, to the consternation of their comrades, almost empty-handed. The moment the infidels arrived, they attacked the advanced posts of the Crusaders. In these early combats, the Christians had to lament the loss of some of their bravest warriors. Bohemond was wounded in a sortie. In vain Tancred and Godfrey performed prodigies of valor; the Mussulmans drove the Christians into the city, in which they were now, in their turn, besieged.

Placed between the vast Mussulman army and the garrison of the citadel, the position of the Crusaders was awful. Kerbogha took possession of the port of St. Simeon, so that no provisions could reach them by sea, and famine very quickly began to exercise cruel ravages upon the besieged.

At the very commencement of the siege, the commonest necessaries were worth their weight in gold. After having slaughtered most of their horses, they were obliged to have recourse to unclean animals. The soldiers and the poor who followed the army lived upon leaves and roots; some even went so far as to devour the leather of their bucklers and shoes: the most destitute exhumed the bodies of the Saracens, and, to support their wretched existence, disputed his prey with death. In this frightful distress, agonized mothers could no longer support their children, and with them died of despair and hunger. Princes and knights, whose pride had been most conspicuous, were debased to the asking of charity. More than one leader sold his equipments and his arms to purchase food for a single day.

Many of the Crusaders endeavored to fly from a city which presented nothing but the image and the prospect of death; some fled toward the sea, through a thousand dangers; others cast themselves among the Mussulmans, where they purchased a morsel of bread by abandonment of Christ and his religion. The soldiers lost courage at seeing the Count de Melun fly, for the second time: he could brave any dangers in the field of battle, but he could not endure hunger and misery. His desertion was preceded by that of the Count de Blois, who bore the standard of the Crusaders, and presided in council. He had quitted the army two days before the taking of Antioch; and when he learned the arrival of Kerbogha, marched toward Constantinople. The deserters escaped during the darkness of night. Sometimes they precipitated themselves into the ditches of the city, at the risk of their lives; and others slipped down the rampart with the aid of ropes.

Stephen, Count of Chartres, arrived safely at the camp of Alexius, who was advancing at the head of an army toward Antioch. To excuse his desertion, he did not fail to paint in the darkest colors the ills and perils of the Christians, and to make it evident by his recital that God had abandoned the cause of the Christians. The despair of some Latin pilgrims who followed the army of the Greeks was so violent, that it inspired them with horrible blasphemies.

The Emperor Alexius, who had advanced as far as Philomelum, terrified at all he heard, did not dare to continue his march toward Antioch. He returned toward Constantinople, dragging in his train half the inhabitants of the countries he passed through, they being afraid of being left to the mercy of the Mussulmans.

The news of this retreat completed the despair of the Christians: hope was gone; deaths increased awfully; their enfeebled hands could scarcely wield the lance or the sword; they had neither the strength to defend their lives nor to bury the dead. Amid such frightful misery, no more tears were seen to flow, no more groans were heard, the silence was as complete in Antioch as if it had been perpetual night, or that no one was left in it. The Crusaders were abandoned even by the courage of despair. The last feeling of nature, love of life, became fainter in their hearts every day; they dreaded to meet each other in the public places, and remained concealed in the interior of their houses, which they looked upon as their tombs.

The towers and ramparts were almost without defense. Bohemond, as lord of the place, in vain endeavored by words and exertions to keep up the courage of the Crusaders; the summons of the serjeant-at-arms, or the trumpet-call, was equally unresponded to. While the army without, and the garrison of the citadel within, renewed their assaults daily, the Christian warriors remained motionless in their dwellings. In order to rouse them, Bohemond set fire to several quarters of the city, destroying, as a pompous poet said, churches and palaces built with the cedar of Lebanon, in which shone marble from the Atlas, crystal from Tyre, brass from Cyprus, lead from Amathonte, and steel from England. The barons, unable to command the obedience of their soldiers, had not strength to set them an example.

They offered to give up the city, upon being permitted to return to their country; but Kerbogha would listen to nothing but unconditional surrender. The European invasion of Asia was such an extraordinary event, that the Saracens, perhaps wisely, deemed a severe lesson necessary.

But some of the leaders, who knew how the minds of many of the Crusaders had been worked upon to undertake the enterprise, had recourse in this extreme distress to similar motives of action: they industriously circulated accounts of visions and supernatural revelations, all pointing to a happy issue.

In order to realize the promises of heaven, a priest of the diocese of Marseilles, named Pierre Barthélemi, appeared before the council of the leaders, for the purpose of revealing an apparition of St. Andrew, which had been repeated three times while he was asleep. The holy apostle had said to him—"Go to the church of my brother, Peter, at Antioch: near the high altar you will find, on digging the earth, the iron of the lance which pierced the side of our Redeemer. In three days, that instrument of eternal salvation shall be manifested to His disciples: that mystic iron, borne at the head of the army, will effect the delivery of the Christians and pierce the hearts of the infidels."

Adhemar, Raymond, and the other leaders affected to believe this tale. The report of it was soon spread throughout the army. The soldiers believed that the glory of Christ was interested in their safety, and that God ought to perform miracles to save his disciples and defenders. During three days the Christian army prepared itself by fasting and prayer for the discovery of this holy lance.

On the morning of the third day, twelve Crusaders, chosen from among the most respectable of the clergy and knights, repaired to the great church of Antioch, accompanied by a vast number of laborers provided with the necessary tools. They began to dig the ground under the high altar; the greatest silence prevailed in the church; every instant the spectators expected to behold the glittering of the miraculous iron. The whole army, assembled outside the closed doors, awaited impatiently the result of the search. The diggers had worked during several hours, and had thrown out the earth to the depth of twelve feet, without the appearance of any lance. Night came on, and nothing was discovered; and yet the impatience of the Crusaders seemed to be increased rather than diminished by disappointment. The laborers rested for awhile, and then in the darkness of the night resumed their operations. While the twelve witnesses were bent in prayer round the hole, Barthélemi leaped into it, and in a very short time reappeared with the sacred iron in his hand! A cry of joy was uttered by all present; it was repeated by the anxious army at the doors, and soon resounded through every quarter of the city. The iron to which so many hopes were attached, was exhibited in triumph to the Crusaders; it appeared to them a celestial weapon with which God himself would disperse his enemies. Enthusiasm gave fresh life to the Crusaders, and seemed to restore strength to the soldiers.

The leaders of the army who had thus excited the enthusiasm of the soldiers were too prudent to let it slumber. They sent deputies to the Saracens to offer them either a single combat or a general engagement. Peter the Hermit, who had, in the lance-scene, evinced more exaltation than any one, was selected for this embassy. Although received with contempt in the camp of the infidels, he spoke with none the less haughtiness and pride: "The princes assembled in Antioch," said he to the Saracen leaders, "have sent me to you, to demand justice. These provinces, marked with the blood of martyrs, have belonged to Christian peoples, and as all Christian peoples are brothers, we are come into Asia to avenge the outrages of those who are persecuted, and to defend the heritage of Christ and his disciples. Heaven has allowed the cities of Syria to fall for a time into the power of infidels, as a chastisement for the offenses of his people; but learn that the vengeance of the Most High is at length appeased; learn that the tears and repentance of the Christians have wrested the sword from the hand of divine justice, and that the God of armies is risen to combat for us. Nevertheless, we still consent to speak of peace; I conjure you, in the name of the all-powerful God, to abandon the territories of Antioch, and return into your own country. The Christians promise you, by my voice, not to interrupt your retreat. We will put up vows that the true God may touch your hearts, and show you the truth of our faith. If heaven deigns to listen to us, how delightful it will be to us to give you the name of brethren, and to conclude with you a durable peace! But if you are unwilling to receive either the advantages of peace or the blessings of the Christian religion, let the fate of arms decide the justice of our cause. As the Christians do not wish to be surprised, and as they are incapable of stealing a victory, they offer you the choice of the battle."

On finishing these words, Peter fixed his eyes upon the countenance of the leaders of the Saracens: "Choose," said he, "the bravest of thy army, and let them fight with a similar number of the Crusaders; fight thyself with one of the Christian princes, or give the signal for a general battle. Whichever be thy choice, thou shalt soon learn what thy enemies are, and shalt know who is the God we serve."

Kerbogha, who was acquainted with the situation of the Christians, but who knew nothing of the kind of succor they had received in their distress, was extremely surprised at such language. He remained for some time mute with astonishment and rage; but at length recovering himself: "Return," cried he to Peter, "return to those that sent thee, and tell them that the conquered receive conditions, and do not dictate them. Miserable vagabonds, attenuated wretches, phantoms can inspire fear in none but women. The warriors of Asia are not to be terrified with words. The Christians shall soon learn that the land we tread on belongs to us. Nevertheless, I am desirous of showing them some pity, and if they will acknowledge Mahomet, I may be able to forget that the city, ravaged by hunger, is already in my power; I may leave it in their power, and give them clothes, food, women—all they stand in need of; for the Koran commands us to pardon those who submit to its laws. Tell thy companions to be quick, and profit to-day by my clemency; to-morrow they shall not leave Antioch but by the sword. They will then see if their crucified God, who could not save himself on the cross, can save them from the fate which is prepared for them."

This speech was warmly applauded by the Saracens, whose fanaticism it rekindled. Peter wanted to reply, but the Sultan of Mossoul, laying his hand upon his saber, commanded the miserable mendicants, who united insolence to blindness, to be driven out of his camp. The Christian deputies retired in haste, and several times ran great risk of their lives in passing through the army of the infidels. On his return to Antioch, Peter gave the assembled princes and barons an account of his mission; and they prepared for the great contest. The heralds-at-arms visited the various quarters of the city, and the impatient valor of the Crusaders was promised battle on the ensuing day.

The priests and bishops exhorted the Christians to render themselves worthy of fighting in the cause of Christ: the whole army passed the night in prayer and acts of devotion. Injuries were forgiven, alms were bestowed; all the churches were filled with warriors, humbling themselves before God, and asking absolution for their sins. The evening before, a considerable quantity of provisions had been discovered, and this unexpected abundance was looked upon as a kind of miracle. The Crusaders repaired their strength by a frugal repast: toward midnight, all the bread and flour that remained in Antioch served for the sacrifice of the mass. A hundred thousand warriors approached the tribunal of penitence, and received, with all the marks of piety, what they believed to be the God for whom they had taken up arms.

At length day appeared; it was the festival of St. Peter and St. Paul. The gates of Antioch were thrown open, and the Christian army marched out, divided into twelve bodies, which reminded them of the twelve apostles. Hugh the Great, although weakened by a long illness, appeared in the foremost ranks, bearing the standard of the Church. All the princes, knights, and barons were at the head of their men-at-arms. The Count of Toulouse was the only leader not in the ranks; detained in Antioch, in consequence of a wound, he was charged with keeping the garrison in check while the battle was fought.

Raymond of Agiles, one of the historians of the Crusade, bore the holy lance, and exhibited it to the soldiers. Bishop Adhemar marched by his side, announcing to the Crusaders the assistance of the heavenly legions which God had promised them. A part of the clergy advanced in procession at the head of the army, singing the martial Psalm: "Let the Lord arise, and let his enemies be dispersed." The bishops and priests who remained in Antioch, surrounded by the women and children, from the heights of the ramparts, blessed the arms of the Crusaders, and raising their hands toward heaven, prayed the Lord to save his people, and confound the pride of his enemies. The banks of the Orontes and the neighboring mountains seemed to reply to these invocations, and resounded with the war-cry of the Crusaders, Dieu le veut! Dieu le veut!

Amid this concert of acclamations and prayers the Christian army advanced into the plain. To consider only the state to which it was reduced, it had rather the appearance of a vanquished army than of one which was marching to victory. A great number of the Crusaders were almost without clothes. Most of the knights and barons marched on foot. Some were mounted on asses, and some on camels; and, which is worthy of note on such a day, Godfrey Bouillon was obliged to borrow a horse of the Count of Toulouse. In the ranks were sickly attenuated men, marching with difficulty, and only supported by the hope of either conquering or dying in the cause of Christ.

All the plains near Antioch were covered with Mussulman battalions. The Saracens had divided their army into fifteen bodies, arranged in echelons. In the midst of all these bodies, that of Kerbogha looked like an inaccessible mountain. The Saracen general, who had no expectation of a battle, at first supposed that the Christians were coming to implore his clemency. A black flag, hoisted on the citadel of Antioch, which was the signal agreed upon to announce the resolution of the Crusaders, soon convinced him that he had not to deal with supplicants. Two thousand men of his army, who guarded the bridge of Antioch, were cut to pieces by the Count de Vermandois. The fugitives carried terror to the tent of their general, who was playing at chess at the time. Roused from his false security, Kerbogha ordered the head of a deserter, who had announced to him the speedy surrender of the Christians, to be struck off, and prepared for battle.

On leaving Antioch, the Christian army advanced westward, toward the point where the mountains approach the Orontes. Drawn up in battle-array on a vast space where the mountains formed a half-circle around them, and secured them from surprise, their line extended into the plain a league from the city. Hugh, the two Roberts, the Count de Belesme, and the Count of Hainault placed themselves at the head of the left wing; Godfrey was on the right wing, supported by Eustache, Baldwin du Bourg, Tancred, Renaud de Toul, and Erard de Puyset. Adhemar was in the center, with Gaston de Bearn, the Count de Die, Raimbaut of Orange, William of Montpellier, and Amenjeu d'Albret. Bohemond commanded a body of reserve, ready to fly to any point where the Christians should require help. When Kerbogha saw the dispositions of the Christians, he ordered the Sultans of Nicea, Damascus, and Aleppo to make the tour of the mountain, and afterward reascend the Orontes, so as to place themselves between the Christian army and the city of Antioch. He at the same time drew up his army to receive the Christians and repulse their attack. He placed his troops partly on the heights, partly in the plain. His right wing was commanded by the Emir of Jerusalem, and his left by one of the sons of Accien. For himself, he remained upon a lofty hill, to give his orders, and watch the movements of the two armies.

At the moment the battle began, Kerbogha was seized with fear, and he sent to the Christian princes to propose a combat between a given number on each side, to prevent the general carnage. But this offer, which he had rejected the day before, was not likely to be adopted by the leaders of an army full of ardor and confident of victory. The Christians did not doubt that heaven would declare for them, and this persuasion must render them invincible. In their enthusiasm they looked upon the most natural events as prodigies which announced the triumph of their arms. A ball of fire, which the evening before had passed over Antioch, and burst over the Saracen camp, appeared to them a certain forerunner of victory. As they left Antioch, a slight rain refreshed the hot air of the season and the climate, and appeared in their eyes a fresh proof of the favor of heaven. A strong wind, which added speed to their javelins and impeded those of the enemy, was, for them, like the wind of celestial anger, raised to disperse the infidels. Animated by these persuasions, the Christian army was impatient for the fight. They marched toward the enemy in perfect order: a profound silence prevailed, broken alone by the voices of the commanders, the hymns of the priests, and the exhortations of Adhemar.

All at once the Saracens commenced the attack; they discharged a shower of arrows, and rushed upon the Christians, uttering barbarous howlings. In spite of their impetuous charge, their right wing was quickly repulsed and broken by the Christians. Godfrey met with greater resistance in their left wing: he, however, succeeded in shaking it, and throwing their ranks into disorder. At the moment the troops of Kerbogha began to give way, the Sultan of Nicea, who had made the tour of the mountain and returned along the banks of the Orontes, fell upon the rear of the Christians with such impetuosity as to threaten the destruction of the body of reserve under Bohemond. The Crusaders, who fought on foot, could not stand against the first charge of the Saracen cavalry. Hugh the Great, when warned of the danger of Bohemond, abandoned the pursuit of the fugitives and flew to the succor of the reserve. Then the fight was renewed with fresh fury. Kilidj-Arslan, who had to avenge the disgrace of several defeats, as well as the loss of his states, fought like a lion at the head of his troops. A squadron of three thousand Saracen horsemen, all bristling with steel, and armed with clubs, carried disorder and terror into the ranks of the Christians. The standard of the Count de Vermandois was borne off and retaken, covered with the blood of Crusaders and infidels. Godfrey and Tancred, who flew to the aid of Hugh and Bohemond signalized their strength and courage by the death of many Mussulmans. The Sultan of Nicea, whom no reverse could subdue, still sustained the shock of the Christians. In the heat of the fight he caused lighted flax to be cast among the heath and dried grass which covered the plain. A conflagration quickly ensued, which encircled the Christians with volumes of fire and smoke. Their ranks were for a moment broken, and they paid no attention to the voice of their leaders. The Sultan of Nicea was about to gather the fruit of his stratagem, and victory was on the point of escaping from the hand of the Christians.

At that moment, say the historians, a squadron was seen coming down from the mountains. It was preceded by three horsemen clothed in white, and covered with shining armor: "Behold!" shouted Bishop Adhemar, "behold the celestial succor that was promised you. Heaven declares for the Christians; the holy martyrs, George, Demetrius, and Theodore, are come to fight for us." Immediately all eyes were turned toward the celestial legion. A new ardor took possession of the hearts of the Crusaders, who were persuaded that God himself was come to their succor; the war-cry Dieu le veut was shouted with as much vigor as at the commencement of the battle. The women and children animated the warriors by their acclamations from the battlements; and the priests continued to pray and sing aloud their hymns and sacred songs of encouragement to the host.

Every Crusader became a hero; nothing could resist their impetuous shock. In a moment the Saracens were shaken everywhere, and only fought in wild disorder. They made an effort to rally on the other side of a torrent, and again on an elevated spot, whence their clarions and trumpets resounded; but the Count de Vermandois attacked them in this last intrenchment, and quickly put them to the rout. There was shortly no safety for them but in flight. The banks of the Orontes, the woods, the plains, the mountains were covered with fugitives, who abandoned their arms and their baggage.

Kerbogha, who had prematurely announced the defeat of the Christians to the Caliph of Bagdad and the Sultan of Persia, fled with all speed toward the Euphrates, escorted by a small number of his most faithful soldiers. Several emirs had fled before the end of the battle. Tancred and some others, mounted upon the horses of the conquered, pursued till nightfall the Sultans of Aleppo and Damascus, the Emir of Jerusalem, and the dispersed wreck of the Saracen army. The conquerors set fire to the intrenchments, behind which the enemy's infantry had taken refuge. A great number of Mussulmans perished there in the flames.

According to many cotemporary historians, the infidels left a hundred thousand dead on the field of battle. Four thousand Crusaders lost their lives on this glorious day, and were placed in the list of martyrs.

The Christians found abundance in the tents of their enemies; fifteen thousand camels and a vast number of horses fell into their hands. In the camp of the Saracens, where they passed the night, they admired at leisure the luxury of the Orientals, and examined with surprise the tent of the King of Mossoul, in all parts of which glittered gold and precious stones, and which, divided into long streets, flanked by high towers, resembled a fortified city. They employed several days in carrying into Antioch the spoils of the conquered. The booty was immense, and every soldier found himself richer than when he left Europe.

The Saracen army was composed of newly raised troops, from nations generally at feud one with another; and of the twenty-eight emirs who accompanied Kerbogha, scarcely any two were disposed to act in concert, or acknowledge the authority of one leader. On the contrary, strange to say, the most perfect union prevailed on that day among the Christians.—Robson.

ANTWERP.—This great commercial city of Belgium, is situated on the right bank of the Scheldt, twenty-seven miles north of Brussels. It is strongly fortified, its walls and other defenses completely encompassing the city on the land side, from the river on the north to the citadel on the south, a distance, following the line of fortification, of about two and three fourth miles. Antwerp has been several times subjected to siege, of three of which only we think it necessary to offer any details.

First Siege, A.D. 1583.—The Netherlands, tired of Spanish domination, made the false step of getting rid of one evil by adopting another quite as bad, and elected as their sovereign Francis of France, who, known as the Duke d'Alençon, had recently assumed the title of Duke d'Anjou. The worthy brother of Francis II., Charles IX., and Henry III.—the son of Catherine de Medici—the Duke of Anjou, might have been thought the last prince to be selected for the purpose of reigning over a people so situated as the Netherlanders were; but France was the enemy of Spain; was the most powerful neighbor they had, and the wily Catherine and wicked Henry III., were liberal in their promises.

Very little satisfied with the name of leader and a limited authority, the Duke of Anjou soon made an effort to throw off the yoke of the States, and to reign as monarch. His first design was to gain possession of the citadel of Antwerp. On the 17th of January, 1583, he left his palace early in the morning, followed by several Frenchmen on horseback, and passed out of the city, by the gate of St. James. He had scarcely left the city, when those who accompanied him pretended to quarrel among themselves, and fell sword in hand upon the corps de garde, the soldiers of which they massacred, or put to flight, and, at the same time, seized upon that gate. All the citizens of that quarter hastened to the spot, while the French took possession of the Emperor's gate, and of the curtain which was between those two entrances. The troops who had been left in the city, ran through the streets, exclaiming: "The city is won! the city is won! Vive la Messe! Vive la Messe!" which was their rallying cry. Fifteen ensigns of foot and ten cornets of horse came to their assistance. The Swiss were approaching likewise. But an accident they might have prevented, disconcerted the enterprise. They had forgotten to take possession of the portcullis of the St. James gate; and the citizens, on perceiving this omission, rushed to the top of it, let it down, and thus impeded the entrance of the French. The whole people took up arms: every man became a soldier. The enraged citizens combined instantly to drive out an enemy who aimed at their property and their lives. So much in earnest were they, that they took the money from their purses, and molded or cut it into bullets with their teeth, and loaded their guns with it. The women disputed with the men the glory of defending their country. The disconcerted French were surrounded, pursued, and completely routed. In vain the Duke endeavored to withdraw them from the rage of the Flemings; they were all killed, wounded, or taken prisoners. Fifteen hundred were left on the field of battle; among whom were persons of the most illustrious houses in France; the Flemings did not lose a hundred men.

Second Siege, A.D. 1585.—This is considered one of the most remarkable sieges of modern times, from its cause, the parties concerned, the events, and the result.

The Prince of Parma presented himself, in 1585, before Antwerp, at the head of a powerful army. His operations commenced by the attack of the forts of Lillo and Liestenstoech, constructed by the Dutch upon the banks of the Scheldt. The Italians conceived a stratagem which very much facilitated the capture of this last fort. They got together a large number of wagons, loaded with green hay, to which they set fire. The wind carried the smoke directly toward the fort. Smothered and stifled by this cloud, the garrison were constrained to draw a little on one side, and the besiegers taking advantage of this short absence, mounted the ramparts, and carried the place. The prince was not so fortunate at Lillo. Mondragone, not having attacked it briskly enough, allowed a reinforcement to enter, by which six weeks and two thousand men were lost. This enterprise was abandoned, and the Spaniards contented themselves with masking the fort on the land side, and stopping the excursions of the troops who were shut up in it. The duke next undertook to close the Scheldt. In the month of September, he built two forts, opposite each other; furnished them with artillery, and then began the construction of a bridge, in appearance a chimerical project, but upon which the success of the siege depended. The Spanish general dug a broad and deep canal, two leagues in length, to facilitate the transport of materials; this was called the Parma Canal. To animate the laborers, the prince fixed his quarters in the village of Beversen. The Count de Mansfeld, lieutenant-general, commanded on the Brabant side, and was encamped at Stabrock. Mondragone was intrenched on the banks of the river, opposite Lillo, where he held the enemy in check. On all parts forts were built, to secure the dykes, and prevent the Dutch from inundating the country; communication between the city and the neighboring places was completely cut off, as was all means of its receiving succor by the Scheldt. The Marquis de Roubais was charged with the construction of the bridge. He exhibited so much activity in this important work, that a speedy completion of it was hoped for.

The besieged, terrified at the progress of the Spaniards, were a prey to the most serious inquietudes. In this wealthy place, every one trembled for his property, and yet could see no means of escaping the storm which growled over their heads. The firmest hearts were shaken. It was given out that they would no longer sustain a siege which must cost so much blood and treasure. Roused by this, Sainte-Aldegonde, the mayor of Antwerp, ventured, though alone, to combat this resolution. In speeches of fire he revived the fallen courage of his fellow-citizens, he inspired them with republican sentiments, and induced them to swear, with a common voice, an eternal renunciation of the yoke of Philip of Spain. An edict forbade, under pain of death, the least approach to accommodation with the royalists. The greatest ardor was evinced for the defense of their country. To prolong the means of resistance, provisions were distributed very economically, and every preparation that could be devised was made to thwart the construction of the fatal bridge which was to reduce Antwerp.

To prevent or retard this work, and destroy what was done, several singular vessels were employed, which were to be filled with fireworks. The redoubts the prince had built on the banks of the river interfered with the cruises of the Antwerp frigates; a vessel of enormous size was constructed, provided with large guns, for the purpose of attacking them. This immense mass in some sort resembled a floating fortress. The besieged conceived such magnificent hopes from this vessel, that they named it The End of the War; a boastful title, of which the skill and activity of the Prince of Parma made the vanity known.

Already the straccadoes, which formed the butments of each end of the bridge, approached completion, in spite of the efforts of the citizens, who gave unceasingly brave and sanguinary battle. In one of these conflicts, Roubais took Teligny prisoner, a captain equally brave and skillful. The Count of Hohenlohe was named in his place. This able officer did every thing possible, both by land and on the Scheldt, to impede the operations of the besiegers. But, notwithstanding all his efforts, they at length succeeded in procuring a sufficient number of vessels to close the river in the middle of its course; and, on the 25th of February, 1585, the bridge was entirely finished.

The spot for this famous bridge was chosen between the villages of Ordam and Calloo, because the bed of the river was narrower there than at any other part. Its course made a marked elbow, which would prevent the vessels of the enemy from sailing full upon the bridge. On commencing it they had driven, on each side of the Scheldt, long rows of large piles, which were continued as far as the depth of the river would permit. They were joined together transversely, and in all their length, with very strong and solid pieces of wood: this formed what they called staccadoes: that of Calloo was 200 feet long, and that of Ordam 900. The space left between them was 1,250 feet. Upon each of these was formed a kind of place of arms, capable of containing a body of troops sufficient to defend it, and to protect the vessels which were to continue the bridge. These were lined by a parapet, from which the soldiers, protected from the shots of the enemy, could annoy them with their fire. The two forts constructed at the two têtes du pont, that is to say, at the extremity of the staccadoes, on the land side, protected the two flanks of them; for this purpose they were furnished with a numerous artillery. Batteries also were established in the places of arms. To these precautions, was added that of bristling, on both sides, the staccadoes with large posts, terminating in sharp iron points. They protruded a considerable distance; and great piles, driven into the bed of the river, held them fast just above the water. It was proposed by this to keep off the enemy's vessels, and weaken their attacks. When the staccadoes were completed, the vessels were brought up that were intended to close the remainder of the Scheldt in the deepest and widest part. Thirty-two barks, 60 feet long and 12 feet wide, were selected for this purpose; they were placed at 22 feet from each other; they were fixed in their positions by two good anchors each, and were fastened together by a great number of strong chains. Each bark was manned by thirty soldiers and four sailors, and armed with two cannon at the extremities. The total number of cannon distributed over the staccadoes and the bridge amounted to 97. The bridge likewise was protected by an outward defense, in order to secure it from surprise. It was known that the garrison were preparing fire-ships, with which they meant to assail the bridge. It was likewise feared that the armed vessels in the besieged city might attack it from above, at the same time that the ships of the confederates might attempt it from below. To secure it from this double danger, some large rafts were made with a great number of masts solidly fastened together, which were set afloat in the width of the bridge, and presented a sort of rampart or large parapet to the enemy. This immense work, which was two miles four hundred feet in length, required for its construction seven months of incessant fatigue and application. The engineers who had the direction of it were named Jean Baptiste Plato and Prosperce Barrochio. It was the latter who formed the idea of the rafts which covered the bridge. The Duke of Parma, to reward them for their labors, made them a present of all the materials, after the capture of Antwerp.

The city, however, neglected nothing that might impede or destroy this astonishing undertaking. It retained in its service a celebrated Italian engineer, named Frederic Giambelli, a native of Mantua. It was he who invented and brought into play those destructive vessels since known by the name of infernal machines. They were built of very thick and solidly-joined timbers, among which were constructed chambers for mines, proportioned to their size. These were formed of good bricks and mortar, and required but one light to set fire to the powder with which they were filled. These terrible vessels were loaded with blocks of stone, bullets of different calibres, in short, with all sorts of materials of great weight, heaped together as closely as possible, in order that the effect of the mine might be increased by the resistance opposed to it. Giambelli employed more than eight months in getting every thing ready. The large vessel of which we have before spoken was not so soon completed. It was a ship with two very lofty decks: the under one was armed with several large and small cannon; the upper was a large place of arms, whereon were a number of troops, who from the elevation of that deck could keep up a warm fire of musketry. This enormous vessel had but two large masts of equal size, placed at the two extremities, and of nearly the same shape. To facilitate its approach to the redoubts constructed by the royalists upon the banks of the river, it was quite flat, and only sunk into the water in proportion to its weight, being kept afloat upon a vast raft of enormous beams, supported by empty barrels. Such were the means to which the inhabitants of Antwerp had recourse to keep open the navigation of the Scheldt. They had placed all their hopes in them. The confederates were expected to aid their endeavors. A great number of armed vessels awaited near Lillo the effects of the infernal machines, with the view of acting at the same time. They attempted to recapture the fort of Liestenstoech, and succeeded.

On the 4th of April at length appeared on the river the two redoubtable machines called Fortune and Hope, followed by some smaller vessels. They were left to the tide; having nobody on board, they floated, abandoned to themselves, and were carried by the reflux. Scarcely were they in motion, than there burst from them a column of fire, which, after having burnt for a few instants, appeared to sink and be extinguished. The spectators were astonished. All at once one of the smaller vessels blew up, when at a considerable distance from the bridge, and produced no other effect than a cloud of thick smoke. All that were constructed in the same manner proved equally abortive. There was nothing to be feared but from the two large vessels, which insensibly drew nearer to their object. The first, the Fortune, ran upon the left bank of the river, burst with a horrible crash, destroying the garrison of a neighboring redoubt and a number of soldiers dispersed about the environs. However serious was the effect of this, that of the Hope promised to be more terrific, and, in fact, caused considerable damage. This vessel had been guided to the point of union of one of the staccadoes and the barks which formed the bridge. It was at this spot it blew up. The air remained for a long time darkened; the shock experienced by the earth extended miles round; the Scheldt rushed from its bed, and threw its foaming waters over the neighboring country; the bodies of the miserable victims to this explosion were so mutilated as to preserve no resemblance to the human figure. The vast mass of stones and instruments of death which were hurled abroad by this frightful volcano, falling in all directions, a great number of unfortunates were killed, wounded, or bruised in the most cruel manner. Five hundred royalists perished, and thousands were either lamed or dangerously hurt. The death of the Marquis de Roubais was the crowning incident of this fatal day. The damage sustained by the bridge was not so great as was at first feared; but the disorder was so great, that if the enemy had attacked the work at that moment, all would have been lost. They were quite ignorant of the effect of their own machine; and the good face put upon the affair by the besiegers led them to believe that the bridge had sustained but little injury.

The citizens of Antwerp had now no hope but in the large vessel which they had named The End of the War. It was put to work. This vast castle drew near to one of the redoubts built on the banks of the river, on the Brabant side. The men on board commenced a brisk fire: they amounted to more than a thousand; they supported the effects of the lower cannon by a continual discharge of musketry; they landed for the purpose of attacking a redoubt; but in this they failed. The fort braved their batteries, and their assaults proved useless. On the other side, their enormous vessel was so knocked about by the artillery of the redoubt, that they had much difficulty in repairing it, and rendering it capable of being employed again. A second attempt was as unfortunate as the first; and all the efforts made afterward, either to carry the works or break down the bridge, proved equally fruitless. The most memorable of the combats fought on these occasions was that of the counter-dyke. The field of battle was only seventeen feet wide. The townspeople were desirous of carrying it, at any price. Animated by the example and exhortatians of Sainte-Aldegonde and the Count of Hohenlohe, they more than once repulsed the royalists, and believed themselves masters of the object of their generous efforts. But, overwhelmed by the number of their enemies, rather than conquered, they yielded their triumph, and retreated within the walls of their city, having lost 2500 men and thirty ships. After this bloody victory, which had cost him more than 1000 men, the Prince of Parma took from the besieged all the neighboring posts that belonged to them, and shut them up closely in their city. Despair was then at its height; the citizens had no other prospect but the horrors of starvation from famine, which began to be not only dreaded but felt, or the painful necessity of yielding to the conqueror. The people assembled, and openly opposed the leaders who wished to continue the defense: and it became necessary to enter into negotiations. Deputies were sent to the Prince of Parma to arrange the articles of surrender. Sainte-Aldegonde, who was at their head, protracted for two months, under various pretexts, the conclusion of the treaty, believing by this skillful delay he should give time for the succors he expected to come up, At length, on the 17th of August, 1585, the capitulation was signed. The conqueror then made his public entrance into the city, with all the pomp of a triumph. Mounted on a superb courser, in complete armor, he marched amid bodies of cavalry and infantry, which opened and closed this brilliant procession. Like other conquerors, though he had obtained a sanguinary victory over a city which was in arms for freedom of action and opinion, he ended his triumph by offering up thanks to the God of Battles, who holds defeat and victory in his hands.—Robson.

Third Siege, 1832.—On the 30th of October, 1832, Marshal Gérard, commander of the French army sent the following summons to General Chassé, commander of the Dutch forces who occupied the citadel of Antwerp:

"To General Chassé, commanding the citadel of Antwerp:

"M. Le General—I am arrived before the citadel of Antwerp, at the head of the French army, with orders from my government to demand the execution of the treaty of the 15th of November, 1831, which guaranties to his majesty the King of the Belgians the possession of that fortress, as well as the forts depending upon it, on both sides of the Scheldt. I hope to find you disposed to recognize the justice of this demand. If, contrary to my expectations, it prove otherwise, I am ordered to make known to you that I must employ the means at my disposal to take possession of the citadel of Antwerp.

"The operations of the siege will be directed against the outer fronts of the citadel; I have, therefore, a right to hope, conformably with the laws of war, and the usages constantly observed, that you will abstain from every kind of hostility against the city. I cause a part of it to be occupied, with the sole view of preventing what might expose it to the fire of your artillery. A bombardment would be an act of useless barbarity, and a calamity to the commerce of all nations.

"If, notwithstanding these considerations, you fire upon the city, France and England will exact indemnities equivalent to the damages caused by the fire of the citadel, and of the forts, as well as by that of the vessels of war. It is impossible but that you, yourself, foresee, that in this case you would be personally responsible for the violation of a usage respected by all civilized nations, and for the evils resulting therefrom.

"I await your reply, and trust that you will find it expedient to enter immediately into negotiations with me, for delivering up the city of Antwerp, and the forts depending upon it. Receiving, etc."

To this, General Chassé replied that he was resolved to defend himself, and the siege was opened. The French soldiers were cheerful and eager; but the inclement season of the year served greatly to check their ardor. They were compelled to dig trenches in a soil, naturally very moist, amid drenching rains, which increased their difficulties. In some places the soldiers sank two feet in the mud. Timber was brought from the city of Antwerp, which, with a great number of fascines, was intended to make the trenches more accessible. At length, after incredible exertions, all the batteries were pronounced ready for action, on the night of the 2d of September, excepting Nos. 7 and 8 upon the left wing. The guns for these last two places were planted the following night. At eleven o'clock, on the 4th of December, the besiegers opened their fire upon the citadel, with eighty-two guns, which were soon increased to the number of 104, the half of which were mortars. The Dutch, who, in the mean time, had striven to harass the operations of the besiegers, now opened a brisk fire, and began an obstinate resistance, determined to triumph themselves, or compel the French to purchase victory at a heavy cost. To prevent General Chassé from fulfilling his threat of bombarding the city, Marshal Gérard felt that it was indispensable to isolate the citadel by closing the Scheldt. General Sébastiani occupied the embankment upon the left side of the river, while General Achard was stationed upon the right bank. The French also garrisoned Fort St. Marie and prepared to put Fort St. Phillipe in a condition to command the course of the river. The Dutch fleet advanced to interrupt the operations of the besiegers; and, after some useless parleys, began a cannonade, which was without effect, as the French were covered by the embankments. On the 8th of December, a Dutch frigate and corvette, and twelve gun-boats, appeared off Fort Frederic, which was occupied by a detachment of the French army. The captain was immediately summoned to evacuate the fort, and upon his refusal, the Dutch prepared to land under cover of a very brisk fire; but these attempts were valiantly repulsed by the enemy. Fort Phillipe was then put into a state of service; two mortars were placed permanently upon Fort la Croix, and Gérard took all proper measures to isolate the citadel, and hinder the rupture of the embankments. The French mean while directed their attacks against the body of the citadel with increasing ardor. The moon was in its full, and afforded so much light that the French could not safely carry on their works by night, for the garrison vigorously defended itself, pouring upon the besiegers an incessant hail of bullets, balls, and shells. The havoc committed by these missiles was terrible; but the French batteries were directed with so much steadiness and precision, that the Dutch were compelled to take shelter in their casements, until at length not a man was seen moving about in the citadel, except those absolutely necessary to work the batteries. On the 13th of December the siege was already very far advanced. The progress of the engineering works in front of the St. Laurent lunette had allowed of a raft being formed upon the ditch on the left face, and of mining operations being begun by the besiegers upon the escarpment near the saillant. The work which had been delayed during the first two nights by the extreme hardness of the masonry, had been steadily resumed, and was approaching its conclusion;

the fire of the French batteries, and that of the musketry were perseveringly kept up, ever since morning, so as to occupy the attention of the enemy; and the maréchal de camp, Georges, who was in the trenches with the 65th regiment of infantry, received orders to lead the attack. The engineers had constructed three new rafts to be joined with the first one, and, in order to form a bridge, over which the French soldiers should pass to the breach at the moment of the explosion of the mine, the rest of the ditch had been filled up with fascines loaded with stone. Upon the 14th, at five o'clock in the morning, the mine exploded, opening a practicable breach for the French. Three picked companies of French infantry were put in motion, and advanced in silence upon the rafts and ruins of the ramparts, while twenty-five grenadiers, led by Carles of the 61st, passed around the lunette to the right front, and proceeded with ladders to the gorge, to escalade or cross the barrier. At the same time another light company, under Captain Montigny, debouched by the right, in order likewise to attack the lunette at the gorge, and to cut off all retreat from the garrison. The soldiers marched with fixed bayonets; they climbed the breach; and rushed with the utmost intrepidity upon the Dutch garrison, which, thus surprised and surrounded, laid down its arms after a short but desperate resistance. Many Dutch soldiers escaped; a few were killed or wounded, and sixty were made prisoners. But this first piece of ill-success did not dismay the besieged; they still poured forth incessant showers of shell and shot upon the French from the yet unimpaired portions of the citadel. The fire of the French was directed with extreme precision, and soon began to tell seriously upon the citadel. At length the moment arrived when the Dutch were obliged to give way. For several days the sufferings of the besieged had reached the highest point. The French had laid dry the ditches of the citadels, and the Dutch could no longer procure the necessary supply of water. The two remaining wells were destroyed by the bombs of the besiegers. There was not a building uninjured. The casemated hospital appeared in danger of falling. Lastly the garrison crowded together in the posterns felt its strength entirely exhausted. An enormous breach had been made upon the left front of bastion No. 2, which had filled up nearly half the fosse. The descent into the fosse was effected; and to render it possible to storm, nothing more was requisite than to explode the mine. At this juncture General Chassé sent two superior officers to treat with the commander of the French army, and after a warm altercation, on the 24th of November, 1832, a capitulation was agreed on for the evacuation of the citadel of Antwerp and the forts depending on it.

AQUILEIA, A.D. 387.—Aquileia is situated in Italy, near the bottom of the Adriatic. It is surrounded by a wall and fosse, and is connected by a canal with the port of Grado, the residence of a few fishermen. This is all that remains of one of the principal cities of ancient Italy.

About the year 388, Maximus, Emperor of the Western Roman dominions, invaded Italy with a large army. Justina, Empress of Italy, and her son Valentinian, who were at Milan, were first warned of the hostile approach of strangers, by the gleam of armor and clouds of dust which arose before the gates of the city. Flight was their only hope, Aquileia their only refuge. Thither they immediately fled. Maximus entered Milan in triumph. Justina reached Aquileia in safety; but she distrusted the strength of the fortifications. She dreaded the event of a siege, and she determined to implore the aid of Theodosius, the great Emperor of the East, whose power and virtue were celebrated in all the countries of the West. The imperial family accordingly were secretly placed on board a small vessel, in Venetia, and after a long but successful voyage, they arrived at Thessalonica. Theodosius had some unknown reason to fix the residence of his royal guests at Thessalonica, instead of inviting them to the palace of Constantinople. But, with the greater part of his court and senate, he visited Thessalonica, and the heart of the emperor was touched by the tears of the beautiful empress. His affections were insensibly engaged by the graces of youth and innocence. He wedded her, and the celebration of the royal nuptials was the signal of the civil war. Shortly afterward (A.D. 388) Theodosius, at the head of a brave and disciplined army, advanced to encounter Maximus, who had fixed his camp in the neighborhood of Liscia, a city of Pannonia, strongly fortified by the broad and rapid stream of the Lave. Arriving within sight of the enemy, the army of Theodosius, notwithstanding the fatigue of a long march, in the heat of summer, spurred their foaming horses into the waters of the Lave, swam the river in presence of the enemy, and charged the troops who guarded the high ground on the opposite side, with such impetuosity, that they were entirely routed. Marcellus, the brother of Maximus, advanced to the aid of the defeated troops with the select cohorts, and obstinately contended with the enemy till nightfall. Both armies slept on the field of battle. In the morning the conflict was renewed, and, after a desperate resistance, the surviving remnant of the bravest troops of Maximus threw down their arms at the feet of the conqueror. Theodosius immediately pressed forward, determined to terminate the war by the death or captivity of his rival, who fled before him with the diligence of fear. On the evening of the first day he reached Aquileia, in which city Maximus had sought shelter. Maximus had scarcely time to shut the gates of the city when he found himself encompassed on all sides. But the gates could not long resist the efforts of a victorious enemy. They were leveled to the ground, and Maximus was dragged from his throne, rudely stripped of the imperial ornaments—the robe, the diadem, and the purple slippers—and conducted like a malefactor to the camp of Theodosius, who delivered him over to the mercy of his soldiers. But no sooner was he removed from the imperial presence, than his head was severed from his body. His son, Augustus, died shortly afterward by the order, perhaps by the hand, of the bold Arbogastes; all the military plans of Theodosius were successfully executed, and the war was terminated with much less difficulty and bloodshed than he had naturally expected.

After the death of Maximus, the Roman world was in the possession of Theodosius. He seated Valentinian on the throne of Milan, and restored to him the absolute dominion of all the provinces from which he had been driven by the arms of Maximus. Satisfied with the glory he had acquired, the emperor returned from Milan to Constantinople, and, in the peaceful possession of the East, insensibly relapsed into his former habits of luxury and indolence. But the empire was soon again to be plunged into a civil war. Arbogastes, a gallant soldier of the nation of Franks, had joined the standard of Theodosius, and, after the death of Maximus, to whose destruction he had contributed by his valor and skill, was appointed master-general of the armies of Gaul. His real merit, his seeming fidelity, won the confidence of both prince and people. His boundless liberality corrupted the allegiance of the troops; and while he was universally esteemed as the pillar of the state, the crafty barbarian was secretly resolved to rule or to ruin the empire of the West. The Franks received all the important commands of the army; the creatures of Arbogastes were promoted to all the honors and offices of civil government; the progress of the conspiracy removed every faithful servant from the presence of Valentinian, and the emperor, without power and without intelligence, was reduced to the precarious and dependent condition of a captive. The young emperor felt the danger of his position, and contrived to apprise Theodosius of his helpless situation. He declared that, unless the Emperor of the East could speedily march to his assistance, he must attempt to escape from the palace, or rather the prison of Vienna, in Gaul, where he had imprudently fixed his residence, in the midst of the hostile faction.

But the hopes of relief were distant, and as every day increased his danger, the emperor resolved to risk an immediate contest with his powerful general. He received Arbogastes on the throne, and delivered to him a paper which dismissed him from all his employments. But Arbogastes announced, with insulting coolness, that his authority did not depend on the smile or frown of a monarch, and contemptuously threw the paper on the floor. The emperor was enraged to such a degree, that snatching a sword from one of the guards, he would have used the deadly weapon against his enemy or himself, had he not been prevented by the guards. A few days after this extraordinary quarrel, the unfortunate Valentinian was found strangled in his apartment. The provincials now awaited with tame resignation the unknown master whom the choice of Arbogastes might place on the imperial throne of the West. He bestowed the purple on the rhetorician Eugenius, for the judicious barbarian thought it more advisable to reign under the name of some dependent Roman. Upon receiving the news of the elevation of Eugenius, the Emperor of the East was aroused to the highest pitch of indignation. The perfidy of a barbarian had destroyed in a moment the labors and fruit of his former victory. He determined to revenge the fate of the unhappy Valentinian, and once more assert by arms the violated majesty of the throne. But as the second conquest of the West was a task of difficulty and danger, two years were consumed in the preparations for the civil war. At length, in the year 394, he set forth with a large army. The Roman, the Iberian, the Arab, and the Goth, all marched under the standard of the same prince. Arbogastes fixed his station on the confines of Italy; the troops of Theodosius were permitted to occupy, without resistance, the provinces of Pannonia as far as the foot of the Julian Alps; and even the passes of the mountains were negligently, or, perhaps, artfully abandoned to the bold invader. He descended from the hills and surveyed with astonishment the formidable camp of the Gauls and Germans, which covered with arms and tents the open country that extends to the walls of Aquileia and the banks of the Frigidus.* The Emperor of the East immediately attacked the fortifications of his rivals. He assigned the post of honorable danger to the Goths, and cherished a secret wish that the bloody conflict might diminish their pride and number. The troops of Arbogastes fought with the utmost courage and fury, and resisted the repeated attacks of the enemy with such success, that under the cover of night the troops of Theodosius fled in disorder to the mountains. Ten thousand Goths, and Bacurius, the Iberian general, were killed. Theodosius retreated to the hills, and passed a disconsolate night, without sleep, without provisions, and without hopes. The camp of Eugenius was a scene of rioting and revel; while the active and vigilant Arbogastes secretly detached a large body of troops to occupy the passes of the mountains, and to encompass the rear of the eastern army. The dawn of day revealed to Theodosius the extent and extremity of his danger; but his apprehensions were soon dispelled by a friendly message from the leaders of those troops who expressed their inclination to desert the standard of Eugenius. The rewards for their perfidy were granted without hesitation. The spirits of the troops were revived by this reinforcement, and they again marched, with confidence, to surprise the camp of the tyrant. The battle which followed was fierce and bloody; but when it was at its height, a violent tempest arose from the east, which blew clouds of dust in the faces of the Gauls, throwing their ranks into disorder, wresting their weapons from their hands, and diverting or repelling their ineffectual javelins. The troops of Theodosius, sheltered by their position from the impetuosity of the wind, handled their weapons with their usual skill, and victory declared itself for the Emperor of the East. The troops of Eugenius, dismayed by the storm, which their superstitious terrors magnified, yielded to Theodosius, whom they considered as aided by the powers of heaven. Eugenius, who had almost acquired the dominion of the world, was reduced to implore the mercy of the conqueror; but the unrelenting soldiers severed his head from his body as he lay prostrate at the feet of the emperor. Arbogastes escaped, and after wandering several days among the mountains, the intrepid barbarian, imitating the example of the ancient Romans, fell upon his own sword and expired.—Gibbon.

ARADUS, B.C. 38.—Aradus, a small island on the coast of Syria, was inhabited by a people who refused to pay contributions to Mark Antony. They had burnt alive Curtius Sallaffus, who had come to levy upon them, and as they had offended Antony too much to hope for favor, they persisted in rebellion, even after all Syria had been regained by the Romans. But in the year 38 B.C., they were attacked by the Roman army under Ventidius, and after a long and obstinate resistance, for they were a brave and skillful people, they were conquered, and punished for their presumption.

ARBELA, B.C. 331.—Twice had Darius, King of Persia, sued for peace from Alexander of Macedon, and twice had he been denied. Again he sent his embassadors to Alexander; but they were sent back to the Persian king, with the reply: "Tell him that the world will not permit two suns, nor two sovereigns. Let him, therefore, choose to surrender to-day, or fight me to-morrow, and not flatter himself with the hopes of better success than he has had hitherto." Darius now immediately prepared for battle. He had pitched his camp near the village Gaugamela, and the river Bumellus in Assyria. He caused the plain, which he intended should be the field of battle, to be leveled, in order that his chariots might have full room to act, for he had before learned that they could not be made useful on rough ground. He also caused caltraps, an instrument of spikes, to be planted in positions best calculated to injure the feet of the enemy's horses. After hearing of these preparations on the part of Darius, Alexander remained four days in his camp, during which time he intrenched it, and surrounded it with pallisades, for he was determined to leave all his captives, wounded, and sick soldiers, and baggage here, that his army might march against the enemy with no other equipage than the weapons they carried. At about nine o'clock on the evening of the fourth day, the Macedonians set forth, in order that they might commence the battle at daybreak. Darius, meanwhile, had drawn up his men in the order of battle, and Alexander's army marched in battle array also, for the armies were within a few leagues of each other. When the Macedonians had arrived within sight of the Persian army, they halted, and Alexander consulted with his generals as to whether they should immediately attack the enemy, or wait until daybreak. The latter plan was adopted, and after exhorting his men, Alexander, as was his usual custom before a battle, consulted his soothsayers, who, with him, offered prayers to Jupiter, Minerva, and Victory. The army of Darius, who constantly expected an attack, remained under arms throughout the night. The Persian army consisted of at least 600,000 foot soldiers, and 40,000 horsemen; while Alexander's army numbered only 40,000 footmen, and 7,000 or 8,000 horsemen. But the Macedonians were soldiers born and bred, while the Persians were totally inexperienced in the art of war. The two armies were disposed in nearly the same array. The forces were drawn up in two lines; the cavalry on the two wings, and the infantry in the middle, and were under the particular conduct of officers of the different nations of which they were composed, and in general commanded by the principal crown-officers. The battle-front of the Persian army, was protected by two hundred chariots armed with formidable scythes, and by fifteen elephants. Darius took his post in the center of the first line. He was surrounded by his body guards, the flower of his army, and by the Grecian infantry. In order to avoid the caltraps, of whose position he had been informed, Alexander extended his army to his right, and Darius, fearful that the Macedonians might draw his army from the level plain into rough ground, and thus prevent the use of his scythe-armed chariots, directed the cavalry of his left wing to charge upon them and prevent this movement. A detachment of Macedonian cavalry immediately rushed upon the advancing Persians; but recoiled from the shock unable to break through the overwhelming mass which opposed them. Alexander quickly sent the division commanded by Aristos to their assistance, and after a desperate struggle the Persians were put to flight, leaving the ground behind them strewn with their dead and wounded. Now Darius ordered his scythe-armed chariots to be driven against the Macedonian phalanx; but the soldiers, striking their swords against their bucklers, created such a terrible noise, that many of the chariot horses, frightened by the clamor, and enraged to madness by the goads of the clouds of arrows directed against them, became unmanageable, and turned back against their own troops. Others were seized by the bridles, and their drivers were cut down by the Macedonians. Notwithstanding their formidable appearance, the chariots did but little execution. Darius now set his whole army in motion, to charge upon the enemy, and Alexander perceiving the success of the cavalry charge under Aristos, advanced to his support, with the flower of his troops. He broke through the Persian line on the left, and then wheeled to the left in order to fall upon the body in which Darius had posted himself. And now the presence of the two kings inspired both armies with new vigor. Darius was mounted on a chariot; Alexander was on horseback, and both were surrounded by brave officers and soldiers, whose sole endeavor was to save the life of their respective kings, at the hazard of their own. The bravest men of the two armies met in close encounter, and the struggle was fearful and bloody. Alexander wounded Darius's equerry with a javelin, and the Persians as well as the Macedonians imagined that the king was dead. The Persians broke out in loud lamentations, and their whole army was filled with consternation. The relations of Darius, who were at his left hand, fled away with the guards; but those at his right took him into their center. Those near their king fought with the desperation of death; but, deserted by their comrades, they slowly retired before the murderous blows of their conquering adversaries. It was not a battle; it was a slaughter. Then Darius, turning about his chariot, fled with the rest, and the victorious Macedonians were wholly employed in pursuing him. But while the right wing of Alexander's army was thus successful, the left was in great danger. A detachment of the Persian cavalry, having broken through the line of the Macedonian infantry on the left, advanced even to Alexander's late encampment; the captives there confined were set at liberty, and arming themselves with whatever weapon they could find, they joined the Persian cavalry, and rushed upon the Macedonian infantry, which was thus attacked before and behind. Learning this, Parmenio dispatched a messenger to Alexander, who commanded him not to regard the baggage but to devote his energies to the battle. Parmenio immediately attacked the Persians in the rear with the infantry of the center of the second line. The Persians resisted vigorously; but were overpowered, and many were cut to pieces. The rest were compelled to retire; but, as they were mounted, the Macedonian footmen could not follow them. Shortly afterward Parmenio's division was attacked by the Persians under Mazeus, and the Macedonians were about to be surrounded. In this strait Parmenio dispatched a messenger after Alexander, declaring that he could not keep his men together unless he was immediately succored. Alexander was in hot pursuit after Darius, for he fancied that he was nearly up to him. But when overtaken by Parmenio's messenger, he turned back, shuddering with rage to see his prey and victory thus swept from him. On his return he met the Persian cavalry, which had plundered his camp, on their way to rejoin their army. They marched in good order; rather as victorious soldiers than defeated ones. They were marching in close columns; not in order of battle, but of march, and it was with great difficulty, that Alexander, even with his greatly superior force, could break through them. They did not amuse themselves by casting their javelins, according to their usual custom; but each choosing a man, engaged him in hand to hand combat, each endeavoring to unhorse his adversary. Sixty of Alexander's chosen men were slain in this encounter. Three of his generals were wounded; yet he conquered, and cut the Persians to pieces, except a very few who forced their way through his squadrons. In the mean time Mazeus had heard the news of Darius's defeat, and dispirited and alarmed, although he possessed a decided advantage, for the Macdonians were now in complete disorder, he ceased his formerly incessant charges upon the enemy. Parmenio could not account for this sudden cessation of battle; but, like an able general, he took advantage of the apparent terror of the enemy, and incited his soldiers to new exertions. At the sight of the terror of the Persians, the Macedonians regained their courage, and, infused with new life, they gave rein to their horses, and dashed upon the enemy with such fury, that the Persians were thrown into disorder, and fled precipitately across the plain. Alexander came up at this moment, and, rejoiced at this unexpected fortune, he resumed, with Parmenio, the pursuit of Darius. He rode as far as Arbela where he hoped to overtake the flying monarch, and all his baggage; but Darius had only passed by it, leaving his treasure a prey to the conqueror, with his bow and shield.

Such was the success of this famous battle, which gave an empire to the conqueror. Arrian says that the Persians lost 300,000 men killed, and many were taken prisoners. Alexander lost 1,400 men, mostly of his cavalry. As Gaugamela was a place of little note, this battle was called the battle of Arbela, that being the nearest city to the field of strife.

ARCADIA.—In 1169, B.C. Arcadia was invaded by the Lacedemonians, and a pitched battle occurred between the women of Arcadia, whose husbands were absent, and the invaders, which resulted in the total defeat of the latter.

ARCIS-SUR-AUBE, A.D. 1814.—Arcis-sur-Aube is a town in the south of France, in the Department of the Aube. On the 20th and 21st of March, 1814, it was the scene of an important action between Napoleon and the allies under Prince Schwartzenberg.

The battle commenced by skirmishes at the outposts. Gradually, however, fresh squadrons of cavalry were brought up on either side, together with some horse artillery; and a serious cavalry action was the result. The cavalry of the French was led by General Sebastiani, that of the allies by Kaisaroff.

The French were overpowered by the weight and numbers of their opponents, and although they fought with that impetuous bravery which characterizes the French soldiers, yet they were forced back and driven in confusion to the bridge of Arcis. Napoleon instantly rode forward to the bridge, and drawing his sword, exclaimed, "Let me see which of you will pass before me." These words had an electric effect on the retreating squadrons. They immediately rallied and reformed, and a fresh division coming to their assistance, they charged the allied cavalry and drove them from the bridge. An obstinate combat had now commenced on the French left. Ney, with his division, there held the village of Torcy, which Marshal Wrede attempted to storm with an Austrian brigade. They were at first successful, and the French were driven out; but Ney quickly charged the Austrians, and they, in their turn, were forced from the village. Wrede again carried it with three battalions, but Napoleon seeing the importance of the village in the coming battle, brought up a body of his Old Guard who retook it, and maintained their position till night, notwithstanding the greatest efforts of the Austrians to dislodge them.

The French position was now sufficiently strong to counterbalance the superiority of the allies in numbers. Their army occupied a semicircular position, facing outward, with each flank resting on the river Aube. In this position, their flanks were secure from being turned; and in their rear was the town of Arcis, which would prove a secure place of retreat in case of disaster.

The allied position was not so strong; they formed a much larger concave semicircle facing inward: with Marshal Wrede on the right wing, the Russian reserves and guards under Barclay de Tolly in the center, and Raieffsky and Gurlay on the left. As soon as the corps under the Prince Royal of Wirtemberg had come up, Schwartzenberg ordered the Russian reserves and the guards, under Barclay de Tolly, to advance. The artillery was immediately hurried to the front, and a general attack commenced. The sun was now sinking behind the western horizon. Arcis and Torcy were already in flames, and the sight which now presented itself to the eye, was at the same time sublime and terrific. The Russian horse artillery on the allied left succeeded in silencing the French guns, and as they advanced to the semicircle of heights commanding the town, the effect of their fire was truly terrible. There stood the French troops, motionless and undaunted. With the instinct of discipline the ranks closed to the center, as shot after shot plowed through their columns with fearful effect. During this terrific cannonade Napoleon was frequently in imminent danger; almost all his staff were killed or wounded. His horse was shot under him; he coolly mounted another, and when some of his generals urged him to retire, he replied, "Fear nothing, gentlemen, the bullet is not yet cast which is to kill me." The carnage ceased about ten o'clock at night, from mutual exhaustion. Both armies slept on their own position, on the field, and neither could claim any advantage. During the night, great efforts were made by the allies to bring up their remote detachments. The position which they occupied on the second day, differed somewhat from that on the first. Marshal Wrede was stationed in front of the blood stained-ruins of Torcy, the Prince Royal of Wirtemberg at the hamlet of Meuil, Gurlay on his left, and next Raieffsky, with his Russians. The grenadiers and cuirassiers formed the second line, in the rear of the center, at Meuil-la-Comtesse. Napoleon's troops were disposed in the same manner as on the previous day.

The sun rose bright and cloudless on the morning of the 21st of March, and the sight which it revealed was at once grand and animating. 150,000 men on the two sides were there drawn up in battle array, trained to the most perfect discipline, yet at the same time animated by the fiercest passions. The infantry in both armies were standing at ease, with their muskets at their shoulders. The cavalry were mostly dismounted, but every bridle was over the horseman's arm. The gunners stood beside their pieces, with the slow matches burning in the front of the lines, ready, at a signal, to vomit forth destruction and death on their enemies. But neither general gave the signal to commence the action. This state of inactivity continued for several hours, but meantime Napoleon had thrown a second bridge over the Aube, and at one o'clock in the afternoon, his troops commenced defiling in that direction. Schwartzenberg did not think it prudent to attack the French till three o'clock, when his whole line advanced, preceded by a hundred pieces of cannon, which opened their fire on the retreating columns. Pahlen attacked on the right wing, and Raieffsky in the center. The town of Arcis was soon in flames from the bombs which fell upon it from the Russian artillery. But Macdonald, who commanded the rear guard, maintained such a gallant resistance, that it was dark before the allies could penetrate Arcis, at which time the bulk of Napoleon's army was established on the other bank of the river. However, the troops under Prince Eugene of Wirtemberg succeeded in driving back Oudinot, and with their cavalry took possession of the bridge, thus cutting off the means of retreat to those of the rear guard who had not yet crossed over. A sanguinary conflict took place in the streets, and numbers were drowned while attempting to swim across the river. The French artillery kept up a tremendous fire from the opposite bank, so that it was impossible for the allies to pursue. When the morning dawned, Napoleon was far advanced with the main body of his troops on the road to Vitry, leaving a powerful rear-guard in front of Arcis to retard the passage of the river.

In this battle the French lost 4000 men, of whom 800 were prisoners, and 6 pieces of cannon; that of the allies was equally as great; but its immediate result was to throw Napoleon upon the eccentric line of operation which immediately led to his fall.

ARCOLA, A.D. 1796.—On the 15th, 16th, and 17th of November, 1796, a series of the most sanguinary engagements that occurred during Napoleon's campaign in Italy, took place near the small town of Arcola, on the river Alpora, fifteen miles east of Verona, in Austrian Italy.

Napoleon, with an army of 20,000 men, fatigued by fighting and surrounded by enemies, was in Verona, a city of Italy, situated on the river Adige. Suddenly there appeared before the city a fresh Austrian army of 30,000 men, and the French troops, dispirited and discouraged by the overwhelming force of the enemy, murmured and seemed on the point of an open rebellion. But Napoleon, whose genius never deserted him, determined upon a movement, the danger of which was only eclipsed by its brilliancy. On the night of the 14th of November, without communicating to any one his design, he conducted his army in the most profound silence out of the city. Sorrow now filled the hearts of the French soldiers; those brave men, who knew not what it was to retreat before an enemy, were filled with indignation at the thought that their general had abandoned the fair fields of Italy to their rivals. Crossing the Adige, the French army in three columns, marched on the road toward Milan. Suddenly an order was given to turn to the left, and descending the course of the river, the army arrived before daybreak at Ronco. On the opposite shore of the river was an immense morass, and beyond the morass was the Austrian army. Now joy reigned universally in the French army; the conquest of Italy was not to be abandoned, and passing quickly from one extreme to another, the soldiers were ready to follow Napoleon into the very jaws of death. A bridge of boats being already prepared, the army immediately crossed the river. From Ronco three roads branch off across the morass, one following the left bank of the Adige, remounts that river to Verona; one in the center, leads directly across the marsh to Arcola, by a stone bridge over the little stream of the Alpora; the third on the right, follows the descending course of the Adige to Albano. On the two first causeways, Napoleon determined to place his army. Along these narrow roads numbers gave no advantage. On the courage and firmness of the heads of the columns, every thing depended. At daybreak on the 15th, Massena at the head of his division, moved along the first causeway, as far as a small eminence, which brought him in sight of the steeples of Verona, and removed all anxiety in that quarter. Augereau led his division along the center causeway, as far as the bridge of Arcola. Here his advanced guards were met by three battalions of Croats, who poured such a tremendous fire upon the head of the column, that, notwithstanding the powerful exertions of the soldiers they were driven back. Augereau seeing his men recoil, hastened to the spot, and led them back to the charge. But the bridge, swept by a fearful storm of lead and iron, was untenable. Unable to withstand the fire of the enemy, the French troops were again driven back. In the meantime, Alvinzi, the Austrian general, whose attention was fixed on Verona, where he imagined the bulk of the enemy's forces to be, was confounded at hearing a violent fire in the marshes. He soon learned that the French were advancing in force on all the dykes, and threatened the flank and rear of his army. He immediately dispatched two divisions along the causeways, by which the enemy was approaching. Mitrouski's division advanced to defend the village of Arcola, while that commanded by Provera, marched against Massena's division. Provera's men soon commenced an attack on the French; but Massena's grenadiers charged them with such impetuosity that they were driven back with great loss. Mitrouski, at the same time, passed through Arcola, crossed the bridge, and attacked the corps of Augereau. The French troops met the charge with such boldness and courage, that they repulsed the Austrians and drove them back to the bridge. Now a desperate struggle commenced; the French column advanced with the utmost intrepidity; but the Austrians received them with a tremendous fire from the artillery in front, sweeping the bridge, and committing frightful havoc upon the head of the column, which faltered and fell back. The possession of Arcola was indispensable to Napoleon. The safety of his army, the success of his future operations, all depended upon it. Perceiving the repeated repulses of his men at the bridge, he placed himself at the head of the column, and seizing a standard, he cried, "Follow your general," and without shrinking he advanced, closely followed by his troops through a hurricane of grape-shot, and planted the standard on the middle of the bridge. But now the iron tempest raged around him with apparently tenfold vigor; his grenadiers hesitated; then grasping their beloved chief in their arms, they bore him back amid clouds of smoke, and over heaps of the dead and dying. The Austrians instantly rushed over the bridge and pushed the fugitives into the marsh, where Napoleon lay up to the middle in water. Soon the French grenadiers discovered that their commander was left behind; the cry ran through their ranks, "Forward to save your general!" Wheeling about they returned to the charge, and driving back the Austrians, extricated Napoleon from his perilous position. During this deadly encounter, Lannes received three wounds. Napoleon's aid-de-camp, Muiron, was killed by his side, when covering him with his body, and almost all his personal staff were severely wounded. In this strife of the heads of columns, and successive advances and repulses, the day wore away. Toward evening the Austrians abandoned Arcola, and drew up their army, facing the marshes, at the foot of the heights of Caldiero. During the night, Napoleon on his side, drew back his forces to the right bank of the Adige, leaving only an advanced guard on the left bank; while the Austrians re-occupied the village of Arcola, and all the ground which had been so vehemently disputed on the preceding day. In the morning the strife was renewed. The Austrians, in two columns advanced along the dykes, to within six hundred yards of the village of Ronco. The French met them with such a furious charge with the bayonet, that the Austrians were routed with great bloodshed. The battle continued through the day with various success, and at nightfall, both parties retired, the Austrians over the Alpora, the French across the Adige. Again the morning dawned on the bloody field, and both parties with diminished numbers, but with undiminished fury, advanced to the struggle. They met in the middle of the dykes, and fought with the ferocity and animosity of tigers, rather than men.

The Austrian column in the center, committed terrific slaughter on the French grenadiers, who finally fell back before the irresistible fire of the enemy, so far that the Austrian balls fell upon the bridge of Ronco. There the action was restored by a regiment which Napoleon had planted in ambuscade among the willows, on the side of the road, which assaulted the Austrian column in flank, when disordered by success, with such vigor, that they were almost all driven into the marshes. Massena, on his side experienced similar vicissitudes, and was only enabled to keep his ground by placing himself at the head of the column, and leading the soldiers on with his hat on the point of his sword. But toward noon, Napoleon perceiving that the enemy was exhausted with fatigue, ordered a general charge of all his forces along both causeways. The Austrians, unable to withstand the terrible shock of the French charge, was soon swept off both dykes, and shortly afterward evacuated Arcola. Napoleon now drew up his army in order of battle at the extremities of the causeways, on the firm ground, his right wing toward Porto Legnago, and his left at Arcola. The garrison of Arcola, by Napoleon's directions, issued forth with four pieces of cannon, so as to take the enemy in the rear. The French general also sent a body of trumpeters into a marsh of reeds by the extreme left flank of the Austrians, with directions to sound a charge the moment the action became general. He then ordered his generals to advance. The Austrians bravely resisted in front, but suddenly, hearing the sound of trumpets and cannon on their flank and rear, and thinking that they were assaulted by a whole division of cavalry on their flank, and threatened with a cannonade in their rear, the Austrian commanders ordered a retreat, and yielded a victory which they had so long and so bravely contested. While this desperate struggle, in the marshes of Arcola, was going forward, the Austrian general, Davidowich, advanced with his forces to the neighborhood of Verona. Without losing time Napoleon, after his victory at Arcola, immediately marched toward Verona, and fell upon the Austrian forces under Davidowich. The Austrians, after an obstinate resistance, were at length compelled to retire into Tyrol.

The loss of the French at the battle of Arcola, including the actions with Davidowich, was 15,000 men. The Austrians lost 18,000.

ARGENTARIA, A.D. 378.—Colmar, a city of France, thirty-six miles north of Strasbourg, is generally believed to stand on the site of the more ancient Argentaria. In the year 378, a battle was fought near Argentaria, in the plains of Alsace, between the Romans, commanded by Manienus and Mellobrandes, and the Alemanni, led by their king, Priarius. The undisciplined Germans, though impetuous and brave, were unable to contend against the missile weapons, and well practiced evolutions of the Romans. The Alemanni fought with the most obstinate valor, and were slaughtered with unrelenting fury by the Romans. Out of 40,000 barbarians, 5,000 only escaped to the woods and mountains. Priarius met a glorious death in the midst of his enemies. This signal victory secured the peace of the Gauls. The Germans no longer dared to contend against the power and perseverance of the Romans.

ARGIVES, B.C. 735.—This celebrated battle was fought between 300 select heroes of each nation, and all perished except two Argives and one Spartan. The latter remained on the field, while the two former went to Argos to announce their victory. Each party claimed the advantage; the Argives, because they had lost the fewest men, and the Lacedemonians, because they remained masters of the field. A second battle was fought in which the Argives were beaten.—Pausanias.

ARGOS, B.C. 272.—This is one of the most ancient and celebrated of the Grecian cities. It is situated about two miles from the bottom of the Gulf of Argos, and about four and a half miles north-west of Napoli di Romania.

The ambitious, quarrelsome Prince Pyrrhus fell upon Argos, at a time when it was divided by the factions of Aristias and Aristippus. The Argives at first sent to Pyrrhus to beg him to evacuate their territories. He promised to do so, but that very same night entered their gates, aided by the treachery of Aristias. A great part of his troops had already spread themselves throughout the city, when an act of imprudence deprived him of his victory and his life. Whoever reads the life of Pyrrhus will observe the importance he always attached to his elephants —engines of war, if we may so call them, introduced for a time into Europe by the conquests of Alexander. He had tried to terrify the Romans with these monstrous animals, but without success. So partial was he to these bulky assistants, that he insisted upon their being brought into Lacedemon, though the gates were not large enough, or the streets sufficiently wide to make them at all available. Alarmed by the noise created by the confusion the elephants produced, the Argives flew to arms, and their houses became so many citadels, from which they poured all sorts of missiles down upon the troops of the King of Epirus. The elephants so completely blocked up the way, as to prevent the entrance of fresh troops, and were of more injury to their masters than to the Spartans. Abandoned by his people, Pyrrhus maintained his character for personal valor by the brave manner in which he fought his way through the enemy. An Argive attacked him, and hurled his javelin at him; but the point was blunted by the thickness of his cuirass. The furious prince was about to strike him dead, when the mother of the Argive, who beheld the fight from the roof of her house, threw a tile at Pyrrhus, which, striking him on the head, stretched him senseless on the ground. One of the soldiers of Antigonus coming up, was rejoiced to find their great enemy in such a state, and immediately cut off his head. His soldiers, deprived of their leader, were soon put to the rout. Thus perished, by the hand of an old woman, a captain famous for his exploits against both Rome and Carthage, and whose victorious arms had made Greece tremble more than once.

ARGAUM, A.D. 1803.—This village is situated in the Deccan, presidency of Bombay, in British India.

After the reduction of Asseghue, an important fortress in the Deccan; Scindiah, the leader of the Mahratta forces, made proposals to General Wellesley, who commanded the British troops, for peace. An armistice on certain terms was agreed to by the British general, but the stipulations not having been fulfilled by the Mahratta chiefs, he determined not to lose the opportunity of striking a decisive blow, and thus terminate the war. For this purpose, on the 28th of November, 1803, he effected a junction with Colonel Stevenson, and marched to meet the enemy. On this occasion the British forces numbered fourteen battalions of infantry, and six regiments of cavalry, in all about 14,000 men, besides 4,000 irregular horse. Scindiah's troops were discovered drawn up in battle array, on the plains in front of Argaum. His army did not exceed 40,000 men; and, although Wellesley's troops were somewhat exhausted by their long march on a sultry day, he deemed this opportunity too favorable to be lost, and accordingly made preparations for immediate attack. The infantry, with the 74th and 78th regiments, were posted on the right, in advance of the other columns, so as to enter first into action; the cavalry were stationed in the second line, in échelon, and the Mysore and Mogul horse thrown back on the left, more for the purpose of protecting the rear than taking part in the battle, while at the same time they opposed an impassable barrier to the immense mass of Mahratta horse which were stationed on the enemy's right wing.

The first British line, consisting of the infantry, with the 74th and 78th regiments at their head, advanced to the attack, but the regiments in front were received with a tremendous fire from the enemy's batteries, while they were at the same time assailed in flank by a great body of Persians who, for some time, kept up a fierce hand-to-hand combat, but on this, as on all other occasions, the European bayonet maintained its superiority over the Asiatic cimeter, and, after a sanguinary struggle, the assailants were repulsed, and almost wholly destroyed. Three battalions of sepoys or native troops, who next came into action, disbanded and fled as soon as they came within cannon range of the enemy, although in previous engagements they had fought quite bravely under a much heavier fire than was now directed against them. This might have been attended with disastrous results to the British had not General Wellesley, who was on the spot, rallied them, and putting himself at the head of them, again led them on against the enemy, and restored the fortune of the day. They succeeded in capturing a large number of the enemy's guns, and in forcing them to abandon their position. Scindiah made another last effort for victory: he detached a considerable portion of his horse to charge the British left wing; but they were quickly repulsed by the steadiness of a battalion of sepoys. Finding his position carried by the enemy, and himself unable to make any impression on their lines, he resolved to retreat. He was pursued by the British cavalry, who captured all his elephants, baggage, and ammunition, together with such of his cannon as he had been able to get off the field of battle. Night came, and with it a cessation of the pursuit. We have the authority of Wellington for the assertion, that had there been another hour of daylight, or had the delay consequent on the break of the sepoys not occurred, the whole of the enemy would inevitably have been destroyed.

ARNHEIM, A.D. 1795.—In 1795, Arnheim, a fortified town of the Netherlands, on the right bank of the Rhine, was taken by the French, who in the month of November 1813, were attacked and driven out of the place by the Prussians.

ARRAS, A.D. 1654.—Arras is situated in the middle of an extensive and fertile plain, on the rivers Scarpe and Corinchon, sixty miles south-east of Calais, in France.

Two of the most illustrious generals, not only of France but of the world, were opposed to each other before Arras. The great Condé had allowed party feeling so far to prevail over his sense of duty as to lead him not only to deprive his country of his services, but to turn them against it. It is rather a remarkable fact, that one of the generals of whom France has most to boast, earned his brightest laurels when in arms against her. Condé proposed to the Spanish court to besiege Arras, to avenge itself for the siege of Stenay. Arras contained a garrison of little more than 2,000 men; the army of the Archduke Leopold consisted of 32,000 men, Italians, Lorrains, Flemings, Spaniards, and discontented Frenchmen. Alarmed at this enterprise, Mazarin had recourse to Turenne, and an army of 14,000 men was sent under his command to succor Arras. Six hundred determined Frenchmen broke through the enemy's lines, and threw themselves into the place before the Spaniards had completed their intrenchments. The army of Turenne, too weak to venture to contend with the superior forces of the enemy in an open country, awaited some time at Peronne for the necessary provisions. Turenne's first object was to starve his enemy, and to occupy a position, the strength of which might render his army respectable.

His camp was at first at Monchi-le-Preux, upon a height which commanded a valley, watered on one side by the Scarpe, and on the other by the Cogel. From this point he intercepted the enemy's communication with Douai, Bouchain, and Valenciennes; the Marquis de Beauvais, sent to Bapaume, prevented their receiving any thing from Cambrai. Two thousand men posted toward Lens, intercepted the passage of Lille, while Lilleboane, with 1,500 men, was to scour the country and block up the road of Aire and Saint-Omar. The Spanish army, thus inclosed, might have been forced by famine to raise the siege, if it had been possible to stop up the roads of Saint-Pol; but that could not be accomplished. The Spaniards opened their trenches on the 14th of July; the besieged defended their ground so completely, foot by foot, that they had only lost a single horn-work at the end of the month; still more, they had cost the besiegers 2,000 men. Marshal d'Hocquincourt, having entered Stenay, came to reinforce the viscount before Arras. On his route he took Saint-Pol, and carried off a detachment of 500 men from the abbey of Saint Eloi. Turenne, who had been to meet him with fifteen squadrons, made on his return a reconnaissance upon all the enemy's lines to the north: they were of two toises in width, and ten feet in depth; in front was a fosse, nine feet wide and six feet deep. Twelve rows of trous de loup, placed checkerwise, were between the intrenchments and the avant-fossé; little pallisades of a foot and a half high were planted in the intervals of these, to prevent the approach of cavalry. The Spaniards, commanded by the Count de Fuensaldagne, occupied the north of these long lines, on the road to Lens; the Prince de Condé was on the opposite side with the French. The archduke, with the Germans and the Flemings, extended to the east, from the road of Cambrai to the Scarpe; Don Ferdinand de Solis completed the investment from the west to the south, with Italians and Lorrains. In a second reconnaissance, the marshal went so close to the quarters of Fuensaldagne, that some of his officers represented to him that he would expose himself to an almost certain defeat if the Spaniards availed themselves of the opportunity offered. "Oh! there is nothing to fear," said Turenne; "they will employ more time in consulting and holding council than it will take me to examine their lines." He was right: the Spaniards did not put themselves in motion till he was out of sight. Terrified by these formidable lines, none of the French generals dared attempt to succor Arras; Turenne alone maintained that certainly some weak point would be found if they were attacked by night; he often conversed with his officers on the conduct to be observed on entering intrenchments, and upon the means of overcoming all the obstacles that art can oppose to valor. The court were of the opinion of Turenne, and gave orders for an attack on the 24th of August.

The principal effort was to be made against the quarter of Don Ferdinand de Solis, and on the part nearest to that of Fuensaldagne: these points had been considered as the weakest or the most remote from the Prince de Condé, whose activity and talents they dreaded, and from the French, whose vivacity and vigilance were likewise formidable.

To divert the attention of the enemy and divide their forces, false attacks were to be made at the same time: one on the quarter of the Prince de Condé, another upon the most distant part of the camp of Fuensaldagne, and the third upon the lines of the Prince of Lorraine. At sunset, the armies crossed the Scarpe upon four bridges, the soldiers being provided with hurdles and fascines. The march was conducted with good order and in profound silence; its precision was such, that the troops arrived exactly at the time appointed for forming a junction with Marshal d'Hocquincourt. Without waiting for him, Marshals Turenne and De la Ferté marched directly to the lines, from which they were distant half a league: favored by a dark night, in which the moon only appeared at intervals, and lighted only by the fires of the matches of the musketeers, they marched till within a hundred paces of their works, without the enemy's having the least suspicion of the enterprise. Here the report of three cannon gave the alarm, and a row of cresset-lights appeared all along the lines of circumvallation. The Italians were still preparing for fight, when the foot of Turenne's first line had already passed the avant-fossé, covered the puits or wells and pulled up the pallisades. Meeting with little resistance, the French easily gained the second fosse: some troops even leaped over it before it was entirely filled up with the fascines. Fiscia, a captain of the regiment of Turenne, planted the color of his company upon the parapet; so much courage and good fortune were requisite to keep up the spirits of the rest of the troops. In the darkness they were afraid to advance; but at the cry of "Vive Turenne!" all were animated with equal ardor. Five battalions broke in at several points at the same time, and cleared the way for the cavalry. Marshal de la Ferté had not been so fortunate on the part of the Spaniards; his soldiers, repulsed, only penetrated the lines by favor of the large gaps made by Turenne's troops. As for Marshal d'Hocquincourt, arriving toward the end of the night in the midst of the enemy's consternation, he easily made himself a passage. Forced in almost all directions, the Italians and the Lorrains abandoned their posts, and flying into the other quarters, carried disorder and terror wherever they went.

At daybreak the Prince de Condé, crossing the quarter of the archduke, advised him to retreat. To protect this movement, Condé marched with the cavalry to meet the French, and check their victorious impetuosity. He at first gained a not very difficult advantage over those engaged in pillage, and then beat the Marshal de la Ferté, who had imprudently descended from a height; but he did not dare to pursue him. The marshal had been replaced upon that height by a considerable body of troops. At seeing this, Condé took possession of a neighboring elevation, to wait for his infantry. His intention was then to attack the column which appeared upon the height. Marshal Turenne had there fortified himself. Some artillery and fresh troops had joined him at this respectable post. Condé led his troops to the attack, but his soldiers were stopped by the fire of Turenne's cannon: in spite of all his efforts, the prince was obliged to fall back. A sortie of the garrison of Arras made him hasten his retrograde movement the more; Condé and Turenne, in face of each other, divined who their opponent was by his maneuvers. The prudent Turenne did not pursue Condé; the Marquis de Bellefonds, not so wise, attacked his rearguard at the passage of the Scarpe, and was repulsed with loss. Still formidable in the midst of a reverse, Condé left his intrenchments, like a general quitting a camp he is tired of occupying, rallied his scattered troops, and retired to Cambrai, always presenting a bold and redoubtable front to his enemies. His fine retreat, in which he covered the conquered Spaniards, formed a striking contrast with the shameful flight of the archduke and the Count de Fuensaldagne, who escaped with a few squadrons through some French baggage-wagons. Turenne lost but few men, but he was wounded; the loss of the Spaniards amounted to 3,000 men, 63 cannon, 2,000 horses, 2,000 wagons, and all the equipages of the army.—Robson.

ARROYO DEL MOLINO, A.D. 1811.—On the 28th of October, 1811, the English troops, under Lord Hill, surprised and defeated the French, on the verge of the ridge of Montaches near Arroyo del Molino, in Spain.

ARTEMISIUM, B.C. 480.—On the same day on which the glorious action between the land armies of the Persians and Spartans, at Thermopylæ, took place, there was also an engagement between the fleets at sea, near Artemisium, a promontory of Eubœa upon the northern coast of Greece, toward the straits. The Grecian fleet consisted of 271 vessels; that of the enemy amounted to about the same number. The battle was very fierce and obstinate, and the success nearly equal on both sides, except that the Persians, incommoded by the largeness of their vessels, sustained much the greater loss. Both parties, however, retired in good order.

ASCALON, A.D. 1099.—Ascalon, an ancient seaport town of Palestine is situated forty-five miles east of Jerusalem. Nothing remains of the former magnificence of Ascalon save a heap of solitary ruins.

A terrible battle was fought near this city in the year 1099, between the Christian forces and an army of 300,000 Saracens and other infidels. The Christians arrived in the plain of Ascalon which is bounded on the east by mountains and extends on the west to the sea. On the coast stood the city of Ascalon, over whose walls the banners of Jerusalem waved. At the extremity of the plain, the army of Saladin was drawn up in battle array, with the sea and the mountains behind it. The Crusaders advanced in two lines; the Count of Toulouse commanded the right wing; the two Roberts and Tancred were placed on the left; Godfrey commanded a body of reserve, which was at the same time to keep the garrison of Ascalon in check, and fight with the army of Egypt.

The nearer they approached the enemy, the more were the Christians filled with hope and confidence. Their drums, cymbals, hymns, and war-songs, animated them to fight, and they marched forward fearlessly and willingly. While the Christian army was thus marching in battle array, the droves of oxen and camels that they had met on their route, came to their rear and followed all their movements. The confused noise of these animals, mingled with the sound of the drums, trumpets, cymbals, and war-songs, and the clouds of dust which arose from under their feet, caused them to be taken for squadrons of horse; and the Saracens were persuaded that the Christian army was more numerous than their own. The infidels were drawn up, like the Christians, in two lines. The Turks, from Syria and Bagdad, were on the right; the Moors and Egyptians were on the left; the Emir Afdhal occupied the center with the main body of the Egyptian forces. This army covered an immense space of ground, and, says Foulcher de Chartres, like a stag that projects its branching horns, it extended its wings to envelop the Christians; but a sudden terror had made it motionless. In vain the emir endeavored to rouse the courage of his troops; they fancied that millions of Crusaders had arrived from the West; they forgot both their oaths and threats, and only remembered the fate of the Mussulmans immediately after the conquest of Jerusalem. Before engaging, all the Crusaders, fully armed, fell on their knees and implored the protection of heaven, and, rising full of ardor and hope, marched against the Saracens. If the most truthful historians are to be believed, the Christians had not more than 15,000 foot and 5,000 horse. When they arrived within bow-shot, the foot soldiers made several discharges of javelins; at the same time the cavalry, increasing their speed, precipitated themselves upon the enemy's ranks. At this charge the Duke of Normandy, the Count of Flanders, and Tancred broke through the center of the Egyptians. Duke Robert, followed by his bravest knights, penetrated to the place where Afdhal fought, and got possession of the great standard of the infidels. The foot soldiers followed the horse into the mêlée, and cast away their bows and javelins to make use of the sword and lance. On all sides the Saracens were thrown into disorder. Toward the end of the battle, Godfrey had to contend with a troop of Ethiopians, who bent on one knee to the ground to launch their javelins, and then springing up, rushed forward upon the Christians with long flails armed with iron balls. This redoubtable battalion could not alone resist the lances of the Crusaders, and were soon dispersed. An invincible terror seemed to paralyze the arms of the Mussulmans. While the King of Jerusalem was pursuing the Ethiopians and Moors, who fled toward the mountains in the vicinity of the field of battle, the Syrians and Arabs, who fought in the left wing of the infidel army, were broken by the Count of Toulouse. Hotly pressed by the conquerors, a great number of the fugitives precipitated themselves into the sea, and perished beneath its waters; others sought an asylum in the city of Ascalon, which they struggled so furiously to enter, that 2,000 were crushed to death upon the draw-bridge. Amid the general rout, Afdhal was on the point of falling into the hands of the conquerors; and, leaving his sword on the field of battle, had great difficulty in gaining Ascalon. Historians add, that, when from the walls of the city he contemplated the destruction of his army, he shed a torrent of tears. In his despair he cursed Jerusalem, the cause of all his evils, and blasphemed Mahomet, whom he accused of having abandoned his servants and disciples. This was a day of terror and death for the Mussulmans. From the beginning of the battle the infidels, who had previously burned with a thirst for vengeance, appeared to have no purpose but to escape by flight from an enemy who had granted no mercy to the vanquished. In their mortal fear they let fall their arms and suffered themselves to be butchered without offering any resistance. This terrified crowd stood motionless on the field of battle; and the sword, to use the expression of a cotemporary, mowed them down, like the grass of the field. Some cast themselves down on the ground and sought concealment beneath the heaps of the slain; others plunged into caverns, or scrambled up rocks or trees, where they were shot down with arrows, like birds. Afdhal, who did not believe himself safe in Ascalon, embarked on board a fleet which had arrived from Egypt. Toward the middle of the battle, all the Egyptian vessels which were near the shore spread their sails and gained the open sea. From that moment no hope of safety remained for the shattered army of the infidels, who were, as they had said, to deliver the East, and whose multitude was so great that, according to the expression of old historians, God alone knew their number.—Michaud's History of the Crusades.

ASPERN, A.D. 1809.—Aspern, a small village of the archduchy of Austria, is situated on the left bank of the Danube, on the island of Lobau, about two miles below Vienna. This and the neighboring village of Essling, were, in 1809, the scene of a tremendous conflict between the grand French army, commanded by Napoleon, and the Austrians under the Archduke Charles.

During the week which immediately followed the occupation of Vienna, by the French army, the Emperor Napoleon, around whose standard were gathered 80,000 effective men, resolved to cross the Danube without delay, and give battle to the Archduke Charles of Austria, who had concentrated his forces, consisting of 100,000 men, in the immediate vicinity of Aspern and Essling. After mature deliberation, Napoleon resolved to attempt the passage of the river at Nussdorf, about half a league above Vienna, and at the island of Lobau, at the same time. Lannes was charged with the undertaking at Nussdorf, Massena at Lobau. Marshal Lannes, with 600 men, pushed forward to Nussdorf, and attempted to cross the river; but his advanced guard was met by the Austrian General Hiller, who fell upon it with an overwhelming force, and before any assistance could arrive, the French troops were obliged to surrender. Marshal Massena was more successful than Lannes. He easily dislodged the Austrians from the isle, and at ten o'clock, on the 19th of May, his troops commenced crossing the river at Lobau, and by daybreak on the 21st, 40,000 Frenchmen already stood in battle array on the northern shores of the river Danube. In the mean time Archduke Charles, with a great body of forces, lay on the woody heights of the Bisermberg, and, from this elevated position, he could distinctly perceive, by the aid of telescopes, the movements of the French army on both sides of the river. The Archduke concluded wisely, to fall, with all his forces, upon that part of the French army which had crossed the Danube, and possibly reduce it to extremities before the other portion on the opposite bank could effect a passage. Stretching from the foot of the Bisermberg to the margin of the Danube, lies the plain of Marchfield, spread like a carpet between the hill and the river. Midway between the villages of Aspern and Essling, each situated at the distance of half a mile from the bank of the Danube, the bridge by which the French had crossed the river from the island, opened upon the plain of Marchfield. Napoleon's army extended in a line across the open space, a mile broad between the two villages, which, therefore, formed the bastions, on either flank of the army. The villages were built of stone houses, most of them two stories in height, and surrounded by enclosures and garden-walls, of the same durable materials. Both offered valuable points d'appui to the bridge, under cover of which it was hoped Massena and Bessières would be able to maintain themselves, until the remainder of the French army could be brought over to their support. Essling had a stone granary, three stories in height, capable of containing several hundred men. Aspern, a long straggling village, above two miles in length, was strengthened by a church-yard surrounded by a strong wall. A double line of trenches, intended to draw off water, extended between these two natural bastions, and served as a wet ditch, which afforded perfect security to troops issuing from the island of Lobau. On the right of the French army, the glittering pinnacles of Breitenlee, and the massy tower of Neusüedel, were conspicuous; while on the left arose the woody heights of Bisermberg, resplendent with the watch-fires of the Austrians. In front the ground arose with gentle slope toward Raschdorf. The plain was covered with verdure, and here and there could be seen, scattered over its green surface, groves of trees, which partially concealed little villages whose whiteness afforded a pleasant contrast with nature's favorite color. This beautiful plain seemed the cherished abode of peace. How soon the balmy air was to be torn by the sharp rattle of musketry, and the rude sounds of warring men! The grass which now was dampened with the gentle dews of summer, would soon be drenched with the gore of human beings The lovely landscape would soon become a scene of terrific strife; the tempest of war was soon to sweep its fair surface and blast its beauty.

Napoleon was alarmed at the magnitude of the Austrian forces, and dispatched orders in every direction to assemble his forces on the north bank of the river. But it was too late, the narrow breadth of the bridges would only permit a very limited number of soldiers to march abreast upon them. The cavalry and artillery alone were, with the greatest difficulty, enabled to cross the river. Mean while, the Austrian army, 80,000 strong, of whom 14,000 were cavalry, with 280 pieces of cannon, were already upon them. The Austrians advanced in five massy columns, preceded by a strong body of horse, which concealed their direction and probable points of attack from the enemy. The first column was commanded by Hiller, and moved along the northern bank of the Danube direct upon Aspern. The second, under Bellegarde, with the generalissimo by his side, advanced upon Leopoldau, and also directed its steps toward the same village. The third, commanded by Hohenzollern, moved by Breitenberg also upon Aspern. The fourth, led by Rosenberg, was to advance by Raschdorf, toward Essling. The fifth, also directed by Rosenberg, was to turn the right flank of the enemy, by Enzersdorf, and cooperate in the attack upon Essling. The cavalry, all massed together, was to move over the open country, between Raschdorf and Breitenlee, so as to assist any column which might find itself assailed by the enemy's horse. Eleven of the Austrian batteries were of position, and as they drew near the French lines, they sent a destructive storm of round-shot through their ranks. The Austrian forces were far superior in numbers, and in the weight of their artillery, to the enemy. The French army consisted only of 50,000 men, 20,000 of whom were native troops. Massena, with two strong divisions, was around Aspern; Lannes, with his troops, was in Essling; the intermediate space was occupied by the remainder of Massena's corps, the Imperial Guard and German auxiliaries, with the formidable cuirassiers of Bessières glittering in their front. Massena had not sufficient time to throw an adequate garrison into Aspern, before the enemy was upon it. The advanced guard of Hiller, commanded by Gurlay, carried the village; but the French marshal quickly attacked it, with the whole division of Molitor, and not only retook it, but pursued the Imperialists to a considerable distance to the northward. Now the broad and deep columns of Hiller, Bellegarde, and Hohenzollern, advanced to the support of the fugitives, and warned the skillful French commander of the necessity of withdrawing all his troops to the defense of the village itself. The prospect which now presented itself was capable of daunting the most intrepid hearts. On the left, three broad and deep columns were seen advancing toward Aspern; on the right, vast clouds of dust announced that other masses were threatening Essling; while along the whole front a formidable array of artillery, vomiting forth fire and smoke, steadily advanced, rendering more awful the scene, by the obscurity in which it involved all behind its traces. Soon, with loud shouts, Hiller's Austrian battalions advanced to the attack. But the French received the assault of the Austrians with a heroism unparalleled. Massena, stationed in the church-yard of Aspern, under the boughs of the huge trees which overshadow the church, calmly awaited the result. He heeded not the terrific tempest of grape-shot which crashed through the branches of the trees over his head, and clattered against the church steeple; but with the coolness and precision of an able and experienced commander, he directed the movements of his troops. For several hours the murderous conflict continued; fresh troops were brought up, on both sides, to supply the places of those who had fallen, or were exhausted in the strife. Every street, every house, every garden of the village, became the theater of mortal combat. The shouts of transient victory; the yells of despair; the screams of the wounded, mingled with the terrific roar of the artillery, created an uproar and turmoil which stunned the senses and appalled the stoutest heart. The bombs and shells from the Austrian batteries spread death on all sides, among friend and foe. The village took fire in several places, and, by the ghastly light of the burning houses, the work of destruction was maintained by both parties, with equal obstinacy and animosity. At the same time a desperate conflict continued in the marshy plain between Aspern and the Danube. For a long time the French center prevented the Austrians from attacking the village on more sides than one; but at about eleven o'clock at night, in spite of the most heroic efforts on the part of Massena, Moiltor, and his officers, Aspern was carried amid deafening shouts. The French, exasperated to madness by the success of the Austrians, made a gallant effort to regain their ground, and succeeded in wresting some of the houses from the enemy. But the greater part of this blood-stained village, with the church-yard, remained through the night in the hands of the Austrians.

While Massena was thus struggling to hold the village of Aspern, the space occupied by the French army, between Essling and the village, was exposed to the fire of Austrian batteries. A storm of grape-shot continually passed through their ranks, with such fury that the field was almost swept of the soldiers. Napoleon, galled by the incessant and sustained discharge of this tremendous array of guns, ordered a grand charge of cavalry in his center to wrest them from the enemy. Marshal Bessières first sent forward the light horses of the Guard. They advanced at a furious gallop; but were met with such terrific disharges of grape from the Austrian batteries, that, reeling beneath the iron storm, they turned and fled, leaving the field strewed with the mangled corses of men and horses. Bessières now placed himself at the head of his heavy armed cuirassiers, and ordering the trumpets to sound, he swept across the plain toward the batteries. Cased in shining armor the gallant horsemen galloped swiftly toward the enemy, shaking their sabers above their heads, and making the air tremble with cries of Vive l'Empereur! On, like a whirlwind, they swept; the earth trembled beneath their steady gallop, and the Austrians, fearing the result, hastily discharged one volley of grape, which tore through the advancing horsemen, and then withdrew their guns to the rear, while the infantry quickly threw themselves into squares to receive the shock. Enveloped in the smoke of the sudden discharge, the French horsemen charged upon the infantry. But when the vapor cleared away, those solid squares stood unbroken and defiant. In vain did the French cavalry renew the charge on every side. Nothing could break the formidable array of bristling steel. The Austrian infantry kept up an incessant fire on every side, and firmly resisted every shock. At length, the French cuirassiers, shattered and defeated, were compelled to retire to their own lines, and both parties at this point slept on the field of battle.

Rosenberg did not attack Essling until five o'clock in the afternoon of the first day of the battle. The French evacuated Enzusdorf on the approach of the Austrians. Lannes, at the head only of a single division, was thus threatened with an attack, by forces more than double his own, both in front and flank. No sooner did the fourth column attack the village on the western side, than Bessières detached a body of French cavalry from the center of the line, and vigorously charged it in flank as it advanced. The necessity of forming squares to resist these attacks, retarded considerably the assault on that side. On the defeat of the French cavalry in the center, the archduke ordered a general advance of the whole line, at the same time that a combined attack of Rosenberg's two columns, now perfectly able to co-operate, was made on Essling. In spite of the utmost efforts of Napoleon, the Austrian center sensibly gained ground, and it was only by the most devoted gallantry, on the part of the French cuirassiers who again and again, though with diminished numbers, renewed the combat, that he was able to prevent that part of his line from being broken through. Lannes's division within Essling, however, poured forth such a constant and violent fire of musketry and grape, that the progress of the Austrians was arrested, when they arrived abreast that village, and, although Rosenberg's columns frequently assaulted it, and it was repeatedly set on fire by the Austrian shells, yet the heroic marshal, with his brave division, fought with such desperation that all the assailants could do was to drive them entirely within its walls. Darkness alone suspended the conflict. Essling still remained in the hands of the French.

Night rested upon the field of battle, shrouding in its dark mantle both the dead and living. In spite of their misfortunes, the brave Frenchmen sternly determined to conquer on the morrow or die on the field of battle. Confident of an easy victory, the Austrians awaited the approach of day with impatience. Sleep at length closed the eyes of the weary soldiers. The silence of night was broken only by the low moans of wounded soldiers, battling with death, as they lay in their own gore on the bloody field. Napoleon, wrapped in his cloak, reposed on the sand of the Danube, within half a mile of the Austrian batteries. But the French generals slept not. During the night the rest of Lannes's corps, the infantry of the Imperial Guard, and the troops of Oudinot, were with much difficulty brought across the bridges. Early in the morning the two armies were again ready for battle. Both parties were now nearly equal, the French numbering full 70,000 men, while Davoust with 30,000 more was just commencing the passage of the bridges. The archduke had also received reinforcements during the night, so that each army now consisted of about 100,000 men. Morning had scarcely dawned before Rosenberg's columns again assailed Essling in front and flank, and Massena with strong reinforcements renewed his attack on the church-yard of Aspern. Rosenberg was at first successful; but St. Hillare, coming up to the assistance of Lannes, who was now driven out of all parts of Essling except the great granary, the gallant marshal rallied, and by a sudden effort, the Austrians were expelled, and were never again able to recover their footing in that important village. The French division of Cara St. Cyr, took Aspern with the battalion in the church-yard and four pieces of cannon. The Austrians made the utmost efforts to retrieve their loss. Klebeck's regiment rushed with fixed bayonets into the burning ruins of Aspern; the French were expelled by the violence of the shock, but they returned to the charge, reinforced by several battalions of the Imperial Guard, and after a struggle of an hour's duration, the Austrians were again driven from the church-yard, which by this time was literally covered with the dead. Hiller again formed a column of attack, determined not to be outdone in this tremendous struggle. In conjunction with Bellegarde's corps, he himself led on the charge at the head of the regiment of Benjossky, and by great exertion succeeded in driving the French, under St. Cyr, entirely out of the village.

Bonaparte, weary at length, of remaining on the defensive, commenced preparing for a great and decisive movement on the center. For this purpose, Massena, who had not yet been expelled from Aspern, was instructed to maintain himself in that village; Davoust was to march toward Essling, while Lannes and Oudinot were ordered to make a united attack on the Austrian's center. At seven o'clock in the morning, Napoleon pointed out to Lannes, whom he had called to his side, the course he wished him to take. Lannes hastened to his post. Shortly afterward Napoleon rode through the lines of the troops who were to advance, and was received with enthusiastic shouts of Vive l'Empereur, which rose above the din of battle, and attracted the attention of the enemy, who immediately concentrated the fire of their cannons in that direction, in the hopes of cutting down the French emperor, though the fog which still hung over the banks of the Danube, concealed him from their sight. General Montholon was killed by his side. In a few minutes the columns of Lannes were advancing over the plain. Two hundred cannon arrayed in front of their whole line, poured forth destructive volleys, as they were rapidly moved over the ground toward the enemy. Behind the infantry was the cavalry, and the Imperial Guard formed the reserve. Thus arrayed and supported, the French columns advanced into the fire of the batteries and infantry, and charged upon the weakest part of the Austrian line with such terrible force, that they soon forced their way through, and throwing the battalions into confusion, formed a large gap, into which the French cavalry rushed with appaling fury. The Austrian battalions, in the center of their line broken and routed, fled in dismay, spreading in all directions the report that the battle was lost. Onward moved the gallant French columns, piercing through their enemies till they reached the reserved grenadiers of the Austrian army. The archduke now exhibited the bravery and skill of a heroic soldier, and an experienced commander. He saw that without a powerful effort all was lost. Seizing the standard of Zach's corps, which was already yielding before the determined valor of the French, and shouting to the men, he led them back against the enemy. His generals, emulated the noble example. They dashed into the thickest of the fight, and leading on their respective regiments they attacked the French columns, with the utmost fury. The struggle which ensued was fierce and bloody. The Austrian generals were killed almost to a man in this fearful conflict. But Lannes's column was stopped, after having penetrated into the checker of squares which formed the Austrian line, by these heroic efforts. The Austrian squares poured incessant and destructive volleys on all sides, and their batteries, playing at half musket-shot, occasioned a frightful carnage in the deep masses of Napoleon's troops, who could neither deploy nor return the terrific fire with which they were assailed. From that moment the French soldiers felt that the day was lost. In vain cuirassiers dashed into the intervals of the squares; in vain they rode round and round the firm squares, charging them repeatedly to the very points of the bayonets. Not one square broke, not one column gave way. Charged in turn by an overwhelming number of Austrian cavalry, the French cuirassiers were driven back upon their own infantry. At this moment, Hohenzollern, perceiving a considerable opening on the right of the French line, occasioned by the unequal advance of some of their regiments, seized the favorable moment to dash in with Troluk's regiment, and occupying the place. Here he maintained his ground until he was supported by the archduke with six regiments of Hungarian grenadiers. At this time the want of ammunition began to be sensibly felt in the French army, especially by the artillery. Just then, too, a report began to circulate, and soon spread through the ranks that the bridges over the Danube, were carried away by the heavy boats which the Austrians had floated against them. In fact, the fire-ships and heavy barks which the archduke had sent down the river, had, with the swelling of the water, swept away a considerable part of the bridge over the main stream. It was a terrible moment. The French defeated and hemmed in by a victorious army, which poured incessant and terrible discharges of cannon and musketry upon them, were filled with terror when they learned that their only means of escape was nearly cut off. Yet the courage and coolness of Napoleon did not desert him. His calmness allayed the fears of those around him. Seeing that no time was to be lost, he ordered the suspension of the attacks at all points, and a general retreat toward the island of Lobau. The Austrians resumed the offensive at all points. Forming two fresh columns of attack, they made a sudden assault on Essling, which, with the exception of the great granary, was carried at the very moment that the French center, slowly retiring, reentered the narrow plain between that village and Aspern.

Aspern, in spite of the most heroic efforts of Massena and Legrand, was in a great part already taken by the Austrians, and the capture of Essling precluded almost entirely the possibility of a retreat to the river side. Napoleon, seeing his position well-nigh desperate, made the utmost exertions therefore to gain the village of Essling. General Mouton at the head of a brigade of the Imperial Guard, advanced at a run, and drove out the enemy at the point of the bayonet. The Anstrians again returned, and pushing up to the very foot of the granary, thrust their bayonets through the loop-holes from which issued the deadly fire which thinned their ranks. In the tumult the upper part of the building took fire, but still the invincible French soldiers maintained themselves in the lower stories, amid the roar of musketry, and the crash of burning timbers. Five times did the Hungarian grenadiers rush up to the burning walls, and five times were they repulsed by the indomitable courage of the Old Guard. At length Rosenberg, finding it impossible to dislodge the enemy, desisted from all further attack on the village, and confined himself to an incessant fire of grape and round-shot upon the French columns which were now in full retreat toward the island of Lobau. As they concentrated on the shore of the river, at the entrance of the bridges leading to the island, they presented such a mighty mass that every shot told with fatal effect. The archduke, determined to rout the French entirely, immediately advanced with his whole army upon them. At the same time his entire artillery, was brought forward, and, arranged in a semicircle around the dense body of French soldiers, poured a constant storm of grape and round-shot upon the struggling masses, with terrible effect. To the French all seemed lost; but Lannes rallying his best troops in the rear of the retreating army, supported by the infantry and cuirassiers whom Napoleon sent up to his assistance, prepared to resist the attacks. Massena, on his side, sometimes on foot, sometimes on horseback, with his sword in his hand, and fire in his countenance, rushed through the ranks, animating his men by voice and action. The French veterans reserving their fire, until the Austrians were within pistol-shot, poured in so close and destructive a volley, that the enemy was checked, and a close contest with fire-arms commenced. Lannes, dismounting from his horse to avoid the tempest of cannon-balls which swept down every thing above the heads of the soldiers, was struck by a shot, as he touched the ground, which carried away both his legs. The wounded marshal was placed in a litter and carried over the bridges into the island of Lobau, where Napoleon was engaged in directing the position of some batteries to protect the passage. Napoleon saw the appearance of the litter, and when it came up, he beheld the bleeding form of Lannes, his early companion in arms. The dying marshal seized his hand, and in a tremulous voice, said, "Adieu, Sire! Live for the world; but bestow a few thoughts on one of your best friends, who soon will be no more." Napoleon kneeling beside the litter, bowed himself over the form of the expiring hero, and wept tears of bitter grief. "Lannes," said he, "do you not know me? It is Bonaparte, your friend: you will yet be preserved to us." "I would wish to live," replied Lannes, "to serve you, and my country; but in an hour I shall be no more." Soon after, he fainted, and several days afterward he died. St. Hillare was brought in with Lannes, also mortally wounded. The French cavalry were now all withdrawn into the island; but still the rear guard, with unconquerable firmness, maintained the combat. At length the Austrians fatigued with fighting, desisted from all further attacks, maintaining only a tremendous fire from all the batteries until midnight. Then the last of the enemy, having withdrawn from the field of battle into the island, the artillerymen, exhausted by fatigue, sunk into sleep beside their guns. Thus ended the famous battle of Aspern. It was the first great battle which Napoleon had lost. The slaughter on both sides was enormous. The Austrians lost 87 superior officers, and 4,200 privates, killed, besides 16,300 wounded. The loss of the French is variously estimated. Mr. Alison, from whose history the account of this battle is taken, sets down the French loss at 30,000 men, of whom 7,000 were buried on the field of battle, by the Austrians. A few guns and some hundred prisoners were taken on both sides; 5,000 wounded fell into the hands of the Austrians. For several days after the battle, the Austrians were constantly engaged in burying the dead. Countless numbers of corpses were found in the smaller channels of the Danube. Even the waters of that mighty river were for some days poisoned by the multitude of slain which encumbered its banks, and a pestilential air was wafted down from the theater of death.

ASSAYE, A.D. 1803.—This village is situated a few miles from the city of Aurungabad, in the presidency of Bombay, in British India.

On the 23d of September, 1803, it was the theater of a sanguinary engagement between the British under General Wellesley, and the Mahrattas under their renowned leader Scindiah.

After the storming of Aurungabad and Baroach by the British, Scindiah commenced concentrating his forces, and those of his allies, who had been placed under his command. In a short time his army exhibited the imposing spectacle of 50,000 admirably disciplined soldiers, of whom 30,000 were horse, with 100 pieces of well-equipped cannon. Almost all his infantry and artillery were under the command of French officers.

Wellesley at once resolved to take the field, as without striking a decisive blow at this formidable body, it would be impossible for him to maintain himself in his conquest. He therefore broke up from his encampment on the 22d of September, and on the day following arrived within sight of the Mahrattas. The sight which met his eye, was sufficient to daunt the bravest heart.

His whole force did not exceed 8,000 men, of whom 1,600 were cavalry, with 17 pieces of cannon; the effective native British were only 1,500, and the remainder of his army were composed of Sepoys, or native Indian troops. Such was the force with which Wellesley determined to give battle to Scindiah and his 50,000 men.

He very wisely resolved to attack the left wing of the Mahrattas, as the infantry, which were there crowded together, presented less formidable difficulties to surmount, than the great mass of cavalry which glittered on their right. In pursuance of this design, the great body of the British troops were moved off to their own right, this movement being covered by the cavalry, and fording the river Kaitna, formed in two lines, having their cavalry in reserve. Scindiah, on seeing these movements on the part of the British, immediately changed his front, and disposed his guns along the crest of his position at Asssaye. The British line with the 74th regiment and the pickets of the 85th in front, on the right, and the 78th on the left, advanced with a swift and steady pace to the attack, but when they came within range, their guns were almost immediately dismounted by the superior fire of the enemy's artillery, but this could not arrest the steady advance of the pickets, and the 74th, who moved direct upon Assaye; but when they came within range of the enemy's grape-shot, frightful chasms became visible in their ranks; still on they pressed, nothing daunted, till a large body of Mahratta horse, who had succeeded in getting around the village unperceived, taking advantage of the openings thus made in the ranks, dashed through them, committing fearful havoc and penetrating almost to the center of the British line. At this critical juncture, the battle seemed lost, but Wellesley ordered the British and Sepoy cavalry, under Colonel Maxwell, to charge this body of horse. They obeyed and advanced at the gallop. The 19th dragoons, headed by their gallant and heroic leader, bore down with irresistible force upon the Mahratta horse, who, being disordered with their success, were speedily routed, and driven headlong into the Juah. The pickets and 74th being relieved from this weight, soon rallied, and the second line coming up, they advanced against and captured a large number of those guns which had been spreading death and devastation around them. Still the enemy held Assaye with a large body of infantry, and in order to dislodge them it was necessary to carry those guns which commanded the left of that position. For this purpose Wellesley put himself at the head of the 78th and a regiment of native horse. He advanced against the guns, and after a closely contested fight, they were at length carried. The enemy fought bravely, and resisted to the last, the artillerymen being in many instances bayoneted at their guns. After a short resistance the village of Assaye was stormed, and the victory on the part of the British might now be said to be complete. In this decisive charge Wellesley had a horse shot under him.

During the retreat of the enemy, a large body of infantry rallied, and for a short time showed a determined front, but they were speedily dispersed by a brilliant charge of the 19th dragoons, headed by the gallant Colonel Maxwell, in which that heroic officer lost his life.

Now that the flight had become general, some of Scindiah's gunners, fearing the sabers of the cavalry, threw themselves on the ground, feigning to be dead; and as soon as the horsemen had passed, sprung to their feet and poured a destructive volley upon the advancing horsemen. The British troops, indignant at the fraud which had been practiced upon them, wheeled about, again stormed the batteries, and bayoneted the deceitful gunners at their pieces. At length, as night set in, they fled on all sides, leaving in the hands of the British 97 pieces of artillery and almost all the ammunition and stores of the army. The Mahrattas lost 2,000 killed and 6,000 wounded; while the loss of the British was 1,500 killed and wounded.

ATHENRY.—This battle was fought in Ireland, between the English army and the Irish, in the year 1599. The Irish had put all the inhabitants of Athenry to the sword: a slaughter which is described as the most merciless and indiscriminate that occurred in those barbarous times. The Irish were defeated in the battle.

ATHENS.—This city, so called from Αθηνη, Minerva, the patroness of the city, is one of the most famous cities of antiquity, and the new capital of Greece. It is situated on the west side of Attica, about twelve miles from the Gulf of Ægina, and is built on the west side of an abrupt and rocky eminence rising out of an extensive plain, surrounded by mountains and hills.

First Siege, b.c. 480.—During the invasion of Xerxes, all the Grecian cities in his passage were subdued or felt the disastrous effects of his vengeance. The Athenians, too proud to submit, and too weak to defend themselves alone by land, sent to consult the oracle at Delphi. The god replied: "It is only within walls of wood the city will find safety." Themistocles persuaded the people that Apollo ordered them to instantly quit their city, and embark on board a good fleet, after having provided places of security for their wives and children. In consequence of this advice, they embarked, after having sent their aged, their women, and their children to Trœzene, in the Peloponnesus. We can not imagine a more affecting spectacle than the departure of this fleet; the unfortunate inhabitants kept their eyes, bathed in tears, fixed upon their abandoned homes till distance or darkness rendered them invisible. The very animals shared the common grief, running along the shore, and seeming to call back their masters by their cries. It is said that a dog belonging to Xantippus, the father of Pericles, threw himself into the sea, and swam by the side of his vessel till it reached Salamis, where it sunk exhausted upon the beach and died. This imaginative people erected a monument to this faithful dog, called "The Grave of the Dog." In the mean time, the Persian army entered Athens, forced the citadel, defended to the last by a small number of self-devoted men, and reduced the superb city to ashes.

Second Siege, b.c. 404.—After the battle of Platæa, the citizens of Athens returned to their country, and built a superb city upon the ruins of the ancient one. By recovering its splendor, it attracted the jealousy of its rival Sparta, the capital of Lacedemonia. This was the commencement of the famous Peloponnesian war. In the twenty-ninth year of this war, Lysander, having conquered the Athenians at Ægospotamos, marched directly against Athens. Though without vessels, without provisions, without hope, the Athenians defended themselves for eight months, and then surrendered, conquered alone by famine. The Spartans disgraced themselves by destroying the walls of the first city in Greece to the sound of musical instruments; and they established a government of thirty tyrants, in order to subdue the spirit of the unfortunate inhabitants.

This servitude did not last long; Athens was delivered from the yoke of the thirty, by means of 500 soldiers, raised by a simple Syracusan orator, named Lysius, out of veneration for the common country of eloquence. The expulsion of the thirty tyrants took place the same year that the kings were expelled from Rome.

After being opposed strongly to Philip, and submissive to Alexander, Athens was taken successively by his successors, Antipater, Demetrius, and Antigonus; its wealth being a rich bait for these captains, whose vanity was continually wounded by the haughtiness of the city, which gave rise to aggressions often but little merited.

Third Siege, B.C. 87.—Archelaus, a general of Mithridates, King of Pontus, entered Athens by means of a sophist named Aristion, to whom he gave the principal authority of the place. The Athenians claimed the assistance of the Romans, and Sylla took the matter upon his own hands.

Upon Sylla's arrival in Greece, all the cities opened their gates to him, with the exception of Athens, which, subject to Aristion, was obliged unwillingly to oppose him. When the Roman general entered Attica, he divided his forces into two bodies, the one of which he sent to besiege Aristion, in the city of Athens, and with the other he marched in person to the port Piræus, which was a kind of second city, where Archelaus had shut himself up, relying upon the strength of the place, the walls being sixty feet high, and all of hewn stone. This had been the work of Pericles during the Peloponnesian war.

The height of the walls did not amaze Sylla. He employed all kinds of engines in battering them, and made continual assaults. If he would have waited a little, he might have taken the higher city without striking a blow, for it was reduced to the last extremity by famine; but being in haste to return to Rome, where he apprehended changes might happen in his absence, he spared neither danger, attacks, nor expense, to hasten the conclusion of the war. Without enumerating the rest of the warlike stores and equipage, 20,000 mules were perpetually employed in working the machines alone. Wood falling short, from the great consumption of it in the machines, which were constantly being broken, in consequence of the vast weight they carried, or burned by the enemy, he did not spare the sacred groves. He cut down the beautiful avenues of the Academy and the Lycæum, and caused the high walls which joined the port to the city to be demolished, for the sake of the ruins, which were useful to him in the works he was carrying on. Having occasion for a great deal of money, both for the expenses of the war, and as a stimulus to the soldiers, he had recourse to the hitherto inviolable treasures of the temples, and caused the finest and most precious gifts, consecrated at Epidamus and Olympia, to be brought thence. He wrote to the Amphyctions, assembled at Delphi, "That they would act wisely in sending him the treasures of the god, because they would be more secure in his hands; and that if he should be obliged to make use of them, he would return the value after the war." At the same time he sent one of his friends, named Caphis, a native of Phocis, to Delphi, to receive all those treasures by weight. When Caphis arrived at Delphi, he was afraid, through reverence for the god, to meddle with the consecrated gifts, and bewailed with tears, in the presence of the Amphyctions, the necessity imposed upon him. Upon which some person there having said that he heard the sound of Apollo's lyre from the interior of the sanctuary, Caphis, whether he really believed it or not, was willing to take advantage of the circumstance to impress Sylla with a religious awe, and wrote him an account of it. Sylla, deriding his simplicity, replied, "That he was surprised he should not comprehend that singing was a sign of joy, and by no means of anger and resentment; and, therefore, he had nothing to do but to take the treasures boldly, and be assured that the god saw him do so with pleasure, and gave them to him himself."

Sylla was exceedingly anxious about this siege, and was, as we have said, in great want of money. He was desirous of depriving Mithridates of the only city he held in Greece, which might almost be considered as a key to Asia, whither the Romans were eager to follow the King of Pontus. If he returned to Rome without achieving this conquest, he would find Marius and his faction more formidable than ever. He was besides sensibly galled by the keen raillery which Aristion vented every day against him and his wife Metella.

It is difficult to say whether the attack or defense was conducted with the most vigor; for both sides behaved with incredible courage and firmness. The sallies were frequent, and were, in character, almost battles, in which the slaughter was great, and the loss generally not unequal. The besieged were supported by several seasonable reinforcements by sea.

What did them most damage was the secret treachery of two Athenian slaves, who were in the Piræus. These slaves, whether out of affection for the Roman interest, or desirous of providing for their own safety in case the place was taken, wrote upon leaden balls all that was going forward within, and threw them from slings to the Romans; so that, how prudent soever were the measures adopted by Archelaus, none of them succeeded. He resolved to make a general sally; the traitor slung a leaden ball, inscribed, "To-morrow, at such an hour, the fort will attack your works, and the horse your camp." Sylla laid ambushes, and repulsed the besieged with loss. A convoy of provisions, sadly wanted, was to be thrown into the city by night; upon advice, conveyed in the same way, the provisions were intercepted.

Notwithstanding all these disappointments, the Athenians defended themselves bravely. They found means either to burn most of the machines erected against the walls, or, by undermining them, to throw them down, and break them to pieces. The Romans, on the other side, behaved with no less vigor. By means of mines, they made a way to the bottom of the walls, under which they hollowed the ground; and having propped the foundation with beams of wood, they afterward set fire to the props, with a great quantity of pitch, sulphur, and tar. When these beams were burned, part of the wall fell down with a horrible noise, and a large breach was opened, through which the Romans advanced to the assault. This battle was contested with great obstinacy, but at length the Romans were obliged to retire.

The next day they renewed the attack. The besieged had built a fresh wall during the night, in the form of a cresent, in the place of that which had been destroyed, and the Romans found it impossible to force it.

Sylla, discouraged by so obstinate a defense, resolved to make no more assaults, but to take the place by famine. The city, on the other hand, was at the last extremity. A bushel of barley had been sold for a thousand drachmas (about $125). The inhabitants did not only eat the grass and roots which they found about the citadel, but the flesh of horses, and the leather of their shoes, which they boiled soft. In the midst of the public misery, the tyrant passed his days and nights in reveling. The senators and priests went to throw themselves at his feet, imploring him to have pity on the city, and to obtain a capitulation from Sylla; he had them dispersed with a shower of arrows, and in that brutal manner drove them from his presence.

He did not demand a cessation of arms, or send a deputation to Sylla, till reduced to the last extremity. As those deputies made no proposals, and asked nothing of him to the purpose, but ran on in praise of Theseus, Eumelpus, and the exploits of the Athenians against the Medes, Sylla was annoyed by their discourse, and interrupted them by saying: "Gentlemen orators, you may go back, and keep your rhetorical flourishes for yourselves; for my part, I was not sent to Athens to be made acquainted with your ancient prowess, but to chastise your modern revolt."

During this audience, some spies having entered the city by chance, overheard some old men talking in the Ceramicus, and blaming the tyrant exceedingly for not guarding a part of the wall, which was the only place where the enemy might easily take the city by escalade. At their return to the camp, they related what they had heard to Sylla. The parley had been to no purpose. Sylla did not neglect the intelligence given him. The next night he went in person to take a view of the place, and finding the wall actually accessible, he ordered ladders to be raised against it, began the attack there, and having made himself master of the walls, after a weak resistance, he entered the city. He would not suffer it to be set on fire, but abandoned it to be plundered by the soldiers, who in several houses found human flesh, which had been dressed to be eaten. A dreadful slaughter ensued. The following day all the slaves were sold by auction, and liberty was granted to the citizens who had escaped the swords of the soldiers, but their numbers were but few. Sylla at once besieged the citadel, where Aristion, and those who had taken refuge there, were soon so much reduced by famine that they were forced to surrender. The tyrant, his guards, and all who had been in any office under him, were put to death. Some few days after, Sylla made himself master of the Piræus, and burnt all its fortifications, especially the arsenal, which had been built by Philo, the celebrated architect, and was a wonderful fabric. Archelaus, by means of his fleet, had retired to Munichia, another port of Attica. To do this commander justice, he deserved to have conquered, for he had failed in neither courage nor skillful exertions during the siege. With his own hand he set fire to one of the Roman galleries, and destroyed all the machines upon it. On another occasion, his soldiers being repulsed, took to flight, and he in vain endeavored to rally them. He was soon left so completely alone, that he had to be drawn up the wall by ropes. His bravery formed a strong contrast with the cowardice and infamous debaucheries of Aristion.—Robson.

AUERSTADT, A.D. 1806.—Six miles west of Naumberg, in Prussian Saxony, is situated the village of Auerstadt, ever memorable as the scene of the sanguinary battle between the French and Prussian armies, on the 14th of October, 1806.

On the morning of the 14th of October, the united corps of Hohenlohe, and Ruchel encountered the French army under the Emperor Napoleon, at Jena, and on the same day the King of Prussia, and his troops, were attacked by the French forces under Davoust on the plateau of Auerstadt. The Prussian army, commanded by the king and the Duke of Brunswick, in person, had bivouacked in close array around the village of Auerstadt. On the 12th of October, Davoust, Bernadotte, and Murat, had marched upon Naumberg, and on the 13th had made themselves masters of considerable magazines. No sooner was the Duke of Brunswick informed of the occupation of Naumberg by the enemy, than he directed the division of General Schmettan to occupy the heights of Koessen, and present itself in battle array before the French, whom he supposed to be only a few thousand strong. Under the cover of Schmettan's division, the remainder of the Prussian army leisurely took up its march toward the Elbe. Schmettan, however, contented himself by occupying the heights in the neighborhood of Auerstadt, and neglected to send forward detachments to seize the defile of Koessen. Davoust, on the morning of the 14th, speedily took advantage of this omission, and seized upon the important pass. At six o'clock that morning, the French marshal received an order from Napoleon, dated three o'clock A.M., from his bivouac on the Landgrafenberg, in which the emperor announced his intention to attack the Prussian army in a few hours. He imagined the enemy's army to be concentrated in his front, and directed Davoust to march without loss of time upon Apolda, in order to fall upon their rear, leaving him the choice of his route provided he took a part in the action. The dispatch added: "If the Prince of Ponte Corvo (Bernadotte) is with you, you may march together; but the emperor hopes that he will be already in the place assigned to him at Dornberg." Davoust immediately repaired to the head-quarters of Bernadotte, who at that moment was in communication with his corps at Naumberg, and showed him this order—proposing that they should march together to Apolda. Bernadotte, however, conceived it his duty to march at once to Dornberg, as the "emperor hoped he would be in the position assigned to him at Dornberg." He at once set out with his whole corps in the direction of that town.

Davoust was thus left entirely to his own resources. Yet he at once commenced his march toward the spot which the emperor had designated. The French army consisted of 26,000 infantry, and 4,000 horse; while the army commanded by the King of Prussia consisted of 50,000 infantry, and 10,000 horse. Neither army was aware of the coming engagement. While Davoust was urging forward his men in the direction assigned by Napoleon, eager only to arrive in season to serve his emperor, the King of Prussia was leisurely proceeding on his march along the Elbe.

At eight o'clock in the morning of the 14th, the Prussian army arrived at the plateau of Auerstadt. A heavy mist hung over the plain. Suddenly the tramp of an approaching body of men was heard coming through the mist. The sound was produced by the approaching vanguard of Davoust. The French emerged from behind a long and steep ascent, and drew up in battle array on either side of its summit. So thick was the fog that neither party saw the enemy until they had approached within a few yards of each other. Upon discovering the proximity of enemies, both sides drew back to collect reinforcements, to clear their advance—the Prussians to drive the enemy back again down the defile, and the French to clear their front and pursue their route by the cross road they were on to Apolda. Speedily reinforced, both parties returned to the charge. The advanced guard of the French was supported by the whole division of Gudin, and were instructed by Davoust to maintain themselves to the last extremity on the level space at the upper end of the defile, in order to gain time for the remainder of the corps to debouch. On the other hand, the King of Prussia, impatient at the check given to the march of his army, ordered Blucher, with 2,500 hussars to ride over the Lonnenberg, and clear the plateau of the enemy. The Prussians anticipating an easy victory, hastened forward to the charge; but they were received by the French with a steady and destructive fire of musketry, which threw them in disorder, and compelled them to fall back. For an instant the Prussian cavalry prevailed over the cavalry of the French, but Gudin quickly brought his powerful artillery to bear upon the compact mass of the Prussian horsemen; and poured upon it such deadly discharges of grape, that it was shattered and driven from the field in confusion. The King of Prussia, although surprised at the obstinate resistance of the enemy, nevertheless, believing that it was only a detached column which occasioned the delay, refused to be advised by the Duke of Brunswick, who strongly urged him to wait until the mist was dispelled, and he could ascertain the precise strength of the enemy before he again attacked them. As fast as his divisions appeared successively, he ordered them forward to the attack. The divisions of Wartensleben, and the Prince of Orange, were ordered to pass the defile of Auerstadt, where the road runs through a winding hollow, skirted with copsewood or rough slopes, and advance to the support of the retreating cavalry. The moment Wartensleben's division emerged from the defile to assail the flank of the French under Gudin, who had advanced on the plateau beyond the village of Hassen-Hausen, the sun came forth in all his brilliancy. The French now for the first time beheld the imposing array of the Prussian army, advancing in beautiful order, but their courage quailed not; they awaited the approach of the enemy with calm deliberation. The Duke of Brunswick put himself at the head of the Prussian infantry, and led them to the attack. Smeltan pressed forward with his division of foot; while Blucher, re-forming his cavalry, led them back to the charge. But Gudin's brave men forming themselves into squares, resisted all their charges with unconquerable firmness. The nature of the ground prevented the Prussians from bringing all their overwhelming force at once upon the French. Yet the odds were strong against the French. Attacked at once in front and flank by a force far superior in numbers to their own, they struggled against hope. Placing themselves behind the hedges and walls of Hassen-Haussen, they resisted every effort of the enemy to dislodge them, and poured forth an incessant and murderous fire of musketry upon them, while the cannon of Gudin's artillery sent a terrific storm of iron hail into the midst of the Prussians, scattering death and destruction on every side. The Duke of Brunswick fell, mortally wounded; Smeltan was killed; the horse of Wartensleben was shot under him; and the Prussians, terrified and discouraged by the carnage committed upon their ranks, wavered in the attack. A shout of joy arose from the French ranks; the discharges of musketry became still more rapid, and the thunder of the cannon rolled over the field with redoubled violence. At this moment the French were reinforced by Morand's division, which gradually drew up on the left of Gudin, toward the Sonnenberg. Shortly afterward the division of Friant arrived, and took up a position upon the right of the French, extending their line to the foot of Speilberg. And now the battle became more equal, although the Prussians still had the advantage in numbers. No sooner had Morand's division formed than it was furiously assailed by the Prussian cavalry under Prince William, which had crossed the Lonnenberg and arrived on the French left. But Morand's admirable troops forming themselves into squares, received the repeated and impetuous charges of the Prussian cavalry, with rapid and destructive discharges. In vain did the Prussian horsemen furiously spur their horses to the very muzzles of the French muskets; the solid squares, encircled by walls of living fire, and protected by hedges of bristling bayonets, which the first rank kneeling, presented to the advances of the enemy, were impregnable. At length, dispirited by their fruitless efforts, and by the loss of their commander, who was severely wounded, the Prussians flew in disorder, leaving the ground behind them strewn with the bodies of one half of their number, and sought refuge partly on the heights of the Sonnenberg, and partly in the inclosures of Neuzalza. In the mean time, the division of Friant on the right, extended itself on the ground to the right of Hassen-Haussen, and drove the enemy, who assailed it, to the village and heights of Speilberg, both of which it speedily carried. The Prussian left was thus threatened; but their principal danger lay on their right. Here the French not only repulsed the vigorous attacks of the enemy, but rapidly pressed forward toward the heights of Sonnenberg, whence their guns would command the whole field of battle, and render the ground occupied by the Prussian reserves, which had taken no part in the action, untenable. The King of Prussia saw that if these heights fell into the hands of the enemy, the battle was lost. Placing himself at the head of a body of picked troops, he led them to the charge. The French sprang forward to meet the enemy. Morand himself led on his regiments. Gradually beating back the Prussians, the French finally succeeded in planting their guns on the heights, and opened such a tremendous fire of grape upon the enemy's columns, that they were driven back with terrible slaughter, and with the blood-stained Sonnenberg, and the village of Rehausen, the whole left of the field of battle fell into the hands of the French. Davoust immediately made preparations to strike a decisive blow. The heights of Eckhartsberg commanded the line of the enemy's line of retreat as those of Sonnenberg did the field of battle. To gain this point, Davoust moved forward his center under Gudin, who advanced, driving before him the broken remnants of Smeltan's and Wartensleben's divisions, which had lost more than one half of their numbers during the bloody struggle in which they had been engaged.

The Prussians, however, made one more effort to repair their misfortunes. Their broken battalions which had retired from the field, were rallied under cover of the powerful reserve, commanded by Kalkreuth, and consisting of two divisions which had hitherto taken no part in the action, and placed in front; while the whole cavalry under Blucher's orders, was posted in a second line immediately behind the infantry to take advantage of any hesitation which might appear in the enemy's columns. The French soldiers, wearied by their morning's march, and four hours' hard fighting, had now to withstand the shock of 15,000 fresh troops, to whom they had no corresponding reserve to oppose. The Prussians were strongly posted on an eminence, and protected by the fire of a powerful battery; but they were charged with such intrepidity by Gudin's division supported by a part of Friant's, that they were driven from their advantageous position with terrible slaughter and with the loss of 20 pieces of cannon. In the mean time the Prussians violently assailed the troops which Morand had stationed on the heights of Sonnenberg; but the assailants were met with a fearful discharge of musketry, and their ranks were torn by showers of grape from that commanding position, which drove them back in huddled disorder. The gallant Frenchmen descended from the heights and eagerly pursued the retreating enemy, carrying every thing before them, and driving the reserves which opposed them through the defiles of Auerstadt. Defeated at all points, the Prussians left the field of battle to Davoust and his heroic soldiers. Thus closed the famous battle of Auerstadt. The Prussians lost 10,000 men killed and wounded. One hundred pieces of cannon and ten standards fell into the hands of the victors. The loss of the French was 7,500 men killed and wounded. The King of Prussia, who during the day had evinced the most signal coolness and intrepidity, and during the repeated charges which he made at the head of his troops, had lost two horses killed under him, gave directions for his army to retreat in the direction of Weimar, intending to fall back on the corps of Prince Hohenlohe, of whose disaster at Jena he was still ignorant.

But, as the troops were in extreme dejection, and with little order following the great road which leads to that place, they were suddenly startled in the twilight by an extensive line of bivouacs on the heights of Apolda. These lights were made by the corps of Bernadotte, who, adhering to his original instructions to march to Dornberg, had arrived in this position; ignorant of the combats which had taken place,he was preparing to fall on the rear of the Prussian army on the following day. This sudden apparition of a fresh corps of unknown strength on the flank of their retreat at that untimely hour, compelled the Prussians to change their direction and abandon the great road. About the same time, obscure rumors began to circulate through the ranks of a disaster experienced at Jena, and soon the appearance of fugitives from Hohenlohe's and Ruchel's corps, flying in the utmost haste and confusion, across the line which the troops retiring with the king were following, announced but too certainly the magnitude of the defeat sustained in that quarter. The men were now seized with a general consternation. The firmest hearts were filled with despair, as the cross tide of the battalions flying from Jena, mingled in greater proportion with the wreck which had survived the fight at Auerstadt; the confusion became inextricable, the panic universal—infantry, cavalry, and artillery disbanded, and leaving their guns, horses, and ammunition-wagons, fled in mingled disorder across the fields, without either direction, command, or rallying point. The king himself narrowly escaped being made prisoner during the tumults and horrors of that night; and it was not till five in the morning that, by a long circuit, he arrived at Sommerda, where he received the official news of his mournful disaster at Jena.

AUGHRIM, A.D. 1691.—Aughrim is a small town, distant about ten miles from Athlone, in the west of Ireland. It was the scene of a memorable action on the 12th of July 1691, between the Irish, under the French general St. Ruth, and the English, under General Ginckle.

After the battle of the Boyne, King James, deeming his cause irretrievably ruined, left his army under the command of St. Ruth, and fled to the sea-coast, where he embarked for France. General Ginckle, who commanded the English, in the absence of William, crossed the Shannon, and carried the fortress of Athlone, after a severe struggle. St. Ruth immediately marched to Augrhim, and there posted his troops, determined to await the English army and at once decide the fate of Ireland. He had under his command 25,000 men, who were planted in an advantageous position. Their front extended over a rising ground, before which was a large bog. Their right wing was covered by intrenchments, and their left by the castle of Aughrim. In this position, Ginckle, whose forces did not exceed 18,000 men, resolved at once to attack the enemy, made the necessary dispositions, and after a severe cannonade, at twelve o'clock, the English army commenced fording the bog, as it was of vital importance for them to possess the heights on the other side.

The Irish fought with surprising valor and steadiness, and several times repulsed the English horse, but Ginckle ordered up some cannon to the assistance of the right, and after an obstinate conflict, that position was carried. But the left wing could make no impression whatever on the enemy; as often as they attacked them, so often were they repulsed, and it was not till six o'clock in the evening, that the Irish, after having become completely exhausted, were forced to abandon their position. At the same time a general attack was made in the center, which resulted in the Irish being driven from that part of the field. Meantime St. Ruth was killed by a cannon-shot, and his death so dispirited his troops that they gave way on all sides, and hastily retreated toward Limerick. Their loss on this occasion amounted to 7,000 men, killed, wounded, and prisoners. The English loss was 600 killed and 960 wounded.

AUGUSTA, A.D. 1781.—This city is situated on the south-west side of the Savannah river, in Richmond county, Georgia, 120 miles north-west of Savannah. In 1781, Augusta was occupied by the British troops under Colonel Brown. The Americans, under Major Eggleston, laid siege to Augusta in the latter part of May, 1781, and on the 4th of June, when the besiegers were upon the point of making a general assault, the garrison agreed to a conditional surrender. The British troops marched out and laid down their arms, and Brown and his fellow-prisoners were paroled. In this siege the Americans lost twenty-three killed, and twenty-eight wounded. The British lost fifty-two killed, and 334 including the wounded, were made prisoners. By this victory the Americans deprived the British of a very important post. They never again occupied the city of Augusta.

AUSTERLITZ, A.D. 1805.—The night of the first of December, 1805, was a night of anxiety to Napoleon Bonaparte. It was the night before the battle of Austerlitz. He had decided upon a battle which he had determined should completely overthrow the allied forces of Austria and Russia. He had rapidly concentrated his forces in a plain near Lake Moenitz, in the vicinity of Austerlitz, and now, on the evening of the first anniversary of his coronation, he was awaiting a battle which should decide the fate of the campaign. The French army, which consisted of nearly 80,000 men, was drawn up on the plain; the right wing resting on Lake Moenitz, and the left six miles distant on a hill, which was covered with artillery. Directly opposite the French army, stretched a line of heights. Mount Pratzen, the loftiest of these heights, formed the center of the allies. The army of the allies numbered 90,000 men, and was commanded by the Emperors of Russia and Austria in person. At four o'clock, on the morning of the second of December, 1805, Napoleon quited his tent, and, mounting his horse, gazed thoughtfully on the plain outspread before him. The morning was calm, and a thick fog shrouded the field. Nothing could be seen of the immense host which was gathered on the opposite heights; but a sound, muffled and heavy, of marching men and rumbling artillery, was borne across the field by a sluggish breeze, and betokened that the enemy were preparing for the conflict. Nearly three hours elapsed, and the sun slowly rose from behind the heights of Pratzen, which glowed in the light like heated gold, and the dense forms of dark columns of infantry came out clear and distinct in the illuminated background. The allies were drawing their forces from their center to the left, for the purpose of outflanking the French, and Napoleon's marshals, at once perceiving the mis-movement, turned to him and eagerly asked to take advantage of it. But Napoleon deemed it imprudent to interrupt the enemy when they were making a false movement, and, therefore, decided to wait until the enemy had so far weakened their center, as to be incapable of resistance at that point. At eight o'clock Napoleon gave the signal to attack, and Murat, Lannes, Bernadotte and Soult, who had been near him, separated from him, and galloped swiftly to their respective divisions. Soult, at the head of his powerful battalions, hastened up the hill of Pratzen. In an instant the summit of Pratzen belched forth a sheet of flame upon the French. The smoke descended like a curtain, enveloping the combatants; but the rapid and heavy discharges of artillery, the rattling and constant reports of musketry, and the shouts of the soldiers, were borne on the breeze to Napoleon's ear, and assured him that his men were struggling fearfully for mastery. For two hours the top of the hill was enveloped in fire and smoke; for two hours the air was stunned with the incessant discharges of cannon; but at length the smoke slowly ascended toward the skies, and Napoleon's quick eye saw the French flag waving triumphantly on the height. Successful in his attack on the enemy's center, Soult next descended on their left wing, but with less success. The Imperial Guard, under Bessières, were charging upon the enemy in the valley, and the whole field resounded with the thunder of the cannon. The French under Murat, Lannes, Davoust, and Augereau, incited by the desperate valor and brave exploits of their leaders, were strewing the field with dead. Soult soon received assistance, and finally the enemy's left wing was put to flight, fighting desperately as they fled. Seven thousand soldiers of the allied army fell in this retreat beneath the hands of the victorious French. The survivors attempted to escape by crossing a frozen lake, with their artillery and cavalry. The ice was weak, and could scarcely sustain their weight, yet they had advanced to the center of the lake, when Soult, suddenly observing them, ordered his cannon to play upon the ice. The result was horrible; the ice, broken and separated by the shower of iron which constantly fell upon it, yielded, and two thousand men, with their horses, were plunged into the water. Still the relentless cannon played upon the men and horses, struggling for their lives in the icy water. They sank, benumbed by the cold, and mutilated by the shot, and the record of their fate forms one of the blackest pages in the history of Napoleon Bonaparte. The bloody battle of Austerlitz was over. Thirty thousand corpses strewed the plain. Eighteen thousand of the Russian and Austrian army were destroyed, while 12,000 Frenchmen met a like fate. The success of this battle firmly established Napoleon's seat upon the French throne.

AYACUCHO, A.D. 1824.—Near this town in South Peru, South America, was fought a battle between the combined forces of Columbia and Peru, and the Spanish army, the 9th of December 1824, which resulted in the total defeat of the latter, and put an end to Spanish dominion on the American continent.

AZINCOUR, A.D. 1415.—In the year 1415, Henry V., of England, invaded France with an army of 6,000 men-at-arms, and 24,000 foot, mostly archers. He landed near Harfleur, and immediately began the siege of that place, which was valiantly defended by D'Estoutville, and under him by De Guitri, De Gaucort, and others of the French nobility. But as the garrison was weak, and the fortifications in bad repair, the governor was at last obliged to capitulate, and on the eighteenth of September, Henry took possession of the town, placed a garrison in it, and expelled the French inhabitants, with the intention of peopling it anew with English. The unusual heat of the season, and the fatigues of the siege had so wasted the English army, that Henry could enter on no further enterprise, and was obliged to think of returning to England. As he had dismissed his transports, which could not anchor in an open road upon the enemy's coasts, he was under the necessity of marching by land to Calais, before he could reach a place of safety. A numerous French army, of 14,000 men-at-arms, and 40,000 foot, had, meanwhile, assembled in Normandy, under Constable D'Albret; a force, which, if prudently conducted, was sufficient either to trample down the English in open field, or to harass and reduce their small army to nothing, before they could finish so long and difficult a march. Henry, therefore, offered to sacrifice his conquest of Harfleur for a safe passage to Calais, but the French indignantly rejected his proposal, and he determined by valor to make his way through all the opposition of the enemy. He made slow and deliberate marches till he reached the Somme, which he proposed to pass at the ford of Blanquetague, the same place where Edward, in a like situation, had before escaped from Philip of Valois. But the ford was strongly guarded by a strong body of French, on the opposite bank, and he was compelled to march higher up the river in order to seek for a safe passage. At length, after a long and painful march—his troops constantly harassed by flying parties of the enemy, his passage across the river continually cut off by bodies of French troops on the opposite bank, his provisions failing, his soldiers languishing with sickness and fatigue—he was so fortunate as to seize, by surprise, a passage near St. Quentin, which had not been sufficiently guarded, and he safely carried over his army. Still subjected to the harasses of the enemy, he bent his march northward toward Calais, and when he had crossed the small river of Ternois at Blangi, he was surprised to observe the whole French army drawn up on the plains of Azincour, and so posted that it was impossible for him to proceed on his march without coming to an engagement. The English army was little more than half the number which had disembarked at Harfleur, while the French army was four times more numerous, and was headed by the dauphin and the princes of the blood. The French were plentifully supplied with provisions, while the English were illy fed, and worn out with their tedious march. Henry drew up his army on a narrow ground between two woods, which guarded each flank, and then patiently awaited the attack of the enemy. Had the French constable been wise, he would have waited until the English were obliged to advance, and relinquish their advantageous position. But the impetuous valor of the nobility urged him on to an immediate attack. The French archers on horseback advanced upon the English archers, who, from behind pallisades which they had erected to break the impression of the enemy, safely hurled upon them a shower of arrows which nothing could resist. The clay soil, moistened by a late rain, proved a serious obstacle to the force of the French cavalry; horses and men, wounded by the incessant clouds of arrows which were hurled upon them by the English, threw their ranks into disorder; and the whole army soon became a scene of confusion, terror, and dismay. Then Henry ordered the English archers to charge upon them, and seize the moment of victory. Like bolts from the bow, the stalwart men of England, battle-axe in hand, rushed from behind their defenses, and fell upon the French, hewing them to the earth, without resistance. The men-at-arms seconded their efforts; pushing on against the French, until the field was covered with the killed, wounded, dismounted and overthrown. All opposition on the part of the French was at an end; and the English had leisure to make prisoners. They advanced with uninterrupted success to the open plain, and saw the remains of the French rear guard, which still maintained the order of battle. At this moment they heard an alarm from behind. Some gentlemen of Picardy, having collected about six hundred peasants, had fallen upon the English baggage, and were doing execution on the unarmed followers of the camp, who fled before them. Henry, seeing the enemy on all sides of him, was fearful that his prisoners would revolt, and therefore gave generals orders that they should be slain; but, discovering the truth, he stopped the slaughter, after a great number of the prisoners had been put to death. This battle occurred on the 25th day of October, 1415. The French lost a large number of princes and nobles, slain or taken prisoners. The Constable D'Albret, the Count of Nevers, and the Duke of Brabant, brothers to the Duke of Burgundy, the Count of Vaudemont, the Duke of Barre, the Duke of Alençon, and the Count of Marle, were among the slain. The French lost, killed, 10,000 men, and 14,000 prisoners taken by the English. It is doubtfully estimated that the English lost in this battle only forty men. The Duke of York was killed while fighting by the side of his king.

AZOTH, OR AZOTUS, B.C. 670.—As the siege of Azoth, although the longest recorded in history, affords but little matter for relation, we will merely mention it.

Azoth was anciently one of the five capital cities of the Philistines. The Egyptians having seized it some time before, had fortified it with such care that it was their strongest bulwark on that side. Nor could Sennacherib enter Egypt till he had made himself master of this city, which was taken by Tartan, one of his generals. The Assyrians had possessed it hitherto, and it was not till after a siege of twenty-nine years, that the Egyptians, under Psammetichus, recovered it. The extraordinary length of this siege ceases to surprise us, when we consider that the siege was nothing but a badly-guarded blockade, where that was expected from lassitude and famine which could not be obtained by either bodily strength, which necessarily failed against stone walls, or by military art, which had not yet learn how to overthrow them, or even to scale them.

BABYLON, B.C. 538.—Nothing now remains of the former magnificent palaces of this great Asiatic city, but immense and shapeless masses of ruins. Babylon was the capital of Chaldea, and of the Assyrian empire, and was probably one of the largest, as it is certainly one of the most famous, cities of antiquity. The site of the city of Babylon is occupied by the modern and meanly built town of Hillah, the capital of a district, and the residence of a Dey, appointed by the Pacha of Bagdad. This town lies on the west bank of the river Euphrates, and occupies nearly the center of the south part of the old inclosures of the ancient city. It contains a population of 6,000 or 7,000, Arabs and Jews. It is surrounded by mud walls, and a deep ditch, and has four gates. It has a rude citadel, the only public building within the walls, except a single mosque, and six or seven oratories. The river Euphrates, at Hillah, in its medium state, is 450 feet wide, and seven and a half feet deep. Its mean velocity is about two and a half miles an hour. The whole surrounding country is intersected with canals. The undoubted antiquity of many of these works, is not a little surprising, considering the nature of the soil, which is wholly alluvial, and so soft, that the turning of the course of the river by Cyrus, does not appear to Mr. Rich, who visited Hillah, in 1811, an exploit of any great difficulty. Such is the present state of Babylon, "the glory of kingdoms, the beauty of the Chaldee's excellency."

The magnitude assigned by ancient writers, to this celebrated city, is so immense, as to stagger belief. It was a perfect square, and, according to Herodotus, 480 stadia (about fifty-four and a half statute miles,) in circumference. Strabo gives the circumference at 380 stadia, (forty-five and three quarter miles); Diodorus Siculus at 360 stadia (forty-two and a third miles), on the credit of Ctesias; but at 365 (forty-three miles) on that of Clitarchus, who was on the spot with Alexander. Quintius Curtius gives it at 368 stadia, and Pliny at sixty Roman miles (about fifty-five statute miles). The population of Babylon has been estimated to have been at the time the city was taken by Cyrus, between 1,000,000 and 1,200,000. The buildings and population bore no proportion to the extent of the city, and in the words of Rich, "it would convey the idea rather of an enclosed district, than that of a regular city."

According to Herodotus, the city was built on both sides of the Euphrates, the connection between its two divisions being kept up by means of a bridge formed of wooden planks, laid on stone piers. The streets are described as having been parallel, and the houses from three to four stories in height. The city was surrounded by a deep and broad ditch, and by a wall of extraordinary dimensions, flanked with towers and pierced by 100 gates of brass,* whose hinges and frames were of the same metal. The wall was built of bricks, formed from the earth taken out of the ditch, and cemented by a composition formed of heated bitumen and reeds; the former being brought from Is (Hit) on the Euphrates, about 128 miles above Babylon. The temple of Jupiter Belus (most probably the tower of Babel,) occupied a central position in one of the divisions of the city. Herodotus describes it as a square tower of the depth and height of one stadium (625 feet) upon which, as a foundation, seven other towers rose in regular succession, the last tower having a large chapel, a magnificently adorned couch, and a table of solid gold. The building was ascended from without by means of a winding stair. The space in which it was built, was inclosed by walls, eight stadia in circumference. The gates to the temple, which were of brass, and of enormous size, were seen by Herodotus. In the other division of the city, stood the royal palace, which seems to have been a sort of internal fortification, and was, no doubt, of vast dimensions.

God had decreed that Babylon should fall, and made use of Cyrus as an instrument for the executing of his design. We find the prophecies, relating to the destruction of Babylon, and the name of its destroyer, recorded in the Holy Scriptures, full 200 years before Cyrus was born; but for a detailed account of the fulfillment of those prophecies, we are obliged to look to profane history.

Cyrus, after entirely reducing all the nations of Asia Minor, from the Ægean sea to the river Euphrates, proceeded to Syria and Arabia, which countries he also subjugated. He then entered into Assyria, and advanced toward Babylon, the only city of the East that stood out against him. He at length arrived at Babylon, with a mighty multitude of horse, and a countless host of archers, spearmen, and slingers. When he had reached Babylon, he posted his whole army around the city, and then rode around the city himself. Having thus viewed the walls and defenses, he saw that the taking of this important place would be no easy task. The walls were of prodigious height, and appeared inaccessible, without mentioning the immense number of people within them for their defense. After he had encamped with his army around the city, Cyrus summoned to his tent the proper persons, and said: "Friends and allies! we have taken a view of the city round, and I can not discover how it is possible that one, by an attack, can make himself master of the walls that are so strong and high. But the greater the number of inhabitants in the city, the sooner may they be taken by famine. Therefore, unless you can propose some better method, I say that the city must be taken in that manner." "Does not this river," said Chrysantas, "run through the midst of the city?" "Yes," declared Godryas, "but it is so deep that the city is better protected by the river than by its walls." Then Cyrus said: "Chrysantas, let us lay aside these things that are above our force; it is our business, as soon as possible, to dig as broad and deep a ditch as we can, each of us measuring out his proportion, that by this means we may want the fewer men to keep watch."

Cyrus, therefore, caused a line of circumvallation to be drawn quite round the city, with a deep ditch, and, that his troops might not be over-fatigued, he divided his army into twelve bodies, and assigned to each of them its month for guarding the trenches. The besieged, thinking themselves out of all danger, by reason of their ramparts and magazines, and being, withal, provided with a twenty years' stock of provisions, insulted Cyrus from the top of their walls, and laughed at all his attempts, and all the trouble he gave himself, as so much unprofitable labor.

At length the ditch was completed, and Cyrus began seriously to think of putting his vast design into execution. Providence soon furnished him with as fit an opportunity for this purpose as he could desire. He was informed that a great festival was to be celebrated in the city,* and that the Babylonians, on occasion of that solemnity, were accustomed to pass the whole night in drinking and debauchery.

Belshazzar,† King of Babylon, made that day a great feast to a thousand of his lords, and drank wine with them. And while he was tasting the wine, he commanded the golden and silver vessels which his father, Nebuchadnezzar, had taken out of the temple, which was in Jerusalem, that the king and his princes, his wives and his concubines, might drink therein. Then all drank from the golden vessels, and praised the gods of gold, and of silver, of brass, of iron, of wood, and of stone. And while they were thus engaged, the fingers of a man's hand appeared, and wrote, over against the candlestick, upon the plaster of the wall of the king's palace, and the king saw the part of the hand that wrote.

The king was terribly frightened and surprised at this vision, and immediately sent for all his wise men, his divines, and astrologers, that they might read the writing to him, and explain its meaning. But they all came in vain; not one of them was able to expound the matter, or even able to read the characters. The queen-mother (Nitocris, a princess of great merit) hearing of this great prodigy, entered the banquet-hall, and endeavored to compose the mind of her son, advising him to send for Daniel, with whose abilities she was well acquainted, and whom she had always employed in the government of the state. Daniel, therefore, was immediately sent for, and spoke to the king with a freedom becoming a prophet. He reminded him of the dreadful manner in which God had punished the pride of Nebuchadnezzar.

"And thou, his son, O Belshazzar," said Daniel to the king, "hast not humbled thy heart, though thou knewest all this; but hast lifted thyself up against the Lord of heaven; and they have brought the vessels of his house before thee, and thou, and thy lords, thy wives, and thy concubines, have drunk wine in them; and thou hast praised the gods of silver, and gold, of brass, iron, wood, and stone, which see not, nor hear, nor know: and the God in whose hand thy breath is, and whose are all thy ways, hast thou not glorified. Then was the part of the hand sent from him; and this writing was written. And this is the writing that was written, MENE, MENE, TEKEL, UPHARSIN. This is the interpretation of the thing: MENE: God hath numbered thy kingdom and finished it. TEKEL: Thou art weighed in the balances, and art found wanting. PERES: Thy kingdom is divided, and given to the Medes and Persians." Belshazzar then commanded Daniel to be clothed in scarlet, and placing a chain about his neck, he proclaimed that Daniel should be the third ruler in the kingdom. But, notwithstanding the warning, Belshazzar continued the festival, and protracted his revelings to a very late hour.

In the mean time Cyrus, according to Xenophon, as soon as it grew dark, took a number of men with him and opened the ditches into the river. He had posted a part of his troops on that side where the river entered into the city, and another part on that side where it went out; and had commanded them to enter the city that very night, by marching along the channel of the river as soon as ever they found it fordable. The water, as soon as the ditches were opened, rapidly ran off, leaving the bed of the river through the city, nearly dry. Cyrus now ordered his officers to attend him, and addressed them as follows: "Friends and allies! The river has yielded us a passage into the city. Let us enter boldly, and fear nothing within, for these are the same people whom we defeated when they were assisted by their allies; when they were awake, sober, armed, and in good order. But now we march against them, at a time when many of them are asleep, many drunk, and all of them in confusion; and when they discover that we are upon them, their consternation and affright will render them still more unfit for service. Do not apprehend that they will discharge their weapons down on us from their house-tops on every side, for we have Vulcan for our fellow-combatant; their porches are easily set fire to; their doors are made of the palm-tree, and smeared with bitumen, which will nourish the flame. We have abundance of torches; we have plenty of pitch and tow, and we shall presently raise such a conflagration that they will be compelled to fly from off their houses, or immediately be consumed. Come on, then, take to your arms, and, with the help of the gods, I will lead you."

If the besieged,* says Herodotus, had either been aware of the designs of Cyrus, or had discovered the project before its actual accomplishment, they might have effected the total destruction of the Persians who entered the city by means of the river. They had only to secure the little gates which led to the river, and to have manned the embankments on either side, and they might have inclosed the Persians in a net from which they could never have escaped.

But God had said, through His prophets: "I will break in pieces the gates of brass," and He made the general negligence and disorder of that riotous night subservient to His design. The gates were left open, and their keepers, instead of guarding them, were carousing with their companions, and the Persians, in two bodies, the one commanded by Gobrydas, and the other by Gadatas, entered Babylon through the channel of the river, both on its entrance into and its departure from the city. The two bodies of troops penetrated into the very heart of the city, without encountering any opposition. They met, as they had agreed, at the palace of the king, and surprised and slew the royal guards. Disturbed by the noise, the king commanded those that were within to examine what was the matter. They immediately threw open the gates and ran out; but they were quickly met by the Persians, who cut them to pieces, and pressing forward through the gates, made themselves masters of the palace. The king, surrounded by his immediate friends, sword in hand, stood ready to contend for his life. But the Persians rushing upon him in a body, overthrew and slew both him and his protectors. Cyrus now sent a body of cavalry through the streets, bidding them kill all the inhabitants they found abroad. He also issued a proclamation in the Syrian language, commanding all those who were in their houses to remain within, for if they were found abroad they should be killed. The next morning, those who guarded the castles, seeing that the city was taken and the king dead, gave up their strongholds to the conqueror. Cyrus immediately took possession of the castles and garrisoned them. He gave up the dead to be buried by their relations, and ordered heralds to make proclamation, that the Babylonians should all deliver up their arms, and that in whatsoever house any arms should be found, all the people in it should suffer death. The arms were accordingly brought out, and Cyrus deposited them in the castles, that they might be ready in case of any future emergency. He then distributed houses and palaces among such of his men as had been sharers with him in all the actions he had performed (having first set aside certain portions of ground for sacred purposes), and gave to each a certain number of Babylonians, as slaves and bondsmen. Thus was the great city of Babylon conquered; its king, the proud Belshazzar, slain, and its vain and frivolous people subjected and inslaved by the Persians.—See Battle of Thymbra.

BABYLON, Revolt and Reduction of, B.C. 516.—In the year 521, Darius ascended the Persian throne, and in the beginning of the fifth year of his reign, the Babylonians growing impatient of the Persian yoke, revolted, and could not be conquered till after a siege of twenty months. The Babylonians had taken advantage of the troubled state of the affairs of Persia, and for four years had secretly made preparations for war. When they had stored the city with many years' supply of provisions, they raised the standard of rebellion, and Darius was obliged to besiege it with all his forces.

God had decreed that Babylon should not only be humbled and brought down; but that it should be depopulated and laid waste with fire and blood. He, therefore, permitted them to rebel against Darius, and by that means to draw upon themselves the whole force of the Persian empire.

The Babylonians, to make their provisions last the longer, and to enable them to hold out with greater vigor, took the most desperate and barbarous resolution that was ever heard of. They resolved to destroy all such of their own people as were unserviceable on this occasion. For this purpose they assembled together all their wives and children and strangled them. Only every man was allowed to keep his best beloved wife, and one maid-servant to do the business of the family. On the first intelligence of this event, Darius assembled his forces and marched against the city. On his arrival he besieged it in due form; but the Babylonians assembling on the ramparts, amused themselves with dancing, and mocking, and insulting the Persians, so confident were they of their security in the strength of their fortifications, and the vast quantity of provisions they had laid up. For the space of eighteen months did Darius and his army lay siege to the city. They used every possible stratagem, and they applied their most powerful engines of war. Neither did they forget to make use of the same means, by which Cyrus twenty-three years before, had happily gained entrance into the city. But their every attempt proved ineffectual. The Babylonians were ever vigilant, and repelled the besiegers at every attack. Darius began almost to despair of taking the place, when a stratagem, till then unheard of, opened the gates of the city to him. Zopyrus, one of his noblemen, conceived the idea of mutilating himself, and then to pass over to the enemy, as if deserting from Darius on account of the cruelty he had received at his hands. He scrupled not to wound himself beyond the power of being healed. He cut off his nose, and his ears, and clipped his hair close to his head. In this state, his wounds still fresh and bleeding, he presented himself before Darius. No sooner had the king beheld a man of his illustrious rank in such a disgraceful plight, than leaping from his throne in anger, he thundered forth, "Who, Zopyrus, has dared thus inhumanely to treat you?" "No man, O king," replied Zopyrus, "save yourself, could thus maltreat me. I, myself, have thus disfigured my body; I could no longer see those Babylonians mock at and insult us." "Wretched man!" said the king, "why do you endeavor to call a shameful action by an honorable name? Will the enemy surrender because you have thus mutilated your person? You must, indeed, be mad." Zopyrus now made the king acquainted with his design, and requested him, as he hoped for success, to follow implicitly his directions. Darius, moved by the zeal and confidence of the young nobleman, at once assured him that all he wished should be done. "Then," said Zopyrus, "on the tenth day after my departure, do you detach to the gate of Semiramis 1,000 men of your army, whose loss can be of no consequence. After an interval of seven days more, send to the Ninian gates, 2,000 men, and then, after the lapse of twenty days send a body of four thousand men to the Chaldean gates. But let none of these detachments be armed with any weapons except their swords. Then let your whole army advance and surround the walls. Be careful that Persians are stationed at the Belidian and Cissian gates. In the mean time I shall advance with the Babylonians and cut to pieces the troops which you have sent, and after they have witnessed my exploits in the field, they will, I think, intrust me with the keys of those gates. Doubt not but the Persians, with my aid, will then easily accomplish the rest."

After giving these injunctions he proceeded toward the gates of the city, and to be consistent with the character which he assumed, he frequently halted and looked behind him, as fearful of being pursued. The sentinels on the watch-towers, perceiving this, ran down to the gates, which they opened slightly and inquired who he was, and what he wanted. He told them that his name was Zopyrus, and that he had deserted from the Persians. He was, therefore, admitted, and was at once conducted before the magistrates. He then told a piteous tale of the indignities he had suffered at the hands of Darius, for no other reason than that he had advised him to withdraw his army, because he saw no likelihood of his taking the city. "And now," said he, "O ye men of Babylon, I come a friend to you, but a bitter and fatal enemy to Darius and his army. I am well acquainted with all his designs, and his treatment of me shall not pass unrevenged."

When the Babylonians beheld a Persian of such high rank, deprived of his ears and nose, covered with wounds and blood, they entertained no doubts of his sincerity, or of the friendliness of his intentions toward them. They therefore acceded to all his requests, giving him the command of as many troops as he desired. He then proceeded to the execution of what he had concerted with Darius. On the tenth day, after his arrival, he made a sally from the town, at the head of a body of Babylonian troops, and encountering the body of 1,000 Persians, whom Darius had stationed as had been agreed upon, he fell upon them. and in spite of their desperate resistance, put every one of them to death. The Babylonians, observing that his actions corresponded with his words, were full of exultation, and were ready to yield him the most implicit obedience. A second time he advanced from the city, with a chosen troop of Babylonians, and falling on the 2,000 Persians, slew them to a man. The joy of the citizens at this second exploit was so great that the name of Zopyrus resounded with praise from every tongue. Again, for a third time, he sallied forth from the city with his troop, and attacked fiercely the 4,000 Persians whom Darius had planted to receive him. The Persians, armed only with the sword, were unable to cope with the Babylonians, and they too were slaughtered. Now the city of Babylon was filled with rejoicings. The citizens could not heap sufficient honor on the head of their brave defender. They gave him the entire command of their army, and appointed him guardian of the walls. And now Darius with all his force advanced to the walls. The Babylonians mounted the ramparts to repel the assault of the Persians; but Zopyrus now proved faithless to them. He immediately opened the Belidian and Cissian gates to his countrymen. The Babylonians seeing this fled for refuge to the temple of Jupiter Belus, and the Persians without molestation entered the city. Thus was Babylon taken a second time. As soon as Darius became master of the place he caused the one hundred gates to be torn from their fastenings, and all the walls to be leveled to the ground. This he did in order to prevent the proud Babylonians from ever again rebelling against the power of the Persians. He impaled alive 3,000 of the most distinguished inhabitants, the rest he suffered to remain as they were. Nay more, he ordered the neighboring nations each to send a stipulated number of females to Babylon, to supply the places of those whom the citizens had slain before the commencement of the siege. These women in all amounted to 50,000.

Zopyrus was loaded with favors by the grateful monarch. Darius settled upon him during life, the whole revenue of Babylon, and heaped all the honors upon him that a king could possibly confer on a subject. He frequently asserted, that could he restore Zopyrus to the condition he was in before he had so cruelly mutilated himself, he would cheerfully resign the conquest of twenty Babylons.

BACTRA, B.C. 2134.—In all arts the East has led the van, and has evidently been as far advanced before the western nations in the great one of fortifying its cities as in most others. The first siege we can obtain any account of is that of Bactra, and we are told it was so fortified by nature and art, that Ninus, at the head of 400,000 men, would never have been able to take it, if a stratagem had not been suggested to him by Semiramis, the wife of one of his officers. Every thing in the East seems to have been upon a gigantic scale: the cities were immense in extent, the height of the walls and towers, and the depth and width of the surrounding moats or ditches, almost incredible.

Ninus, King of Assyria, one of the most ancient of the great disturbers of the peace of mankind called conquerors, was desirous of putting the crown to his glory by the conquest of Bactriana, now Corassan. Nothing in the open country could resist an army of 400,000 men; but Bactra, the capital, for a length of time withstood all his endeavors. As the defense of a city consisted in its walls, ditch, and advantages of position only, so the means of attack were correspondingly simple; and we are not surprised at the inhabitants holding out for a time which in modern warfare would be impossible. We are told that the genius of Semiramis conceived a stratagem—what, we do not learn—by which the city was at length taken, and her master, in a truly eastern manner, showed his gratitude by seeking a cause for putting her husband to death, and making her his wife. Some accounts do not hesitate to say that the lady, at least as ambitious as Ninus, repaid him by removing him as he had removed her first husband, in order to reign alone.

BADAJOZ, A.D. 1811.—This ancient city of Spain is situated in an extensive plain, in the province of Estramadura, near the frontier of Portugal, in an angle between and at the point of the confluence of the river Rivellas with the Gaudiana, 198 miles south-west of Madrid. A castle, situated on a high eminence at the confluence of the two rivers, commands them and the town, which is further defended by various very strong fortifications.

On the 2d of January, 1811, Soult, with an army of 20,000 French soldiers, set out from Seville, taking the road by Llerena, for Badajoz. The Spanish and Portuguese troops under Mendizabel and Ballasteros consisted of 12,000 combatants, and too weak to oppose any resistance to Soult's force, they retired under the cannon of Badajoz and Olivenza. Four thousand men were thrown into the fortress of Olivenza, which, after a resistance of twelve days, surrendered on the 22d of January, and then Soult, collecting all his forces, took up his position before Badajoz. Wellington, who was at the lines of Torres Vedras, no sooner heard of the danger which threatened that important fortress, than he resolved to dispatch Romana with two Spanish divisions to co-operate in its relief. But scarcely had this noble Spaniard set out, than he was seized with a disease in the heart, of which he suddenly died at Cartalo. His troops, however, reached Badajoz on the 6th of February, and joined Mendizabel, whose forces were drawn up under the guns of Badajoz, with his right resting on the fort of St. Christoval, forming one of the outer walls of the city. Soult's situation was highly critical: the necessity of keeping up his communications with the main body of the French army, had reduced the forces under his command to sixteen thousand men, and the Spaniards, with a force full as great, occupied a strong position, resting on the cannon of the fortress. But he was soon relieved from his critical position by the negligence and fatuity of the Spanish general. Wellington had repeatedly advised Mendizabel to strengthen his position under the walls of the place, with intrenchments, in order that he might possess an impregnable station from which he might co-operate in its defense; but he deemed it entirely unnecessary to follow this advice. His position was separated from that of the French, by the river Gaudiana and Gebora, both of which were flooded with rains. He contented himself, therefore, by breaking down a bridge, which crossed the latter stream, and left his army in negligent security on its banks. Soult observed the self-confidence of the Spanish general, and conceived the audacious plan of crossing both rivers, and surprising the Spaniards amid their dream of security. He forded the Gaudiana at the French ferry, four miles above the confluence of the Gebora, late in the evening of the 18th of February. The Gebora, however, was yet to be crossed; but before daybreak the passage was accomplished under cover of a thick mist. At sunrise the mist was dispelled, and the Spanish outposts near the ruined bridge were alarmed by the French skirmishers, who had already gained the opposite bank. The cavalry forded the river five miles further up, and speedily threatened the Spanish flank, while Mortier, with six thousand foot, assailed their front. The struggle was only of a few minutes' duration; horse, foot, and cannon were speedily driven together in frightful confusion into the center; the cavalry cut its way through the throng, and escaped; but the infantry were almost all cut down or taken. Mendizabel fled, with a thousand men, to Elvas, 2,000 got into Badajoz; but 8,000, with the whole artillery, were taken, and not a vestige of the Spanish army remained in the field. The French immediately resumed the siege of Badajoz. The undertaking was an arduous one, for the ramparts of the city were of great strength; the garrison was nine thousand strong, amply supplied with provisions. But with indomitable energy, Soult rapidly advanced his works. Manecho, the Spanish governor, prepared for a vigorous defense. A few days after the fire began, however, this gallant Spaniard was killed, and was succeeded by Imaz. The French kept up an incessant fire, from six battering guns; the ramparts were soon breached, and the fire of the place considerably weakened. At length, after losing one thousand men, the Spanish governor surrendered the place, with 8,000 men, and 170 guns. Thus in the space of one month, Soult had achieved two most brilliant victories. With an army of 20,000 men, he had carried two fortresses, and had destroyed or taken an equal number of the enemy.

The loss of Badajoz, the Duke of Wellington saw would constantly endanger the west of the Peninsula, and he considered it as by far the greatest calamity which had befallen the allies since the taking of Madrid by Napoleon. While Ciudad Rodrigo and Badajoz were in the hands of the French, Wellington felt that he could not undertake any serious enterprise either in Portugal or Spain. In the middle of May, 1811, Wellington having determined to act on the offensive against the French in Spain, and to endeavor in the onset to recover the important fortress of Badajoz, moved his head-quarters to Estramadura, taking with him 12,000 men to reinforce Beresford.

General Beresford had previously begun the campaign in that province, and had, on the 17th of April, made himself master of the fortress of Olivenza, with its garrison of 380 men. Thus re-inforced, Beresford immediately blockaded Badajoz, and, as soon as the Gaudiana was fordable, the town was invested on both banks of the river. Soult no sooner heard of the enterprise, than he began to collect troops at Seville for its relief. A double attack was projected by the English—one on the castle, and another on the fort of St. Christoval. On the night of the 8th of May, the besiegers had broken ground at a distance of 400 yards from the latter fortress. The French garrison within the place, however, kept up an incessant fire upon the workmen, and as their aim was assisted by a bright moon, their fire was very destructive. Two days afterward, the besieged made a vigorous sally, and were repulsed with loss; but, as the allies pursued the fugitives too far, they were torn in flank by a discharge of grape-shot from the ramparts, which, in a few minutes, struck down 400 men. In the mean time, the fire from Christoval was so effective that five of the guns which the besiegers had placed in the trenches, were speedily dismounted. On the 12th, the besiegers had broken ground in front of the castles, and a battery was opened against the tête-du-pont. Intelligence was now received by the allies that Soult, with a large army, was approaching. Beresford immediately gave orders to discontinue the siege and assemble all the forces in front to give battle. The battle was fought on the 16th and 17th of May, near the village of Albuera, where, on the heights in front of that village, Beresford's army was concentrated. Soult's army consisted of 19,000 infantry, and 4,000 horse. The troops of Beresford numbered 30,000 men, of whom 16,000 were English.* The battle of Albuera resulted in the defeat of the French, and as soon as Soult had retired toward Seville, by the road he had advanced, the British resumed their position around the bastions of Badajoz. Wellington took command of the siege of Badajoz, and Beresford set out for Lisbon. Wellington had no sooner arrived than he re-commenced the siege with the utmost vigor. Both parties had improved to the uttermost the brief breathing-time afforded by the battle of Albuera. Both the besiegers and the besieged knew that succor was approaching, and that, unless the place was carried within a fortnight, Marmont and Soult would arrive from the north and compel the raising of the siege. During the absence of the allied forces, Phillippon, the French governor of Badajoz, had leveled the trenches and destroyed the approaches of the besiegers, and had repaired his own works where injured by their fire. He had also constructed strong intrenchments behind such places where breaches were expected, and considerably augmented his supplies of provisions. On the 27th of May, the place was wholly invested; two days after, ground was broken against Fort Christoval, and fifty heavy pieces of artillery were mounted. The besiegers pushed their operations with vigor, and, on the 6th of June, the breach was declared practicable. At midnight the storming party advanced to the attack. They reached the glacis in safety, and descended unobserved into the ditch. But, immediately after dark, the French had cleared away the rubbish at the foot of the breach from the bottom of the ditch slope, so that it could not be ascended. The troops, however, refused to retire, and boldly attempted to gain admittance by escalade. But the French made a stout resistance, and poured such destructive volleys upon the besiegers, that they were at length obliged to retreat. This check taught the British to be more prudent in their future operations. They continued their fire with great vigor, both on Christoval and the body of the place, for three days in succession. A heavy fire was also kept up against the castle, but though the breaching-batteries played on it at the distance of only 500 yards, yet, at the end of nine days, they had produced no decided effect. The guns of Fort St. Christoval swept along the foot of the wall, and over the ground in its front, and thus prevented an assault on the castle, even if a breach had been effected. A second attempt was therefore made to carry Christoval. The garrison of this fort, which at the late attack consisted only of seventy-five, was now increased to 200 men. The French troops were in the highest degree animated and encouraged by their recent success, and, mounting their bastions, they invited the British, with loud cheers, to come on. Each soldier of the garrison was provided with four loaded muskets, and on the top of the ramparts were arrayed a formidable array of bombs, hand-grenades, and powder barrels, ready to be ignited and rolled over among the assailants the moment they reached the foot of the walls. The British storming party, bearing ladders, slowly advanced to the walls, and, notwithstanding the heroic exertions of the garrison, who fought valorously in the defense of their post, the assaulting columns united at the bottom of the breach and applied their ladders to the walls. But only a few of those brave men reached the summit of the wall, and those few were instantly bayoneted by the French troops. At the same moment the garrison rolled over the bombs, grenades, and powder barrels, down among the besiegers in the ditch, and the explosion of these terrible weapons committed fearful havoc in all directions. The British soldiers hastily leaped from the ditch, and, leaving their wounded behind them, fled to their intrenchments. The cries of the wounded Englishmen aroused the sympathy of the besieged. Desiring them to raise their ladders, the generous Frenchmen assisted their wounded enemies into the fort, where they were treated with the utmost kindness. In these two attempts upon Christoval the British lost 400 men, and Wellington, learning that Napoleon, who also deemed the possession of Badajoz of the utmost importance, had sent positive orders to Marmont to collect his forces and co-operate with Soult in the most vigorous manner for its deliverance, and that those generals were rapidly approaching with overwhelming forces, on the 10th and 11th of June, raised the siege, and retired into Portugal. On the 18th the junction of the armies of Soult and Marmont was effected, and on the 28th they entered Badajoz in triumph.

The campaign of 1812 was commenced by the siege of Ciudad Rodrigo, as Wellington was fully determined to reduce that place and Bajadoz, without the possession of which he could not enter regularly on his intended operations. The investment of Ciudad Rodrigo was begun on the 8th of January, and on the 18th of January the town was carried by storm after one of the bloodiest and most desperate struggles of the Peninsular war.* After putting Ciudad Rodrigo into a situation of defense, Wellington resolved to attack Badajoz, the only remaining fortress on the frontier. The town had been blockaded for some time by General Hill, and now it became necessary to reduce it as speedily as possible, as there was reason to apprehend that the French would otherwise make an attempt for its relief. On the 17th of March they had regularly and completely invested Badajoz, forming the first parallel within 200 yards of the French outworks called Fort Picurina. During the six months that had elapsed since the last attempt of the British on the place, Phillippon, whose great experience and skill had been proven in the last siege, had been indefatigible in improving the fortifications, and adding to the strength and resources of the place. He had 5,000 men under his command, drawn by equal numbers from the armies of Marmont, Soult, and Jourdan at Madrid. He had repaired the old breaches, and constructed strong additional works to retard the operations of the besiegers in the quarters where the former attacks had been made. The ditches had been cleared out, deepened, and filled with water; the glacis was everywhere elevated, so as to cover the scarp of the rampart; the tetes-du-pont, on the other side of the river, ruined in the former siege, had been thoroughly repaired, and ample provisions laid up, for the numerous garrison. The castle, standing on a rock, more than a hundred feet above the level of the Guadiana, and surrounded by walls, seemed perfectly impregnable. Alarmed by the rapid approach of the enemy's parallels against Fort Picurina, Phillippon on the 19th of March, ordered a sortie of 1,500 men, foot and cavalry against the right flank of the British works. The French approached under cover of a thick mist, and entering the enemy's trenches, drove the whole working parties from their posts, sweeping away several hundred intrenching tools, and spreading confusion as far even as the bivouacs and dépôts in the rear. The gallant Picton, however, quickly called his men to arms, and fiercely attacked the French, who after a most obstinate resistance were at length obliged to retreat. In this encounter the French lost about 300 men; the English loss was 150 men, among whom was Colonel Fletcher, their chief engineer. The next day after the sortie, the rain commenced falling in torrents, filling the British trenches, and saturating the earth, so that it was impossible to cut it into any regular form. For four days in succession the rain descended without intermission, and both the besieged and besiegers remained inactive. On the 24th of March, however, the atmosphere cleared up, and the British completed their investment on the right bank of the Guadiana. A fire was opened from 28 guns on the Picurina, and the British sharp-shooters kept up such an incessant fire from the trenches, that no man ventured to look over the parapet of that fort. The heavy discharges from the battery soon produced a visible effect upon the pallisades of the fort, and although the defenses were not breached, the British general determined without delay to carry it by storm. General Kempt with 500 men made the attack. On the night of the 25th, the British troop rushed to the assault, and gained the foot of the pallisades, but the French had so thoroughly repaired their defenses that an entrance was impossible. As the assaulting party hesitated and paused in this place of danger, a streaming fire from the top of the walls, cut them down on all sides. The French marksmen shot fast from the ramparts; the alarm-bells in the town rang violently, and the guns of the castle were opened in rear on the struggling masses of the assailants. Thus hemmed in by destructive fires on both sides, the British soldiers fell with fearful rapidity; but Kempt, in the midst of the tumult, was cool and courageous; he drew the troops around to that part of the fort sheltered from the fire; the reserves were quickly brought up, and sent headlong in to support the front. The shock was irresistible; the scaling-ladders were applied in an instant, and the besiegers, loudly cheering, mounted the ramparts. At the same time the axe-men discovered the gate, and hewing down the barriers, also entered the fort on the side next the town. During this assault, which lasted an hour, the British lost 350 men. No sooner did the French governor of Badajoz learn the capture of Fort Picurina, than he opened a tremendous fire upon it from every gun on the bastions which could be brought to bear, and with such effect that the lodgment effected in it was destroyed, as the troops could not remain in the work. A sally was made to recover it; but it was quickly repulsed. However, on the following night (the 27th) the British had completed their second parallel in front of Fort Picurina; enfilading and breaching batteries were erected in it; and after five days' continual firing, the sap being pushed up close to the walls, the Trinidad bastion of the castle began to crumble beneath the British balls, and soon three large chasms appeared in its walls. On the morning of the 6th of April, they were all declared practicable, and an assault was determined to be hazarded on the following day.

The plan of the attack was as follows: General Picton's division, on the right, was to file out of the trenches, to cross the Rivillas rivulet, and endeavor to scale the castle walls when the tumult at the breaches had drawn the principal attention of the enemy to the other side of the fortress. Leith's division, on the left, was to make a feint on the near Pardaleras outwork, and a real attack by escalade, on the more distant San Vincente bastion. The glacis at this point were mined; the scarp was twenty-eight feet high, and the ramparts were lined with bold and determined men. General Colville and Colonel Barnard, in the center, were to assault the breaches. The light division was to assault the bastion of Santa Maria; the fourth division that of Trinidad. All the assaulting columns were furnished with ladders and axes, and preceded by storming parties of 500 men, led by their forlorn hopes. The divisions that were to assault the breaches were nearly 10,000 strong. The French governor had chosen sixteen companies to defend the three breaches. These were arrayed behind the parapets which had been constructed on the terre pleine of the ramparts. In a retrenchment which had been formed in the rear of the menaced bastion, immediately behind the ramparts, was placed a strong battalion. A raft which was floated in the inundation which immediately adjoined the foot of the trenches, and flanked the assaulting columns, was crowded by a company of sharp-shooters. At the gate of Trinidad, another battalion was in reserve, ready to carry succor to any point which might require it. Every soldier had four loaded muskets beside him, to avoid the delay of charging them at the critical moment; shells were arranged in abundance along the parapet, to roll down on the assailants the moment they filled the ditch; heavy logs were provided to crush whole files by their descending weight, and at the summit of each breach an immense beam of wood, sunk three feet deep into the earth, at either extremity, was placed, thickly studded with sword-blades, with the sharp ends turned outward. Similar preparations, with the exception of the sword-blades, were made at the castle and the bastion of San Vincente, which was menaced by escalade; and pits dug, in considerable numbers, at the foot of the great breach, to entangle or suffocate those of the enemy who might have descended into the fosse. The French soldiers looked down from their lofty ramparts on the dark columns of the distant enemy, and waited the assault with courage and eagerness. Both armies longed for the decisive moment which was to determine this long-continued duel between the two nations. The British intended to assail the whole points at once. Ten o'clock at night was the hour assigned for the attack. A bomb, however, bursting close to the third division, destined for the assault of the castle, discovered their position, and Picton was obliged to hasten on the assault. The ramparts now strewed forth fire in every direction; the fourth and light divisions in the center of the besiegers, advanced swifty toward the breaches; while the guard in the trenches, leaping out with a loud shout, enveloped and carried the little outwork of San Roque, by which the column attacking the castle might have been enfiladed in flank. They were discovered, however, as they reached the crest of the glacis, by the accidental explosion of a bomb, and its light showed the ramparts crowded with dark figures and glittering arms, which the next instant were clouded in gloom. Silently the hay-packs were let down, the ladders placed to the counterscarp, and the forlorn hopers and storming-parties descended into the fosse. Five hundred were already down, and approaching the breaches, when a stream of fire shot upward into the heavens as if the earth had been rent asunder; instantly a crash, louder than the bursting of a volcano, was heard in the ditch, and the explosion of hundreds of shells and powder-barrels, blew the men beneath to atoms. For a moment only, the besiegers halted, then, with a shout, they leaped down into the fiery gulf. And now a scene ensued unparalleled even in the long and bloody battles of the French Revolutionary War. The British columns furiously rushed forward; the rear constantly urging on the front, and pushed down into the ditch. Many who kept too far to the right fell into the inundated part of the ditch, and were drowned. But their dead bodies filled it up and formed a bloody bridge, over which their comrades passed. Others, inclining to the left, came to the dry part, and shunned a watery death; but fell into the still more appalling terrors of fire. The besiegers had now descended into the ditch which was of very confined dimensions, with the enemy's ramparts in front and on both flanks, so that the troops, crowded together in a narrow space at the bottom, were exposed to a cross and plunging fire on every side, except their rear, where stood a ravine filled with British soldiers, whose loud cheers, and incessant, but ineffectual, fire against the parapets, rather augmented than diminished the general confusion.

The shouts of the French soldiers from the breaches and walls; the bursting of the shells; the explosion of the powder-barrels; the heavy crash of the descending logs; the continued stream of fire from the ramparts; the roaring of the guns from either flank; and the distant thunder of the British batteries, which still threw howitzers on the breaches, formed a terrible confusion of deafening sounds, which stunned the ear and confounded the senses. The brave Britons again and again rushed up to the breaches; but their attempts were all in vain; the ponderous beams, bristling with sword-blades, barred further progress; the numerous spikes set among the ruins transfixed their feet, discharges of grape and musketry within pistol-shot on either flank, tore down their ranks, and even the desperation of the rear, who strove to force forward the front, in order to make a bridge of their writhing bodies, failed in shaking the steady girdle of steel which opposed them. Some of the besiegers endeavored to make their way under it, but having forced their heads through, their brains were beaten out by the but-ends of the enemy's muskets. Notwithstanding this terrible slaughter, the besiegers remained two hours in that bloody ditch, but at length after 2,000 had fallen, they were compelled to retire. While this conflict was going on at the breaches, a struggle of a different but hardly less violent kind took place at the castle. No sooner was Picton's division discovered by the explosion of the bomb, than the whole moved forward at a steady pace, about half an hour after the fight began at the breaches. While crossing the stream of the Rivillas, in single file, they were exposed to a terrible fire from the ramparts; for the enemy brought every gun and musket to bear on the advancing mass, and the light of the discharges which spread on all sides, showed each man as clear as day. Gaining the opposite side of the stream, they rapidly formed and rushed up the rugged steep to the pallisades outside the castle wall. Kempt, who led the assault, was here cut down. Picton alone was left to conduct the column. The pallisades were soon broken through, and in ran Picton, followed by his men; but when they had arrived at the foot of the wall they were assailed by such a terrific fire, which poured down almost perpendicularly from the ramparts, that the besiegers wavered. But the loud voice of their brave leader arose above the din, calling on them to advance; and they rushed in, bearing on their shoulders the ponderous scaling-ladders, which were instantly raised against the walls. Now descended from the ramparts a terrific storm of huge logs of wood, heavy stones, shells, and hand-grenades, while the musketry, with deadly effect, was plied from above, and the bursting projectiles illuminating the whole battlements, enabled the besieged to take aim with unerring accuracy. Several of the ladders were broken by the weight of the throng which pressed upon them; and the men falling from a great height were transfixed on the bayonets of their comrades below, and died miserably. Still fresh assailants swarmed around the foot of the ladders; hundreds had died, but hundreds remained eager for the fray. But the besieged defended themselves with equal valor and obstinacy, and soon the British were obliged to recoil and take shelter under a projection of the hill. Repeatedly had the gallant troops attempted to scale the walls; but the besieged, equally brave and desperate, as repeatedly drove them back. Picton, himself, was badly wounded, and several of his officers were also severely injured. At length, however, the voice of Picton again summoned the besiegers to the attack, and he directed it a little to the right of the former assault, where the wall was somewhat lower, and an embrasure promised some facility for entrance. Here Colonel Ridge, a young officer, sprang forward and mounted the first ladder himself. He quickly ascended the rounds, holding his broadsword in guard above his head. The bayonets of his grenadiers projected from behind on either side. He reached the summit! Cranch, of the grenadiers, quickly mounted another ladder, and the two gallant officers stood side by side on the ramparts. The troops with shouts and cheers pressed up after them, and the castle was won. The French fought for every inch of ground; but at length were driven through the inner gate into the town. Here they were reinforced from the reserve, and a sharp conflict took place at the gate. During this struggle, Colonel Ridge was slain. But before succors arrived from Phillippon the English had established themselves in the castle. During these struggles at the breaches and in the castle, Walker, with his brigade, was escalading the distant bastion of San Vincente, so that the town was literally girdled with fire. The besiegers approached the counterscarp undiscovered, and immediately planting their ladders they descended into the ditch; but at that moment the moon shone out, and a heavy fire began from the walls. The Portuguese in the division instantly threw down their ladders and fled, but the British pushed on, and soon reached the foot of the rampart. Their ladders, however, were too short, for the wall was thirty feet high. No sooner had they discovered this unpleasant fact, than a mine was exploded under their feet, and a shower of logs of wood, shells, and powder-barrels, was poured upon them from the ramparts, crushing and tearing in pieces whole companies at once.

The besiegers hastily withdrew; but suddenly discovering a part of the scarp only twenty feet high, they placed three ladders against an empty embrasure, at a favorable moment, when the besieged were disordered and alarmed by the carrying of the castle. The ladders, however, were yet too short; but the besiegers bravely mounted to the top round, and assisted the first man up to the summit of the wall. He, in turn, stooped down and drew up his companions. Having mounted the embrasure, they hastened, led by their commander, to the ramparts. The French soldiers turned upon them with the utmost fury; Walker, himself among the foremost, was struck down, severely, but not mortally wounded. Strenuously fighting, the besiegers advanced toward the breaches, where the incessant roar, and awful conflagration told that the struggle was still going on. They had taken several bastions when they were alarmed by the report that a mine was about to be sprung beneath them; a panic spread throughout their ranks, and they fled back to the original one they had won; but a battalion left there, by a crushing volley arrested the pursuers, and the troops again rallying, fought their way forward toward the breaches, while another body marched toward the great square of the town. Then sounding their bugles they announced their victory to their companions, and were answered by a similar note from the castle. The breaches were soon abandoned, and the victors poured in from all quarters. Phillippon, the French governor, crossed the bridge, and took refuge in Fort Christoval, where he surrendered, at discretion, the next morning, but not till he had sent off messengers to Soult, to warn him of the great disaster, and in time to avert a greater one from himself. Thus ended the siege of Badajoz, and Wellington found himself in possession of one of the strongest fortresses on the frontier of Spain and Portugal. The French loss, out of a garrison of 5,000 men, during the siege, was 1,300 killed and wounded, and 3,800 men, including the governor, Phillippon, were made prisoners. The English lost, during the siege, 5,000 men and officers. And of these 5,000, no less than 3,500 had been struck down during the assault; an unparalleled loss, proving alike the skill and intrepidity of the defense, and the desperate valor of the attack. One hundred and seventy heavy guns, 5,000 muskets, and 80,000 shot, fell into the hands of the conquerors. The siege was of nineteen days' duration; eleven of which were with open trenches. No sooner had the British secured their victory, than the soldiers entered into a scene of riot and violence of the most disgraceful hue. Wine shops and vaults were broken open and plundered, pillage was universal, every house was ransacked for spirits and wine, and for two days the streets were crowded with throngs of drunken soldiers, who committed the most fearful barbarities upon the citizens, sparing neither sex nor age. It was not until the third day that these disgraceful scenes were ended. Wellington, incensed at the continuance of the disorders, marched two fresh divisions into the town; a gallows was erected in the great square, a few of the worst plunderers were executed, and thus order was restored.

BANGALORE, is an inland, fortified town of Mysore, in South Hindoostan. The town is enclosed with double walls; but the chief fortress, which contained the palace of Tippor Saib, is quite detached from the other, and is built in a solid manner, with a deep ditch and spacious glacis. On the 6th of March, 1791, the British troops, under Lord Cornwallis, laid siege to Bangalore, and the town was taken by storm on the 21st of March.

BAGDAD, A.D. 1559.—This famous city of Asiatic Turkey, stands on the Tigris, 196 miles, in a direct line, from the junction of that river with the Euphrates.

Bagdad has been besieged several times. In 1559 it was taken and sacked by Holakoo, grandson of Gengis Khan. It afterward underwent several changes, falling successively into the hands of the Persians and Turks. Since it was taken in 1638 by Amurath IV., however, it has remained in the possession of the Turks. Amurath IV. had twice besieged Bagdad—in 1625 and 1634; twice his generals had been compelled disgracefully to raise the siege, when the sultan, in 1638, determined to punish a city which had so roused his anger. During thirty days his artillery thundered against its ramparts. Cannon, steel, and fire, spread desolation within the walls; assault upon assault was given. The grand seignor appeared, cimiter in hand, striking down such of his own men as even advanced slowly. He killed the vizier Mahommed, who appeared to him not sufficiently eager to court danger. At length the city was carried. Thirty thousand unarmed Persians were slaughtered before the eyes of the cruel conqueror. This savage prince was about to exterminate all the inhabitants of Bagdad, when a musician threw himself at his feet, and spoke as follows: "Sublime emperor! will you permit so divine an art as that of music to perish this day with me, with Schah-Culi, your slave! Ah! preserve, by preserving me, a divine art of which I have not yet discovered all the beauties." This speech made the sultan laugh, and casting a favorable look upon the artist, he permitted him to prove his talents. Schah-Culi immediately took up a scheydor, a kind of six-stringed harp, and adapting his voice to the sounds of that instrument, he sang the tragic capture of Bagdad and the triumph of Amurath. The sultan at first appeared astonished; fury was depicted in his countenance: he fancied himself amid his warriors, animating the combatants, and leading them to victory. All at once the artist touched another chord: by plaintive and affecting sounds he subdued the heart of the implacable conqueror: the haughty sultan melted into tears; his stern heart was, for the first time, accessible to pity; he shudders at the barbarous orders he had given to immolate so many thousand victims; he revokes them and puts a stop to the carnage. Overcome by the charms of music, he restored liberty to the compatriots of Schah-Culi, attached the musician to his personal service, and loaded him with benefits. —Robson.

BALAKLAVA.—See Sebastopol.

BALKAN, A.D. 1829.—The Balkan was supposed to form almost an insurmountable barrier to an army invading Turkey; but the passage through these mountains was effected by the Russian army under Diebitsch, in spite of the most strenuous exertions of the Turks to prevent him. The march of the Russians through these mountains may be considered a memorable achievement of the Russian and Turkish war. The passage was completed on the 26th of July, 1829.

BALLINAHINCH, A.D. 1698.—Near this small town of Ireland, in Ulster county, was fought, in the month of June, 1698, a battle between the royal troops and the Irish insurgents, in which the latter were defeated.

BALTIMORE, A.D. 1814.—This city is situated on the north side of Patapsco river, fourteen miles from its entrance into Chesapeake bay, in Maryland.

The success of the British at Washington induced General Ross to undertake the capture of Baltimore. He boasted that he would make that nest of privateers his winter quarters, and with the force which he commanded, he could march through Maryland in any direction he pleased. The Americans, however, were not unprepared for an attack in this quarter. They assembled for the defense of the city a force of militia from Maryland, and the neighboring States, which, with the regular troops who had been lately engaged at Washington, amounted to 15,000 men. The command of these troops was given to General Smith, of the Maryland militia, assisted by General Winder.

On the 6th of September, 1814, the whole British fleet, consisting of more than forty sail, moved slowly up the Chesapeake, carrying a mixed, heterogeneous land force of 5,000 men. Six days after, it reached the Patapsco, and landed the troops at North Point. The first object of attack was Fort M'Henry, situated about two miles from Baltimore. The capture of this, it was thought, would open a passage to the city. Having put their forces in marching order, Generals Ross and Cochrane moved forward toward the intrenchments erected for the defense of Baltimore, while the vessels of war advanced against the fort.

After marching four miles, the leading column of the army was checked by General Stricker, who with three thousand men had taken post near the head of Bear creek. A sharp skirmish ensued, in which the two companies of Levering and Howard, under Major Heath, and Captain Aisquith's rifle company, fought gallantly. General Ross, hearing the firing, rode forward, and mingled with the skirmishers, to ascertain the cause of it, when he was pierced by the unerring ball of a rifleman, and fell in the road. His riderless horse went plunging back toward the main army, his "saddle and housings stained with blood, carrying the melancholy news of his master's fate to the astonished troops." Stretched by the road-side the dying general lay writhing in the agonies of death. He had only time to speak of his wife and children, before he expired. He was a gallant, skillful, and humane officer, and his part in the burning of Washington, must be laid to his instructions rather than to his character.

The command devolved on Colonel Brooke, who gave the order to advance. General Stricker defended his position firmly, but at length was compelled to fall back upon his reserve, and finally took post within half a mile of the intrenchments of the city. This ended the combat for the day. The next morning Colonel Brooke recommenced his march, and advanced to within two miles of the intrenchments, where he encamped till the following morning, to wait the movements of the fleet.

In the mean time, Cochrane had moved up to within two miles and a half of the fort, and forming his vessels in a semi-circle, began to bombard it. These works, under the command of Major Armstead, had no guns sufficiently heavy to reach the vessels, which all that day threw shells and rockets, making a grand commotion but doing little damage. At night, Cochrane moved his fleet further up, and opened again. The scene then became grand and terrific. It was dark and rainy, and amid the gloom, rockets and shells, weighing, some of them, two hundred and fifty pounds, rose heavenward, followed by a long train of light, and stooping over the fort burst with detonations that shook the shore. Singly, and in groups, these fiery messengers traversed the sky, lighting up the fort and surrounding scenery in a sudden glow, and then, with their sullen thunder, sinking all again in darkness. The deafening explosions broke over the American army and the city of Baltimore like heavy thunderclaps, calling forth soldiers and inhabitants to gaze on the illumined sky. The city was in a state of intense excitement. The streets were thronged with the sleepless inhabitants, and the tearful eyes and pallid cheeks of women, attested the anguish and fear that wild night created. As soon as Armstead discovered that the vessels had come within range, he opened his fire with such precision that they were compelled to withdraw again, content with their distant bombardment. At length a sudden and heavy cannonade was heard above the fort, carrying consternation into the city, for the inhabitants believed that it had fallen. It soon ceased, however. Several barges, loaded with troops, had passed the fort unobserved, and attempted to land and take it in the rear. Pulling to the shore with loud shouts, they were met by a well-directed fire from a battery, and compelled to seek shelter under their ships.

During this tremendous bombardment, Francis Key lay in a little vessel under the admiral's frigate. He had visited him for the purpose of obtaining an exchange of some prisoners of war, especially of one who was a personal friend, and was directed to remain till after the action. During the day his eye had rested eagerly on that low fortification, over which the flag of his country was flying, and he watched with the intensest anxiety the progress of each shell in its flight, rejoicing when it fell short of its aim, and filled with fear as he saw it stooping, without exploding, within those silent inclosures. At night, when darkness shut out that object of so much and intense interest, around which every hope and desire of his life seemed to cling, he still stood straining his eyes through the gloom, to catch, if he could, by the light of the blazing shells, a glimpse of his country's flag, waving proudly in the storm. The early dawn found him still a watcher, and there, to the music of bursting shells and the roar of cannon, he composed "The Star-Spangled Banner."*

In the morning, Brooke not deeming it

* The scene and the occasion which called forth this beautiful ode, have helped to make it a national one. It requires but little imagination to conceive the intense and thrilling anxiety with which a true patriot would look for the first gray streak of morning, to see if the flag of his country was still flying, while the heart involuntarily asks the question:

"O, say, can you see, by the dawn's early light,
What so proudly we hailed at the twilight's last gleaming?
Whose broad stripes and bright stars through the perilous fight,
O'er the ramparts we watched, were so gallantly streaming—
And the rocket's red glare, the bombs bursting in air, Gave proof through the night that our flag was still there.
O, say, does that star-spangled banner yet wave
O'er the land of the free and the home of the brave?

"On that shore, dimly seen through the mists of the deep,
Where the foe's haughty host in dread silence reposes,
What is that which the breeze o'er the towering steep,
As it fitfully blows, half conceals, half discloses?
Now it catches the gleam of the morning's first beam,
In full glory reflected, now shines in the stream:
'Tis the star-spangled banner: O, long may it wave O'er the land of the free and the home of the brave."—J. T. H. prudent to assail those intrenchments, manned by 10,000 brave and determined men, while the heights around bristled with artillery, resolved to retreat. Waiting till night, to take advantage of the darkness, he retraced his steps to the shipping.

From the extreme apprehensions that had oppressed it, Baltimore passed to the most extravagant joy. Beaming faces once more filled the streets, and the military bands, as they marched through, playing triumphant strains, were saluted with shouts. The officers were fêted, and exultation and confidence filled every bosom.—Headley's Second War with England.

BANNOCKBURN, A.D. 1314.—The name of this village is imperishably associated with one of the most memorable events in English history. In its immediate vicinity, on the 24th of June, 1314, was fought the great battle, between the English, under Edward II., and the Scotch, under Robert Bruce, which secured the permanent independence of Scotland, and established the family of the conqueror on its throne. The village is situated in the county of Stirling, in Scotland, on both sides of the small river Bannock, which, after a course of a few miles, falls into the Frith of Forth.

The forces of the English king were 100,000 strong. He had summoned the most warlike of his vassals from Gascony; he enlisted troops from Flanders, and other foreign countries; he invited over great numbers of the disorderly Irish, promising them an easy victory and great booty, and induced also a body of Welsh, by the same means, to join him. Then assembling all the military force of England, he marched with this mighty army to the frontiers. Robert Bruce's army was small, when compared with that of his rival. It consisted of only 30,000 men, but these men were all soldiers, inured by long service, and distinguished alike by their bravery and skill. The castle of Stirling which, with Berwick, was the only fortress in Scotland that remained in the hands of the English, had long been besieged by Edward Bruce; and Philip de Mowbray, after an obstinate defense, was at length obliged to capitulate, and to promise, that if, before a certain day, he was not relieved, he should open his gates to the enemy.

Robert Bruce, therefore, was sensible that the English would hasten to the assistance of the governor of Stirling. He posted himself at Bannockburn, about two miles from Stirling, where he had a hill on his right flank, and a morass on his left; and not content with having taken these precautions to prevent his being surrounded by the more numerous army of the English, he foresaw the superior strength of the enemy in cavalry, and made provisions against it. Having a rivulet in front, he ordered deep pits to be dug along its banks, and sharp stakes to be planted in them; and he caused the whole to be carefully covered with turf. The English arrived in sight in the evening, and a bloody conflict immediately ensued between two bodies of cavalry, where Robert, who was at the head of the Scotch, engaged in single combat with Henry de Bohun, a gentleman of the family of Hereford, and at one stroke cleft his adversary to the chin with a battle-ax, in sight of the two armies. The English horse precipitately fled to their main body. The coming of night prevented further operations; both parties awaited the approach of morning with impatience; the English, confiding in their numbers, expected an easy victory; the Scots, encouraged by their success, were equally as confident of victory on the morrow. Before sunrise, Edward drew up his army in battle array, and advanced toward the Scots. The Earl of Gloucester, his nephew, who commanded the left wing of the cavalry, impelled by the ardor of youth, rashly rushed on to the attack, and fell among the covered pits which Bruce had prepared for the reception of the enemy. This body of horse was thrown into the most complete disorder; Gloucester himself was overthrown and slain; and Sir James Douglass, who commanded the Scottish cavalry, gave the enemy no time to rally; but charging them furiously, drove them off the field with great loss, and pursued them in the very face of their whole line of infantry. The English army, alarmed and disheartened at this unfortunate beginning of the action, remained in a state of inactivity and indecision. Suddenly a large army appeared on the heights toward their left, marching toward them, apparently with the intention of surrounding them. This army, in truth, was simply a number of wagoners, and sumpter boys, whom Robert had collected; and having supplied them with military standards, they had the appearance at a distance, of a formidable body of soldiers; but the English were seized with such a panic that they threw down their arms and fled. With shouts of triumph the victorious Scots pursued the fugitives, cutting to pieces all whom they overtook. Besides an inestimable booty, the Scots took many persons of rank prisoners. Edward himself narrowly escaped by taking shelter in Dunbar, whose gates were opened to him by the Earl of March. He thence passed by sea to Berwick. The loss of the English in the battle and pursuit, is estimated at 30,000 men, including a great number of nobles and persons of distinction. The Scots lost 8,000 men.

BARANOW, A.D. 1656.—This place, situated on the Vistulan, in Austrian Gallicia, 42 miles north of Tarnow, was, in the year 1656, the scene of a battle between the Poles and the troops of Charles Gustavus of Sweden, in which the former were defeated.

BARCELONA, A.D. 801.—This Spanish city has sustained several sieges. It was subjugated by the Arabs, in the beginning of the eighth century, and was taken from them by the Catalonians, aided by Charlemagne and Ludovico Pio, in 801. In 1705, it was taken, after a long siege, by the Earl of Peterborough, who commanded the army of the Archduke Charles, competitor with Philip V., of France, the grandson of Lous XIV., in conjunction with the Prince of Darmstadt. During the course of the siege the Prince of Darmstadt was killed. It was taken by the French in 1808, who kept possession of it during the Peninsular war.

BARDIS, A.D. 1799—This town is in upper Egypt, three miles south of Gisgeh. A battle was fought here on the 6th of April, 1799, between the French and the Turks; the latter were defeated.

BARNET, A.D. 1471.—The town of Barnet crowns a hill on the line of the great north road from London, at a distance of eleven miles from that metropolis. On the 14th of April, 1471, a decisive battle took place between the armies of Edward IV. and the Earl of Warwick, on Gladsmuir heath, in the vicinity of this town. The battle began early in the morning and lasted till noon, and never did two armies fight with greater obstinacy and bravery. They fought not alone for honor; their very lives depended on the issue of the contest. The soldiers, in imitation of their leaders, rushed to the strife with a desperate bravery; and the victory long remained undecided between them. But an accident threw the balance on the side of the Yorkists. The badge of the followers of Edward was a sun; that of those of Warwick a star, with rays; and the mistiness of the morning rendering it difficult to distinguish them, the Earl of Oxford, who fought on the side of the Lancastrians, was by mistake attacked by his friends, and chased off the field of battle by his retainers. Warwick, contrary to his more usual practice, engaged that day on foot, resolved to show his army that he meant to share every fortune with them. Leading a chosen body of troops into the thickest of the slaughter, he there fell, covered with wounds, in the midst of his enemies. His brother underwent the same fate; and as Edward had issued orders not to give any quarter, a great and indiscriminate slaughter was made in the pursuit. Ten thousand of the Lancastrians were slain; while the victors lost only about 1,500 men.

BARROSA, A.D. 1811.—On the 6th of March, 1811, the allied armies of Spain and England, consisting of 16,000 men, commanded by Sir Thomas Graham, encountered the French forces, under Victor, which were about 15,000 strong, on the heights of Barrosa, about four miles from the mouth of the Santa Petri, in Spain. The battle, although very obstinate and bloody, was indecisive, and closed with the day. The English lost 1,200 men, while the French loss amounted to about 2,000 killed and wounded, and 300 taken prisoners.

BAR-SUR-AUBE, A.D. 1814.—This ancient town of France is twenty-eight miles east of Troyes, on the river Aube. A combat occurred here, on the 27th of February, 1814, between the French troops under Marshal Oudinot, and the allies, under Schwartzenberg. The French were about 17,000 strong; the allies numbered 35,000 men. After an obstinate conflict, the French were defeated, and effected their retreat with a loss of 2,500 men in killed and wounded, and 500 made prisoners. The allies lost about 2,000 in killed and wounded. Among the wounded were Count Wittgenstein, and Prince Schwartzenberg.

BASSANO, A.D. 1796.—This city is in northern Italy, nineteen miles north-east of Venice, was, on the 9th of September, 1796, the scene of an engagement between the French, under Bonaparte, and the Austrians, under Wurmser, in which the former were victorious.

On the 7th of September, Wurmser, the commander of the Austrian forces, collected all his troops at Bassano, in order to bar the passages, and throw the French army, under Massena, back into the defiles; the heavy infantry and artillery were placed on a strong position, in front of the town, and round its moldering towers, while six battalions of light troops occupied the opening of the valley into the plain. These were speedily overthrown, and the divisions of Massena and Augereau, emerging from the defiles, found themselves in the presence of a force of 20,000 men, drawn up in order of battle. But the Austrians, discouraged by repeated defeats, made but slight resistance. Massena speedily routed them on the right, and Augereau on the left; the fugitives rushed in disorder into the town, where they were followed by their opponents, who made 4,000 prisoners; and captured thirty pieces of cannon, besides nearly all the baggage, pontoons, and ammunition of the army.

BATTLE, A.D. 1351.—After the death of Sir Thomas Daggerworth, Sir Walter Bentley was appointed commander of Brittany. The English being much irritated at the death of Daggerworth, and not being able to revenge themselves on those who slew him, did so on the whole country by burning and destroying it. The Marshal de Beaumanoir, desirous of putting a stop to this, sent to Bembro, who commanded in Ploermel, for a passport to hold a conference with him. The marshal reprobated the conduct of the English, and high words passed between them, for Bembro had been the companion in arms to Daggerworth. At last one of them proposed a combat of thirty on each side; the place appointed for it was at the half-way oak between Josselin and Ploermel; and the day was fixed for the 27th of March, the fourth Sunday in Lent, 1351. Beaumanoir chose nine knights and twenty-one squires. Bembro could not find a sufficient number of English in his garrison; there were but twenty, the remainder were Germans and Bretons. Bembro first entered the field of battle and drew up his troops. Beaumanoir did the same. Each made a short harangue to his men, exhorting them to support their own honor, and that of their nation. Bembro added that there was an old prophecy of Merton, which promised victory to the English. As they were on the point of engaging, Bembro made a sign to Beaumanoir he wished to speak to him, and represented that he had engaged in this matter rather imprudently, for such combats ought first to have the permission of their respective princes. Beaumanoir replied that he had been somewhat late in discovering this; and the nobility of Brittany would not return without proving in battle who had the fairest mistresses. The signal was given for the attack. Their arms were not similar, for each was to choose such as he liked. Billefort fought with a mallet twenty-five pounds in weight, and others with what arms they chose. The advantage at first was for the English; as the Bretons had lost five of their men. Beaumanoir exhorted them not to mind this, as they stopped to take breath; when each party had had some refreshments the combat was renewed. Bembro was killed. On seeing this Croquart cried out, "Companions, don't let us think of the prophecies of Merton, but depend on our courage and arms; keep yourselves close together, be firm, and fight as I do." Beaumanoir, being wounded, was quitting the field to quench his thirst, when Geoffrey de Bois cried out, "Beaumanoir, drink thy blood, and thy thirst will go off." This made him ashamed, and he returned to the battle. The Bretons at last gained the day, by one of their party breaking on horseback, the ranks of the English; the greater part of whom were killed. Knolles, Calverly and Croquart were made prisoners. Tinteniac on the side of the Bretons, and Croquart on that of the English, obtained the praise of valor. Such was this famous battle of thirty, so glorious to the Bretons, but which decided nothing as to the possession of the duchy of Brittany.—Histoire de Britagne.

BAUTZEN, A.D. 1813.—The town from which the famous battle of Bautzen derives its name, is the capital of upper Lusatia, in Saxony, and is situated on a height, at the foot of which runs the river Spree, thirty-three miles east of Dresden.

During the early part of the month of May, 1813, the allied armies of Prussia and Russia, retired to the superb position which they had selected and fortified with care on the heights around Bautzen. Their entire army amounted to 90,000 men. Their principal stronghold was placed on the famous knolls of Klein Bautzen and Kreckwitz, where Frederic the Great found an asylum, after his disaster at Hochkirch, during the Seven Years' War, and where the strength of his position enabled him to bid defiance to the superior and victorious army of Count Daun. The ground which the allied army now occupied was an uneven surface, in the middle of a country in the hollows of which several small lakes were to be found; while its eminences terminated, for the most part, in little monticules or caves, forming so many citadels where artillery could most advantageously be placed, commanding the whole open country at their feet. The position in this uneven surface which they had chosen for their battle-field, was composed of a series of heights, running from the great frontier chain of Bohemia to the neighborhood of the little lake of Molschwitz, and the village of Klix, behind which the right was stationed in a situation difficult of access. The Spree ran along the whole front of the position, and it was difficult to approach it in that direction, as well on account of the broken nature of the ground, and the variety of ravines, with streamlets at their bottom, by which it was intersected, as of the number of villages, constituting so many forts, occupied by the allies, contained within its limits, and the hills planted with cannon, which commanded the whole open country. The principal of these villages were Klein Bautzen, Preitetz, Klix, and Krechwitz. This was the first line of defense; but behind it at the distance of three miles in the rear, was a second line, strengthened by intrenchments more contracted than the former, and still more capable of a protracted defense. This position commenced at the village of Hochkirch, on the one flank, and extended through Bautzen and the three villages of Boswitz, Inckowitz and Kubchitz, and then fell back behind the marshy stream of the Kayna, terminated at the heights of Krechwitz which overhang the Spree.

The French army consisted of 150,000 men, of whom 16,000 were cavalry, and all were under the immediate command of Napoleon. But the strength of the position of the allies, more than counterbalanced the superiority of the forces of Napoleon. At eight o'clock on the evening of the 15th of May, Napoleon advanced to the village of Klein Wilke, almost within musket-shot of the outposts of the enemy, and then his plan of attack was formed. Sometime before, he had dispatched orders to Ney, who had passed the Elbe at Torgau with his own force and that of Victor and Lauriston, to incline to the right, and, instead of moving on Berlin, as originally intended, to cut across the country and come up so as to form the extreme left of the army in the great battle which was expected near Bautzen. Ney received these orders on the 17th, and on the evening of the 19th he had already arrived in the neighborhood of the army. As Ney approached, marching in echelons, Napoleon detached Bertrand's corps toward the left, to open up the communication with him. The allies having received intelligence of the approach of this double body of the enemy, detached Kleist with his Prussians to meet Ney, and Barclay de Tolly with the Russian veterans to encounter Bertrand. De Tolly surprised Bertrand while his Italian troops were leisurely reposing after dinner, and in disorder, and after a sharp conflict, defeated him with a loss of 2,000 men. The Prussians encountered Lauriston near Weissig, but were, in turn, defeated, with a loss of about 2,000. The success was thus equally divided.

On the morning of the 20th, the allied army occupied the following positions. On the left, Berg and D'York were stationed from Jenkowitz to Barchutz with ten thousand Prussians. The plain thence to Kreckwitz was protected by the regiments of Prussian cuirassiers which were stationed at its upper extremity in the second line, and by the heights of Kreckwitz, crowned with Blucher's guns, which commanded its whole extent. Blucher's infantry 18,000 strong, extended from Kreckwitz, and further on, beyond the little lakes, Barclay de Tolly was stationed with 14,000 Russians near Gleina. Milarodowitch, with 10,000 Russians, was placed in front of the whole in Bautzen and its environs, with Kleist and 5,000 Prussians near him on the heights of Berg. The second line consisted of the Russian Guards and reserve, 16,000 strong, who were about a mile in the rear, behind the left and center; and near them were the Russian cuirassiers, 8,000 in number. Drawn up in a semicircle on the heights, the lines of the allied army stretched across the country full six miles. At their feet ran the river Spree, whose banks were dotted with the fortified villages, and before them spread out the plain thickly studded with rocky cones, whose summits were crowded with cannon, and alive with men.

On the morning of the 20th, Napoleon made his disposition for the attack at all points. Wisely judging that the right wing of the allies was the vulnerable point, he accumulated force in that direction so as to put at Ney's disposal nearly eighty thousand men. Lauriston, who commanded the army on the right, received orders to pass the Spree, and move upon Klix, and thence to press on around the right flank of the enemy toward Wurschen and Weisenberg, so as to appear in their rear when the engagement in front was hottest. On the right, the allied positions, in the mountains were to be assailed by Oudinot, near Sinkowitz; to his left Macdonald was to throw a raft over the Spree, and assault Bautzen; half a league to his left, Marmont was directed to throw another bridge over the same river, and advance to the attack in the center; the whole of the corps there were put under the direction of Soult, while the reserves and the Guards were in the rear, on the great roads leading to Bischoffswerda, behind Bautzen, ready to succor any point that might require assistance. At nine o'clock in the morning, Napoleon was on horseback; but such was the distance which the greater part of the columns had to march, before they reached their destined point of attack, that it was nearly eleven o'clock before the passage of the Spree commenced. A powerful array of cannon was, in the first instance, brought up by the emperor, and disposed along every projection which commanded the opposite bank, and the fire, as far as the eye could reach, looking from the heights near Bautzen, both to the right and left, grew hot and furious; for the enemy's batteries answered with great spirit, and the vast extent of the line of smoke, as well as the faint sound of the distant guns, gave an awful impression of the magnitude of the forces engaged on both sides. Under cover of this cannonade, the bridges in the center were soon established, and then a still more animating spectacle presented itself. The emperor mounted a commanding eminence, on the banks of the Spree, near the point where Marmont's bridge was established, whence he could see the whole field of battle, direct the movements of the troops, and enjoy the splendid spectacle which presented itself. Never had war appeared in a more imposing form. The plain, as far as the eye could reach, was one mass of moving men.

On all sides the troops, in long glittering lines, preceded by their artillery, which continually vomited forth flames and smoke, advanced toward the river. At first the plain seemed covered with a confused multitude of horses, cannon, chariots and men; but as they approached, the throng gradually assumed the appearance of order. Like an experienced chess-player, Napoleon stood watching the movements of his army on the plain, which extended out beneath him like an immense chess-board, and his eye kindled with satisfaction and pride, as he saw the cavalry, infantry, and artillery, separate and defile each to their respective points of passage, and the marvels of military precision appear in their highest luster. The passage of the river was effected with scarcely any opposition, and by five o'clock the river was passed at all points. The allies evacuated Bautzen, and the French troops rapidly moved toward the eminences occupied by the enemy; but it was now so late that no serious conflict could take place till next day. On the French right, however, the action soon became hot and bloody. Oudinot pressed vigorously up the Bohemian mountains, and fiercely fell on the left wing of the allies. Slowly creeping up the hills, in a line of flame, the incessant fire of his artillery consumed every thing before it. The woods resounded with the roar of his cannon, while the echoes from the Bohemian mountains rolled back upon him. Tempests of contending grape-shot crashed through the trees, and the vivid and incessant discharges of musketry gleamed through the shadows of the woods, now darkened by approaching night. Upward, upward, mounted that sheet of destructive fire, while far above blazed an equally as destructive line of flame. Fire seemed to fight fire. The French line was rapidly approaching the enemy, threatening to overwhelm the entire left wing of the allied army, when Prince Wirtemberg and St. Priest's divisions of Milarodowitch, corps, arrived to its aid, and for a time arrested the progress of the ascending flame. The French troops, however, redoubling their exertions again advanced, and the enemy began to fall back. At this critical moment, the Emperor Alexander, who commanded the Russians in person, re-inforced them by three brigades of infantry, and one of cavalry, under General Diebitch, and with their aid the Russians were able to maintain themselves for the night in the villages of Prelitz, Mehlthener and Falkenberg, still keeping the commanding points of the mountains. While this obstinate conflict was going on among the hills, on the allied left, a still more serious attack was made on Kleist's Prussians on the heights of Burg, and the remainder of Milarodowitch's corps, commanded by himself in person, on the eminences in the rear of Bautzen, to which the Russians had retired after the evacuation of that town. At noon, General Milarodowitch was violently assailed by Campan's division, followed by the whole of Marmont's corps, while Bonnet advanced toward Nieder Kayna, and commenced an attack on Kleist. The resistance, however, was as obstinate as the attack; and Napoleon deeming it essential to his plan to make a great impression in that quarter, in order to withdraw attention from the grand movement he was preparing on his left, brought forward the whole of Bertrand's corps, still about 24,000 strong, notwithstanding its losses, with Latour Mauborg's formidable cuirassiers, to support Marmont and Macdonald. About 50,000 combatants were thus accumulated in the center, supported by a powerful artillery; and the allies were compelled to retire. This was done, however, in good order; the troops halting and facing about, by alternate companies, to fire, as they slowly withdrew toward the intrenched camp, their artillery keeping up an incessant fire on the pursuing columns. The French center, meanwhile, steadily advanced, and, as soon as they reached it, assaulted Kleist's troops on the heights of Burg with great gallantry. Despite all their efforts, however, the brave Prussians maintained their ground with undaunted resolution. Seeing that they could not carry the position by an attack in front, the assailants attacked the village of Nieder Gurkan on its right, in order to threaten it in flank. There, however, they experienced such a vigorous resistance, from Rudiger's men of Blucher's corps, some regiments of which had been detached, under Ziethen, to occupy that important post, and the fire from Blucher's guns, on his commanding heights, immediately behind, was so violent that, after sustaining heavy losses, they were obliged to desist from the attempt. At length, at seven o'clock in the evening, bringing up the celebrated 10th regiment of light infantry, the French carried the village. The whole allied center now slowly retreated over the plateau of Nadelwitz to their intrenched camp in their rear. Blucher, however, still retained his advanced positions on the heights of Kreckwitz, from the summit of which his artillery never ceased to thunder, as from a fiery volcano, in all directions, till utter darkness drew a vail over the field of battle. That night the French bivouacked in squares on the bloody ground they had won. The allied army also sunk to rest, and nothing disturbed the silence of night save the low moans of the wounded soldiers who were lying scattered over the plain. The stars shone tranquilly upon the gory field, and the flames of the burning villages gleamed in the distance, casting a flickering and sickening light upon the white faces of the slain.

At five o'clock on the morning of the 21st, the fire began with unwearied vigor in the wooded recesses of the Bohemian mountains. But the Emperor Alexander had sent such large reinforcements during the night to that quarter, that Milarodowitch was enabled to repulse the attacks of the French on his position on the heights of Meltherer. Napoleon, perceiving the superiority of the enemy in numbers in that quarter, immediately ordered up Macdonald's corps to the support of Oudinot. At the same time, immense masses, above 40,000 strong, were deployed in front of Bautzen, to arrest the attention of the enemy. Before Macdonald, however, could get up to his assistance, Oudinot was so hard pressed by the enemy that he was unable to maintain his ground: step by step, the Russian tiralleurs gained upon the Bavarian sharp-shooters in the woods, and at length he was fairly driven out of the hills and forced to assume a defensive position in the plain at their feet, where the arrival of Macdonald enabled him to stop the progress of the enemy.

In the mean time, Marmont and Bertrand's battalions thundered in the center, and the battle raged furiously along the whole lines. Napoleon anxiously listened for the sound of Ney's guns on the left. He felt assured that ere long that gallant marshal would turn the right wing of the enemy's army. In effect, Ney, at the head of his own corps and those of Lauriston, had advanced early in the morning against the position of Barclay, near Gleina, while Victor's corps, and Regnier's Saxons were directed, by a wider circuit, to turn his extreme right, by the wood and heights of Baruth, and get entirely into the rear of the allies. Barclay's veterans were advantageously placed on the heights of Windmuhlenberg, near Gleina; and the strength of their position, joined to the admirable fire of the artillery on its summit, long enabled those iron veterans of the Moscow campaign to make head against the French. At length, however, the approach of Regnier and Victor's corps turned the position in flank, and Barclay was obliged to fall back, fighting all the way, to the heights of Baruth. Here Kleist was detatched to his support; but his corps, reduced to little more than 3,000 men by the losses of the preceding day, could not restore the action in that quarter; and at eleven o'clock, Southan, with the leading divisions of Ney and Lauriston's corps, made himself master of Prelitz, near Klein Bautz n, behind Blucher's right, and between him and Barclay. Napoleon was lying on the ground in the center, under the shelter of a height, a little in front of Bautzen, at breakfast, when the sound of Ney's guns in that direction was heard. At the same time a bomb burst over his head. Without paying any attention to the latter circumstance, he immediately wrote to Marie Louise, to announce that the victory was gained; and, instantly mounting his horse, set off at a gallop with his staff, to the left, and ascending a height near Neider Kayna, whence he could descry the whole field of battle, in the center, directed Soult, with the four corps under his orders, to assault with the bayonet the numerous conical knolls crowned with artillery, which formed the strength of the allies in that quarter, in order to distract their attention, and prevent them from sending succors to Blucher, on their right. Blucher was fully alive to the importance of the village of Prelitz, and immediately made a great effort to regain it. Kleist was detached with the remains of his corps, and several Russian regiments of infantry, with two regiments of Prussian cuirassiers, were sent in the same direction. The arrival of these fresh troops, who vied with each other in the ardor of their attack, enabled the allies to drive out Southan, who was routed with great slaughter, and thrown back on the remainder of his corps in a state of utter confusion; while twenty of Blucher's guns playing on the flank of Ney's dense columns, did dreadful execution, and caused him to establish himself on some heights behind Klein Bautzen, whence his artillery could reply on equal terms to that of the enemy. At one o'clock, however, Ney again resumed the offensive, and succeeded in completely turning the right wing of the enemy. Napoleon, in the mean time, made a combined attack on the center and left of the enemy. Eighty thousand men, in admirable order, moved against the heights of Krechwitz, the guns from which had so long carried death through the French ranks. A hundred pieces of cannon, which the French disposed on the highest points of the ground they traversed, kept up a vehement fire on the enemy's batteries. This grand attack gave the victory to Napoleon. Blucher, assailed in front by Marmont, in flank by Bertrand, and in rear by Ney, was soon obliged to recall Kleist and the other reinforcements which he had sent to the assistance of Barclay de Tolly; and, in consequence, Ney, whose reserves had at length come up, was enabled, not only to take Prelitz without difficulty, but to spread out his light troops over the whole level ground as far as Warschen. The allied right was thus entirely turned. And now the allied army was forced to retreat. Orders were at once given to both Barclay and Blucher to retreat, and the whole army, in two massy columns, began to retreat, the Russians by the road of Hochkirch and Lobau, the Prussians by Wurschen and Weissenberg. Napoleon, standing on a commanding eminence, surveyed the battle-field, which now presented a spectacle more thrilling and magnificent than that he had viewed the day before. How great must have been the pride of the conqueror when he viewed and directed the motions of the host which his voice alone had called together. He ordered his troops to advance, and, like a mighty wave, the whole French army swept across the plain. Before it, retreated the allied army in two black columns, around whose extremities hovered clouds of cavalry, in protection. Onward poured the French army into the valley of the Neider Kayna, and the beams of the setting sun gilded the forests of bayonets, and were reflected in the dazzling lines of helmets, sabers, and cuirasses with which the plain at the bottom of the valley was filled. From the heights of Krechwitz, yet in the hands of the enemy, poured forth a constantly-increasing fire on all sides. A hundred and twenty cannon in front of the advancing French army, continually thundered against the retreating columns. Night alone put an end to this tremendous cannonade, and the two armies lay down to rest.

This night the slain of the previous day received new companions; many, who in the morning had gazed with sorrow upon the corpses of beloved comrades were now stretched upon the same bloody bed of death. During the two days the allies lost 15,000 men, killed and wounded, and the French took 1,500 prisoners. The French lost about the same number. As night advanced, men, women, and children were to be seen issuing forth from the villages, carrying litters, pushing wheelbarrows, or drawing little carts. They hastened to the field of battle; not to plunder the dead, but to rescue the wounded. Russians, French, Prussians, and Italians, were all alike carefully attended and provided with all the comforts and necessaries which the humble cottages of the kind-hearted peasantry could afford. What a sublime spectacle! At the close of one of the bloodiest battles of modern times, Christian charity was to be seen healing the wounds and alleviating the sufferings equally of the victors and the vanquished. The next morning at daybreak Napoleon renewed the pursuit. Soon the French army came up with the rear guard of the enemy, who now stood firm on the heights behind Reichenbach, in order to gain time for the immense files of chariots, cannon, and wounded men to defile by the roads in their rear. Milarodowitch had the command, and the veterans of the Moscow campaign were prepared to defend the position to the last extremity, while forty pieces of cannon were placed on the summit, and a large body of cuirassiers stood on the slopes. The position was admirable. Napoleon caused a furious cannonade to be opened against it, and awaited the arrival of the cavalry of the Guard. The French, after a desperate struggle, carried Reichenbach itself, which was in front of the allied position. But no sooner did the French column show themselves on the opposite side, than they were torn by the point-blank discharge of the enemy's batteries from the heights behind. Upon this, Napoleon brought up Latour Mauborg, with the whole cavalry of the Guard, 6,000 strong, and at the same time made dispositions for outflanking and turning the enemy. These measures were attended with the most brilliant success; the allies were driven from their position, and retreated to Gorlatz. Napoleon hastened to the advanced posts, and himself pressed on the movements of his troops. And so promptly were his orders obeyed, that the setting sun shone on the sabers and bayonets of 50,000 men accumulated in a front of a mile and a half in breadth, and closely advancing in pursuit. The enemy, as they retreated, poured upon the advancing line an incessant fire of cannon and musketry. As the balls were flying thick around him, one of Napoleon's escort fell dead at his feet. He turned to Duroc, and said: "Duroc, fortune is determined to have one of us to-day." The melancholy anticipation was soon realized. The enemy retired to a fresh position behind the ravine of Makersdorf; and Napoleon, who was anxious to push on before night to Gorlatz, himself hurried to the front to urge on the troops who were to dislodge the enemy from the ground which they had occupied to bar the approach to it. His suite followed him, four abreast, at a rapid trot, in such a cloud of dust that hardly one of the riders could see his neighbor. Suddenly a cannon-ball glanced from a tree near the emperor, and struck a file behind, consisting of Duroc, Caulaincourt, Kirgener, and Mortier. In the confusion and dust, it was not at first perceived who was hurt; but a page soon came up and whispered in Napoleon's ear that Kirgener, was killed and Duroc severely wounded. Duroc's entrails were torn out by the ball, and the dying man was carried into a cottage near Makersdorf. Napoleon dismounted, and casting a stern and long glance on the battery whence the fatal shot had issued, he entered the cottage, and ascertained with tears in his eyes, that there was no hope. "Duroc," said he, pressing the hand of the dying hero, "there is another world, where we shall meet again." The next morning, a little before sunrise, Duroc died. When Napoleon received the sorrowful intelligence, without uttering a word, he placed into the hands of Berthier a paper, ordering the erection of a monument on the spot where he fell, with this inscription: "Here, General Duroc, Duke of Friuli, grand marshal of the palace of the Emperor Napoleon, gloriously fell, struck by a cannon-ball, in the arms of the emperor, his friend." He placed two hundred Napoleons in the hands of the owner of the house, and the clergyman of the parish, to defray the expenses.*

On the 23d, the allied army continued to retreat, in two columns, and the French in three columns pressed on in pursuit. During the retreat and pursuit sharp conflicts frequently took place between the cavalry on both sides. At length, on the 27th of May, the allied army returned by Leignitz, to the neighborhood of Schweidnitz, where they had constructed an intrenched camp, and where it was intended that a strand should be made. The progress of the French arms, as well as the position of their forces, excited just disquietude in the breasts of the allied sovereigns, and measures were at once taken to arrange an armistice with Napoleon.

BAYONNE, A.D. 1813.—At the confluence of the river Neve with the Adom, stands Bayonne, one of the most noted towns of France. Bayonne is divided into three equal parts, which communicate by bridges. On the left bank of the Neve is the great Bayonne. On the right bank of that river and the left bank of the Adom is the little Bayonne, and on the right bank of the Adom is the suburb of St. Esprit, joined by a long wooden draw-bridge to the rest of the town. Although often besieged, Bayonne has never been taken; hence it derives its motto: Nunquam polluta. The military weapon called the bayonet, takes its name from this city, where it is said to have been first invented, and brought into use during the siege of 1523.

On the 11th of November, 1813, the French army retired before the victorious armies of England, Spain, and Portugal, to the intrenched camp in front of Bayonne. The intrenchments extended semicircularly on the south side of the Adom, above and below the junction of the river Neve. While Wellington remained with his army on the side of the Neve toward the Pyrenees, supplies of all kinds were brought down the Adom to Bayonne; and as the intrenched camp of the French was uncommonly strong, the British general could not expect to drive the enemy from it by main force; it therefore became necessary to cross the Neve in order to intercept the supplies that were brought down the Adom to Bayonne. The army of the British commander consisted of 88,600 men, of whom 8,600 were cavalry, and his powerful artillery numbered 100 pieces. The French army consisted of 76,000 men, and was commanded by the able general, Marshal Soult. Soult's position was most admirable. Bayonne, situated at the confluence of the rivers Adom and Neve, commanded the passage of both. The camp being defended by the guns of the fortress of Bayonne, immediately in its rear, could not be attacked in front. The French general, therefore, stationed only his center there, composed of six divisions under D'Erlon. The right wing, consisting of Reille's two divisions, and Villatte's reserves, was stationed to the westward of the fortress, on the Lower Adom, where there was a flotilla of gun-boats; and the approach to it was covered by a swamp and artificial inundation. The left wing, under Clausel, posted to the westward of Bayonne, stretched from its right to the Neve, and was protected partly by a large fortified house, which had been converted into an advanced work. The country in front consisted of a deep clay, much inclosed and intersected with woods and hedge-rows, and four divisions of D'Erlon's men occupied it beyond the Neve, in front of the Ustaritz, and as far as Cambo; the remainder being in reserve, occupying a strong range of heights in front of Mousserolles, stretching from Villefranque, on the Neve, almost to the Old Moguerre, on the Adom. The great advantage of this position was, that the troops, in case of disaster, might securely find refuge under the cannon of Bayonne, while the general-in-chief, having an interior and protected line of communication through that fortress, could, at pleasure, throw the weight of his forces from one flank to another, when unforeseen and unguarded against, upon the enemy. Wellington, having taken his resolution to force his adversary's position in front of Bayonne, collected materials for throwing bridges over the Neve, and, on the 8th of December, he gave orders for the right wing of his army, under General Hill, to pass the river at day break on the 9th, by the fords of Cambo, and advance by the great road from St. Pied-de-port, toward Bayonne. At the same time Beresford, in the center, with the third and sixth divisions was to cross the Neve, by bridges to be thrown over it during the night. Sir John Hope, and General Charles Allen, with 24,000 men, horse and foot, and 12 pieces of cannon, were to drive back the French advanced posts, along the whole front of the intrenched camp, from the Nivelle to the sea.

* But the monument was never erected, for after the defeats, which soon followed, the allies claimed this money as a part of the spoils of war. For the paltry sum of eight hundred dollars, they could prevent a monument from being raised to genius and true worth, and insult a noble heart by denying it this last tribute of affection to a dear friend. What a contrast does this present to Marshal Soult at Corunna, who ordered a monument to be reared to Sir John Moore, on the spot where he fell.—J. T. Headley.

The necessary preparations having been made, a huge fire was lighted on the height behind Cambo, at daybreak, on the 9th of December, as a signal of attack. Notwithstanding the destruction of the bridges during the night, the British troops forced the passage of the Neye in the center, under cover of a heavy fire of artillery, and the French immediately opposite were driven back. At the same time, Hill forced the passage on the right, above and below Cambo, and drove the French left wing back on the road from St. Jean Pied-de-port to Bayonne.

In consequence of Wellington's having succeeded in crossing the Neve, he nearly inclosed the French camp. He commanded the navigation of the Adom, and always had it in his power to throw detachments across the river above the city, either to intercept convoys, or even to bombard the town, or to storm the works to the north of Bayonne. Soult saw that he could not safely remain in his intrenched camp, after the passage of the Neve by the British, and he resolved to attempt to drive back the allies to their original position. For this purpose he assembled his troops in great force on a range of heights that run parallel with the Adom, keeping the village of Villefranque on their right. This village, Wellington ordered to be attacked, and, after an obstinate struggle, it was carried by a Portuguese brigade, and the British light infantry battalions of the sixth division. No sooner had they gained possession of the village, than they proceeded to the attack of the heights, which they also carried. Neither of these advantages was obtained without great difficulty. The French furiously contested every inch of ground, and it was not until overpowered by numbers, that shortly after noon, they slowly retired through a heavy rain, toward Bayonne. Soult now determined to make a grand effort to drive back the enemy. On the morning of the 10th, he moved out of his intrenched camp with his whole army, with the exception of that division which was opposite Sir Rowland Hill, and made a most desperate attack on the posts of the light division, and on the advanced posts of Sir John Hope's corps, on the high road from Bayonne to St. Jean de Luz. The brunt of this attack fell principally on the first Portuguese brigade, and on a brigade of the fifth division which advanced to their support; but in spite of the most strenuous efforts on the part of the French, they were repulsed, with considerable loss. After this action was over, two regiments, one Dutch and the other German, abandoned the French, and came over to the British. The French, although repulsed, still continued in considerable force in front of the British posts, on the ground from which they had driven the pickets. In the course of the night, however, most of them retired, except those who occupied the ridge on which the pickets of the light division had stood. But though they had changed their position, they were still in front of the left of the British army.

On the 12th nothing but a severe cannonade, which consumed fruitlessly four hundred men on each side, took place. During the night, Soult marched 35,000 men through Bayonne, and succeeded, before daylight on the 13th, in placing them on the right of the Neve at St. Pierre, in front of the British General Hill's position, while with seven thousand more he menaced his rear. Hill's force was stationed on both sides of the road, from Bayonne to St. Pied-de-port, and occupied a line about two miles in length. The center consisted of Ashworth's Portuguese and Barnes's British brigade, and was strongly posted on a rugged conical height, one side of which was broken with rocks and brushwood, while the other was closed in by high and thick hedges, with twelve guns pointing directly down the great road by which the French were to advance. The left, under Pringle, occupied a wooded and broken ridge, in the middle of which was the old chateau of Villefranque; the right, under Byng, was posted on the ridge of Old Moguerre, nearly parallel to the Adom. Between the two armies was a wide valley or basin, open, and commanded by the guns in every part. As the bridge of boats across the Neve was destroyed, Hill's corps was, during the early part of the action, entirely separated from the remainder of the allied army. On the morning of the 13th, a heavy fog settled on the plain, and Soult, under cover of the mist, was enabled to form his columns of attack unperceived by his antagonist. In front, on the great road, came D'Erlon, leading on D'Armagnac's, Abbe's, and Daricaus's infantry, with a large body of cavalry, and twenty-two guns. Next came Foy's and Maransin's men, and behind, the two other divisions in reserve. At half-past eight o'clock the sun broke forth, and the formidable array of the approaching enemy became visible to the allies. Soult immediately pushed forward his light troops, and drove in the allied pickets in the center, which fell back toward St. Pierre. Abbe attacked them in the center with great vigor; D'Armagnac, standing off to the left, directed his troops against Old Moguerre, and Byng's men; the flaming line gradually crept up the slopes on either side of the basin, and the roar of forty guns re-echoed over the plain. The Portuguese brigade soon gave way before the impetuous attack of Abbe's men, and the British, who were sent to their aid, were also forced back. But receiving additional aid, the French, in their turn, were repulsed. The French now opened a vigorous cannonade upon the British center, with terrible effect. Abbe, seeing the center of the enemy weakened, pushed forward a strong and massy column, which advanced with such gallantry, that in spite of the tremendous volleys from the British batteries, which tore its front and flanks, it drove back the Portuguese and British, and won the crest of the hill in the center. Barnes now brought up his Highlanders, who were in reserve behind St. Pierre, and determined to regain the hill, he charged down the highway, soon clearing away the skirmishers on either side, and, driving home, met the shock of two French regiments, which were advancing up the causeway. The struggle which ensued was terrible; but, at length, the French wavered, broke and fled in disorder, closely followed by the hardy mountaineers. Soult immediately advanced his guns on either side, and opened a destructive fire upon the flanks of the pursuing mass. The Highlanders were arrested in their pursuit, and in turn retreated in disorder. The French corps in front steadily advanced forward, with admirable resolution, and the 92d British regiment, were borne back, in disorder, to their old ground, behind St. Pierre. The Portuguese hastily withdrew their guns, and took up a post in the rear. The French skirmishers every where crowded forward to the summit. Barnes fell, seriously wounded. The French directed their fire upon the Portuguese gunners with such fatal accuracy, that they fell so fast beside their pieces that their fire was almost extinguished. The British were driven back in every quarter, and the cries of victory resounded through the French ranks.

Hill, who had stationed himself on a hill in the rear, whence he could survey the whole battle field, saw the critical position of the right and left, and hastily descending from the eminence, he led on, in person, one brigade of Le Cor's Portuguese infantry, to support Barnes's men in the center, and dispatched the other brigade to aid the right on Old Moguerre, against D'Armagnac. The Highlanders re-formed, and Cameron, then commander, again led them with colors flying, and music playing, down the road. The skirmishers on the flank again rushed forward. The French skirmishing parties in front were driven back in their turn, and the Highlanders, charging rapidly down the highway, met the solid column of French infantry, which, in all the pride of victory, was marching up. For a moment the two masses stood firm, with fixed bayonets; the soldiers on either side eyed their enemies with resolute bravery; but the French suddenly wheeled about and retired to their original position. The Highlanders were too much exhausted with fatigue, by their desperate encounter, to follow them. The right center of the French was also forced back by Le Cor's Portuguese, after a desperate conflict, in which Le Cor himself fell seriously wounded. In the mean time D'Armagnac's corps on the French left, with the aid of six pieces of horse artillery, had attacked Byng's men with such vigor that he had nearly carried the ridge of Old Moguerre. But at the very moment when the French troops had reached the summit of the hill, and when about to fall upon the right of the British center, the brigade of Portuguese, detached by Hill, arrived in double quick time, and ascending the reverse slope of the ridge, under a raking fire from the French guns, now established on the summit, and uniting with the former defenders of the ridge, charged up the hill, with loud shouts, and after a sharp conflict won the top. The French in turn were driven back from the heights at all points, and were obliged to fall back to their original position on the other side of the basin. Here they were attacked by the other divisions of the allied army, which had crossed the re-constructed bridge. And now the battle raged with the utmost fury. Wellington commanded his army in person, and urged forward his men in all quarters of the field. The French, dismayed at the overwhelming force of the enemy, fought with the courage of despair; but slowly recoiling before the British, they fell back to the ground they had occupied before the commencement of the action. The battle now died away, the discharges of musketry gradually ceased on either side, and the sound of distant cannon became less frequent. At length, despairing of success, Soult withdrew his troops into the intrenched camp in front of Bayonne, and the battle was at an end. During this bloody battle, 6,000 men were killed or wounded. The loss on both sides was nearly equal. The British generals Hope, Robinson, Barnes, Le Cor, and Ashworth, were severely wounded. After the bloody operations of Wellington and Soult near Bayonne, a considerable rest was allowed to both armies. Wellington fixed his winter quarters at St. Jean de Luz, and Soult remained in his intrenched camp near the town. It was not until the middle of February, 1814, that the British general re-commenced active hostilities against the French. Soult's army had been materially reduced during the two months of idleness by large draughts which Napoleon had been compelled to make from the army at the south. Soult's force now barely amounted to 40,000 men. Wellington on the contrary had greatly increased the number of his army. He had received reinforcements from England, Spain, and Portugal, until his whole army swelled to the immense number of 100,000 men, and a hundred pieces of cannon. The Anglo-Portuguese army alone amounted to 70,000 men, of whom 10,000 were cavalry, and the Spaniards were 30,000 more. Soult's army, therefore, was less than one half the number of that of his antagonist, yet he occupied a most advantageous position. His right wing was protected by the now powerful and fully armed fortress of Bayonne. Deeming his right sufficiently secured by the fortress, Soult, during the month of January, draughted off the bulk of his forces to his left, in the mountains toward St. Jean de Pied-de-port, and there strengthened his position by field-works. On the 14th of March, Wellington put his army in motion. Hill marched with 22,000 men against Harispe, who lay at Hellette with 5,000 men, while another column marched against the enemy's pickets on the Joyeuse streamlet. The French made a most obstinate resistance, but, overwhelmed with numbers, they were forced back to St. Martin, and the fortress of St. Jean de Pied-de-port was immediately invested by Mina's battalions. At the same time the allied center, under Beresford, advanced against the French center, under Clauzel, who, in obedience to his orders, fell back successively across the Joyeuse, the Bidouse, and the Gaue de Mauleon, behind which the French finally took up a position. In the mean time Harispe, who had taken up a strong position on the Garris mountain, was assaulted by the 28th and 30th British regiments, who, after losing 160 men, gained the hill. The French lost 300 killed and wounded, and 200 prisoners. On the 17th the French on the left were driven across the Gaue de Mauleon, and in the night retired across the Gaue de Oleon, and took up a strong position near Launeterre. Hill pushed forward his advanced post, and was next morning on that river, but as the bridges were all broken down it could not be passed until the pontoon-train arrived. Soult now concentrated his forces on the ridge of Launeterre on his left, to defend the passage of the Gaue de Oleon.

On the evening of the 23d, the pontoons arrived, and the allied army immediately made preparations to force the passage of the river. On the morning of the 24th, Hill effected his passage at the head of three divisions, while Beresford, passed near Monfort with the whole center. Soult, not deeming the position of Launeterre tenable against the superior forces which by these movements threatened its front, drew back his whole force, leaving Bayonne, garrisoned by 6,000 men, to its own resources, and took post a little way further back at Orthes, behind the Gaue de Pau. On the 26th and the following day, the British army having passed the Gaue de Pau, found the enemy in a strong position near Orthes, with his right on the heights along the high-road to Dax, and occupying the village of St. Baes. Beresford, after, an obstinate resistance, carried the village of St. Baes; the victors, pursuing the beaten columns of the enemy, began to move along the narrow elevated ridge which extended from the village to the center of the French army, where they were arrested. The French troops, slowly retiring, kept up an incessant and rolling fire upon the pursuers; while Reille's batteries skillfully planted against them, committed such fearful havoc upon their ranks, that they were obliged to turn back. At the same time a detachment which Picton sent forward to endeavor to gain a footing on a tongue of land jutting out from the lofty ridge on which the enemy's center was posted, was repulsed with loss. Shouts of joy now rang through the ranks of the French. Both extremities of their line were victorious, and Soult hoped for final victory. But now Wellington ordered a simultaneous attack on the right of the center of the French line, and the left of their right wing. Three divisions, under Generals Picton and Clinton, and Lieutenant-colonel Colburn, advanced against the enemy at the point designated. The strife was brief and bloody. Borne back by the superior numbers of the enemy, the French abandoned that important part of their position. Meanwhile Hill, having forced the passage of the Gaue above Orthes, moved forward upon the left of the enemy, who retired in good order. Soult now ordered a general retreat, and the French troops with admirable discipline retired in the finest array, the rear guard constantly facing about, and obstinately resisting whenever the intervention of a ridge afforded a favorable opportunity for making a stand. The victorious army eagerly pursued, and as soon as the French had gained the level plain, which was utterly void of rock or bush, they closed with them so rapidly, and poured such constant and deadly volleys of musketry and cannon upon the fugitives, that the French troops fell into confusion and the field was covered with scattered bands. The pursuit was continued till dark; the French suffered severely; the whole country was covered with their dead, and the victors took six pieces of cannon and a great number of prisoners. At length the scattered bands, after crossing the stream of the Luy de Beam, five miles from the field of battle, reassembled on the opposite bank, with that readiness for which the French troops have ever been distinguished; and the wearied British soldiers formed their bivouacs on the southern shore of the same stream. The French lost on this occasion 3,900 killed and wounded, and prisoners on the field; the British lost 2,300.*

During these operations on the right of the army, Sir John Hope availed himself of an opportunity which offered itself on the 23d to cross the Adom below Bayonne, by means of rafts made of pontoons, and to take possession of the river at its mouth. The vessels destined to form the bridge could not arrive till the 24th, when they were safely brought into the river. The citadel of Bayonne was invested on the 25th; and on the 26th, the bridge being completed, Sir John Hope attacked and carried the village of St. Etienne, and established his posts within 900 yards of the outworks of Bayonne. Hope now exerted himself with the utmost zeal and diligence to forward the siege of Bayonne. On the 7th of April, the works were in such a state of forwardness that he was ready to attack the citadel, when rumors of the overthrow of Napoleon, and the restoration of the Bourbons reached him. Having afterward received official intelligence that peace had been restored, he forwarded the papers to Thouvenot the governor of the fortress of Bayonne, who returned for answer, "that you shall hear from me on the subject before long." He had determined upon a brilliant exploit which he hoped would terminate the siege. On the morning of the 14th of April, the French commencing with a false attack on the left of the Adom, as a blind, suddenly poured out of the citadel to the number of 3,000 men. They broke through the line of pickets, and with loud shouts they rushed into St. Etienne, and drove the enemy out of every quarter of that village, except one house, which was occupied by a picket, commanded by Captain Forster, which maintained its ground till General Hinuber came up with some of the German legion. A battalion of Portuguese arrived also, and after a tremendous struggle at the point of the bayonet, the village was retaken, and the French driven back toward the works. Meanwhile the guns of the citadel, guided by the flashes of musketry, fired incessantly on the scene of combat; the British gun-boats, which had dropped down the stream, opened upon the flanks of the fighting columns, without being able to distinguish friend from foe; and amid the incessant clang of small arms, and alternate cheers of the combatants, the booming of a hundred guns added to the horror of this awful nocturnal combat. On the right the conflict was still more terrible. The French rushing with the fury of rage and hate upon the pickets and reserves, broke through; and the troops, broken into small bodies by the inclosures, fought in the darkness, bayonet to bayonet, sword to sword, and man to man, with desperation and bravery. Hand to hand, unable scarcely to see their antagonists, the soldiers fought with the ferocity of beasts. Sir John Hope spurring his horse to the front, was met by a point-blank discharge from the French, and fell severely wounded. He was immediately captured by the enemy, who hastily conveyed him into their works. At day-break the French troops retired within their walls. In this melancholy battle, fought after the peace had been concluded, 2,000 gallant men were slain, or cruelly wounded. The loss on both sides was equal.

BAZA, A.D. 1489.—This Spanish city was, in the year 1489, taken from the Moors by the Spaniards, after a siege of nearly seven months. In the year 1810, a battle was fought near Baza, between the Spaniards, under Generals Blake and Freire, and the French, under Marshal Soult. The Spaniards were defeated with great loss.

BEAUVAIS, A.D. 1472.—Beauvais is situated at the confluence of the river Avelon with the Thérian, in France.

Charles the Bold, Duke of Burgundy, in 1472, was engaged in an inveterate war with Louis XI. Learning there was but a weak garrison in Beauvais, he marched toward that city, with the expectation of entering it without opposition; and so it proved with the faubourgs, and the Burgundians thought themselves masters of the place; but the citizens, the moment they were aware of their danger, closed their gates, and took their posts on the walls like men. Not only these: the women and maidens insisted upon taking part in this honorable defense. Led by Joan Hachette, they ranged themselves on the parts of the walls the least protected; and one of these heroines even obtained an enemy's standard, and bore it in triumph into the city. The principal attack of the besiegers was directed against the gate of Bresle: the cannon had already beaten it in; the breach was open, and the city would have been taken, if the inhabitants had not heaped together on the spot an immense mass of fagots and combustible matters. The flames of this pile proved an efficient check to the Burgundians. The assault began at eight o'clock in the morning, and was still raging, when, toward the decline of day, a noble body of troops was seen entering by the Paris gate. These brave fellows, having marched fourteen leagues without halting, gave their horses and equipments to the care of the women and girls, and flew to those parts of the walls where the fight was hottest. The besiegers, though numbering 80,000, could not resist the united valor of the garrison and the new comers; they soon wavered, and at length fled to their camp in disorder. More defenders arrived by daybreak; the citizens received them as liberators; they spread tables for them in the streets and public places, cheered them with refreshments, and afterward accompanied them to the walls. The Duke of Burgundy then perceived, but too late, a great error he had committed. Instead of investing Beauvais with a numerous army, he had attacked it on one side only: succors and convoys arrived from all parts. The duke himself began to experience the horrors of famine; the French, scouring the country, intercepted his convoys. Every thing announced a fruitless enterprise; but he resolved, before raising the siege, to attempt a general assault. The besieged, under the orders of Marshal De Ronault, prepared to receive him. The marshal wanted to relieve La Roche-Tesson and Fontenailles; but as they had arrived first, and had established themselves at the gate of Bresle, which was the post of danger, they complained of removal as an affront, and obtained permission to retain a post they had kept night and day. The trumpets sounded, the cannon roared, the Burgundians advanced, fire and sword in hand; they planted their ladders, mounted the breaches, and attacked the besieged: the latter received them with firmness; they precipitated them, they crushed them, or beat them back from their walls. Raging like a wild bull, Charles rallied his soldiers and led them back to the assault; but they were again repulsed with greater loss than before. How willingly we may suppose, Charles sounded a retreat. Had it not been for the excessive precaution of some of the burgesses, his army must have been entirely destroyed: they had walled up the gates on the side next the Burgundians, which impeded the sortie. Charles raised the siege on the 10th of July. Louis XI. rewarded the valor and fidelity of the inhabitants by an exemption from imposts. As the women had exhibited most ardor in defense of Beauvais, he ordered that they should take precedence of the men in the fête which was celebrated every year, on the 10th of July, in honor of their deliverance from the power of a man known to be a sanguinary conqueror.—Robson.

BEAVERDAMS, 1813.—Colonel Boestler, with six hundred Americans, in 1813, was attacked at Beaverdams, in Canada, a few miles from Queenstown, by a body of British and Indians, and after a brief conflict, surrendered his whole detachment prisoners of war. The British force consisted only of about three hundred men; but they were maneuvered in a manner which led the Americans to believe that they were the light troops of a very superior army which was in fact approaching; but had not yet come up.

BEDLIS, A.D. 1554.—In the year 1554, the army of Solyman the Magnificent encountered the Persians near Bedlis, a town of Asiatic Turkey, and, after a bloody battle, Solyman's army was defeated and put to rout, with great slaughter.

BELGRADE, A.D. 1717.—This celebrated town of European Turkey is the capital of Servia, and is situated on the side of a hill, at the conflux of the Save and the Danube. It was formerly a very strong place, but it is now destitute of fortifications. The possession of Belgrade has been repeatedly disputed between the Turks and the Austrians. In 1521, it was taken by the Turks, after having been attacked in vain by Amurath II. in the preceeding century. It was retaken by the imperial army, under the Elector of Bavaria, in 1688, but restored to the Turks two years afterward, with whom it remained till August, 1717, when it surrendered to Prince Eugene, and was secured to Austria by the peace of Passarowitz. Belgrade is chiefly famous in military history on account of the battle fought in its vicinity, in the year 1717, the result of which was the last victory obtained under the auspices of the celebrated Prince Eugene, and which decided the event of the war then depending between the German and Ottoman empires. Notwithstanding the heavy losses they had sustained during the campaign of 1716, the Turks were determined to make the most vigorous efforts for the preservation of their Hungarian acquisitions. The Austrians were equally desirous of terminating the war by some important action. Prince Eugene having concentrated the Austrian forces in the bannot, on the 15th of June effected a passage of the Danube, in boats, with 30,000 of his troops, without the loss of a man, in presence of some Turkish corps, stationed on the southern bank, who, without attempting to obstruct his passage, threw themselves into Belgrade. Having constructed a bridge of boats, the rest of the army—the cavalry and artillery—were passed over; and by the 19th of the same month, Belgrade was completely invested. Eugene carefully fortified his camp, for he foresaw that the Turks would hazard a battle to relieve the place. He accordingly began to cast up lines of circumvallation and contravallation, strengthening them with redoubts, intrenchments, and other necessary field-works. Within these lines the army incamped to the south of Belgrade, its front toward the open country, its left resting on the Danube, and its right extending toward the Save. A bridge of boats was thrown across the Save, and, as well as that already constructed across the Danube, secured by strong têtes-du-pont. The line of contravallation, looking toward Semedria, consisted of a ditch sixteen feet wide, of proportionable depth, and defended by a strong parapet. The proper openings were left for the troops to issue and form in order of battle, without confusion, covered in front by ravelins and redans; upon the right, a large redoubt was erected, for the purpose of commanding a hollow ground which the Turks might otherwise have found serviceable in their approaches. The field-pieces of all the different battalions, planted at regular distances along the front of the contravallation, secured it from any sudden assault. As, however, the army was not sufficiently numerous to occupy the whole extent of ground between the two rivers, cross intrenchments were formed, connecting the principal lines on the right and left, and still preserving a communication with the different bridges.

As the Turkish garrison consisted of between twenty and thirty thousand regular troops, and had also a strong flotilla on the Danube, Prince Eugene found it absolutely necessary to maintain two flying camps, one of several thousand men at Semlin, to keep up a communication with Peterwarodin, whence the imperialists derived their supplies of provisions, under Count de Hauben; and another of five battalions and some cavalry, to cover the head of the bridge over the Danube. Four ships of war protected the navigation of that river, and watched the motions of the Turkish flotilla. But a violent storm, which happened on the 13th of July, had rendered nearly abortive the projects of the besiegers. The bridges of the Danube and Save were broken by the violence of the tempest. Several vessels, detached from the rest, were carried floating at random down the stream, and the Turks, taking advantage of this accident, made a sally across the Save, and attacked the redoubt which covered the head of the bridge. The gallant defense of a captain and sixty-four men, who alone garrisoned the post, preserved it, together with that part of the bridge which remained on the north side of the river from falling into the hands of the enemy. To prevent such sorties in future, the camp of Semlin was strongly reinforced, and the command intrusted to Count Martigny. More serious operations commenced; and during the night of the 18th, trenches were opened against Belgrade, to the north of the Save, by 1,200 pioneers, covered by a large detachment under General Massigli. The Turks, however, on the following morning, opened a terrible fire upon them from all the batteries of the place, the flotilla on the Danube, and the islands in that river, and, making a sortie with 4,000 men in boats, assaulted so furiously the guard of the trenches, that, if Prince Eugene had not animated the troops by his personal presence and bravery, in repulsing the attack, a total defeat must have ensued. As it was, General Massigli, with twenty other officers of note, and 400 soldiers perished in this affair. It became necessary to augment the guard of the trenches to nine battalions, and to construct new lines. In six days a complete chain of works was established from the bridge along the Save to its influx with the Danube, and thence, ascending the course of the latter river, to the camp of Semlin, defended with redoubts, and well provided with artillery. From the moment of the completion of these formidable works the garrison attempted no further sallies.

On the 23d of July, the cannonade and bombardment commenced from all the Austrian batteries, with such terrible effect that, in seven days, the lower part of the town was reduced to a heap of ruins. But the excellent state of their fortifications on the side of the besieging camp, and the expectation of speedy aid, animated the besieged to maintain a most vigorous resistance. And their expectations were not delusive. The grand vizier, having drained the Turkish provinces of soldiers to complete his army, had already commenced his march; and on the 28th his advanced guard appeared in sight, and began to skirmish with the Austrian outposts. The number of these troops daily increased, and on the last of July, the vizier, with his whole army, arrived in the presence of the imperialists. Instead of attacking the Austrians immediately, as Eugene had expected, the Turkish commander encamped upon the heights above the Austrian camp with all his forces, with his right flank resting on the Danube, and his left stretching toward the Save. He next proceeded to fortify his position by throwing up intrenchments, to erect batteries, and to make approaches against the Austrian works, as if they had literally been a town besieged. This mode of attack compelled Eugene to adopt new dispositions. He mounted additional artillery in his own lines; defended all the avenues with chevaux-de-frize; mined the ground in front of the great redoubt, and collected in part of his troops from the opposite bank of the Save. The Turks pushed forward their works with the utmost vigor, in spite of the dreadful havoc incessantly made among them by the Austrian bombs and bullets, until they had approached to within musket-shot of the contravallation. The Turkish army consisted of 200,000 men; and their works were mounted with 140 pieces of cannon and mortars. The garrison, who now sustained some respite from the fire of the Austrian batteries, directed their own upon the tents of the besieged; and thus situated between two armies, who from their situation, commanded the greater part his position, Eugene found himself infiladed by the fire of upward of 250 pieces of artillery. His situation became more precarious every day. The dysentery, which for the last two months had done great mischief in his camp, now raged to such a degree that hundreds were buried daily. A mortality prevailed among the horses, in consequence of which half the cavalry were dismounted; and an army which, at the opening of the campaign, amounted to 80,000 men, could not now muster 60,000 effective soldiers. Though no immediate scarcity of provisions or ammunition was experienced, yet the disappointment of the expectations Prince Eugene had conceived, that the Turks would be compelled to retire for want of provisions, obliged him to determine without delay on some decisive measure; especially as the vizier had occupied an eminence adjoining the Save, with a considerable body of troops, and might, by sending 20,000 or 30,000 men across the river, have rendered a retreat, in case of defeat, impracticable to the Austrians. Under these circumstances it was resolved, in a general council of war, held on the 15th of August, to anticipate the movements of the enemy, by making a decisive attack on their camp. The detachments beyond the Save were immediately called in, except about 1,400 foot and 300 horse. Seven regiments of cavalry, and ten battalions, with all the dismounted horse and dragoons, were left in the lines to observe the garrison. Eleven regiments of cavalry, commanded by Field Marshal Palfi and General Merci, composed two lines on the right, and marched out before midnight. The left wing, consisting of twelve regiments, marched out at the same time, commanded by Generals Montecucuti and Martigny. The infantry, under Prince Alexander of Wirtemberg, in chief, was drawn up in the center; the first line of twenty-two battalions, under the direction of Count Maximilian of Staremburg, and Count Harrach; the second of eighteen battalions, under the command of the Prince of Bevern. The reserve corps, consisting of eighteen battalions, under Marshal Seckandorf, remained in the works, ready to act as occasion should require. The effective force of the two lines, on whom the success of the day in a great measure depended, did not amount to more than 40,000 men. The morning of the 16th was dark and foggy. At one o'clock in the morning, the Austrians, under cover of the fog, marched out of their trenches; the right advancing toward the redoubt, which was assigned as its post of formation, and the left over the open ground adjoining the Danube. Two hours were spent in making the necessary preparatory movements, but the fog, which had hitherto favored the Austrians, increased to such a degree as to become productive of serious inconvenience. The right wing, missing its way, stumbled upon one of the Turkish advanced works, instead of the redoubt. The surprise was equal on both sides; but a discharge which immediately opened upon the Austrian cavalry, from the guard of the Turkish trenches, spread the alarm throughout the whole of the grand vizier's army. His troops hastily rushed from every part of the camp toward the scene of action, and in a few minutes Count Palfi became hotly engaged. The Austrians forming in haste, and their battalions, through fear of losing the support of the cavalry, inclining successively to the right flank, a wide vacancy was left in the center, and afforded the Turks an advantage of which they did not fail to profit. In the mean time the conflict, now fairly engaged on the right, commenced on the opposite flank. Prince Eugene had intended to begin the attack with both wings at the same time; but convinced by the heavy firing he heard toward the Save, that Palfi had already begun the battle, he was himself obliged to come to blows before the battalions of his left wing were completely formed. It was now between four and five o'clock in the morning, The fog continued so thick, that the combatants could not discern each other, until they had arrived almost close to the muzzles of their antagonists' pieces. In the midst of this obscurity, several small detachments of the Austrians, carried away by their desire to distinguish themselves, rushed into the thickest of the enemy, and were almost instantly cut to pieces. The Austrians, however, rapidly gained ground. The darkness compelled them to march with their muskets constantly presented, and the moment they perceived their enemies, they poured in such a close and well directed fire, that the Turkish battalions, as they advanced in succession were broken, dismayed, and precipitated headlong into their trenches, where the bayonet and saber made terrible havoc among them. The Austrian cavalry were not equally successful; the broken nature of the ground, compelled them to perform frequent evolutions in order to find some passages of easier access, and the Turks who lined the trenches galled them with severe and incessant firing. The center of the Turkish camp also, finding nothing to oppose them, threw several battalions into the void space between the flanks of the Austrian army, and completely intercepting all communication, opened a heavy fire from right to left upon the divided forces. Victory seemed about to declare for the Turks; but at this critical moment the fog was suddenly dispelled, and Prince Eugene at a glance discovered the disposition of both armies and his own perilous situation. The advance of his second line prevented his total defeat. The Prince of Bevern, who commanded it, advanced upon the Turks, thrown into disorder by their own success, and charged them with such fury that the infidels, unable to sustain the shock, fled in disorder, and were pursued up to their very trenches, leaving the space behind them strewn with their dead.

This success changed the state of affairs. No time was lost in filling up the interval that had been so unwarily left, and in forming the two wings of the Austrians, for a new attack. The right wing commenced the attack. Advancing toward the Turkish works with the utmost rapidity, they carried with invincible impetuosity the batteries, whose fire they had so long sustained, and turned the cannon against the intrenchments which protected the Turkish camp. The left wing encountered a stronger resistance. The principal forces of the enemy were concentrated on that wing; and their number far exceeding that of the Austrians, was constantly increased by the arrival of troops, whom the success of Palfi had driven from the right. The Austrians advanced bravely to assail the enemy's works, but were driven back by the janizaries, who defended themselves with the utmost courage. But returning to the charge, the Austrians beat the Turks from their furthest advanced intrenchment, and pushing their advantage, advanced regularly up to the second intrenched line, without firing a musket till they came within ten paces of the enemy. This work was carried in less time than the first; the Turkish intrenchments were forced one after another, as well as several coupures with which the camp was defended; and notwithstanding resistance was attempted at each of them, and the Austrians were constantly exposed to a most terrible fire, yet the courage and skill of Prince Eugene, surmounted every obstacle, and obliged victory, after a struggle of six hours, to declare in his favor. The last serious stand made by the infidels, was at a grand battery, mounted with 18 pieces of cannon, and defended by 20,000 janizaries, sustained by 10,000 spahis, the bravest troops in the Turkish army. It was necessary to halt and form the Austrian troops anew, for this perilous attempt; but when the word was given, they rushed forward with an impetuosity which overthrew every thing before them. The Austrian grenadiers, in defiance of the fire from the battery, bore down all opposition, mounted through the embrasures, and drove the Turks from their guns, while the rest of the army made such slaughter that the bodies of the slain rose in heaps around the redoubt. The routed forces driven on all sides from their intrenchments, retired into the plains, as if to form once more for the defense of their camp; but observing that the Austrians had gained the heights, and were advancing toward them in good order, they scattered and fled in every direction, leaving their camp, baggage, and ammunition at the mercy of the conquerors. The victory was complete by nine o'clock in the morning. The plunder of the infidels' camp, which resembled a large city, was given to the soldiers. This battle, which was fought on the 16th of August, 1717, cost the Turks 10,000 of their best troops, killed in the action, and 3,000 in the pursuit. About 5,000 were wounded, and nearly the same number were made prisoners. Within the Turkish camp and lines, were found 131 pieces of brass cannon, 30 mortars, and an immense quantity of powder, bullets, bombs, and grenades. Fifty-two colors, nine horse-tails, and other military trophies fell into the hands of the victors. The Austrians lost 3,000 men killed, among whom were Generals Hauben and Dalbery, and 4,500 wounded. But the Turkish troops had used their weapons to such purpose, that only 2,000 of the wounded Austrians recovered. In consequence of this great victory, Belgrade surrendered on the 19th, the garrison still consisting of more than 25,000, being allowed to walk out with all their effects. The fortifications of the town, toward the land, were in a most excellent state, and more than 400 pieces of cannon and mortars were found on the works, in the arsenals, and on board the flotilla on the Danube.

Belgrade remained twenty-two years in the hands of the Austrians. In 1739, it was given up to the Turks on condition that they would demolish its fortifications. But so important did the Austrians consider the place, that they again invested it in 1789, under Field Marshal Lundohn, who, in his approaches, availed himself of the old line of circumvallation, conducted by Prince Eugene, which the Turks had carelessly neglected to fill up. The suburbs were soon carried, sword in hand, and the garrison surrendered on honorable terms. About 300 pieces of artillery and vast military stores were found in the fortress on its capture.

In 1791, Belgrade was again restored to the Turks by the peace of Lestovi, and has since remained under their authority.

BELCHITE, A.D. 1809.—This town is in Spain, 22 miles south of Saragossa. On the 18th of June, 1809, an engagement took place near Belchite, between the French under Suchet, and Spaniards under General Blake, in which the French were victorious.

BENDER, 1770–1809.—Bender in Russia, in the environs of which is Vamitza, the retreat of Charles XII. after the battle of Poltowa, was taken by the Russians in 1770; and was also stormed, and taken by the Russian troops in 1809.

BENEVENTO, A.D. 1266.—In the year 1266, a battle was fought near Benevento, in southern Italy, 32 miles N. E. of Naples, betwen the troops of Charles of Anjou, and those of Manfred, King of Naples. The army of the king was defeated with great loss, and Manfred was slain during the engagement.

BENNINGTON HEIGHTS, 1777.—Bennington in Vermont, is 117 miles south-west of Montpelier, the capital of that State, and is famous in the history of our country, as the spot near which a battle was fought on the 16th of August, 1777, between a detachment of Burgoyne's army, and that of the Americans.

The British army, in the month of August, 1777, was on its way from Skenesborough toward Fort Edward on the Hudson river, and Burgoyne found it highly difficult to obtain provisions for his soldiers. He knew that the Americans had accumulated a considerable quantity of provisions at Bennington, about twenty miles north-east of the Hudson, whence they were accustomed to send supplies to their army as occasion required, and he resolved to send a detachment thither for the purpose of surpising the place, and bringing off the provisions of the enemy. Accordingly he detached Lieutenant-colonel Baum, a German officer of great bravery, with about 500 troops, consisting of Hessians, Canadians, Tories, and Indians. Two hundred were admirable cavalry. Baum was ordered to scour the country from Rockingham to Otter creek; to descend the Connecticut river as far as Brattleborough; he was not to allow his regular troops to scatter, but to keep them always in a compact body; the front and rear of his column were to be protected against ambuscade, by light troops, and he was to return by the road to Albany, where he was to rejoin Burgoyne. He was also instructed to make prisoners of all officers, civil or military, acting under the Congress, and to tax the towns where they halted, with such articles as they wanted, and to seize on all such horses as were suitable for cavalry use, with as many saddles and bridles as could be found. The British general insisted that Baum should return with thirteen hundred horses, at least, and ordered that they should be "tied in strings of ten each, in order that one man might lead ten horses." "This redoubtable commander," says Dr. Thatcher, in his military journal, "must have been one of the happiest men of the age, to imagine such prodigious achievements were at his command; that such invaluable resources were within his grasp. But, alas! the wisest of men are liable to disappointments in their sanguine calculations, and to have their favorite projects frustrated by the causalties of war." This is remarkably verified in the present instance. In order to facilitate the movements of this detachment, Burgoyne moved his whole army down the river and encamped at a place nearly opposite Saratoga.

He thus held the American troops, under General Schuyler, who had intrenched themselves at Stillwater, in check, and prevented them from sending succor to Bennington. Burgoyne also sent Lieuteuant-colonel Breyman, with a regiment of Brunswick grenadiers and light infantry, toward Bennington, with directions to post himself at Batton Kill, in order, if necessary, to support Baum. On the 13th of August, Baum set forward on his march, advancing rapidly; but with the utmost caution. Bennington, at this time, was occupied by General Stark, with a small body of New Hampshire militia. On the evening of the 13th, Baum reached Cambridge, and near this place, an advanced body of Indians and Tories fell in with a party of Americans, who were escorting some cattle. The Americans received the attack of the enemy with a well-directed fire; but were forced to fly before superior numbers, leaving five prisoners and the cattle in the hands of the enemy. Toward evening the fugitives arrived at Bennington, and informed Stark that a large body of British and Indians were advancing directly toward the town. He immediately sent to Colonel Warner, who was stationed with his regiment at Manchester, to march to his assistance at once; and detached Lieutenant-colonel Gregg to oppose the advance of the enemy. He also called on the militia in the neighborhood, and the inhabitants flocked to his standard from all sides. After the arrival of Colonel Warner, at Bennington, the whole American army, including the militia, consisted of about 2,000 men. General Baum, perceiving that the Americans were too strong to be attacked by his present force, sent to Colonel Breyman, urging him to advance speedily to his succor. Meanwhile he posted his army on a height near a bend in the Walloomsloick river, about four miles from Bennington, where he commenced intrenching. Stark, learning of the strength of the British army, rallied his brigade, and on the morning of the 14th set forward with his whole army, for the purpose of supporting Colonel Gregg. As the Americans advanced to within a mile of the enemy's position, they met Colonel Gregg retreating. Stark fell back about a mile, and prepared to give battle to the enemy the next day. The 15th of August was exceedingly rainy, and both armies remained inactive with the exception of an occasional skirmish between detached parties. During the night Stark was reinforced by a body of Berkshire militia under Colonel Symonds. Among these troops was the Rev. Mr. Allen, of Pittsfield, who was impatient to a degree to be led against the enemy. Early in the morning of the 16th, before daybreak, the belligerent parson approached Stark, and exclaimed, "General, the people of Berkshire have often been summoned out to fight, but have never had a chance yet, and if you do not allow them to fight now, they say they will never turn out again." "Well," replied Stark, "do you wish to march out now, while it is dark and rainy." "No; not just this moment," answered the warlike parson. "Then," returned Stark, "if the Lord shall once more give us sunshine, and I do not give you fighting enough, I'll never ask you to come out again."

The morning broke brightly and beautifully; the sun bathing the fresh landscape in a sea of golden light. Stark advanced within half a mile of the enemy, and carefully reconnoitered their position. He then proceeded to act upon the plan of attack, which he had formed during the night. Two hundred men, under Colonel Nichols, were detached with orders to follow a circuitous route, and attack the left wing of the enemy in the rear; 300 men under Colonel Herrick were sent to attack the rear of their right, and both officers were ordered to join their forces before making a general assault. Colonel Nichols marched up along the banks of a little stream that empties into the Walloomscoick, a short distance above the bridge, on the Bennington road, and gaining the rear of the enemy's left, at three o'clock in the afternoon furiously assailed the Hessians in their intrenchments. Simultaneous with this attack, Herrick fell upon the rear of the right wing of the enemy, and the battle at the two wings of the British army raged furiously. At the sound of the musketry, Stark advanced with the main body of his army. He reached the base of the hill on which the Hessians were intrenched, and saw the enemy on the slope of the heights and in the plain rapidly forming in battle array, while the intrenchments on the hill were covered with smoke, and the sharp rattle of musketry proved that the fight in that quarter was raging fiercely. "See, men, see!" shouted Stark, pointing to the enemy, "there are the red coats. Before night they are ours, or Molly Stark will be a widow!" This laconic speech was received by his soldiers with a shout which sent terror into the ranks of the loyalists, and the Americans rushing with the utmost impetuosity on the troops of the enemy which guarded the bridge, quickly drove them across the creek back on their very intrenchments. The Americans pursued eagerly, and ascending the steep acclivity, attacked the Hessians in their works. The Hessians, after a short resistance fled, and the Indians having abandoned the allies at the commencement of the affair, the whole weight of the battle fell on the gallant troops of Reidesel, who were under the direct command of Colonel Baum. In vain did the Americans endeavor to break their unyielding columns; they stood firm, and replied to the incessant volleys of the enemy with vigor, and finally having expended all their ammunition, they charged down upon the patriots with their swords. But received by a well directed volley, and an answering charge, which shattered their columns, and threw them into the utmost confusion, Baum vainly endeavored to rally his men; they turned their horses and fled in disorder across the plain, leaving their artillery and baggage behind. The Americans not caring to pursue, dispersed to gather the plunder.

At this moment Colonel Breyman with reinforcements for Baum, arrived. He had been detained on the road by the heavy rain, and, although he had urged his men forward with all possible speed, he did not arrive to take part in the action. He met the flying party of dragoons, who rallying, joined him, and with the whole force, he advanced toward the abandoned intrenchments on the height. Stark saw the danger at once. Galloping across the plain in various directions he strove to rally his men, but they were so much scattered that he could only collect a few of his forces before the enemy was upon him, and for the time being, the tide of victory seemed to have changed. But at this critical moment, Colonel Warner, who with his regiment, had left Bennington in the morning, arrived and vigorously attacked the rear of the British and Germans. The militia, that were scattered in quest of plunder, on hearing the report of the artillery, immediately rallied, and Stark thus reinforced, charged furiously into the faces of the enemy. The British, overpowered by numbers, fell back, fighting fiercely as they retreated, toward the Hoosick. The Americans pursued until darkness prevented them from distinguishing friend from foe, and then Stark reluctantly withdrew his troops. Seven hundred of the royalists were made prisoners. "Another hour of daylight," said Stark, in his official report, "and I would have captured the whole of them." The royalists lost, in both engagements, 200 killed and 34 wounded, besides the prisoners. Among the prisoners was Colonel Baum, who was mortally wounded. He died shortly afterward. The total loss of the British was 934 men. The Americans lost in killed and wounded about 200. Four pieces of cannon, nearly 1,000 muskets, and 250 sabers fell into the hands of the victors. Stark for his bravery and skill evinced in this battle, was promoted to the rank of brigadier-general; and the thanks of Congress were tendered to General Stark, and the officers and troops under his command, for their brave and successful attack upon and signal victory over the enemy on this occasion. The victory was of the utmost importance. It prevented Burgoyne from securing supplies for his troops, and was one of the causes which compelled him to make that disastrous movement that finally led to the surrender of his whole army at Saratoga.

BERESINA, A.D. 1812.—The Beresina, a river of Russia in Europe, rises in the district of Dessna, which it traverses from north to south, and falls into the Dnieper, a little below Ritchitza.

The broken remnants of Napoleon's once magnificent army, on their retreat from Moscow, approached the river Beresina. They were surrounded on all sides by the Russian troops, who, exasperated to madness by the invasion of their country, seemed determined to exterminate the army of the French emperor. Napoleon sent Oudinot forward to defend the bridge of Borrissou, the only passage over the river, and confidently expecting that his orders had been fulfilled, he continued to advance. But on the 23d of November, 1812, the advanced guard of the Russian army was met by the van-guard of Oudinot. The Russians were defeated with a loss of above 1000 men; but in their flight across the river they destroyed the bridge of Borrissou. Napoleon's situation was now indeed critical. Before him, on the further bank of a wide and deep river, stood a powerful enemy, with heavy artillery, awaiting his arrival to dispute his passage, while behind him threatened an immense host, hastening onward to his destruction. On the 24th of November the army approached the Beresina. And now were drawn up on either side of that river, two armies of different aspects. The French soldiers, squalid, unshorn, without uniforms, wrapped in blankets, female garments, and rags, presented a striking contrast to the well-clothed, and well-fed Russian troops on the opposite shore. Napoleon gazed anxiously across the river. An army of 30,000 men, were drawn up to dispute his passage, and thirty pieces of cannon frowned from the broken parapets of the destroyed bridge. The river full of broken ice presented apparently an insurmountable barrier to his progress. But Napoleon was not disheartened. To conceal his real intentions he endeavored to deceive the enemy as to his real point of passage. He even went so far as to make considerable preparations for a bridge lower down the river, as if he designed to effect a passage there. In the mean time he collected his forces on the heights of Borrissou, and finding that the enemy were attracted by his demonstrations further down the river, under the cover of a battery of forty pieces he began, on the night of the 25th, to throw two bridges over the river, nearly opposite Studienka. The task was arduous, surrounded by every difficulty. But nothing could arrest the French engineers. All night they toiled in the cold water; while the cavalry of General Carbineau swam across the river to drive back the Russian detachments which were beginning to collect on the opposite shore. The enemy were defeated; and the bridge for infantry, by the incredible exertions of the French engineers, was completed by daybreak, and a brigade of infantry was soon transported in safety to the opposite shore.

In the morning of the 26th, the French, who had passed a sleepless night, watching the Russian forces, beheld with astonishment, their bivouacs deserted, and their batteries in retreat, at the very time the bridge was beginning to acquire consistency. Tchaplitz, who commanded the Russian troops on the western side of the river, had been ordered, that very night, to march further down the river, to resist the attack which was anticipated in that quarter. Soon, however, Tchaplitz was informed of the real movements of the French. He made all haste to return; but he found the French advance guard so firmly established, that it was impossible to dislodge them from their position. The French soon completed a second bridge, for the passage of the carriages and artillery: fifty pieces of cannon, besides the artillery of the whole corps, defiled in a short time to the western bank. Oudinot's corps was transported across, and the Russians were driven back to the thickets at a distance from the river. Now Napoleon found himself master of the important defiles that lead to Zembia; and the passage of the Beresina was secured to his army. After repeated advices from Tchaplitz, Tchichagoff, the Russian general, who during these critical operations was lying with the main body of his forces at Chabochwiezi, at length became convinced that the passage was in reality commenced at Studienka; and made all haste to march his army in that direction. In the meantime, Wittgenstein, commander of the Russian forces in the rear of Napoleon's army, attempted to march directly to Studienka, in order to destroy the rear guard on the left bank; but the state of the roads compelled him to relinquish that project, and he marched toward Staroi-Borissou, in the hope either to cut off Victor, if he had not yet passed that place, or to follow him up in the direction of Studienka. Victor's corps was extended along the left bank of the river as far as Borrissou, which was occupied by General Partonneaux, with a strong division. Napoleon's whole army consisted of 70,000 men; and his united artillery amounted to 250 pieces. But of his men 40,000 only were perfectly armed and in good fighting condition. During the whole of the 27th, the French army continued to pass over the river. Victor's corps gradually approached the bridge; but the division of Partonneaux, which formed his rear guard, remained in Borissou, and was commanded not to move along the Staroi-Borissou till six in the evening. But before that hour, Wittgenstein's force firmly established themselves across the great road, completely cutting off all communication between the French and the river. Partonneaux, finding his progress interrupted by so formidable a force, determined to cut his way through. The French advanced gallantly to the charge; but the overwhelming number of the enemy, overpowered them, and they were driven back with great loss. At that moment Platoff came up with his Cossacks, and cut off the retreat of the French to Borrissou. Surrounded on all sides by enemies, Partonneaux at length was obliged to capitulate. On the morning of the 28th, the Russians began a general attack on the French, on both sides of the river. Marshal Oudinot's corps, which had crossed the river the previous day, was fiercely assailed by the army of Tchaplitz. The French, however, fighting with the courage of despair, drove back the enemy at all quarters, and fully protected the bridge on that bank of the river. In the meantime, Wittgenstein, with 40,000 men, commenced a vigorous attack on the corps of Victor, which numbered about 25,000. An obstinate and bloody struggle ensued. At length the Russian general, Diebitch, established a battery of 12 pieces, so far in advance as to command the bridge, and the confused masses of soldiers, chariots, and baggage wagons, which were assembled in its vicinity. Soon he opened upon them a furious and incessant discharge which told with terrible effect upon the masses of living flesh. Then came a spectacle unparalleled in the history of war. The whole crowd of French soldiers, rushed toward the bridges, crushing each other, and blockading the passage in their efforts to get over. The loud rattle of the musketry of Victor's gallant corps, as they strove to cover the retreat of the bleeding army, and the roar of the Russian guns, which, steadily advancing, and forming in a semicircle, pouring death and destruction upon the struggling masses on the bridge, mingled with the fierce shouts of the Russians, who were burning with an ardent desire to annihilate their enemies, and the hoarse screams of the retreating French, created a chaos of sounds which added to the terrors of the day. In the midst of all this confusion the artillery bridge broke, and the crowd upon it, hurled forward by those behind, were precipitated into the water, and died miserably. Cavalry, artillery, and infantry now rushed promiscuously to the other bridge. Soon this was also choked up by the struggling masses. The Russian batteries vomited forth upon them a pitiless and incessant storm of iron. Thousands died upon the bridge, beneath this withering tempest; thousands were crushed beneath the feet of their companions, and thousands were hurled from the bridge, and perished miserably amid the masses of ice which were floating on the surface of the river. Yet onward struggled that frantic throng of men, women, and children; and in that struggle was exhibited every passion of our nature. Fear, rage, cruelty, selfishness, generosity, love, and pity, were mingled together. The coward, made brave by his fears, drew his own sword upon his comrades, and endeavored to hew a path for himself through the mass, until he was seized and precipitated into the water by those whom he assailed. The strong crushing along, heedless of the weak, trampled them down.

But in bright and glorious contrast to such baseness, stand the heroism and unselfishness of thousands of noble men, who, casting aside all thoughts of their own peril, endeavored to preserve the young and tender. Soldiers, seizing infants from dying mothers, vowed, with scalding tears, to cherish them as their own. Privates sacrificed their lives to preserve their officers, while officers harnessed themselves to sledges to extricate their wounded soldiers. During the whole of this fearful day, Victor, with his rear guard, had nobly sustained the arduous duty of protecting the passage. Toward evening, when nearly the whole French army were over, he gave orders to retreat, for the time had arrived when he should save his army, if ever. When he arrived at the entrance of the bridge, masses were still struggling upon it. Stern necessity compelled his troops to open a passage for themselves through the helpless multitude. In vain did he endeavor to persuade them to pass over to the opposite shore. Despair and misery had rendered them incapable of the exertion. At length the morning dawned. The Russian troops approached the bridge. Victor's troops passed over to the opposite shore. Again did he entreat the multitude on the opposite shore to follow him. They heeded him not. Reluctantly the French marshal commanded the bridge to be set on fire. And now, when the flames arose, a frightful cry came up from those who had remained behind. Too late were they awakened to the horrors of their situation. Multitudes rushed across the burning bridge; but to avoid a horrible death by fire, they chose one almost as terrible, by leaping into the river. The others watched the receding lines of their countrymen, and when they disappeared, remained sitting on the shore in hopeless despondency, until death ended their miseries. In the spring, when the ice dissolved, 12,000 dead bodies were found along the banks of the river Beresina. After crossing the river, the French army, now reduced to 50,000 men, marched in disorderly and detached groups along the road to Wilna.

BERGEN, A.D. 1759.—Bergen is a town in the electorate of Hesse, three miles northeast of Frankfort. A bloody battle was fought here on the 13th of April, 1759, in the Seven Years' War, between the French and the allies, in which the latter were defeated. On the 19th of September, 1799, the allies were again defeated by the French, near Bergen, and in another battle, fought October 2d, 1799, the allies were again defeated by the French, before Alkmær.—See Alkmær.

BERGEN-OP-ZOOM, A.D. 1585.—This strongly-fortified town of Holland is situated on the left bank of the E. Schelder. It is not only strongly fortified, but is surrounded by marshes which render access to it very difficult.

This celebrated fortified place has been several times besieged. The Spaniards attacked it in 1585, when it was defended by Morgan, an intelligent and brave English captain. The Duke of Parma, knowing all the difficulties of the undertaking, thought to abridge them by attempting to win over two English officers, who passed for being not very delicate. These two soldiers discovered the duke's proposals to their commander, who ordered them to carry on the negotiations. They went into the enemy's camp; and a detachment of 4,000 men was intrusted to their guidance, to take possession of the place. They marched at the head of them, between two soldiers, who had orders to poniard them if they were treacherous, or if they did not introduce them into the citadel. They did, in fact, introduce them; but scarcely had forty men passed through the gate, when the portcullis was let down. The Spaniards who were within Bergen-op-Zoom did not dare to kill their guides, while the artillery of the place opened its thunders upon the detachment under the walls. The dishonor and defeat of this day both fell to the Spaniards, who, degenerating from Castilian valor, were taken in their own snare.

SECOND SIEGE, A.D. 1622.—The court of Madrid had placed at the head of 60,000 men the famous Spinola. This general, to carry out the intentions of his master, entered the territories of Holland, and presented himself before Bergen-op-Zoom. The Spaniards took their posts, erected their batteries, thundered against the ramparts, gave many assaults, and caused the timid among the besieged to tremble; but the Prince of Orange having thrown in succors, the besiegers retired on the 2d of October, with the loss of 10,000 men, after two months of useless efforts, leaving Bergen-op-Zoom her glorious title of a Maiden City.

THIRD SIEGE, A.D. 1747.—During more than a century this Maiden remained intact, but in October, 1747, she was deprived of the proud title by the illustrious and impetuous Lowendahl. In order not to lose the fruits of the memorable day of Lanfeld, Louis XV. commanded the siege of this important place. In describing it, we will avail ourselves of the words of Voltaire:—

"Siege was laid to Bergen-op-Zoom, a place esteemed impregnable, less because the celebrated and ingenious Cohorn had there displayed all his art, than from its being constantly supplied with all it could want by the Scheld, which forms an arm of the sea behind it. In addition to these defenses and a numerous garrison, there were lines near the fortifications, and in those lines a body of troops, which might at any moment assist the city. Of all the sieges ever undertaken, this was, perhaps, the most difficult. The Count de Lowendahl, who had already taken a part of Dutch Brabant, was charged with this enterprise. The allies and the French, the besieged and the besiegers, were all equally of opinion that the undertaking would fail; Lowendhal was almost the only person who reckoned upon success. The allies neglected nothing: the garrison was reinforced; succors, provisions, and munitions, were thrown in from the Scheld; the artillery was well served; the besieged made frequent sorties; the troops from the lines were constant in their attacks, and mines were sprung in several places. The diseases to which the besiegers were subjected, from being encamped in an unhealthy spot, materially seconded the resistance of the city. These contagious maladies placed more than 20,000 men hors de combat; but that deficiency was soon filled up.

"At length, after three weeks of open trenches, the Count de Lowendahl made it apparent that there are occasions on which the rules of art may be exceeded. The breaches were not yet practicable. There were three works scarcely commenced—the ravelin of Edem and two bastions, one of which was called the Cohorn, and the other the Pucelle. The general determined to give the assault at all these three points at the same time, and to carry the city.

"The French, in pitched battles, often meet with their equals, and sometimes with their masters in military discipline; but they have none in those bold strokes and rapid enterprises, in which impetuosity, agility, and ardor, overcome all obstacles. The troops were ordered to assemble in profound silence, toward the middle of the night; the besieged imagined themselves in perfect safety. The French descend into the fosses, and go straight to the three breaches; twelve grenadiers only render themselves masters of the Fort of Edem, kill all who attempt to defend themselves, and compel the terrified remainder to lay down their arms. The bastions of La Pucelle and Cohorn are assailed and carried with the same spirit. The troops mount in crowds. Every thing is carried; they push on to the ramparts, and there form: they then enter the city with fixed bayonets. The Marquis de Luzeac seizes the port gate; the commander of the fortress of this port surrenders to him at discretion: all the other forts do the same. The aged Baron de Cromstron, who commanded in the city, flies away toward the lines. The Prince of Hesse Philipstadt endeavors to make some resistance in the streets with two regiments, one Scotch and the other Swiss; but they are cut to pieces. The remainder of the garrison flies toward the lines, and carries terror to the body to which they look for protection. All fly; arms, provisions, and baggage, everything is abandoned: the city is given up as legitimate plunder to the conquering soldiers.

"A seizure was made, in the name of the king, of seventeen large vessels lying in the port, laden with munitions of all kinds, and provisions, which the cities of Holland had sent to the besieged. Upon the chests which contained them there was printed in large characters, To THE INVINCIBLE GARRISON OF BERGEN-OP-ZOOM. Louis XV., on learning the news of this event, made the Count de Lowendahl a marshal of France. The surprise of London was great, but the consternation of the United Provinces was extreme. The army of the allies was discouraged."

The Count de Lowendahl, in the letter he wrote the day after the capture to Marshal de Saxe, estimated his loss at 400 men only, and that of the enemy at 5,000.

In 1794 Bergen-op-Zoom was again besieged by the French and taken. On the 8th of March, 1814, the British under Graham, endeavored to carry the fortress by storm; but they were defeated. After forcing an entrance their retreat was cut off, and a dreadful slaughter ensued, nearly all of the storming party being cut to pieces or made prisoners.

BERWICK, A.D. 1296. — This strongly fortified town and seaport of England, is situated on the north-east extremity of the kingdom on the north bank of the Tweed, and close to its mouth, 300 miles north of London. It was the theater of many bloody contests between the English and Scots; and while England and Scotland remained two kingdoms was always claimed by the Scots as belonging to them, because it stood on their side of the river. In the year 1296 it was taken by the English by assault, and the garrison, 7,000 strong, was put to the sword. After being taken and retaken several times, it was finally ceded to England in 1502. In 1648 the town surrendered to Cromwell, and afterward to General Monk. Since the union of the crowns (1603), the fortifications, which were formerly very strong, have been much neglected.

BILBOA, A.D. 1836.—This seaport town of Spain, was in 1836 invested by the chartists under Villanoe, and was in considerable danger, when it was delivered by the defeat of the besiegers, by Espartero, assisted by several British ships of war. On the 25th of December, the day after the defeat of the besiegers, Espartero entered Bilboa in triumph. The chartist general, Don Thomas Zumalacarregui, was wounded here, June 10th, 1835, and died eight days after at Cegama.

BLACKHEATH, A.D. 1497. — On the plains of Blackheath, in the vicinity of London, on the 22d of June, 1497, the Cornish rebels, 16,000 strong, were defeated by Danburcy, commander of the king's forces. The rebels made but slight resistance. Lord Audley, Flammoe, and Joseph, their leaders, were taken and all three executed. The rebels being surrounded on all sides by the king's troops, were almost all made prisoners, and immediately dismissed without punishment. About 3,000 perished on the field.

BLACK ROCK, A.D. 1813.—On the 11th of July, 1813, a detachment of the British army, under Colonel Bishop, 250 strong, suddenly crossed the Niagara river from Fort Erie, to Black Rock, a small village about two miles from Buffalo, N. Y., and driving out the American militia at that place, destroyed the stores. The news of the arrival of Bishop reached Buffalo, and a few American regulars, with some friendly Indians, hastened to Black Rock and attacked the invaders, who were forced to retreat, with the loss of their commander, who was slain in the skirmish.

BLADENSBURG, A.D. 1814.—The village of Bladensburg, in Prince George county, Maryland, was, in the year 1814, the scene of a shameful defeat of the Americans by the British. Commodore Barney, with a few marines, made an obstinate resistance to the British; but, deserted by the militia, and surrounded by superior numbers, he was overpowered and obliged to surrender. See Washington.

BLENHEIM, A.D. 1704.—Blenheim is a small village of Bavaria, on the Danube. It has been rendered famous in history by the great and decisive battle which was fought in its vicinity on August 2d, 1704, between the English and Dutch on the one side, and the French and Bavarians on the other.

The English and Dutch army, commanded by the Duke of Marlborough and the Prince Eugene, consisted of 52,000 men. The French and Bavarians under Marshal Tallard numbered 60,000 men. Their right wing, which was covered by the Danube and the village of Blenheim, was commanded by Marshal Tallard in person. Their left, defended by the village of Lutzengen, was commanded by the Duke of Bavaria, and as his second in command, General Marsin an experienced Frenchman. In the front of their position, there ran a rivulet, which served in a great measure to defend them from attack in that quarter. Thus strongly posted the French general awaited Marlborough's attack. A severe cannonade commenced in the morning about 9 o'clock, and continued for three hours. Then the troops marched to the attack, the right wing commanded by Eugene, and the left, which was opposed to Marshal Tallard, headed by Marlborough. As soon as he had crossed the rivulet he attacked the French cavalry with great vehemence, and as Tallard was at that time inspecting the position of his troops on the left, his cavalry fought for some time without a commander; but when he learned that they had been attacked by Marlborough, he hastened to put himself at their head. They had already been twice repulsed, but as often rallied. At this moment he endeavored to bring a large body of the troops stationed in Blenheim to the charge, but they were attacked with such force by a detachment of British troops, that all their efforts to render any assistance to the main body were unavailing, and they were forced to retire from the position which they occupied. Marlborough now ordered his troops to attack the French cavalry in flank, and with such effect was his brilliant charge executed that they were totally routed. The English troops continued to penetrate through the French line, overthrowing every obstacle, till they had completely separated Marshal Tallard from his left wing. He, seeing the desperate state of affairs, proceeded to rally some of his troops, but being near-sighted, he mistook a detachment of Hessian troops in English pay, for his own, and was taken prisoner by them. On the right, Eugene had for a long time been endeavoring to force the Duke of Bavaria's position; he had already charged it three times, and as often had been repulsed. He renewed his charge with increased vigor, and so irresistible was it, that the enemy broke and fled in confusion. The officers lost all control of their men, and there was no general to preserve an orderly retreat. Marlborough and Eugene now surrounded the village of Blenheim, where were posted 13,000 men, who had maintained their ground during the action. These troops, seeing all means of retreat cut off, and the overwhelming numbers opposed to them, laid down their arms and surrendered as prisoners of war. The victory was now complete. The French and Bavarians lost 12,000 killed, and 13,000 prisoners, with their general, Tallard. The loss of the allies was about 5,000 killed, and 8,000 wounded or taken prisoners.

BLOREHEATH, A.D. 1459.—On the 23d of September, 1459, the second battle between the forces of York and Lancaster was fought at Bloreheath in the county of Stafford, England. The Lancasterian army consisted of about 10,000 men, and was commanded by Lord Audley. The Yorkists, not so numerous, were under the command of the Earl of Salisbury. Salisbury, at the advance of the enemy, caused his men to fall back as if in full retreat. The royalists pursued in confusion, and as soon as one half of them had crossed a rapid torrent, the fugitives turned, and fell on the pursuers with such fury that they were soon put to flight with great slaughter. Audley, with over 2,000 men, was slain; and Lord Dudley, with many knights and esquires, was made a prisoner.

BLUE LICKS, 1782.—The battle at the Blue Licks in Nicholas county, Kentucky, took place on the 19th of August, 1782. A strong body of Indians, commanded by the notorious Simon Girty, having committed various depredations in the neighborhoods, the inhabitants finally resolved to pursue and punish them. Daniel Boone, with a number of men from Boonesborough; Trigg with a party from Harrodsburg, and Todd with a company from Lexington, united their forces at Bryant's Station, about five miles north-east of Lexington. The whole army consisted of 132 men, and on the 18th, they advanced in pursuit of the enemy. The number of the Indians was more than two hundred; but the little band of white men determined to rid the country of the Indians, and expecting to receive reinforcements from General Logan at Lincoln, within twenty four hours, marched all night, and on the following morning came within sight of the enemy at the lower Blue Licks. The Indians were ascending the opposite bank of the river; and the Kentuckians, holding a council of war, determined, with a few exceptions, to await the arrival of Logan before making an attack. Major McGarry, however, impatient and impetuous, urged his horse into the water, and waving his hat, cried out, "Let all who are not cowards follow me!" The Kentuckians, stimulated by this example, madly dashed, both horse and foot, into the water, and pushed, in disorder, through a deep ford to the opposite shore. Ascending the bank, they rushed forward in pursuit of the enemy, and—as Boone had suggested at the council—fell into an ambuscade which the Indians had prepared for them. As they advanced at a rapid pace, suddenly, as if by magic, they were surrounded by Indians, who sprang up from behind bush and tree, and poured deadly volleys into the Kentuckians who were standing upon a barren and elevated spot of ground between two bushy ravines. The Kentuckians fought with the ferocity of tigers; but the Indians, greatly superior in numbers, closed around them, and finally fell into their midst with tomahawk and knife, striking to right and left until the ground was strewn with the slain, and reeking with blood. Most of the Kentucky leaders, including a son of Daniel Boone, were slain. The Indians, extending their line, endeavored to cut off the retreat of the survivors. But the horsemen, turning, dashed through the enemy, and made good their escape; the footmen were slain almost to a man. A great number of the fugitives on foot were killed at the ford, and the water of the river was crimsoned with their gore. Those who succeeded in gaining the opposite shore, dived into the thickets, and by various paths escaped to Bryant's Station.

BOADICEA, A.D. 61.—Notwithstanding the defeat of the Britons at the battle of Shropshire, they were not totally subdued by the Romans. They resolved, by a general insurrection, to free themselves from that state of abject servitude to which they were reduced by the Romans. They had many motives to aggravate their resentment; the greatness of their taxes, which were levied with unremitting severity; the cruel insolence of their conquerors, who reproached that very poverty which they had caused; but particularly the cruel treatment of Boadicea, Queen of the Iceni, drove them at last to open rebellion. Prastagus, King of the Iceni, at his death, had bequeathed one half of his dominions to the Romans and the other to his daughters; thus hoping by a sacrifice of a part to secure the rest in his family. But it had a different effect; for the Roman procurator immediately took possession of the whole, and when Boadicea, the widow of the deceased, attempted to remonstrate, he ordered her to be scourged like a slave, and violated the chastity of her daughters. These outrages were sufficient to produce a revolt throughout the whole island. The Iceni, being the most deeply interested in the quarrel, were the first to take arms; all the other states soon followed the example, and Boadicea, a woman of great beauty and masculine spirit, was appointed to head the common forces, which amounted to 230,000 fighting men. These, exasperated by their wrongs, attacked several of the Roman settlements and colonies with success. Paulinus, the Roman general, hastened to relieve London, which was already a flourishing settlement; but found on his arrival that it would be requisite for the general safety to abandon that place to the merciless fury of the enemy. London, therefore, was soon reduced to ashes; such of the inhabitants as remained in it, were massacred; and the Romans, with all other strangers, to the number of 70,000, were cruelly put to the sword. Flushed with these successes, the Britons no longer sought to avoid the enemy, but boldly came to the place where Paulinus awaited their arrival, posted in a very advantageous position with a body of 10,000 men. The battle was very obstinate and bloody, Boadicea herself appeared in a chariot, with her two daughters, and harangued her troops with masculine firmness, but the irregular and undisciplined bravery of her soldiers was unable to resist the cool intrepidity of the Romans. Her army was routed with great slaughter; 80,000 perished in the field, and an infinite number were made prisoners. Boadicea, herself, fearing to fall into the hands of the enraged victor, put an end to her own life, by poison.—Goldsmith.

BOMMEL, A.D. 1599.—Bommel is situated on the Wahal, in the Netherlands, and withstood a siege in 1599, which is interesting, both on account of its forming part of the noble struggle which rescued the Netherlands from the dominion of the Spaniards, and from the fact that at this siege one of the great scientific operations of war was first brought into use.

The Spaniards having penetrated, in 1599, into the island of Bommel, formed by the Wahal, in the duchy of Gueldres, hastened to lay siege to the capital city of that island. Prince Maurice came to its succor, with the greater part of his army. He encamped on the opposite bank of the Wahal, reinforced the garrison with 1000 men, and, with great rapidity, threw two bridges over the river, above and below the besieged city; the first, destined for the infantry, was but a collection of little barks; but the second, for the cavalry, was composed of large pontoons, and was wide enough for the passage of two chariots abreast. Having completed this operation he ordered 3,000 infantry and 400 horse, whom he charged most particularly with the defense of Bommel, to cross over into the island. This place being too small for such a numerous garrison, it was lodged without, and immediately covered itself with a good intrenchment, well flanked with redoubts, and defended by a wide ditch. This intrenchment furnished the first model of what has since been called the covered way. This happy invention contributed much to the failure of the Spanish expedition. They had not yet perfected their intrenchments, when the Dutch artillery, established on the banks of the Wahal, the fire of the armed barks, and that of the place, thundered all at once against their ramparts. The Spaniards, however, after many efforts, succeeded in sheltering themselves from this multiplied tempest; they raised good intrenchments, they placed cannon in battery, and began to assail in earnest both the city and the intrenched camp. The besieged did not oppose a less number of works or less courage to the Spanish attacks. Toward the end of May, the garrison of Bommel fell all at once upon every one of the enemy's quarters; it might have been supposed that they came to fight a regular battle, and not to clear out trenches or overthrow works. Both sides fought with the greatest resolution; but at length the resistance of the Spaniards disheartened the Dutch, and they retreated after a contest of three hours. They returned to the charge the following night, persuaded that they should surprise the besiegers. They succeeded in the first moments; but the Spaniards having recovered themselves, the Dutch were obliged to abandon their attack. Three days after, they perseveringly made fresh efforts, which proved likewise unfortunate. Fatigued with their endeavors to overcome so many obstacles and such obstinate enemies, the Spaniards, finding they made no considerable progress, determined to raise the siege toward the end of June, after having lost 2,000 men.—Robson.

BORODINO, A.D. 1812.—Borodino is a small village of Russia in Europe, on the Kolatza, ten miles west from Mojaisk.

Napoleon, with an immense army, was marching through a barren and almost uninhabited country toward Moscow. As he approached that city he saw that a battle with the enemy was at hand, and he gave three days' rest to his army. He ordered a general muster-roll to be called of his troops along the whole line, and warned his detachments that, if they did not join their respective corps, they would lose the honor of the approaching conflict. At the same time, orders were dispatched to the parks of reserve ammunition to advance; to the artillery to have their pieces in the best order; to the cavalry to refresh their horses, and to the soldiers to sharpen their sabers and examine the locks of their muskets. Mean while the Russians took post at Borodino. The little stream of the Kolatza, flowing in a rocky dell, covered the right of the line as far as the village of Borodino, which stood in the center of the position on an elevated ridge. On the left, the army extended to the village of Semenowskoie, and the approach to it, though of easier access, was intersected by broken ravines, which promised to embarrass the movements of the enemy. To aid the advantages of nature, intrenchments were hastily thrown up by the Russian army on some parts of their line; a wood on the right was strengthened by some field-works; and in the center, on the sloping banks of the Kolatza, two heavy batteries were placed; while between the center and the left, where the position was most accessible, a great redoubt was erected on a height which commanded the whole plain in front of the army. On the extreme left three other batteries were placed, to aid by their cross fire the great redoubt; while, at the distance of 900 toises in front of the line, another redoubt was erected on an eminence to retard the advances of the attacking army. On the 5th of September, 1812, the French army, in three great columns, passed the vast and gloomy convent of Kolotskoi, without meeting an enemy; but as it approached the destined field, clouds of Cossacks were seen traversing the plain, and behind them the Russian army drawn up in battle array, presenting a brilliant and formidable appearance. At this sight the advanced guard halted, and Napoleon, instantly coming forward to an eminence in the front, surveyed the position of the enemy with the eye of a conqueror, and fixed, with the rapidity of lightning, on the points of attack. The first object was to seize the redoubt in front of the position, where Prince Gorczakoff commanded 10,000 men, supported by twelve pieces of heavy artillery.

An attack was immediately ordered, and Murat, with a large body of cavalry, the divisions of Campans, and the corps of Prince Poniatowsky advanced toward the redoubt. The French infantry boldly approached to within twenty yards of the redoubt; the cannon on both sides vomited forth grape-shot on their opponents, and the fearless combatants stood firmly at that short distance discharging musketry at each other. At length the 57th French infantry fiercely assaulted the redoubt, and after a bloody struggle carried it; but the Russians obstinately returned to the charge, and during the evening it was taken and retaken three times. At length, however, the French firmly established themselves in the important position. Both armies now took up their positions, and the fires of the bivouacs were lighted. The French fires scattered here and there upon the field gleamed through the darkness of the night, and presented an animated appearance; while the Russian camp-fires, arranged in a huge semicircle, blazed up as it were in one immense flame, illuminating the half of the heavens with an unearthly luster. Nearly the whole night Napoleon labored incessantly, dispatching orders and asking questions. At length, toward morning, the French emperor, after assuring himself by the moving shadow, which surrounded the Russian watch-fires, that the enemy remained firm on the ground they had chosen, was prevailed upon to take a few hours of necessary repose. During the whole night the French camp presented a scene of busy activity; the soldiers repaired their arms, and the officers, sleepless from anxiety, walked hastily through the cold air, watching the Russian position to see whether a retreat was commencing. The Russian camp was silent; their watch-fires burned steadily throughout the night: morning alone extinguished their bivouacs.

At dawn the Russian army was discovered in their original position, and as it became evident that a general battle was to take place, a universal feeling of joy pervaded the French troops. Both officers and soldiers were animated to the highest pitch, and the impatience of the men to begin the battle, evinced itself in a general murmur throughout their lines. The emperor quitted his tent at day-break, and advancing into the midst of the circle of officers, who awaited his approach, mounted on horseback, and, riding to the heights in front, he surveyed the whole of the Russian position. The weakness of the left, made him resolve to make the principal effort at that point, and against the redoubt in the center. While he was gazing, the sun, breaking through a fog, appeared in cloudless splendor. "It is the sun of Austerlitz!" exclaimed Napoleon, and immediately the trumpets sounded, the drums beat, and the shouts of the soldiers echoed through the plain. The following proclamation was read to the troops: "Soldiers, the battle is at hand which you have so long desired: henceforth the victory depends on yourselves. It has become necessary, and will give you abundance, good winter-quarters, and a speedy return to your homes! Conduct yourselves as you did at Austerlitz, Friedland, Witepsk and Smolensko, and let the remotest posterity recount your actions on this day; let your countrymen say of you all, 'He was in that great battle under the walls of Moscow.'" The enthusiasm of the troops knew no bounds; a universal shout of joyful approbation filled the air, and penetrated even to the Russian camp. The Russian commanders employed the most powerful means to animate the courage of their troops. On the evening of the 6th, a procession of clergy, arrayed in religious robes, and bearing an image, to which miraculous powers were supposed to belong, passed through the whole lines of the army. The soldiers knelt as it passed, and mingled their voices with the chants of the priests, in prayers for victory. The priests bestowed their blessings on the prostrate army, and all, officers and men, felt penetrated by the resolution to conquer in the defense of their country, or to die in the attempt. Shortly afterward the Russian general, Kutusoff, preceded by an adored image, and accompanied by his entire staff, rode along the front of the line, and immediately afterward the following proclamation was read to the troops: "Brothers in arms! Before you, in that image, the object of your pious regard, you see an appeal addressed to heaven to join its aid to that of men against the tyrant who disturbs the universe. Not content with destroying millions of human beings, the images of God, that arch rebel against all laws, human and divine, has penetrated with an armed force into our sanctuaries, defiled them with blood, overturned our altars, and exposed the ark of the Lord, consecrated in that holy image of our church, to the desolation of the elements, and the profanation of impious hands. Fear not, therefore, that the Almighty, who has called the reptile from the dust by his power, should not be with you. Fear not that he will refuse to extend the buckler over your ranks, and to combat his enemy with the sword of St. Michael. It is in that being that I set out to combat, to conquer—if needs be, to die; assured that my eyes shall behold victory. Soldiers! perform your duties: think of your cities in flames; of your children, who implore your protection; think of your emperor, who considers you as the strength of his arm; and to-morrow, before the sun has set, you will have traced your fidelity and faith on the soil of your country, with the blood of the aggressors."

The Russian force was 132,000 men, with 640 pieces of artillery. The French army consisted of 133,000 men, of whom 30,000 were cavalry, and they brought into the field 590 pieces of cannon. Napoleon resolved to attack from the right by echelon, and disposed his masses to act accordingly. On the extreme right Poniatowsky was placed on the old road to Smolensko; next to him, three divisions of Davoust, 30,000 strong, stood near the redoubt, carried on the evening of the 5th; and on his left, Ney's corps was stationed, with Junot's directly in his rear, between the redoubt and the stream of the Kolatza; the heavy cavalry of the reserve was behind the wood on one side of the captured redoubt, while the whole Imperial Guard, also in reserve, was on the other. Morland and Gerard's divisions of Davoust's corps were placed on the left of Ney and Junot, under the orders of Eugene, whose corps, with the heavy cavalry of Grouchy, formed the extreme left of the line. Thus the great bulk of the French army was concentrated around the captured redoubt, within cannon-shot of whose batteries 80,000 veterans and 300 guns were accumulated, and it was easy to see that there the principal efforts of Napoleon were to be made. While these vast preparations were going on, in the French lines, the Russians, on their part, were making every thing ready to oppose to them a most vigorous resistance. The great road from Smolensko to Moscow ran perpendicularly through the center of their position: on its right, Bugawouth and Ostermann occupied the plateau which bordered the Kolatza; the second next the road, the first on the extreme right. On the left of Ostermann, and on the left also of the road, the massy columns of Doctoroff extended as far as the great redoubt, with the defense of which his left was charged. Beyond the redoubt, Rajewskoi lay with his right resting on that bulwark, and his left on the village of Semenowskoie; while the corps of Borosdin and division of Newerofskoie, on an eminence, stretched beyond it to the woods occupied by skirmishing parties; beyond which, on the extreme left, opposite to Poniatowsky, Touczkoff had taken a position at the village of Uliza, on the old road to Smolensko, with his own corps, and the militia of Moscow, which were placed under his orders. The Imperial Guard was in reserve, behind the center. The whole of the cavalry was drawn up in a third line in rear of the infantry, with the exception of one corps, which was on the extreme right near the Moskwa, while the formidable artillery lined the whole front of the position.

At six o'clock on the morning of the 7th of September, a cannon fired from one of the batteries of General Sorbier, announced the commencement of the battle. The French columns advanced in echelon, with the right, under Davoust, in front. Steadily onward moved their masses, under cover of their artillery, without flinching, notwithstanding the incessant discharge of all arms upon them from the Russian position. On through a tempest of grape-shot and round shell, marched those gallant troops. The slaughter committed on their ranks was terrible. Several generals, as they hurried over the plain or toiled at the foot of the intrenchments, were slain, and Davoust had a horse killed under him. Yet onward rolled the moving masses, toward the flaming line which marked the position of the enemy's batteries. General Campans was severely wounded, at the head of his division; Rapp, who succeeded him in command, soon shared the same fate; Dessaix, who succeeded Rapp, also was struck down, and Davoust himself injured by a contusion, received in the fall of his horse, was, for a short time, disabled. At length the redoubts on the left were carried; but the second line of Russians, hastening furiously to the charge, immediately retook them. The combat which ensued was fearful, and the slaughter on either side terrible. Kutusoff, soon perceived that his left wing could not long withstand the repeated attacks which Napoleon directed against it. He therefore moved the corps of Bugawouth from the right of the army, to its support.

During this fierce conflict, Ney, impatient for the fight, was still inactive in the center. At length the moment arived for him to support the left of Davoust; the orders to attack the redoubts were given; the drums beat, and Ney's three divisions precipitated themselves to the charge, preceded by 70 pieces of cannon, and Murat prepared to aid them with 10,000 of his redoubtable cavalry. The heads of the columns soon arrived in the awful tempest of grape-shot, but nothing could restrain their impetuosity. Gallantly facing the storm, they pushed on, till they reached the foot of the intrenchments, and then breaking off to the right and left, passed between them, and entered the redoubts by the gorge. Immediately afterward, Bagawouth's corps came up from the extreme Russian right, where it lay unengaged, and Bagrathion, putting himself at its head, not only expelled the enemy from their intrenchments, but pursued them for some distance into the plain. On the extreme right, Poniatowsky, in the first instance, carried Uliza, by a rapid charge, but he was soon after arrested by Touczkoff, in the woody marshes which lay around that village, where the nature of the ground would only permit skirmishing parties to be employed. Eugene, however, on the left, carried the village of Borodino, on the right bank of the Kolatza, and immediately crossing his divisions over the bridges of that stream, prepared to assail the great redoubt in the center of the Russian line, where Barclay lay with the flower of the Russian infantry. Thus far, however, these contests were subordinate. It was in the right center where Davoust and Ney were striving for the heights of Semenowskoie, that the decisive blows were to be struck.

These important heights soon became the principal objects of contention; both parties strove by accumulating forces upon that important ridge, to gain possession of an eminence which promised to render them masters of the field. After four hours' hard fighting, Ney, finding himself overmatched by superior forces, anxiously demanded succor; and Napoleon, perceiving that these heights were still in the hands of the Russians, made preparations for a grand attack. The Young Guard, and a great part of the cavalry in reserve, were sent to the support of Davoust; 400 pieces of cannon were brought to bear upon the redoubts; while, under cover of this tremendous fire, immense columns of infantry advanced to the assault. As they marched over the plain, the grape-shot from the Russian batteries swept through them, demolishing entire battalions as they approached; but the survivors, hastily closing their ranks, marched over the corpses of their slain companions, and steadily and firmly advanced with an unbroken front against the rampart of death. The Russian general, Bagrathion, perceiving that the French were gradually gaining ground, ordered the whole left wing to issue from their intrenchments, leaving only the reserves to guard the works. And now a terrible scene occurred in the plain. Eighty thousand men, and seven hundred pieces of cannon, accumulated in a small space, strove with unparalleled fury, for above an hour. Whole ranks of men were swept away before the murderous discharges of grape, like grass before the mower's scythe. Neither party seemed willing to relinquish the strife; French courage and Russian obstinacy raged against each other with terrible effect. The ground trembled beneath the thunder of the cannon; and the screams of the wounded, and the groans of the dying, mingled with the sullen roar of artillery, the incessant rattle of the musketry, and the savage cries of the infuriated combatants, produced such a confusion of terrible sounds, that it seemed almost as if the demons of darkness had been let loose from their prison, and were engaged in a fearful carnival on the earth. And above this theater of bloodshed, hung the sable curtain of war, as if endeavoring to shroud the awful spectacle from the fair face of heaven. At length, the Russians, assailed in flank by Friant's division of Davoust's corps, and having lost their commander, Bagrathion, who, with St. Priest, the chief of his staff, was severely wounded, began to give ground. General Konownitsyn immediately assumed the command and drew back his troops, with their whole artillery, from the disputed ridge, and established them in a strong position in the rear, behind the ravine Semenowskoie. The victorious French endeavored to pursue their advantage, and the cavalry, under Nansouty, fell with the utmost fury upon the extreme left of the new Russian position; but the Russian guard, forming themselves into squares, under the tremendous fire from their abandoned works, now lined by French cannon, defeated all the efforts of the French, and, for the remainder of the day, maintained their ground alike against the impetuous charges of the horse and the fatal ravages of the artillery. In the mean time an obstinate conflict was raging in the center. Barclay, after losing the village of Borodino, still resolutely defended the great redoubt. The viceroy, after having crossed the Kolatza, advanced with the utmost intrepidity through the broken ground which lay in the front, overthrew the division of General Paskiewitch, and, aided by General Bonami, with his brave brigade, in the midst of the fire of eighty pieces of cannon, carried that formidable intrenchment. Kutusoff, sensible of the necessity of repairing this disaster, instantly brought forward his best troops, and, after an arduous conflict, not only retook the redoubt, but made Bonami and part of his troops prisoners. Napoleon was anxiously solicited to support that point by the Imperial Guard; but he deemed it imprudent to risk that last reserve at so great a distance from support. After much hesitation he refused the succor, and Eugene was left for two hours to support unaided the terrible fire of the great redoubt, and the repeated charges of the Russian cavalry. Suddenly the attention of the emperor was arrested by a violent outcry and confusion on the left. Kutusoff had ordered Ouvaroff, with eight regiments of Cossacks, to cover the divisions of Ostermann and Bagawouth, while they were traversing the field of battle, from the Russian right to their left, by an attack on the left flank of the French, under Eugene. This irruption was attended with the most signal success. A brigade of cavalry, under Ornano was speedily overthrown; the Cossacks soon passed Borodino; Delzon's Italian division avoided destruction only by throwing themselves into squares; the viceroy himself escaped being made prisoner only by throwing himself into one of the squares of infantry; the baggage and artillery drivers fled in confusion, and Napoleon himself deemed the attack so serious that he hastily galloped to the spot, accompanied by the cavalry and artillery of the guard. It turned out, however, to be a false alarm, as Ouvaroff, unsupported by infantry, retired across the Kolatza, when he found himself threatened by large bodies of the enemy; but the diversion produced the desired effect, and, by withdrawing a portion of the reserve destined for the attack of the great redoubt, sensibly retarded the success of the day. But after the Russian intrenchments on the left were carried, Napoleon resolved to make a desperate effort to regain his advantages in the center. For this purpose more than 200 pieces of cannon were directed against the great redoubt; and, while the viceroy reformed his divisions for the assault, Caulaincourt, in command of Montbrun's division of cuirassiers, which he had assumed as that general had just been struck down by a cannon-shot, was directed to penetrate through the Russian line, and, wheeling around, to enter the intrenchment by its gorge. "You will see me there immediately, dead or alive," cried the gallant young general, and, setting off at a gallop, he led his men against the redoubt. Soon the glittering mass was lost in the volumes of smoke which arose from every part of the intrenchment; the vivid discharges of the cannon gleamed through the vapor, and the hissing, death-dealing missales swept like an iron tempest through the ranks of the brave Frenchmen.

The Russians hastened to support the intrenchment; the corps of Ostermann was placed in front, and the regiments of the guards, Preobazinski and Semenowskoie, were stationed as a reserve in their rear. Caulaincourt's division, advancing with the utmost, rapidity, threw itself with such fury upon the regiments of Russian horse whom Kutusoff had opposed to it, that, crushed and overthrown, the Russians fled in disorder. The great redoubt continued to vomit forth an incessant fire upon its assailants. Eugene, with his infantry, was advancing to the attack; already were the bayonets of his troops gleaming on its slopes, when the columns of the cuirassiers were seen ascending through the clouds of smoke which enveloped the intrenchments; its sides seemed clothed in glittering steel; and the fire from its summit, after redoubling its fury for a few seconds, suddenly ceased. The flames of the volcano were extinguished in blood; and the resplendent casques of the French cuirassiers appeared, when the smoke cleared away, above the highest embrasures of the intrenchment. The brave Caulaincourt met a glorious death at the entrance of the redoubt; but his fall did not prevent the French from establishing themselves in their important conquest. The Russian soldiers, charged with its defense, refusing quarter, had almost all perished in the assault, and the interior presented a frightful assemblage of dismounted cannon, dying men, broken arms, and wounded horses. Marshal Grouchy hoping to profit by the consternation which its capture had occasioned, advanced at the head of his cavalry, against the corps of Ostermann, drawn up on the heights in the rear; but they were met by the chasseurs of the Russian guards, who, vastly superior in numbers, drove back the French with severe loss. Encouraged by this success, the Russian general resolved to make a forward movement in order to re-occupy the ground on which his army had stood in the center at the commencement of the battle. Ostermann's corps, with a great part of the guard, and a large body of cavalry, advanced on this perilous mission. The batteries which the French had now established on the heights, won from the Russians, opened with terrible effect upon the advancing columns; but still the Russians firmly marched onward, and even reached the foot of the intrenchment, when eighty pieces of cannon thundered on their close ranks, with a severity of fire unexampled in war. Notwithstanding the terrible storm of iron, which thinned their ranks, the Russian cavalry even carried some of the redoubts, by several gallant charges, and erected the Russian standards on their old strongholds. But all their efforts were in vain; they were speedily retaken, and the Muscovite battalions, unable to advance, unwilling to retire, toiled and died at the foot of the field-works which they had lost. At length Kutusoff drew off, covered by his immense artillery, and the Russians were again re-established along the whole line on the heights, immediately in rear of their original position. The Russian batteries were planted on the heights behind the redoubts, and from this second line the artillery opened upon the French who were in possession of the intrenchments. In the evening, Poniatowsky advanced against the corps of the Russian general Bagawouth, which then occupied the great road to Smolensko, on the left of the Russian line. After an obstinate struggle the French carried the position, and the Russians retired to the heights in the rear. Thus the Russians at all points, at the close of day, had lost their original position, and on the succeeding day they retreated on the great road to Moscow.

The dreadful loss on both sides demonstrated the unparalleled obstinacy of the battle. The Russians lost one of their bravest and ablest generals, Prince Bagrathion, who fell severely wounded while defending the redoubts on the left, and subsequently died of his wounds; Generals Kaitaisoff and Touckoff killed, and thirty generals of an inferior rank wounded. Fifteen thousand killed, 30,000 wounded, and 2,000 prisoners, presented a total loss of nearly 50,000 men. On the French side, beside Generals Monbum, Caulaincourt, and many others killed, thirty generals were wounded; and the total loss was 12,000 killed, and 38,000 wounded. The trophies of victory were nearly equally divided. The French took ten pieces of cannon from their enemy, who captured thirteen pieces from them.

BOSSUT-LES-WALCOUR, A.D. 1792.—An engagement took place near this village in Belgium, fourteen miles south of Charleroi, between the Austrians and French, in 1792, in which the former were defeated.

BOSTON, A.D. 1775.—The siege of Boston includes the battle of Bunker's Hill, for which reason we have given the description of that battle under this head.

The Americans followed up their victory at Lexington, by laying siege to the British garrison in Boston. The left wing of the American army rested upon the river Medford, thus intercepting the communication of the besieged with Charlestown neck; the right wing was posted at Roxbury to repress the sallies of the British in that quarter, and the center occupied Cambridge. The American army was greatly superior in number to that of the English, it being stated that at one time, it consisted of 30,000 men; but the number was variable, for as yet the army was wanting in that discipline without which neither order nor stability can be maintained, and many of the soldiers, weary of life in the camp, returned to their homes, while other fresh volunteers were constantly arriving to take their places. The Americans were well provided with food, but their arms were far from perfect. Their artillery consisted of sixteen pieces, of which six only were in a serviceable condition, and these, with two or three exceptions, were of the smallest caliber.

Of powder they had only eighty-two half barrels; and they were provided with but a scanty supply of bombs and cannon balls. The infantry was armed with pieces of various sizes and caliber, each man having brought his own gun to the field; many of them being mere fowling-pieces, while none of them were provided with the bayonet. The principal head-quarters of the besiegers were at Roxbury and Cambridge.

The British army presented a strong contrast to that of the Americans. Their arsenals were filled with cannon of all sizes, muskets, swords, powder and ammunition of every description. The soldiers were well disciplined and practiced in the art of war; having fought many a battle in countries of the old world. Inured to fatigue and danger, they panted to engage with the "rebels," as they considered the Americans, and wipe out the disgrace they had experienced at Lexington. The British garrison was commanded by General Gage.

The Americans besieged the city so strictly, that a great scarcity of provisions began to be felt both by the soldiery and by the citizens; and soon they were reduced entirely to salted food. The inhabitants on several occasions had made earnest application to the British governor to be permitted to leave the city; but General Gage, notwithstanding that there was not a sufficiency of provisions for his own men, refused his consent. He wished apparently to hold the citizens as hostages for the safety of the town and his troops. At length however perceiving no immediate relief from England, whence he awaited reinforcements before commencing active operations against the enemy, he consented to the departure of as many of the citizens as should choose to go, providing they would give up all weapons in their possession to be deposited in Faneuil Hall. But no sooner had the citizens given up their arms, than the British commander, after allowing a few to depart, refused to grant passes, and the greater part of the inhabitants were obliged to remain. He afterward allowed a few others to depart; but they were not permitted to take their effects with them.

On the 25th of May, the British man-of-war Cerberus arrived at Boston, bringing from England three experienced officers, Burgoyne, Howe, and Clinton. The garrison, meanwhile, had been reinforced by accessions from England and Ireland, until it numbered 10,000 men. The besieging army at the commencement of June, consisted of about 16,000 men, and these were all fired with the one desire to drive the invaders from their soil. The army was composed of soldiers furnished by the several colonies, and each colony held supreme control over the movements of its own corps. But the colonies, by common consent, appointed General Ward, commander-in-chief of the besieging army. The Americans exerted their every power to intercept from the English all supplies of provisions. Hog's and Noddle's Islands in Boston harbor, abounded in corn and cattle, and the English frequently visited these islands in search of provisions. The Americans determined to put an end to this by destroying all the corn and removing the cattle. Accordingly a detachment was sent to Hog's Island. They effected a landing and were engaged in destroying the provender when they were fiercely attacked by a British foraging party and a severe skirmish ensued.

The British troops were aided by one or two armed vessels in the harbor. The fight raged until late at night, and a number of Americans were killed. They succeeded, however, in expelling the English from the island, and completed their work of destruction. Early on the following morning the provincials discovered that one of the enemy's vessels had grounded during the night, and was abandoned by its crew. They immediately boarded her, and having divested her of every thing of value, they returned with the cattle in triumph to their camp. The Americans made similar descents on Noddle's, Patrick's, and Deer Islands, with like success. Meanwhile the British generals were meditating on the most expedient method of extricating themselves from the unpleasant position in which they were placed; and, after a long deliberation, they resolved to commence operations by taking possession of Bunker's Hill, and Dorchester Heights. The American generals were immediately informed of the intended movements of the enemy, and the most strenuous efforts were made to defeat them. Colonel William Prescott was ordered to occupy Bunker's Hill, with a detachment of 1,000 men, and two pieces of artillery. There he was to throw up intrenchments, and await the coming of the enemy. On the night of the 16th of June, Prescott, with his forces, set forth from Cambridge for Charlestown. In the deepest silence the Americans continued their march until they had arrived at Charlestown neck, where they were joined by General Putnam and Major Brooks. Having placed a guard of ten men in Charlestown, Prescott advanced to Bunker's Hill. But with the advice and consent of his officers, he abandoned the original plan of fortifying Bunker's Hill, and marched to Breed's Hill,* which being nearer Boston, he considered better adapted for his purpose. He therefore directed his troops to throw up intrenchments on this height, at the same time causing them to fortify Bunker's Hill, in order to cover his retreat across the peninsula, in the event of a defeat. The Americans advanced rapidly with their work. Officers and men, with shovel and pick, labored with equal zeal, and before the break of day, they had constructed a strong redoubt, eight rods square. The east and west sides of the redoubt were protected by fences six feet in height, composed of rails and stone. The redoubt was defended by two cannon in embrasure. The Americans, at about four o'clock on the morning of the 17th of June, were busily engaged in completing the breastwork on the eastern side of the redoubt, when they were discovered by the watch on board the British vessel of war, Lively. The sailors were called to arms, and the captain of the Lively, without awaiting General Gage's orders, opened a brisk cannonade on the American works. Aroused by the sound of the cannon, the people of Boston flocked to the shores in crowds; and soon every house top and height in the city was black with spectators. The English generals gazed at the American position with astonishment, and bitterly did General Gage regret that he had not occupied Breed's Hill when it was in his power to do so. The Americans, protected by their intrenchments, worked incessantly, in spite of the shots from the Lively. The firing, by order of the naval commander of Boston, was discontinued; but soon afterward it was renewed from the vessel, and a battery on Copp's Hill, directly opposite the American position, also opened its thunders on the provincials.

The British generals at once saw the importance of dislodging the Americans before their fortifications were completed, for Breed's Hill commanded the city, and if the Americans planted a battery on this height, Boston would be no longer tenable. A council of war was called, and it was immediately decided that a force should be sent out to drive the Americans from the peninsula, and destroy their fortifications on Breed's and Bunker's Hills. A general fire, therefore, was opened on Breed's Hill from the artillery of the city, of the floating batteries in the harbor, and of the fleet. Bombs and balls fell like hail in the American lines. The battery on Copp's Hill, which was nearly on an equal elevation with the American position, especially annoyed the provincials. But amid this storm of missiles, the Americans worked on; both officers and men, encouraged by the voice and example of their patriotic and energetic commander. Prescott seemed everywhere, directing and encouraging, and with his own hand giving the finishing touches to the works. His courage and presence of mind are worthy of the highest praise. One incident deserves particular mention. A soldier recklessly exposed his person outside of the redoubt, and was instantly struck down by a cannon ball. A few of the Americans were so alarmed by this accident that they left the hill. Prescott, perceiving this, walked around the fortifications upon the parapet, in full view of the British. The balls whistled around him in a whirlwind of iron; but he was untouched. General Ward had been urged early in the morning to send fresh troops to relieve those on duty; but only a portion of Stark's regiment was allowed to go, as Ward apprehended that Cambridge would be the principal point of attack. Convinced otherwise, however, by certain intelligence, the remainder of Stark's regiment, and the whole of Reed's corps were ordered to reinforce Prescott. General Gage made immediate preparation to storm the American works.

It was nearly noon when two or three thousand British soldiers, commanded by General Sir William Howe, and General Pigot, embarked in twenty-eight barges, from Boston. They landed at Morton's Point, a little north of the eastern foot of Breed's Hill, under the guns of the Falcon, and the other vessels of war. The British force consisted of four battalions of heavy infantry, two of light infantry, and two of genadiers. The music of their martial bands reached the ears of the little band of Americans, as they deployed, the grenadiers on the right, and the infantry on the left, in a long line of gorgeous scarlet and glittering steel. General Howe, however, observing the strength of the American position, ordered a halt, and sent to Boston for reinforcements. Meanwhile, the American forces on the peninsula of Charlestown, were in a state of the greatest excitement. When the news of the landing of the British reached Cambridge, two miles distant, the bells were rung, and the military and the people made the most active preparations to defend the town. The regiments of Generals Ward, Paterson, and Gardner, and a portion of Bridge's regiment were stationed at Cambridge, while the soldiers of Massachusetts and Connecticut were marched to Charlestown. The Americans on Breed's Hill ceased working at twelve o'clock; their tools were sent to Bunker's Hill, and having partaken of some refreshments, the New England flag was hoisted, and the soldiers prepared to receive the enemy. In spite of the terrific fire of the British, they had completed a breastwork from the redoubt nearly to the foot of the hill, toward the Mystic river, and had lost but one man! At two o'clock, Howe was reinforced by a large body of British troops from Boston, so that his whole force now consisted of nearly 4,000 men. The dispositions of both armies for the approaching battle were as follows:

The center and left wing of the Americans formed themselves behind the trench which extended down the side of the hill, nearly to the Mystic river, and the right wing rested on Charlestown, occupying many of the houses. The extremity of the left wing was the weakest part of the line, for an open and level space of ground was left between the end of the breastwork and the river. To strengthen this spot, and obstruct the passage of the enemy, the Americans, while the British were forming, hastily constructed a barricade, consisting of two parallel rail fences, the interval between which being filled with fresh cut grass.

The British army was formed in two columns. The left wing, under General Pigot, was to assail the redoubt on Breed's Hill, and the center and right, under General Howe, was to attack the American left, near the Mystic river.

The Americans watched the movements of the enemy with breathless interest. They saw before them a magnificent array of the best disciplined soldiers of Europe; and they could not but feel their own inferiority when compared to the matchless force which they were about to engage. They saw, too, constant accessions made to the British army by troops from Boston, while they on their side had received only feeble reinforcements. But, with hearts animated by patriotism, they sternly awaited the approach of the enemy, determined to sell the victory at the highest price. The arrival of Dr. Warren and General Pomeroy, at a timely moment, filled the Americans with joy. Colonel Prescott offered to resign his command to Warren, but the latter refused to accept it, saying, "I am come to fight as a volunteer, and feel honored in being allowed to serve under so brave an officer."

Having completed his dispositions for the attack, the British general put his forces in motion. A signal-flag was displayed, and the battery upon Copp's hill, and the floating batteries and the fleet in the harbor, opened a terrible cannonade against the redoubt. Roxbury, the head-quarters of General Thomas, was also assailed by a furious cannonade, in order to prevent reinforcements being sent to Charlestown. The American artillery responded feebly to the guns of the enemy, and were soon silenced. Under cover of their guns the British slowly advanced toward the American line. As they moved up the acclivity their artillery poured forth its thunders; but finding the discharges ineffectual the cannon were abandoned, and they resolved to continue the fight with small arms alone. The day was intensely hot, and burdened by knapsacks and bearing muskets, the British soldiers toiled up the hill toward the enemy. A deep silence pervaded the American lines. The sun shone placidly on the rude intrenchments of the Americans, and his rays were reflected back a hundred times by the brilliant arms and gorgeous uniforms of the ascending host; while strains of martial music enlivened the air. It was the calm before a tempest. Fifteen hundred resolute men were behind those earthen walls, and the British troops were marching blindfold, as it were, to certain death. Prescott, aware that his men were but scantily supplied with ammunition, had directed them to spare their powder, and, in the language of that gallant officer, not to fire on the enemy until they could see the whites of their eyes. "Then," said he, "aim at their waistbands; and pick off the officers, known by their handsome coats!" When the British arrived within gun-shot of the American works, they opened a desultory fire. A few of the Americans, unable to restrain their impatience, returned the fire. Putnam, perceiving the importance of strict obedience to Prescott's command, hastened to the spot, and threatened to cut down the first man who should again be guilty of disobedience. On came the assailing column; they advanced to within a few yards of the breastworks. "FIRE!" shouted Prescott, and the Americans opened a volley of musketry on the enemy which mowed down the British by scores. Volley succeeded volley with the same deadly effect. The ground streamed with British blood, and the corpses of the slain lay piled in gory heaps. The English wavered, they broke, they fled. Down to the water's edge in an affrighted mass fled those troops which had a moment before so proudly marched to the assault. Again the American lines were wrapt in silence. The smoke of battle arose from the field, and the sun again shone placidly upon the American intrenchments; but now his rays were feebly reflected in the tarnished accoutrements of the British slain. The Americans were eager to pursue the flying enemy; and it was with considerable difficulty that they were held in check by their officers. Putnam hastened to Bunker's Hill for reinforcements, but only a few troops could be brought to Breed's Hill before the British made a second attack.

The British re-formed at the foot of the hill, and reinforced by four hundred marines from Boston, commanded by Major Small, they again moved up the hill in the same order as before, General Howe marching in the rear. They had moved their artillery toward the rail-fence, and having pushed it within a hundred paces of the breast-work, opened a furious fire on the Americans with considerable effect. During these movements the battery on Copp's Hill was directed against Charlestown; a carcass and some hot-shot were thrown into the village, and several of the buildings were set on fire. The fire spread rapidly, and soon the greater portion of the town was wrapped in flames. The English hoped under cover of the smoke of the burning village to approach the breastworks unperceived by the enemy; but a breeze sprung up from the west, and drove the smoke in a contrary direction, exposing to full view the advancing columns. The assailants who had reserved their fire, now opened a brisk discharge of musketry on the Americans. Three men were wounded and Major Moore was killed by this volley, which otherwise was ineffectual. But the Americans did not respond. Silently, with their gun-barrels grimly resting across the breast-works, they awaited the nearer approach of the enemy. At length the signal was given, a sheet of flame illuminated the verge of the parapet, and a leaden tempest swept through the British ranks, with terrible effect. Officers and men went down before that fearful storm like grass before the mower's scythe.

The dead of the former engagement received new companions; and British blood again gushed in crimson rivulets down the sides of the hill. The officers of General Howe's staff fell around him, until he stood alone among the dead. His troops faltered. Vainly he shouted for them to advance, a second withering discharge from the Americans sent them rushing in disorder toward the water. Here they came to a halt, and their officers made preparations for the third assault. General Clinton, who, from Copp's Hill, had observed all the movements of the day, hastened across the river, and joined the shattered army as a volunteer. Howe had discovered the weakness of the American line of defense, between the trench and the rail fence, and resolved to lead his left wing, with the artillery, against that point, while a feigned attack on the rail-fence, should divert the attention of the enemy from the real object of the assault. The soldiers were directed to stand the fire of the enemy, and then to carry the works at the point of the bayonet. The ammunition of the Americans was nearly expended; but with the firmness of men fighting for their liberty, they resolved to club their muskets, and sell their lives as dearly as possible. They endeavored to procure ammunition and reinforcements from the main body of the army; but the enemy's artillery, commanding all the approaches to Breed's Hill, effectually prevented them from doing so. Having completed their preparations for a final assault, the British troops advanced

Their artillery swept the interior of the American line, from one extremity to the other, and many of the patriots were slain by its incessant discharges. The British carried the breastwork at a single charge, and the Americans retreated to the redoubt. From this work they maintained, with terrible effect, a vigorous discharge on the enemy. The British officers were the especial aim of the enemy, and many of them were slain, among whom were Colonel Abercrombie, and Majors Williams, and Speedlove. Howe was wounded in the foot; but with bravery kept his place at the head of his men. The fire from the redoubt gradually weakened, for the Americans had loaded their pieces with their last charges. The British neared the wall: "Forward, for the glory of the marines!" shouted Major Pitcairn, and sprang upon the parapet. A ball struck him, and he fell back upon his soldiers. The English pressed forward, and mounting the wall, leaped down among the enemy. A furious hand-to-hand combat ensued; but the bayonts of the British were more powerful than the clubbed weapons of the Americans. They gradually drove back the defenders of the redoubt; their countrymen followed them, and Prescott, perceiving the folly of resisting a force so greatly superior, ordered his men to retreat. The little band of Americans was fairly surrounded by enemies; but with sturdy blows they fought their way through the mass, and retreated toward Bunker's Hill. Prescott and Warren were among the last to quit the redoubt. Prescott escaped unharmed, though his clothes were pierced in many places by thrusts of the sword and bayonet. Warren, when at a short distance from the redoubt, was shot through the head, and killed instantly. The British pursued the flying enemy, bayonetting all that came in their path. The Americans on Bunker's Hill, pressed forward, and poured a deadly volley on the enemy, and covered the retreat of their countrymen with the utmost bravery. Those at the rail-fence, had maintained their ground, and had effectually checked the enemy at that point, thus saving the defenders of the redoubt from being entirely cut off. When they saw the defeat of the main body, however, they abandoned their works, and fled also. Putnam endeavored vainly to rally them. He pleaded, cursed, and commanded; but so great was the panic that his efforts were fruitless. The whole army retreated to Prospect Hill, where they encamped for the night. The British took possession of Bunker's Hill, where they prepared to spend the night. Neither party was willing to hazard a new movement, and hostilities ceased.

The Americans lost in this battle 450 men, of whom 115 were killed and missing, 305 were wounded, and 30 were made prisoners. The British lost, according to General Gage's official statement, 226 killed, and 828 wounded, making a total of 1054. Five pieces of cannon, and all the intrenching tools, which the Americans left at Bunker's Hill, fell into the hands of the British. Thus ended this famous battle. The British no longer ridiculed the valor of the provincials, for it was sufficiently tested in this hard fought field, to prove that they were foes to be feared.

Breed's Hill is now crowned by a stately monument, erected by the descendants of those noble men, whose valor and patriotism it witnessed on that memorable day.

George Washington, two days before the battle of Bunker's Hill, had been elected by the Continental Congress, commander-in-chief of all the patriot forces raised, or to be raised, for the defense of American liberty. The commander-in-chief immediately set out from Philadelphia to the scene of hostilities, and arrived at the American camp in Cambridge on the 2d of July. On the 9th, Washington called a council of war, to consult upon future operations, and it was unanimously decided to maintain the siege of Boston with the utmost vigor. On the 10th of July, the relative positions of the two armies were as follows: the British were strongly intrenched on Bunker's Hill, about a mile from Charlestown, and advanced about half a mile from the place of the late action, with their sentries extended about 150 yards on the Cambridge side of the narrowest part of the neck leading from Cambridge to Boston. Three floating batteries lay in the Mystic river near the British camp, and one twenty-gun ship below the ferry-place between Boston and Charlestown. They had also a battery on Copp's Hill, on the Boston side, and upon Roxbury neck they were also deeply intrenched and strongly fortified. The bulk of the British army occupied Bunker's Hill, and the remainder were posted on Roxbury neck, except the light horse, and a few troops in Boston.

The Americans had thrown up intenchments on Winter and Prospect Hills, in full view of the enemy's camp at the distance of a little more than a mile. At Roxbury, General Thomas had thrown up a strong work on the hill, about 200 yards above the meeting-house. The troops from New Hampshire, with a regiment of Rhode Islanders, occupied Winter Hill; and General Putnam, with some Connecticut troops, was posted on Prospect Hill. Cambridge was occupied by Massachusetts troops; and the remainder of the Rhode Island men were posted at Sewall's Farm. The residue of the army, to the number of 700 men, were posted in several small towns along the coast to prevent the depredations of the British. The following letter, written by the Rev. William Emerson, a chaplain of the army, a few days after Washington's arrival at Cambridge, gives a life picture of the American camp: "New lords, new laws. The generals, Washington and Lee, are upon the lines every day. New orders from his excellency are read to the respective regiments every morning after prayers. The strictest government is taking place, and great distinction is made between officers and soldiers. Every one is made to know his place and keep it, or to be tied up and receive thirty or forty lashes, according to his crime. Thousands are at work every day from four till eleven o'clock in the morning. It is surprising how much work has been done. The lines are extended almost from Cambridge to the Mystic river; so that very soon it will be nearly impossible for the enemy to get between the works, except at one place which is supposed to be left purposely unfortified, to entice the enemy out of their fortresses. Who would have thought, twelve months past, that all Cambridge and Charlestown would be covered over with American camps, and cut up into forts and intrenchments, and all the lands, fields, and orchards, laid common—horses and cattle feeding in the choicest mowing-land, whole fields of corn eaten down to the ground, and large parks of well-regulated locusts cut down for fire-wood and other public uses. This, I must say, looks a little melancholy. My quarters are at the foot of the famous Prospect Hill, where such preparations are made for the reception of the enemy. It is very diverting to walk among the camps. They are as different in form as the owners are in their dress, and every tent is a portraiture of the temper and taste of the persons who encamp in it. Some are made of boards, and some of sail-cloth, some partly of one and partly of the other. Again others are made of stone, or turf, brick or brush. Some are thrown up in a hurry; others are curiously wrought with doors and windows, done with wreaths and withes, in the manner of a basket. Some are proper tents and marquees, looking like the regular camp of the enemy. In these are the Rhode Islanders, who are furnished with tent equipage, in every thing the most exact English style.

The British strength, on the 27th of July, was computed by Washington, to be about 12,000 men, including their marine forces; the American, including sick and absent, was about 16,000; but then the latter had to guard a semicircle of eight or nine miles, to every part of which they were obliged to be equally attentive, while the British, situated as it were in the center of the semicircle, and having the entire command of the water, could bend their whole force against any part of it with equal facility. The American army was formed into three grand divisions, under the command of Generals Ward, Lee, and Putnam.

On the night of the 26th of August the Americans took possession of a hill in advance of their lines, and within point-blank shot of the enemy on Bunker's Hill. The men worked incessantly the whole night, and before morning they had thrown up an intrenchment which bade defiance to the enemy's cannon. At about nine o'clock on Sunday morning, the British opened their guns on the American intrenchment, and maintained a heavy cannonade during the whole day. The works, however, were not injured; two men were killed and two wounded. The Americans did not return the enemy's fire, owing to the scarcity of ammunition, except with one nine pounder, with which they sunk one of the British floating batteries. The close investment of Boston soon caused much suffering among the troops and citizens in the town. They suffered greatly for want of fresh provisions; and being unaccustomed to the use of salt food, of which they had an abundance, many fell sick. The American lines were advanced so close to those of the enemy, that they could see every thing that passed in the British camps on the two peninsulas of Boston and Charlestown; but the patriots could make no assault, as both of the peninsulas were surrounded by British ships-of-war and floating batteries, and the narrow necks of land leading to them were fortified in such a manner as to be impracticable. The two armies remained in close proximity, but almost entirely inactive, during the remainder of the year. On the 1st of January, 1776, the Union Flag was, for the first time, unfurled over the American camp, at Cambridge. Washington's army had dwindled to about 10,000 effective men. Meanwhile, the British Parliament had made active preparations to crush the rebellion. A land and naval force of 55,000 men was voted for the American service, and 17,000 mercenary troops were hired by the government of Great Britain from the Landgrave of Hesse Cassel and other petty German rulers. On receiving intelligence of these proceedings, the American Congress saw the necessity of immediate and energetic action. Washington was urged to attack the British in Boston at once, and, by strenuous efforts, his army was increased to 14,000 efficient men. On the evening of the 2nd of March, a heavy cannonade was opened on Boston from all the American batteries, with considerable effect. The fire was returned with spirit, and the cannonade on both sides was continued, with brief intermissions, until the 4th. At seven o'clock on the evening of the 3d, General Thomas, with 2,000 men, proceeded to take possession of Dorchester Heights, and, by their great activity and industry, threw up intrenchments of sufficient strength to resist the shot of the enemy, and armed them with heavy cannon which completely commanded the city and harbor. The position of the British was now critical in the extreme. Howe was assured that the American guns would immediately destroy the British fleet in the harbor; and the situation of the troops in the city was no less dangerous. The British general resolved to drive the Americans from their advantageous position, at all hazards; but a storm arose which, rendering the passage of the harbor impracticable, gave the Americans time to strengthen their works, until they were almost impregnable, and Howe saw that he must either surrender or evacuate the city. On the 17th of March, 1776, Washington wrote to Governor Cooke as follows: "Sir: I have the pleasure to inform you that the ministerial troops evacuated the town of Boston without destroying it, and that we are now in full possession." Seven thousand soldiers, four thousand seamen, and fifteen hundred families of loyalists on that day sailed for Halifax, and the Americans, embarking in boats, proceeded down the river to Boston, which they entered in triumph, with beating drums and flying colors. The American commander-in-chief was ignorant of the destination of Lord Howe; but supposing he would proceed to New York, Washington, as soon as he had placed Boston in a state of security, advanced with his army toward New York, where he arrived on the 14th of April.

BOSWORTH, A.D. 1485.—The decisive battle between Richard III. and the Earl of Richmond, in which the former lost his life and crown, and the latter gained the throne of England, was fought on a plain near Bosworth in the county of Leicester, in England. The town is situated on an eminence, in the center of a fertile district, and is one of the pleasantest and neatest villages of England. In the battle-field is a well, named from Richard III., with an inscription by the late Dr. Parr; and an elevation called Crown Hill, where Lord Stanley is said to have placed Richard's crown on the Earl of Richmond's head.

In the year 1485, the Earl of Richmond set sail from Harfleur in Normandy, with a small army of about 2,000 men, and after a voyage of six days, arrived at Milford-haven in Wales, where he landed without opposition. Sir Rice ap Thomas and Sir Walter Herbert, were intrusted by Richard to oppose the Earl of Richmond; but the former immediately deserted to the earl, and the second made but a feeble opposition to him. As the earl advanced toward Shrewsbury, he received every day some reinforcement from his partizans. Sir Gilbert Talbot joined him with all the vassals and retainers of the family of Shrewsbury. Sir Thomas Bourcher and Sir Walter Hungerford brought their friends to share his fortunes, and the appearance of men of distinction in his camp already made his cause wear a favorable aspect. But the danger to which Richard was chiefly exposed, proceeded not so much from the zeal of his open enemies, as from the infidelity of his pretended friends. Scarce any nobleman of distinction was sincerely attached to his cause, except the Duke of Norfolk; and all those who feigned the most loyalty, were only watching for an opportunity to betray and desert him. But the persons whom he most suspected were Lord Stanley, and his brother Sir William, whose connections with the family of Richmond, notwithstanding their professions of attachment to his person, were never entirely forgotten or overlooked by him. When he empowered Lord Stanley to levy forces, he still retained his eldest son, Lord Strange, as a pledge of his fidelity; and that nobleman was, on this account, obliged to employ great caution and reserve in his proceedings. He raised a powerful body of his friends and retainers in Cheshire and Lancashire, but without openly declaring himself; and though the Earl of Richmond had received secret assurances of his friendly intentions, the armies on both sides knew not what to infer from his equivocal behavior. The two rivals at length approached each other at Bosworthfield in Leicestershire; the Earl of Richmond at the head of 6,000 men, Richard with an army of about 13,000 men, and a decisive action between them was hourly expected. Notwithstanding the magnitude of the enemy's army, the Earl of Richmond did not despair; his chief confidence lay in the friendship and secret assurances of Stanley, who with a body of 7,000 men hovered near the field of battle, and declined engaging on either side. As soon as he had arrived within sight of the enemy, Richard drew up his army in order of battle. He gave the command of the vanguard to the Duke of Norfolk, while he led the main body himself, with the crown on his head, designing by this, either to inspire the enemy with awe, or to render him conspicuous to his own army. The van of Richmond's army, consisting of archers, was commanded by John, Earl of Oxford; Sir Gilbert Talbot led the right wing, Sir John Savage the left, while the earl himself, accompanied by his uncle, the Earl of Pembroke, placed himself in the main body. Lord Stanley in the meantime, posted himself on one flank between the two armies, while his brother took his station opposite him on the other. Richard seeing him thus in a situation equally convenient for joining either army, immediately sent him orders to unite himself to the main body. This order Lord Stanley refused to obey, and Richard gave instant commands for beheading Lord Strange, whom he still kept as a hostage. He was persuaded, however, to postpone the execution till after the fight, and, attending to the more important transactions of the day, he directed the trumpets to sound to battle. The two armies approaching each other, the battle began with a shower of arrows, and soon the two adverse fronts closed in a deadly hand-to-hand struggle. This was what Lord Stanley had for some time anticipated. Immediately profiting by the occasion, he joined the line of Richmond and thus turned the fortune of the day. This measure, so unexpected to the soldiers, though not to their leaders, had a proportioned effect on both armies. Richmond's soldiers were inspired with new valor, while Richard's men were dispirited and soon fell into disorder. The intrepid tyrant, perceiving the danger of his situation, spurred his horse into the thickest of the fight. Richmond also quitted his station behind the army, and rode to the front to encourage his troops by his presence. Richard, mad with rage, no sooner saw his detested rival, than he rushed toward him with the fury of a tiger springing on his prey, resolved that either Richmond's death or his own should decide the victory between them. He slew Sir William Brandon, the earl's standard bearer, who attempted to stop his career, and hurling Sir John Cheyne, who took Brandon's place, to the ground, he arrived within reach of Richmond himself. The earl, in the meantime, firmly awaited his approach; but an interposing crowd separated them. Thus disappointed, Richard went to inspire his troops, by his presence, in another quarter of the field. At length perceiving his army every where yielding or flying, and finding that all hopes of victory were gone, with a loud yell of defiance and hate, he rushed into the midst of his enemies, cutting down all who opposed his path, until overwhelmed by the crowd, and pierced by a thousand weapons, he died on the field of battle, a better fate than his cruelties and crimes deserved. His men every where sought safety in flight. After the battle Richard's body was found stiffened among a heap of slain, mangled with ghastly wounds, and the eyes open and frightfully staring. In this manner it was thrown across a horse, the head hanging down on one side, the heels on the other and thus carried to Leicester. It laid there two days exposed to public view, and then, without further ceremony, it was hastily buried. Richard's crown being found by one of Richmond's soldiers on the field of battle, it was immediately placed on the head of the conqueror; while the whole army, as if inspired with one voice, cried out, "Long live King Henry!"

The battle of Bosworth, was fought on the 22d of August, 1485. There fell in this battle about 4,000 of the vanquished, among whom were the Duke of Norfolk, Lord Ferrars of Chartley, Sir Richard Ratcliffe, Sir Robert Piercy, and Sir Robert Brockenbury. On the side of the victors, the loss was inconsiderable. With this battle ended the contests between the houses of York and Lancaster.

BOTHWELL BRIDGE, A.D. 1679.—The village of Bothwell, in Scotland, is situated on the north side of the river Clyde, on the road from Glasgow to Hamilton, eight miles east of the former, and three miles northwest of the latter. About one mile further on toward the south-east, the road to Hamilton is carried over the Clyde, by Bothwell Bridge, the scene of one of the most memorable events in Scottish history. Near the village is the magnificent ruin of Bothwell castle, once an important Scotch fortress. The battle of Bothwell Bridge was fought in the year 1679, between the Covenanters and the royal forces, under the Duke of Monmouth. The army of the Covenanters, which numbered, in all, about 8,000 men, had taken post near Bothwell castle, between Hamilton and Glasgow, where there was no access to them but over a bridge, which a small body would be able to defend against a much greater force. They showed judgment in the choice of their post, but discovered neither judgment nor valor in any other step of their conduct. No nobility, and few gentry had joined them. The clergy were in reality the generals. Monmouth, with a small body of English soldiers, attacked the bridge, which was defended by about 5,000 of the Covenanters, who maintained their post as long as their ammunition lasted. When they sent for more, they received orders to quit their ground, and to retire backward. This imprudent measure occasioned their immediate defeat. Monmouth passed the bridge, without opposition, and drew up his forces opposite the enemy. His cannon alone put them to rout. About 700 fell in the dispute; for, properly speaking, there was no action. 1,200 were taken prisoners; and were treated by Monmouth with a humanity which they had never experienced from their own countrymen. Such of them as promised to live peaceably were dismissed. About 300, who were so obstinate as to refuse this easy condition, were shipped for Barbadoes; but unfortunately perished on the voyage. Two of their clergy were hanged.

BOULOGNE.—The city of Boulogne is situated on the English Channel, in the Department of Pas du Calais, in France, 139 miles north of Paris. In the year 882, Boulogne was taken by the Northmen, who massacred the inhabitants. On the 25th of July, 1544, Henry VIII. of England, laid siege to the city of Boulogne, with an army of 30,000 men, and, after an obstinate resistance, the French garrison capitulated on the 13th of September, and Henry., having garrisoned the city, returned to England. The English remained in possession of Boulogne until 1550, when Edward VI. restored it to the French, upon payment of 400,000 crowns.

BOUVINES, A.D. 1214.—This is a village of France, Department of Nord, six miles south-east of Lille. On Sunday, the 27th of July, 1214, the armies of Philip I., of France, and Otho, Emperor of Germany, who was in alliance with John of England, met at Bouvines, and a bloody battle ensued. After a desperate struggle, the Germans were defeated. Philip, at one time, was in imminent personal danger. Trusting to the temper of his armor, he had furiously rushed into the midst of the combatants. A German, on foot, who espied an opening between his visor and cuirass, made a desperate push at his throat with a barbed lance. He missed his aim; but the hook caught the strap of the helmet, and the king was dragged from his horse. The soldier kept his hold; Philip rose to his feet; Otho hastened to overpower his enemy; while the French knights rushed forward to rescue their sovereign. After a desperate conflict, he was disengaged, remounted his horse and continued the battle. The soldiers fought with increased animosity and fury; contending showers of arrows constantly filled the air, and with loud yells the combatants rushed together, striking at each other with sword, lance, and battle-ax. The Emperor Otho fought with the utmost bravery. He wielded an immense one-edged sword, and at each stroke, stunned or unhorsed an opponent. During the battle, he had three chargers killed under him. On one of these occasions, Du Barré, an athletic knight, seizing him round the waist, endeavored to carry him off; nor was it without difficulty that he was liberated by the efforts of his guards. On another, he received, on his breast, a stroke from a battle-ax, which was repelled by the strength of his cuirass. A second stroke wounded his horse on the head; and the animal, furious with pain, wheeled round and carried him out of the combat. The Earl of Salisbury, chancing to meet the Bishop of Beauvais, a single-handed combat took place between them. The bishop's profession did not seem to interfere with his passion for fighting; but his only weapon was a club, that he might not, as he pretended, shed blood in violation of his vows. The earl, however, was no match for the bishop, for with one tremendous blow from his bludgeon, the bishop brought his adversary to the ground, and made him his prisoner. The Earl of Boulogne, who, out of respect for the Sunday, had proposed to postpone the battle, and had been called a coward and a traitor for his advice, fought after his companions had fled, and refused to accompany them. At length his horse was killed beneath him, and unable to rise, he surrendered to De Guerin, bishop elect of Senlis. The Earl of Flanders was wounded and taken prisoner by the French. The forces of Otho were utterly defeated and put to rout, and this defeat broke all the measures of John of England, who solicited, and obtained, from Philip, a truce of five years.

BOVINO, A.D. 1734.—In the year 1734, a battle took place near Bovino, a town of Naples, between the Spaniards and Imperialists, in which the former were defeated with great loss.

BOXTEL, A.D. 1794.—Boxtel is a small village of the kingdom of Holland, and is situated on the Dommel, seven miles south of Bois-le-duc. On the 14th of August, 1794, an obstinate action was fought near this village, between the French, on the one side, and the British and Dutch troops, under the Duke of York, on the other. The latter were defeated, with considerable loss, and compelled to retire behind the Maese.

BOYNE, A.D. 1690.—The Boyne, a river of Ireland, has its source in the bog of Allen, near Carberry, in Kildare, 225 feet above the level of the sea. It flows north-east by Trim, Navan, and Slane to Tullogballen, whence it follows an east course to Drogheda, emptying into the sea about two miles lower down. On the 1st of July, 1690, the forces of William III., of England, gained an important victory over those of James II., on the banks of the river Boyne, about three miles above Drogheda.

On the 7th of May, 1689, James embarked at Brest, in France, and on the 22d arrived at Kinsale. Shortly afterward he made his public entry into Dublin, amid the acclamations of the inhabitants. England and Scotland had acknowledged William, Prince of Orange, as king; Ireland alone remained faithful to James. He found the appearance of things in that country equal to his most sanguine expectations. Tyconnel, the lord-lieutenant, was devoted to his interests; his whole army was steady, and a new one raised amounting to 40,000 men. The Protestants over the greater part of Ireland were disarmed; the Prince of Ulster alone denied his authority; while the papists, confident of success, received him with shouts of joy. Louis XIV., of France, had granted him a fleet and some troops, and he felt confident of again firmly establishing himself on the throne of England. The Protestants of Ireland underwent, in this state of affairs, the most oppressive and cruel indignities. Most of those who were attached to the revolution were obliged to retire into Scotland and England, or hide themselves, or accepted written protections from their enemies. The bravest of them, however, to the number of 10,000 men, gathered round Londonderry, resolved to make their last stand at that place, for their religion and liberty. Early in the spring, James laid siege to Londonderry. Colonel Lundie had been appointed governor of the town by William; but he was secretly attached to King James; and at a council of war prevailed upon the officers and townsmen to send messengers to the besiegers with an offer to surrender the day following. But the inhabitants, being apprised of his intention, rose in a fury against the governor and council, and shooting one of the officers whom they suspected, they boldly resolved to maintain the town, though destitute of leaders. The town was weak in its fortifications, having only a wall eight or nine feet thick, and weaker still in its artillery, there not being above twenty serviceable guns upon the works. The new-made garrison, however, made up every deficiency by courage. Walker, a dissenting minister, and Major Baker put themselves at the head of these resolute men, who made every preparation for a resolute defense. The batteries of the besiegers soon began to play upon the town with great fury; and several attacks were made, but always repulsed with resolution. At length, however, the besieged began to be reduced to the greatest extremities for want of provisions. To add to their miseries a contagious distemper broke out in the city, and at length greatly thinned in numbers by the ravages of disease, and compelled to subsist upon horses, dogs, and all kinds of loathsome vermin, they sent proposals of capitulation to the besieging army. But at this crisis, Kirke, who had been sent to their assistance, hearing of their distress, resolved upon an attempt to throw provisions into the place, by means of three victuallers, and a frigate to cover them. As soon as these vessels sailed up the river, the eyes of all were fixed upon them; the besiegers ready to destroy, and the garrison as resolute for their defense. The besiegers had blocked up the channel with a boom; but the foremost of the victuallers at the first shock broke the impediment. The violence of her own stroke, however, stranded her. Upon this a shout burst from the besiegers, and they advanced with fury against a prize which they considered as inevitable. The smoke of the cannon on both sides wrapped the whole scene in darkness; but to the astonishment of all, in a little time the victualler was seen emerging from imminent danger, having got off by the rebound of her own guns, while she led up her little squadron to the very walls of the town. The joy of the inhabitants at this unexpected relief was only equalled by the rage and disappointment of the besiegers. The troops of James were so dispirited by the success of this enterprise, that they abandoned the siege in the night, and retired with precipitation, after having lost about 9,000 men before the place.

King William at length determined to spare no efforts to drive King James from Ireland. He therefore ordered 23 new regiments to be raised, for he was afraid to send the late king's army to fight agianst him. These, with two Dutch battalions, and four of French refugees, together with those Protestants who had rallied at Inniskillen, were appointed for the reduction of Ireland. Schomberg, a Dutchman, who had long been the faithful servant of William, and who had now passed a life of nearly eighty years, almost continually in the field, was appointed commander of this army. But the method of carrying on the war in Ireland, was a mode of operation with which he was entirely unacquainted. The forces he had to combat were incursive, barbarous, and shy; those whom he commanded were tumultuary, ungovernable, and brave. He considered not the dangers which threatened his troops by being confined to one place, and he kept them in a low, moist, camp, near Dundalk, without fuel almost of any kind; so that the men fell into fevers, and died in great abundance. The enemy also were afflicted with several disorders. Both camps remained for some time in sight of each other, and at last the rainy season approaching, both armies, as if by mutual consent, quitted their camps at the same time, and retired into winter quarters, without attempting to take any advantage of each other's retreat. The bad success of the campaign, and the miserable situation of the Protestants of Ireland, at length induced King William to attempt their relief in person, at the opening of the spring of 1690. Accordingly he landed at Carrickfergus, where he found himself at the head of an army of 36,000 men, which was more than a match for the forces of James, although they numbered about 46,000 men. The army of James was stationed at Ardee and Dundalk, and William having received intelligence that the French fleet had sailed for the coast of England, resolved to attack the enemy at once, in order to prevent the impression which that circumstance might make upon the minds of his soldiers. As William advanced, the enemy fell back, first from Dundalk, and then from Ardee, and at last, upon the 29th of June, they fixed their camp in a strong situation on the east side of the Boyne. It was upon the opposite banks of the river that the two armies came in sight of each other, inflamed with all the animosities, arising from religion, hatred, and revenge. The river Boyne at this place was not so deep but that men might wade over on foot; however, the banks were rugged, and rendered dangerous by old houses and ditches, which served to defend the latent enemy. William had no sooner arrived than he rode along the side of the river to make proper observations upon the plan of battle; but in the mean time, being perceived by the enemy, a cannon was privately brought out and planted against him, where he was sitting. The shot killed several of his followers, and he himself was wounded in the shoulder. The news of his being slain was instantly propagated through the Irish camp, and even sent off to Paris, but William, as soon as his wound was dressed, rode through the camp and quickly undeceived his army. Upon retiring to his tent, after the danger of the day, he continued in meditation till nine o'clock at night, when, for form sake, he summoned a council of war, in which, without asking advice, he declared his resolution to force a passage over the river the next morning. The Duke of Schomberg attempted at first to expostulate with him upon the danger of the undertaking, but finding his master inflexible, he returned to his tent with a discontented aspect, as if he had a prescience of his own misfortune.

Early in the morning, at six o'clock, King William gave orders to force a passage over the river. This the army undertook in three different places; and, after a furious cannonading, the battle began with unusual vigor. The Irish troops fought with desperation; but, after an obstinate resistance, they fled with precipitation, leaving the French and Swiss allies to make the best retreat they could. William led his cavalry in person, and contributed by his activity and vigilance to secure the victory. James was not in the battle, but stood aloof during the action, on the hill of Dunmore, surrounded by some squadrons of horse; and at intervals was heard to exclaim, when he saw his own troops repulsing those of the enemy, "O, spare my English subjects!" The Irish lost in this battle 1,500 men, while the Protestants lost only about 500. The victory was splendid, and almost decisive; but the death of the Duke of Schomberg, who was shot as he was crossing the river, seemed to outweigh the whole loss sustained by the enemy. He was killed by a discharge from his own troops, who, not knowing that he had been accidentally hurried into the midst of the enemy, fired upon the body of men by whom he was surrounded, and mortally wounded him. James, while his troops were yet fighting, quitted his station, and leaving orders to defend the pass of Duleek, he made the best of his way to Dublin, despairing of future success. After arriving at this city, he advised the magistrates to obtain the best terms they could from the victor, and then set out for Waterford, whence he embarked for France, in a vessel fitted for his reception. O'Regan, an old Irish captain, was heard to say, immediately after the retreat of the fallen monarch, that if the English would exchange generals, the conquered army would fight the battle over again.

BRADDOCK'S DEFEAT, A.D. 1755.—On the 8th of July, General Braddock, with his troops, arrived at the fork of the Monongahela and Youghiogeny rivers, in Pennsylvania, with 1,200 men, on his way to attack Fort du Quesne, which was strongly occupied by the French. The distance from the fork to Fort du Quesne was twelve miles, and early on the morning of the 9th of July, 1755, Braddock set his troops in motion. They forded the Monongahela, a little below the Youghiogeny, and marched along the southern bank of that river till noon, when they again forded the Monongahela, and stood between the rivers that form the Ohio, only seven miles distant from their junction. A detachment of 350 men, under Lieutenant-Colonel Gage, and closely attended by a working-party of 250, under St. Clair, advanced cautiously, with guides and flanking-parties, along a path twelve feet wide, toward the uneven woody country that was between them and Fort du Quesne. The general followed with the columns of artillery, baggage, and the main body of the army, when a heavy and quick fire was heard in the front. The French scouts had reported the progress of the British troops, and the commandant at Fort du Quesne resolved on an ambuscade. At an early hour he detached De Beaujeu, Dumas, and De Ligney with about 230 French and Canadians, and 637 Indians, under orders to repair to a favorable spot, selected the previous evening. Before reaching it they found themselves in the presence of the English, who were advancing in the best possible order, and De Beaujeu, instantly began an attack with the utmost vivacity.* Gage should, on the moment, and without waiting for orders, have sent support to his flanking-parties. His indecision lost the day. The onset was met courageously; but the flanking-parties were driven in, and the advanced-party, leaving their two six-pounders in the hands of the enemy, were thrown back upon the vanguard, which the general had sent as a reinforcement, and which was attempting to form in face of a rising ground on the right. Thus the men of both regiments were heaped together in promiscuous confusion, among the dense forest-trees and thick-set underwood. The general himself hurried forward to share the danger and animate the troops; and his artillery, though it could do little harm, as it played against an enemy whom the forest concealed, yet terrified the savages and made them waver. At this time De Beaujeu fell, when the brave and humane Dumas taking the command, gave new life to his party; sending the savages to attack the English in flank, while he, with the French and Canadians, continued the combat in front. Already the British regulars were raising shouts of victory, when the battle was renewed, and the Indians, posting themselves most advantageously behind large trees "in the front of the troops, and on the hills which overhung the right flank," invisible, yet making the woods re-echo their war-whoop, fired irregularly, but with deadly aim, at the fair mark offered by the compact body of men beneath them. None of the English that were engaged would say they saw a hundred of the enemy, and many of the officers who were in the heat of the action the whole time, would not assert that they saw one. The combat was obstinate, and continued for two hours, with scarcely any change in the disposition on either side. Had the British regulars shown courage, the issue would not have been doubtful; but terrified by the yells of the Indians, and dispirited by a manner of fighting such as they had never imagined, they would not long obey the voice of their officers, but fired in platoons almost as fast as they could load, aiming among the trees, or firing in the air. In the midst of the strange scene, nothing was so sublime as the persevering gallantry of the officers. They used the utmost art to encourage the men to move upon the enemy, they told them off into small parties of which they took the lead; they bravely formed the front; they advanced sometimes at the head of small bodies, sometimes separately, to recover the cannon, or to get possession of the hill, but were sacrificed by the soldiers, who declined to follow them, and even fired upon them in the rear. Of 86 officers, 26 were killed—among them, Sir Peter Halket—and 37 were wounded, including Gage, and other field-officers. Of the men, one half were killed or wounded. Braddock braved every danger. His secretary was shot dead, both his English aids were disabled early in the engagement, leaving the Americans to distribute his orders. "I expect, every moment," said one, whose eye was on Washington, "to see him fall. Nothing but the superintending care of Providence could have saved him. An Indian chief—I suppose a Shawnee—singled him out with his rifle, and bade others of his warriors to do the same. Two horses were killed under him, four balls penetrated his coat." "Some potent manitou guards his life," exclaimed the savage. "Death," wrote Washington, "was leveling my companions on every side of me; but, by the all-powerful dispensation of Providence, I have been protected." "To the public," said Davies, a learned divine, in the following month, "I point out that heroic youth, Colonel Washington, whom I cannot but hope Providence has preserved in so signal a manner for some important service to his country." "Who is Mr. Washington?" asked Lord Halifax, a few months later. "I know nothing of him," he added, "but that they say he behaved in Braddock's action as bravely as though he really loved the whistle of bullets." The Virginia troops showed great valor, and were nearly all massacred. Of three companies, scarcely thirty men were left alive. Captain Peyronney and all his officers, down to a corporal, were killed; of Polson's, whose bravery was honored by the Legislature of the Old Dominion, only one was left. But those they call regulars, having wasted their ammunition, broke and ran, as sheep before hounds, leaving the artillery, provisions, baggage, and even the private papers of the general, a prey to the enemy. The attempt to rally them was as vain as to attempt to stop the wild bears of the mountain. Thus were the English most scandalously beaten. Of privates, 714 were killed or wounded; while of the French and Indians, only three officers and thirty men fell, and but as many more were wounded. Braddock had five horses disabled under him; at last a bullet entered his right side, and he fell, mortally wounded. He was with difficulty brought off the field, and borne in the train of the fugitives. All the first day he was silent; but at night he aroused himself to say, "Who would have thought it?" Shortly afterward, the British evacuated Fort Cumberland, in the western part of Virginia, and hastened to Philadelphia. A few days after the battle, Braddock died. His grave may still be seen, near the national road, about a mile west of Fort Necessity. The forest field of battle was left thickly strewn with the wounded and the dead. Never had there been so great a harvest of scalps and spoils. As evening approached, the woods around Fort du Quesne rang with the halloos of the red men; the constant firing of small arms mingled with a peal of cannon from the fort. The next day the British artillery was brought in, and the Indian warriors, painting their skins a shining vermillion, with patches of black, and brown, and blue, gloried in the laced hats and bright apparel of the English officers.—Bancroft.

BRANDYWINE, A.D. 1777,—Brandywine creek rises in Chester county, Pennsylvania, and, in a south-easterly direction, flows through the State of Delaware. It forms a junction with Christiana creek, at Wilmington, and the united streams empty into the Delaware river, 35 miles below Philadelphia. The battle of the Brandywine was fought near the banks of this creek, at Chad's Ford, in Birmingham township, Chester co., Pennsylvania.

In the month of July, 1777, the British fleet, under Lord Howe, bearing 18,000 troops, under Sir William Howe, arrived at the mouth of the Chesapeake, from New York. Washington, for the purpose of protecting Philadelphia from the long threatened attacks of the enemy, had concentrated his forces in that city to oppose him. The British fleet sailed up the Chesapeake, as far as Turkey Point, on the west side of the river Elk, about eleven miles from Elkton; where, on the 25th of August, the troops were disembarked, preparatory to their advancing against the city of Philadelphia.

The whole army was stationed behind Christiana creek, having Newark on the right and Pencada on the left. A division of the British army, under Lord Cornwallis and Knyphausen, fell in with Maxwell's riflemen, at Pencada, and an engagement ensued in which the patriots were defeated with a loss of 40 in killed and wounded. The British loss was somewhat less. Meanwhile the American army marched out of Philadelphia, and, advancing toward the enemy, encamped behind White Clay creek.

Shortly afterward, Washington, leaving only the riflemen in the camp, retired with the main body, behind Red Clay creek, about half way between Wilmington and Delaware. The left wing of the army rested on the Christiana creek, and the right extended toward Chad's Ford, on the Brandywine. The whole American army consisted of about 11,000 men. On the 8th of September, the British army, reinforced by the rear guard, under General Grant, moved forward by way of Newark, and encamped within four miles of the American position. A strong detachment made a feint of attacking the center of the Americans; and at the same time the British general extended his left wing as if with the intention of turning the right flankof the enemy. Washington perceiving the danger, broke up his encampment, and at about two o'clock on the morning of the 9th, crossed the Brandywine at Chad's Ford. The enemy took up its encampment on the rising grounds, which extend toward the north-west and north-east from Chad's Ford. Maxwell's riflemen scoured the right bank of the Brandywine, in order to harass and retard the enemy, and the militia, under General Armstrong, protected a passage below Washington's principal encampment. The right wing of the army lined the banks of the river further up, where the passage was more difficult, and the passage of Chad's Ford, which was the most impracticable of all, was guarded by the main body. On the morning of the 9th, the British army advanced in two columns. Cornwallis, who commanded the right, which consisted of 13,000 men, British and Hessians, halted at Hockhesson; and Knyphausen, with the left, which consisted of about 5,000 men, moved forward to Kennet Square and New Garden. On the 10th both bodies met at Kennet Square; and at daybreak the following morning, Cornwallis advanced along the Lancaster road, which for several miles runs parallel to the Brandywine, toward the American army. The left wing, under Knyphausen, moved forward at nine o'clock. The American militia in the vicinity of Kennet Square, from behind the walls of the grave yard, of the house, trees, bushes, and fences, annoyed the British by constant discharges of musketry. Knyphausen's column, however, pushed forward toward Chad's Ford. The British plan of attack was, that while Knyphausen should make repeated feints to attempt the passage at this point, Cornwallis should take a longer circuit to the upper part of the river, and cross the Brandywine, at Trimble's Ford, where the stream is divided into two branches. Knyphausen sent forward a strong party to dislodge Maxwell's troops. At ten o'clock the two parties met, and a severe engagement ensued. The British charging with the utmost vigor drove back the Americans to the verge of the river. At this moment Maxwell received reinforcements from the main body of the army, and like a wolf at bay, turned furiously on his pursuers. The Americans, following the example of their gallant commander, rushed furiously upon the enemy, and, with one vigorous charge, threw them into complete disorder, and forced them back on Knyphausen's main column. Knyphausen now sent a detachment through the woods to attack Maxwell's men in flank, and the Americans, perceiving this movement, retreated to the opposite shore, leaving the British in the entire possession of the west bank of the Brandywine. Meanwhile Knyphausen advanced with his column, and opened a tremendous cannonade upon the passage of Chad's Ford, as if with the intention of crossing at that point.

The Americans returned his fire with the utmost spirit, and even passed over to the other side several detachments of light troops, in order to annoy the enemy's flanks. These troops assailed the British with gallantry, and it was not until overwhelmed by numbers that they retreated to the eastern shore. Knyphausen now renewed his cannonade with tenfold power; and the Americans, supposing that Chad's Ford was the threatened point, exerted their every effort to dispute the passage. Meanwhile, Cornwallis, at the head of his column, unperceived by the Americans, reached the forks of the river, and by a rapid movement, at about 2 o'clock passed both branches of the river at Trimble's and Jeffrey's Fords, unmolested by the enemy, and then turning short to the right, advanced along the east bank of the Brandywine toward the American army. Washington soon received intelligence of this movement, and, therefore, decided upon crossing the river with the center and left wing of his army, and by one furious attack overwhelm the troops of Knyphausen. This movement, although bold, was judicious, and had it been carried into effect the result of the battle might have been different, for the advantage the Americans would obtain on the enemy's right would more than compensate the loss they might sustain in the right wing of their own army; but no sooner had the American general made his dispositions for the attack, than a second report arrived, contradicting the first. Washington, deceived by this false intelligence, abandoned the idea of crossing the river; and re-called Greene, who had already passed over with the vanguard. The Americans, however, did not long remain in suspense. Washington soon received positive information that the English had not only crossed both branches of the river; but that they were advancing in full force against his right wing. This part of the American army consisted of the brigades of Stephens, Stirling, and Sullivan; the first occupying the extreme right, the second the center, and the third the left of the right wing. The entire wing was under the command of General Sullivan. Washington perceiving the danger which threatened his right, approached that portion of the army with two divisions under General Greene, leaving a strong body of troops under General Wayne, to oppose the passage of Knyphausen; and took a position between the left wing and the troops under Wayne, ready to advance to the support of either as circumstances should dictate. The troops of Cornwallis soon arrived within sight of the Americans. Sullivan drew up his men on the elevated grounds near the Birmingham meeting-house, with his left extending toward the Brandywine. Both flanks of his line were covered with thick woods, and his artillery was advantageously planted on the neighboring heights. His own brigade, however, had not joined those of Stirling and Stephens, when the action commenced, having taken a long circuit over rough and broken ground. The English advanced impetuously to the attack. At about four o'clock in the afternoon the battle raged furiously on both sides. The Americans fought with the utmost gallantry, and the carnage was fearful. The artillery of both parties was plied constantly with terrible effect. The Hessians and English seemed determined to outdo each other in the conflict. But in spite of the efforts of the English the mercenary troops of the British army led the van, and pushed on from behind by their impetuous friends, they rushed madly into the very midst of the enemy.

The Americans strove in vain against the overwhelming tide of the enemy; their right wing first gave way, and the left soon followed. Sullivan flew frantically over the plain endeavoring to rally his flying troops, but without effect. In the utmost confusion they fled towards Chad's Ford. The center, however, which consisted of 800 men, under General Conway, stood firm against the repeated attacks of the enemy. Sullivan, abandoned by his men, hastily joined this gallant band, where, side by side with the noble Lafayette and General Stirling, he engaged personally in the hottest of the strife. Cornwallis concentrated all his energies against this point. His artillery was brought to bear upon this quarter of the field, and made fearful havoc among the dense masses of the Americans. Unable to cope with superior numbers, the Americans faltered. Lafayette, leaping from his horse, sword in hand, endeavored to rally, and lead the wavering troops against the enemy; but struck by a musket-ball in the leg, he fell to the ground, and was borne off the field by his aid. Two of Sullivan's aids were slain; and the troops, filled with dismay, turned and fled precipitately. The British pursued eagerly. At a short distance from Dilworth some of the fugitives made a stand, and a sharp engagement ensued; but the Americans were again obliged to fly. At the first sound of the cannon, Washington had pushed forward with Greene's division, to the support of Sullivan, but as they approached the field of action, these troops met the flying soldiers of Sullivan, and General Greene, perceiving that the day was lost, by a skillful movement opened his ranks to receive the fugitives. After they had passed, he closed again, and covered their retreat, keeping the pursuit of the enemy in check by an incessant fire of the artillery which sustained his rear. He thus retreated in good order for about a mile, when having arrived at a narrow defile, flanked on either side by woods, he faced about, and kept the enemy at bay, while the fugitives re-formed in his rear. The enemy vainly endeavored to drive him from this strong position; but their every attack was repulsed by his troops with the utmost gallantry until dusk, when the British encamped for the night. In this heroic stand, the tenth Virginian regiment, under Colonel Stephens, and a Pennsylvanian regiment, under Colonel Steward, were especially conspicuous. Meanwhile, Knyphausen, warned by the sound of the artillery that the right wing of the Americans was fully engaged, and perceiving that the corps under General Wayne, at Chad's Ford, were weakened by the troops that had been detached to the support of Sullivan, immediately made dispositions for crossing the river. The passage was protected by batteries and an intrenchment. The moment Knyphausen advanced, the Americans opened a heavy fire of artillery from their intrenchments and batteries. But the troops of Knyphausen steadily advanced through the storm of deadly missiles, and reaching the opposite bank, prepared to assail the intrenchments. At this moment, Wayne heard of the defeat of the right wing and center at Birmingham meeting-house, and seeing that some of the British troops had penetrated the woods, and were preparing to fall on his right flank, ordered a retreat. This was made in great disorder, the Americans abandoning their artillery and ammunition to the enemy. In their retreat, they passed the position of General Greene, where the Americans were still defending themselves gallantly. This brave general was the last to quit the field. Taking advantage of the darkness, he withdrew his forces, and the whole army retreated to Chester, where they rendezvouzed, and the following morning marched toward Philadelphia, and encamped near Germantown.

Thus ended the disastrous battle of Brandywine. The Americans lost 300 killed, 600 wounded, and 400 taken prisoners. The British loss in killed and wounded was about 500. Eleven pieces of cannon, and a considerable quantity of ammunition fell into the hands of the victors.

BRECHIN, A.D. 1403.—In the year 1403, the castle of Brechin, a royal burgh of Scotland, withstood a siege of twenty days by the English under Edward I., and surrendered only when Sir Thomas Maule, its brave commander, was killed.

BRESLAU, A.D. 1757.—A battle was fought on the 22d of November, 1757, between the Austrians and Prussians, at Breslau, in Prussia. The Prussians were commanded by Prince Bevens, who was defeated after a most bloody struggle. The city of Breslau fell into the hands of the conquerors; but in the year 1806 it was re-taken by the Prussians. On the 8th of January, 1807, the city was besieged and taken by the French. In 1813 it was again taken by the French.

BREST, A.D. 1694.—Brest is the strongest military port of France. In the year 1694, an English fleet under Admiral Berkley appeared before Brest, to attack the place; 900 men were landed, but the tide having receded, their boats were stranded, and being attacked by the French, the men who had landed were cut to pieces, and the fleet set sail without accomplishing its purpose.

BRIHUEGA, A.D. 1710.—In 1710, a battle was fought near Brihuega, in Spain, between the French army under the Duke de Vendome, and the allies under Lord Stanhope, in which the latter were defeated with considerable loss.

BRIAR CREEK, A.D. 1779.—In the year 1779, an action took place between the Americans and British, at Briar Creek in Georgia. The American force, consisting of 1,500 North Carolina militia, and a few regular troops under General Ash, had taken up a position on Briar Creek, when they were suddenly surprised by Lieutenant-Colonel Prevost, who attacked them in rear with 900 veterans. The militia were thrown into confusion at once, flying at the first fire of the enemy. One hundred and fifty Americans were killed; 162 were made prisoners, and many were drowned in the river and swamps. Only 450 escaped to General Lincoln's camp, near Savannah; and almost all the arms fell into the hands of the conquerors.

BROMPTON, A.D. 1138.—Near this place, in York co., England, was fought the "Battle of the Standard." See Standard.

BROWNSTOWN, A.D. 1812.—On the 8th of August, 1812, a sharp engagement took place between an American detachment, 600 strong, and a large body of British and Indians, near Brownstown, in Canada, in which the latter were defeated with considerable loss.

BROOKLYN, A.D. 1776.—This beautiful city stands at the western extremity of Long Island, and is in King's county in the State of New York.

Immediately after the British evacuated Boston, Washington proceeded to New York, fearing that Howe would sail against that city; and upon his arrival made every preparation for its defense. On the 8th of July, Howe arrived at Staten Island with a fleet bearing 9,000 British and Hessian soldiers. These troops were disembarked at this place, and the British general there awaited the arrival of his brother, Admiral Howe, with other troops. These soon arrived, and being joined by the troops of Clinton and Parker, the whole British army numbered 30,000 men. Meanwhile the Americans were exerting themselves to the utmost to dispute the entrance of Howe into New York. On the first of August the American army in New York and vicinity, consisted of about 27,000 men. Of these troops about 15,000, under Generals Greene and Sullivan, occupied the city of Brooklyn. A small detachment was stationed on Governor's Island; another occupied Paulus's Hook, where Jersey City now stands; a body of New York militia under General George Clinton was detached to Westchester co., in order to oppose the landing of the British on the shores of Long Island, and Parson's brigade was posted at Kip's Bay on the East river.

But the American army was in a poor condition to repel the attacks of their vigorous foe. The soldiers were poorly armed, and, wasted by diseases, at least one fourth of them were unfitted for active duty. About the middle of August, General Greene was prostrated by sickness, and the whole command of the army at Brooklyn fell on General Sullivan. The possession of Long Island was very desirable to the British; being separated from New York by the East river, and being abundant in corn and cattle, it presented the means of subsistence for the most numerous army. Aside from this, its inhabitants were believed to favor the cause of the king. Wishing, therefore, to secure a post so important, Howe decided to attack Long Island. Accordingly, having made all his dispositions, on Thursday morning, the 22d of August, 1776, the British fleet approached the west shore of the Island, near the Narrows, a strait which separates it from Staten Island, and, without molestation, 10,000 troops, with 40 cannon, were disembarked near New Utrecht. The chief commanders of the British were Generals Clinton, Cornwallis, Percy, Grant, De Heister, and Erskine. The intelligence of this movement on the part of the British, created the utmost alarm and confusion. General Putnam, with reinforcements, was sent thither, with orders from Washington to take the entire command of the army on Long Island. The greater part of the American army occupied the city of Brooklyn, their left wing resting upon Wallabout Bay, and their right covered by a marsh adjoining Gowanus Cove. The entrance to the city was strongly fortified with moats and intrenchments. Behind the American army was Governor's Island, and the East river, which gave it direct communication with New York, where Washington, with the other part of the army, was stationed. Having effected their landing, the British marched rapidly forward. The two armies were separated by a chain of heights extending from the Narrows to the Jamaica road, which were practicable only at four points—at Martensis Lane, near the Narrows; the Flatbush pass, at the junction of the present Brooklyn and Flatbush turnpike, and the Coney Island plank road; the Bedford pass, about half a mile east of the junction of the Flatbush and Bedford roads, and the Jamaica pass, a short distance from East New York, now called, on the road to Williamsburgh. These ways were interrupted by precipices, and by excessively difficult and narrow defiles. With the exception of the Jamaica pass, they were all defended by bodies of American troops, and were fortified with breastworks. General Sullivan, assisted by Brigadier-General Stirling, was intrusted with the command of the troops without the lines. Colonel Miles, with his battalion, was to guard the road of Flatlands, and to scour it, as well as that of Jamaica, continually with his scouts, in order to observe the movements of the enemy. Meanwhile, the British army gradually advanced, its left wing being to the north, its right to the south. The center consisted of Hessians, under General de Heister; the left wing was composed of English troops, under General Grant, and rested on New York bay, and the right wing, on which the British generals placed their principal hope of success, was composed of picked troops, under the command of Cornwallis, Clinton, and Percy, accompanied by General Howe, in person. The British plan of attack was, that while the troops of Generals Grant, and De Heister should annoy the Americans on the left and center, the right, taking a circuit, should march through Flatlands and endeavor to secure the roads and passes between Jamaica and that village; and then hastily descending to the plain which extended from the foot of the hills, should fall upon the flank and rear of the left wing of the enemy. As this post was the most distant from the center of the army, the British generals hoped that the advanced parties of the Americans would be weaker, and less careful; and at all events, they supposed that the enemy would be unable to defend it against the assault of such a superior force. On the evening of the 26th, the division was put in motion. The vanguard, consisting of light infantry, was commanded by General Clinton; the center, composed of the grenadiers, the cavalry, and the artillery, was under Lord Percy, and the vanguard was commanded by Lord Cornwallis. In admirable order this body of the British army marched in the deepest silence, though New Lots, followed by the baggage, the heavy artillery, and some regiments of infantry. At about two o'clock in the morning, they arrived at the heights within half a mile of the road to Jamaica, unobserved by any of Colonel Miles's troops except some patrols whom they met and captured. General Clinton halted on these heights and made preparations for the attack.

The American commander did not expect an attack on his left, and had turned all his attention toward his right. General Clinton being informed by his prisoners that the Jamaica road was not guarded, determined to secure that important pass. With a rapid movement he bore his left toward Bedford, and seized the Bedford pass before General Sullivan was aware of his departure from Flatlands. To this unfortunate oversight on the part of the Americans, the British may attribute their success of the day. Lord Percy and Cornwallis followed with their troops, and the whole column passed through the village of Bedford into the plain which lay between the hills and the American position. Meanwhile, General Grant, with the left wing of the British army, advanced toward Brooklyn, in order to divert the attention of the enemy from the events that were transpiring on the right. As they approached the heights they were discovered by the guard at the lower pass, and the alarm was immediately given. General Putnam detached Stirling with Atlee, Haslet, and Smallwood's regiments to oppose the troops of Grant. The British drove back the militia-guard from the pass of Martenses Lane, but they were soon rallied by Colonel Parsons, on an eminence,* where they maintained their ground until the arrival of Stirling at early dawn, with 1,500 men. Stirling took a position on the neighboring slopes, and the action became exceedingly warm. The engagement continued without either party gaining a decided advantage, until eleven o'clock in the forenoon, when the aspect of affairs was suddenly changed by the movements of the British on the American left.

During the time that Stirling and Grant were thus engaged the Hessians under De Heister, advanced from Flatbush, and opened a cannonade on the American works at the Flatbush pass, at which point the regiments of Colonels Williams and Mile's were posted, under the command of General Sullivan. At the same time the English ships, having taken an advantageous position, opened a brisk fire upon an American battery at Red Hook Point. These operations were all made with the intention of diverting the attention of the Americans from what was passing in their center and on their left. At all these points the Americans defended themselves with the utmost gallantry; but their exertions were fruitless, for the rapid and unexpected movements of Clinton on their left soon placed victory in the hands of the invaders. Having gained the plain between the American line and Bedford, Clinton furiously attacked the left wing of the enemy. At the first sound of Clinton's cannon, De Heister ordered the Hessians, under Count Donop, to charge the troops of Sullivan. The conflict which followed was terrible. The Americans bore up gallantly against the fierce attack of the enemy; but Sullivan perceiving that his little band was unable to cope with the superior numbers of the Hessians, and that Clinton was rapidly gaining ground in his rear, ordered a retreat. But the order came too late. The retreating Americans were met by Clinton's dragoons and light infantry, who, charging down upon them, drove them back on the bayonets of the Hessians. The entrapped Americans fought furiously with the foe; hand to hand, and breast to breast they struggled desperately, swaying backward and forward between the opposing ranks of the enemy. Some with the courage of despair hewed their way through the walls of bayonets and swords which encompassed them, and escaped to Putnam's camp, the others were slain to a man. The Hessians slaughtered the patriots with the fury of fiends, giving no quarter. "It was a fine sight," wrote a British officer, "to see with what alacrity they dispatched the rebels with their bayonets, after we had surrounded them and they could not resist." The left wing and center of the American army being thus discomfited, the English, under Cornwallis, made a quick movement against the rear of the right wing. Here General Stirling was engaged with Grant. Attacked thus in front and rear, Stirling saw no means of escape, except across Gowanus Creek. This could only be effected by keeping Cornwallis at bay with a few troops, while the others should make their escape. He at once changed his front, and placing himself at the head of a body of men (whose names should be written in letters of gold for their noble sacrifice on this day,) commanded by Major Gist, he led them against the troops of Cornwallis. Fighting for the lives of their countrymen the Americans fell upon the British with the utmost fury. The carnage was terrible. For twenty minutes that gallant little band held the British in check, and even drove them back, and thus afforded the remainder of his corps an opportunity to cross the creek; but the bed of the stream was miry, and many of them sank into the quicksand beneath its turbid waters, in death. But at length, when nearly all his brave men were slain, Stirling was overwhelmed, and was himself taken prisoner. The battle ended with Stirling's defeat. The loss of the Americans in this battle has been variously stated. It is thought, however, to have been about 2,000 in killed, wounded, and prisoners. This number is large considering that only about 5,000 were engaged. Among the prisoners were Lord Stirling, General Sullivan, and Colonel Atlee. The British lost about 400 in killed, wounded, and prisoners. The British encamped in front of the American lines in Brooklyn, and on the morning of the 28th, broke ground within six hundred yards of Fort Putnam. They cast up a redoubt and cannonaded the American works. Washington was there. He had witnessed the disastrous defeat of his army with intense sorrow, and exerted himself to the utmost to secure the shattered remnant. Finding that all hopes of success were useless, it was finally decided to evacuate Long Island, and on the night of the 29th of August, favored by a thick fog, the entire army, with all the artillery, baggage, camp equipage, in fact, every thing was safely transported to New York.

BRIENNE, A.D. 1814.—The chateau of Brienne, the scene of the boyish adventures of Napoleon Bonaparte, afterwards was the theater of two bloody engagements between the forces of the French emperor and the united army of the Russians and Prussians. There the great captain received the first rudiments of his military education, and here in 1814, after he had startled all Europe by the magnitude and brilliancy of his warlike exploits, he was in imminent danger. The town is situated on the great road from Paris to Chaumont, and has a fine castle, which, erected on an artificial plateau, commands an extensive view.

On the 29th of January, 1814, the French troops approached Brienne, which was occupied by Blucher with 26,000 Prussians. The French army consisted of about 70,000 men, of whom 15,000 were cavalry; but a part of these were at a considerable distance from the center of action. As the French approached Brienne they discovered the Prussians drawn up in successive lines in front of its buildings. The beautiful terraces which lie along the higher parts of the town, were strongly occupied by their powerful artillery. The great road between Brienne and Mazieres, was occupied by Olsoofief's guns and Pahlen's dragoons, as an advanced guard; but at two o'clock, the French attacked this position with such vigor, that the Prussians gradually retired toward the lower part of the town. Napoleon, encouraged by the retreat of the enemy's rear guard, now pressed on vigorously with all the forces he could command. He constantly received accessions of fresh troops, while the action was going on in front of the town. He hurried forward his numerous guns to the front, and opening a concentric fire on the town, discharged a shower of bombs and shells, which soon set it on fire and reduced a considerable part to ashes. A column of infantry charging amid the spreading conflagration, through the streets, took twelve Russian guns. Soon, however, the French troops advancing to support this vigorous onset, were checked by a battery which commanded their left wing; and being charged in rear by the Russian dragoons, they lost the guns they had taken, and were driven out of the town with a loss of eight pieces of their own. Until nightfall the fire on both sides was continued with great vigor; but as darkness covered the earth, it slackened. The town still remained in the hands of the Russians; and Blucher, deeming the battle at an end, retired to the chateau, to survey, from its elevated summit, the position of the vast semicircle of watch-fires, which marked the camp of the enemy on the west side of the town. While he was gazing upon the French line, he heard loud cries in the avenue which led to the castle. They were speedily followed by the discharge of musketry, and vehement shouts at the foot of the building itself. He hastened down stairs, accompanied by a few of his suit, and he had hardly time to reach the road, when the castle was carried by a body of French grenadiers who had stole unperceived into the grounds of the chateau. Mounting his horse, the old marshal hastily rode toward the town, when he was met by a Cossack who told him that the French had again burst into Brienne. By the light of the burning houses he distinctly perceived a large body of the enemy advancing toward him at a rapid trot. Drawing himself into the shadow of a house in the street, the French dragoons passed him like a whirlwind, little thinking that they had lost the opportunity of capturing him, who two months afterward was governor of Paris!

Blucher now ordered the town to be cleared of the enemy; but though his men advanced vigorously to the attack of the castle, they were always repulsed with great loss. At two o'clock the Prussian field marshal withdrew his whole army, and took up a strong position at Trannes, on the road to Bar-sur-Aube, and Brienne remained entirely in the hands of the French. In this bloody affair, the Prussians only were engaged. Both parties fought with the most determined resolution, and each sustained a loss of about 3,000 men. At the very time that Blucher so narrowly escaped being made prisoner, Napoleon, himself, was still nearer destruction. The emperor, after having inspected the position of the bulk of his army, which was lying in the plain between Maizieres and Brienne, was riding back, accompanied by his suite, to the former town, when a party of Cossacks suddenly dashed across the road. The foremost Cossack, with his lance in rest, rode at full speed against the horseman with the cocked-hat and gray riding coat, who rode in front. A cry of horror arose in the emperor's suite; Corbineau threw himself across the lancer's path, while Gourgand drew his pistol and shot him dead, and he fell headlong at the feet of the emperor. The Cossacks immediately turned and fled, ignorant of the inestimable prize almost within their grasp. On the 30th of January, Napoleon transferred his head-quarters to the chateau of Brienne. The allied generals now made the most vigorous efforts to concentrate their forces.

One hundred thousand men, under the command of the Emperor Alexander and the King of Prussia, were collected together, and disposed for a general attack on the French army. The center, consisting chiefly of Blucher's Prussians, was posted on the elevated ridge of Trannes, with Barclay de Tolly's reserve behind it; the right wing was formed of the hereditary prince of Wirtemberg's corps, which was stationed at Getanie, and the left wing consisted of the Austrians under Giulay, with Colloredo's corps in reserve. The command of the whole army was given to Blucher. The French line was drawn up directly opposite to that of the allies. It extended from Dionville on the right, through La Rothiere and La Giberie in the center, to Chaumenie on the extreme left; forming the two sides of a right-angled triangle, facing outward, of which La Giberie was the turning point. The morning of the 1st of February was dark and gloomy. A cold wind swept across the plain, and the air was filled with driving sleet and snow, which rendered every thing invisible. At one o'clock the sky cleared, and as the mist dissolved the two armies discovered each other. On the one side stood 100,000 Prussians, Russians, and Austrians, ready for the fight, while on the other, in battle array, stood only 50,000 Frenchmen, calmly awaiting the attack of the enemy. Some distance behind the French army stood the chateau of Brienne, whose summit commanded a view of the whole field of battle. The right wing of the French army was commanded by Marshal Gerard; the left by Marmont, and the center was under the immediate direction of Napoleon himself, while Mortier, Ney, and Oudinot were in reserve behind. To distinguish the soldiers of the allied army, who belonged to six different nations, and were clothed in every variety of uniform, from the enemy, orders were given that they should all, from the general to the private soldier, wear a white band around the left arm. The allied monarchs now gave the orders to attack. Giulay, who commanded the left wing of the allied army, advanced against the right wing of the French under Gerard; the Prince of Wirtemberg and Sacken, who directed the allied center, marched against the French center, at La Giberie, and La Rothiere, and Wrede advanced on Monvilliers. The ground was so heavy that Niketin, who commanded Sacken's artillery, was obliged to leave half of his guns in position on the ridge of Trannes, and harness the horses belonging to them to the other half, thirty-six in number, with which he advanced to the attack. To each of the heavy guns were attached ten horses; six to the light, and five to the caissons. As they were slowly dragged through the deep clay, the French artillery maintained a heavy and incessant discharge upon them; but at length they were formed in a line, ready to open on the French center at La Rothiere. The infantry destined for their protection was still far in the rear, toiling through the miry fields. Napoleon now caused a large body of cavalry to charge the guns; but the Russian cuirassiers, reserved their fire till the enemy's horse was within 600 yards, when they opened a sudden discharge upon the advancing troop, which caused them to recoil, and finally retreat. Snow now commenced falling with such thickness, that the nearest objects were no longer visible. During the obscurity the thirty-six pieces left behind at Trannes, were brought to the front.

In the mean time, the cavalry of Sacken's corps approached, and the action became general. The French troops posted in a wood in front of La Giberie, were driven back by the Prince of Wirtemberg, who, threading his devious way through a narrow path between fish-ponds, at last reached the open country, and commenced an attack on the village of La Giberie and Chaumenie, which, after a bloody struggle, he carried. Napoleon immediately ordered his guards and reserves to regain these important posts, and supported their attack by the concentric fire of a large part of his artillery. These gallant soldiers attacked the village with such vigor, that the enemy was driven out, and the posts regained. Again the Austrians, supported by Wrede, advanced to the charge. Attacked at once in front and flank, the French, after an obstinate resistance, were dislodged, and the villages were regained, and permanently held by the allies. Meanwhile, Sacken, in the center, led his troops against La Rothiere and the French batteries adjacent. The vanguard pushed the attack vigorously, and at length reached the church of La Rothiere, around which a bloody conflict arose. The snow descended in thick and heavy flakes, and the combatants fighting in obscurity, were frequently obliged to suspend their fire, being unable to see each other. At this moment the Russian dragoons advanced upon the French cavalry, and charged and captured a battery of twenty-eight guns in the French center. At the same time, the Prince of Wirtemberg made himself master of a battery of nine guns, between La Giberie and La Rothiere; then turning about to his left, he attacked the village in flank, and expelled the French from every part of it, while Wrede carried Chaumenie and twelve guns on the extreme left of the line. The French center and left wing were thus entirely broken and defeated. The right wing, however, still stood firm at Dionville, and had repulsed all the attacks of Giulay's Austrians. Napoleon, determined to regain La Rothiere, placed himself at the head of the dragoons of Colbert and Piri, and bringing up every disposable gun he had, directed a general attack on that village. Oudinot, with two fresh divisions, came up to his aid, and the French soldiers enthusiastically advanced to the charge. Blucher, perceiving the concentration of the French forces at this decisive point, put himself at the head of his reserves, and advanced to sustain the encounter. The evening was far advanced when these two formidable antagonists met in arms. The falling snow rapidly covered the bodies of the slain with its white mantle, and the moon shining through a misty atmosphere, faintly illumined the field. The first attack of the French was irresistible. Amid loud cheers the village was carried; but the Emperor of Russia immediately brought up the grenadier regiments, and the French, far inferior in point of numbers, were driven out at the point of the bayonet, fiercely contesting every inch of soil. In vain did the brave Frenchmen battle with the enemy; their ranks dissolved before the murderous fire of the Russians, like grass before the scythe. Such was the indomitable resolution with which they fought, that the division of Duhesme was almost entirely destroyed. Napoleon and Blucher directed the attacks in person. At length the French were driven from the village. At the same time, Giulay, on the extreme right, after the sixth assault, carried Dionville. The whole ground, and every village occupied by the French at the commencement of the battle, were now in the hands of the allies. Napoleon saw that the day was lost, and gave orders to burn La Rothiere, and drew off his troops to Brienne, under cover of the night. The French lost in this battle 6000 men, killed, wounded, and made prisoners, and seventy-three pieces of cannon fell into the hands of the victors. The allies lost 5000 killed and wounded. The great loss of the French on this occasion testifies to their valor and resolution. For nearly twelve hours had they contested against the combined armies of Europe; and the overwhelming number of the enemy alone, finally compelled them to retreat.

BUENA VISTA, A.D., 1847.—This celebrated battle-field, in Mexico, is situated about ninety miles south-west of Monterey, and ten miles from Saltillo. It consists mostly of mountain ridges, impassable ravines, and narrow defiles.

At noon, on the 21st of February, 1847, the American army, commanded by General Taylor, broke up its camp at Agua Nueva, and encamped at a new position a little in front of the hacienda of Buena Vista. Taylor had learned that the Mexicans had concentrated a heavy force in his front, and that Santa Anna, the Mexican general, meditated a forward movement and attack upon his position at Agua Nueva. As the camp of Agua Nueva could be turned on either flank, and as the enemy's forces were greatly superior to his own, especially in cavalry, he determined to take up a position at Buena Vista, about eleven miles in rear, and there await the attack of the enemy. With a small force the American general proceeded to Saltillo, to make some necessary arrangements for the defense of that town, leaving Brigadier General Wool in the immediate command of his troops. Before he had completed his arrangements, on the morning of the 22d, he was advised that the enemy was in sight advancing. Upon reaching the ground, he found that the Mexican advance cavalry was in his front, having marched from Encarnacion the day before, and driving in a mounted force, left at Agua Nueva to cover the removal of public stores. The American troops were in a position occupying a line of remarkable strength. At this point the road becomes a narrow defile, the valley on its right being rendered quite impracticable for artillery, by a system of deep and impassable gulleys, while on the left a succession of rugged ridges and precipitous ravines extended far back toward the mountain which bounds the valley. The features of the ground were such as nearly to paralyze the artillery and cavalry of the enemy, while his infantry could not derive all the advantages of his numerical superiority. The American army consisted of about 4,000 men. Of this number two squadrons of cavalry, and three batteries of light artillery, making not more than 453 men, composed the only force of regular troops. The balance were volunteers. The Americans were drawn up in the following order to receive the attack of the enemy. Captain Washington's battery (4th Artillery) was posted to command the road, while the 1st and 2d Illinois regiments, under Colonels Hardin and Bissil, each eight companies (to the latter of which was attached Captain Conners's company of Texas volunteers), and the 2d Kentucky, under Colonel McKee, occupied the crest of the ridges on the left and in rear.

The Arkansas and Kentucky regiments of cavalry, commanded by Colonel Yell and H. Marshall, occupied the extreme left near the base of the mountain, while the Indiana brigade under Brigadier General Lane (composed of the 2d and 3d regiments, under Colonels Bowles and Lane), the Mississippi riflemen, under Colonel Davis, the squadrons of the 1st and 2d dragoons, under Captain Steen, and Lieutenant Colonel May, and the light batteries of Captains Sherman and Bragg, 3d Artillery, were held in reserve. At eleven o'clock, the American commander received the following summons from General Santa Anna, to surrender at discretion: "You are surrounded by 20,000 men, and can not in any human probability, avoid suffering a rout, and being cut to pieces with your troops; but as you deserve consideration and particular esteem, I wish to save you from a catastrophe, and for that purpose give you this notice, in order that you may surrender at discretion, under the assurance that you will be treated with the consideration belonging to the Mexican character, to which end you will be granted an hour's time to make up your mind, to commence from the moment when my flag of truce arrives in your camp. With this view I assure you of my particular consideration..

"God and Liberty. Camp at Encantada, February 22d, 1847.

"Antonio Lopez de Santa Anna."

To this summons General Taylor replied as follows:

"Sir—In reply to your note of this date, summoning me to surrender my forces at discretion, I beg leave to say that I decline acceding to your request.

"With high respect, I am, sir,

"Your obedient servant,

"Z. Taylor,

"Major General U. S. A., Commanding."

The Mexican general still forbore his attack, waiting for the arrival of his rear columns, which could be distinctly seen by the American look-out, approaching the field. Perceiving a demonstration on the enemy's left, the American general detached the 2d Kentucky regiment, and a section of artillery to the right, in which position they bivouacked for the night. In the mean time the Mexican light troops had engaged the Americans on the extreme left, which was composed of parts of the Kentucky and Arkansas cavalry, dismounted, and a rifle battalion from the Indiana brigade, under Major Gorman; the whole being commanded by Colonel Marshall. The Mexicans kept up a sharp fire, climbing up the mountain side, with the endeavor to gain the American flank. Three pieces of Captain Washington's battery had been detached to the left of the American army, and were supported by the 2d Indiana regiment. The Mexicans occasionally threw shells into this part of the American line, but without effect. The skirmishing of the light troops was kept up, with trifling loss to the Americans, until dark, when Taylor, convinced that no serious attack would be made before morning, returned with the Mississippi regiment and a squadron of the 2d dragoons, to Saltillo. The troops bivouacked without fires, and laid upon their arms. A body of the enemy's cavalry, about 1,500 strong, had been visible all day, in rear of the town, having entered the valley through a narrow pass east of the city. This cavalry, commanded by General Minon, had been thrown into the rear of the Americans, to break up and harass their retreat, and perhaps make some attempt against the town if practicable. Saltillo was occupied by four excellent companies of Illinois volunteers, under Major Warren of the 1st regiment. A field-work, which commanded most of the approaches, was garrisoned by Captain Webster's company, 1st Artillery, and armed with two 24 pound howitzers, while the train and head-quarter camp were guarded by two companies of Mississippi riflemen, under Captain Rogers, and a field-piece commanded by Captain Shover, 3d Artillery. Having made these dispositions, General Taylor proceeded on the morning of the 23d to Buena Vista, ordering forward all the other available troops. The action had commenced before his arrival on the field. At an early hour on the 23d, the action commenced, on the mountain side, where the Mexicans during the evening and night of the 22d had thrown a body of light troops with the purpose of outflanking the left of the American line. The American riflemen, under Colonel Marshall, who had been reinforced by three companies under Major Trail, 2d Illinois volunteers, maintained their ground gallantly against a greatly superior force, holding themselves under cover, and using their weapons with deadly effect. At eight o'clock the Mexicans made a strong demonstration against the center of the American position. The Mexicans in a heavy column, moving along the road, rapidly approached; but a few well directed and rapid shots from Captain Washington's battery, soon dispersed them. In the mean time the Mexican general was concentrating a large force of infantry and cavalry under cover of the ridges, with the intention of forcing the enemy's left, which was posted on an extensive plateau. The 2d Indiana and 2d Illinois regiments formed this part of the American line, the former covering three pieces of light artillery, under the order of Captain O'Brien, Brigadier General Lane being in the immediate command. In order to bring his men within effective range, General Lane ordered the artillery and 2d Indiana regiment forward. The artillery advanced within musket range of a heavy body of Mexican infantry, and was opened against it with great effect; but without being able to check its advance. The infantry ordered to its support, were exposed to such a severe fire of small arms in front, and such a murderous cross-fire of grape and canister from a Mexican battery on the left, that they had fallen back in disorder. Captain O'Brien found it impossible to retain his position without support. He therefore withdrew; taking with him only two of his pieces, all the horses and cannoneers of the third piece being killed or disabled.

The 2d Indiana regiment, which had fallen back, could not be rallied, and took no further part in the action, except a handful of men, who, under its gallant colonel, Bowles, joined the Mississippi regiment, and did good service; and those fugitives who, at a later period in the day, assisted in defending the train and dépôt at Buena Vista. This portion of the American line having given way, the Mexicans attacked the left flank with an overwhelming force, and the light troops on the mountain were compelled to withdraw, which they did, for the most part, in good order. Many, however, were not rallied until they reached the dépôt at Buena Vista, to the defense of which they afterward contributed. Colonel Bissil's regiment (2d Illinois), which had been joined by a section of Captain Sherman's battery, had become completely outflanked, and was compelled to fall back, being entirely unsupported. The Mexicans were now pouring masses of infantry and cavalry along the base of the mountain, on the left of the American position, and were gaining their rear in great force. At this moment General Taylor arrived upon the field. The Mississippi regiment had been directed to the left before reaching the position, and immediately came into action against the Mexican infantry which had turned the American flank. The 2d Kentucky regiment, and a section of artillery, under Captain Bragg, had previously been ordered from the right, to reinforce the left wing of the American army, and arrived at a most opportune moment. That regiment, and a portion of the 1st Illinois, under Colonel Hardin, gallantly drove the enemy, and recovered a portion of the ground the Americans had lost. The batteries of Captains Sherman and Bragg were in position on the plateau and did much execution, not only in front, but particularly upon the masses which had gained their rear. Discovering that the enemy was heavily pressing upon the Mississippi regiment, General Taylor dispatched the 3d Indiana regiment, under Colonel Lane, to strengthen that part of the American line, which formed a crotchet perpendicular to the first line of battle. At the same time Lieutenant Kilburn, with a piece of Captain Bragg's battery, was directed to support the infantry there engaged. The action was for a long time warmly sustained at that point—the Mexicans making several exertions, both with infantry and cavalry, against the American line, and being always repulsed with heavy loss. The American commander had placed all the regular cavalry, and Captain Pike's squadron of Arkansas horse, under the orders of Brevet Lieutenant Colonel May, with directions to hold in check the enemy's column, still advancing along the base of the mountain, which was done in conjunction with the Kentucky and Arkansas cavalry, under Colonels Marshall and Yell. In the mean time the left, which was strongly threatened by superior Mexican forces, was further strengthened by the detachment of Captain Bragg's and a portion of Colonel Sherman's batteries to that quarter. The concentration of artillery fire upon the masses of the enemy along the base of the mountain, and the determined resistance offered to them by the two regiments opposed to them, had created confusion in their ranks, and some of the corps attempted to retreat upon their main line of battle. The squadron of the 1st dragoons, under Lieutenant Bucker, was now ordered up the deep ravine, which these retreating corps were endeavoring to cross, in order to charge and disperse them. The squadron proceeded to the point indicated, but could not accomplish the object, being exposed to a heavy fire from a battery established to cover the retreat of those corps. While the squadron was detached on this service, the Mexican general concentrated a large body on the extreme left of the American line, with the view of making a descent upon the hacienda of Buena Vista, where the train and baggage of the Americans were deposited. General Taylor immediately ordered Lieutenant Colonel May to the support of that point, with two pieces of Captain Sherman's battery, under Lieutenant Reynolds. In the mean time the scattered American forces, near the hacienda, composed in part of Majors Trail and Gorman's commands, had been to some extent organized under the advice of Major Monroe, chief of artillery, with the assistance of Major Morrison, volunteer staff, and were posted to defend the position. Before the American cavalry had reached the hacienda, that of the Mexicans had made the attack; having been gallantly met by the Kentucky and Arkansas cavalry, under Colonels Marshall and Yell. The Mexican column immediately divided, one portion sweeping by the dépôt, where it received a destructive fire from the forces which had been collected there, and then gaining the mountain opposite, under a fire from Lieutenant Reynolds's section, the remaining portion regaining the base of the mountain, on the left. In the charge at Buena Vista, Colonel Yell fell gallantly at the head of his regiment. Adjutant Vaughan, of the Kentucky cavalry, was also slain. Lieutenant Colonel May, who had been rejoined by the squadron of the 1st dragoons, and by portions of the Arkansas and Indiana troops, under Lieutenant Colonel Roane and Major Gorman, now approached the base of the mountain, holding in check the right flank of the Mexican army, upon whose masses, crowded in the narrow gorges and ravines, the American artillery was doing fearful execution. The position of that portion of the Mexican army which had gained the rear of the American line, was now very critical, and it seemed doubtful whether it could regain the main body.*

At this moment, while General Taylor was sitting quietly on his white charger, watching the movements of the enemy, a Mexican officer was presented, bearing a white flag, who stated that he had been sent by his excellency, General Santa Anna, to inquire what General Taylor was waiting for? "For General Santa Anna to surrender,"† was the response of the American commander, who immediately dispatched Brigadier General Wool to the Mexican general-in-chief, and sent orders to cease firing.

Upon reaching the Mexican lines, General Wool could not cause the enemy to cease their fire, and accordingly returned without having an interview. Taking advantage of the momentary cessation of the American fire, the extreme right of the Mexican army at length effected a junction with the main body of their army. During the day, the cavalry of General Menon had ascended the elevated plain above Saltillo, and occupied the road from the city to the field of battle, where they intercepted several American soldiers. Approaching the town, they were fired upon, by Captain Webster, from the redoubt occupied by his company, and then moved off toward the eastern side of the valley, and obliquely toward Buena Vista.

At this time Captain Shover moved rapidly forward with his piece, supported by a miscellaneous command of mounted volunteers, and fired several shots at the Mexican cavalry, with great effect. They were driven into the ravines which lead to the lower valley, closely pursued by Captain Shover, who was further supported by a piece of Captain Webster's battery, under Lieutenant Donaldson, which had advanced from the redoubt, supported by Captain Wheeler's company of Illinois volunteers. The Mexicans made one or two efforts to charge the artillery, but was driven back in a confused mass, and did not again appear upon the plain. In the mean time, the firing had partially ceased upon the principal field. Santa Anna confined his efforts to the protection of his artillery. General Taylor had left the plateau for a moment, when he was recalled thither by a heavy musketry fire. On regaining that position, he discovered that the infantry of the Illinois and Kentucky regiments had engaged a greatly superior force of the enemy —evidently his reserve—and that they had been overwhelmed by numbers. The crisis appeared most imminent, Captain O'Brien, with two pieces of cannon, had sustained this heavy charge to the last, and was finally obliged to leave his guns on the field—his infantry support being entirely routed. Captain Bragg, who had just arrived, was ordered at once into battery, without any infantry to support him; and at the imminent risk of losing his guns, this officer came rapidly into action, the Mexican line being but a few yards from the muzzles of his pieces.*

At this critical moment, Generel Taylor rode up behind the gallant men, who were working their pieces with desperate energy.

* General Taylor's official report.

"A little more grape, Captain Bragg!" said the general, calmly, and the cannoneers, inspired to renewed exertions by the cool bravery of their commander, worked their guns with a rapidity and accuracy which told with fearful effect upon the Mexican columns.

The first discharge of canister caused the Mexicans to hesitate; the second and third drove them back in disorder; and the victory belonged to the Americans. The 2d Kentucky regiment, which had advanced beyond supporting distance in this affair, was driven back, and closely pressed by the Mexican cavalry. Taking a ravine which led in the direction of Captain Washington's battery, their pursuers were exposed to his fire, which soon checked them, and finally drove them back with loss. In the mean time, the rest of the American artillery had taken position on the plateau, covered by the Mississippi and 3d Indiana regiments, the former of which had reached the ground in time to pour a fire into the right flank of the enemy, and thus contribute to his repulse. In this conflict the Americans sustained a very heavy loss. Colonel Hardin, Colonel McKee, and Lieutenant Colonel Clay, 2d Kentucky regiment, fell at this time, while gallantly leading their commands. No further attempt was made by the Mexicans to force the American position, and the approach of night gave an opportunity to pay proper attention to the wounded, and also to refresh the soldiers, who had been exhausted by incessant watchfulness and combat.* Though the night was extremely cold, the troops were compelled to bivouac without fires, expecting that morning would renew the combat. During the night the Mexicans abandoned their position, and fell back upon Agua Nueva. The great disparity of numbers, and the fatigue of his troops, prevented the American general from pursuing them. The next day a staff officer was dispatched to General Santa Anna, to negotiate an exchange of prisoners, which was satisfactorily completed on the following day. Thus ended the battle of Buena Vista. The Americans lost 267 killed, 456 wounded, and 23 missing. The Mexicans lost, in killed and wounded, about 2,000, beside a great number of deserters and others who dispersed from their ranks. The following extract from a letter written by a distinguished American officer, will make a fitting close to this description of the battle of Buena Vista:

"At a time when the fortune of the day seemed extremely problematical—when many on our side despaired of success—old Rough-and-Ready, as he is not inaptly styled, whom you must know, by-the-by, is short, fat, and dumpy in person, with remarkably short legs, took his position on a commanding height overlooking the two armies. This was about three or, perhaps, four o'clock in the afternoon. The enemy, who had succeeded in gaining an advantageous position, made a fierce charge upon our column, and fought with a desperation that seemed for a time to insure success to their arms. The struggle lasted for some time. All the while General Taylor was a silent spectator, his countenance exhibiting the most anxious solicitude, alternating between hope and despondency. His staff perceiving his perilous situation—for he was exposed to the fire of the enemy—approached him and implored him to retire. He heeded them not. His thoughts were intent upon victory or defeat. He knew not at this moment what the result would be. He felt that engagement was to decide his fate. He had given all his orders, and selected his position. If the day went against him, he was irretrievably lost; if for him, he could rejoice, in common with his countrymen, at the triumphant success of our arms. Such seemed to be his thoughts, his determination; and when he saw the enemy give way, and retreat in the utmost confusion, he gave free vent to his pent-up feelings. His right leg was quickly disengaged from the pommel of the saddle, where it had remained during the whole of the fierce encounter; his arms, which were calmly folded over his breast, relaxed their hold, his feet fairly danced in the stirrups, and his whole body was in motion. It was a moment of the most exciting and intense interest. His face was suffused with tears. The day was won, the victory complete, his little army saved from defeat and disgrace, and he could not refrain from weeping for joy at what had seemed to so many but a moment before, as an impossible result."

BUENOS AYRES, A.D. 1806.—Buenos Ayres is a maritime city of South America, and is the capital of the republic of La Plata. On the 24th of June, 1806, Buenos Ayres was attacked by the British land forces under General Beresford, while the naval forces distracted the attention of the defenders of the city by threatening Montevideo, where the principal regular forces of the vice-royalty of La Plata were collecting. Buenos Ayres, chiefly defended by militia, was unable to withstand the energetic attack of the invaders, and a capitulation was soon concluded, which guarantied private property. Public stores, however, of great amount, fell into the hands of the victors. But the city did not long remain in the hands of the British. The Spaniards, ashamed of their defeat by a handful of foreigners, began to entertain serious intentions of expelling the intruders. An insurrection was secretly organized in the city of Buenos Ayres, almost under the eyes of the British commanders; the militia of the surrounding districts were assembled; Linieres, a French officer in the Spanish service, succeeded in crossing over from Montevideo, with 1,000 regular soldiers, and, on the 4th of August, the small English garrison, assailed by several thousand men from without, found itself menaced with insurrection in the interior of the city. The weather prevented embarkation; and the English troops were fiercely assailed by a greatly superior force in the town. After maintaining an unequal conflict with the enemy in the streets, for several hours, and harassed on every side by unseen enemies in the windows and on the roofs of houses, they were obliged to capitulate. The Spaniards violated the terms of surrender, and the whole remaining British troops were made prisoners of war, after losing nearly 200 men, killed and wounded. Sir Home Popham, the British commander, succeeded in making his escape with the squadron, and cast anchor off the mouth of the river, where he maintained a blockade till reinforcements enabled the British to resume the offensive.

On the 9th of May, 1807, General Whitelock, with 9,000 British soldiers, arrived at Montevideo (which town had been taken by the British the preceding year), and immediately made preparations for the reduction of Buenos Ayres. With 7,800 men, and eighteen pieces of artillery, he set out for that city. After several fatiguing marches the British troops reached Reduction, a village about nine miles from Buenos Ayres, and, having maneuvered, so as to deceive the enemy as to the real point of passage, succeeded in crossing the river La Plata, with very little loss, at the ford of Passo Chico. No sooner was the army assembled on the south bank of the river, than orders were given for a general attack on the town. The inhabitants had made great preparations for defense. Two hundred pieces of cannon were disposed, in advantageous positions, in the principal streets, and 15,000 armed men were stationed on the flat roofs of the houses to pour their destructive volleys on the columns that might advance to the attack. The British columns of attack were to advance by the principal streets to the great square near the river; but by an inconceivable oversight, they were not allowed to load their pieces, and they were forbidden to fire until they had reached the final place of their destination. As they advanced through the long streets, leading to the great square, they were exposed, without the possibility of returning it, to a destructive shower of musketry, hand-grenades, and stones, from the tops of the houses, which were crowded with armed and enthusiastic inhabitants; while strong barricades were drawn at intervals across the streets, mounted by powerful artillery. Sir Samuel Auchmuty, on the right, however, by a vigorous attack, made himself master of the Plaza de Toros, and took eighty-two pieces of cannon, an immense quantity of ammunition, and 600 prisoners. General Whitelock, himself, had gained possession of an advanced post in the center, and the Residencia, a commanding station on the left, had also fallen into the hands of the British. But these advantages were dearly purchased, and in other quarters of the town, the plunging fire to which the troops had been exposed, without the possibility of returning it, had proved so destructive, that three regiments mere compelled to lay down their arms, and the attacking force was weakened by the loss of 2,500 men. The next morning Linieres, the Spanish general, offered to restore all the prisoners he had taken, on condition that the British forces should withdraw altogether from Montevideo and all the settlements which they held on the Rio de la Plata. The British generals, fearful of a repetition of the disaster of the preceding day, agreed to these terms, and a capitulation, in virtue of which the whole British troops were withdrawn from the River Plata, was signed on the 7th of July, the second day after the action. And thus the expedition of the British to South America, was brought to an end.

BUNKER'S HILL. See Boston.

BURGOS, THE CASTLE OF, A.D. 1812.—This is a small fortress, but an important siege, filled with incident and instruction.

On the morning of the 18th of September, 1812, the allied army was in front of Burgos, and may be said to have commenced a siege, in which each claim the victory. The town was as bravely defended as it was bravely assailed.

Burgos is the capital of Old Castile. It is memorable for the noble stand which it repeatedly made against the Saracens. After the retreat of Massena, it was considered a critical and dangerous point, and its fortifications were repaired. The ruins of the castle were very strong, being stone, and of deep foundation, situated, besides, on the brow of a hill, commanding the river Arlanzon, on which the town stands, and the roads on both sides of it. These ruins were repaired, and strengthened by additional earth-works. Beyond the hill on which the castle is situated is another eminence, called St. Michael's Hill, on which a hornwork was erected. Adjoining the castle was a church, which was converted into a fort. The above works were included within three distinct lines of circumvallation, which were so carried and connected as to form an oblong square, and each to defend and support without endangering (in the event of being itself lost) the others. The garrison consisted of more than 2,000 men.

As Burgos is on the north side of the Arlanzon, while the allied army was on the south, and as the castle commanded both the river and the roads, Wellington had some difficulty in preparing the passage, and the remainder of the day of the 18th was employed in making the necessary arrangements. On the following day this operation was effected. The outworks of the hill of St. Michael were immediately seized, and troops posted close to the hornwork. At night the hornwork was itself attacked and carried, and thus the whole of St. Michael's Hill was obtained. This hill was, however, a mere outwork to the main fortress, inasmuch as the possession of it only brought the allies in front of the outermost of the three lines, behind which were the castle and body of the work.

The possession of this eminence afforded the allies a better knowledge of the defenses of the fort, with a commanding view of some of the works. The besieged evinced neither tardiness nor want of skill; they had demolished, in an incredibly short time, the houses which interfered with their line of defense. They had raised ramparts of earth and biscuit-barrels, and constructed flêches and redans to cover the batteries and sally-gates. These works, considering the materials and the pressure of the time, were so solid and accurate as to command the general praise of the British engineers, while the Portuguese regarded them with astonishment.

From the 19th to the 22d of September, the allies were employed in raising their own works upon St. Michael's Hill, in front of the exterior line of the enemy, and more particularly in fortifying and completing the hornwork, of which they had possessed themselves. Every thing being ready on the evening of the 22d, it was resolved to give the first regular assault. Accordingly, at the hour of eleven at night, the storming body was moved forward in two columns: the one, consisting of Portuguese, to the south-west flank of the castle; and the other of British, under Major Laurie, to the front. The plan of the attack was, that the Portuguese should engage and occupy the eminence on the above-mentioned flank, while Major Laurie's party should escalade the parapet in front.

The Portuguese, who were to begin the attack, commenced with much spirit. They were opposed to a deep ditch and a lofty parapet on the opposite side, and therefore, had to descend into the one and fight their way up the other. They were stopped at the very edge of the descent into this ditch; their attack, therefore, as a diversion, became nugatory, and failed in the first instance.

In the mean while, the party in front, under Major Laurie, having seen the Portuguese commence, advanced to the escalade, and having the same works in opposition to them as the Portuguese, in an instant reached the head of the counterscarp, and in another instant descended it, cleared the pallisades at the bottom, and planted their ladders to the parapet. The first assailants penetrated to the top of the parapet, and a fierce contest took place both there and in the bottom of the ditch. The assault was repelled with as much spirit as it was made, and the ditch and scarp were covered with dead of both parties. Among these was Major Laurie. But after much severe fighting, and a consequent loss, the party was withdrawn. The total British and Portuguese loss on this occasion was not short of 400 killed and wounded.

It would be of little general interest to follow the details of an irregular, and therefore, inartificial siege from day to day; we shall, therefore, confine ourselves to the attacks. Of those, during the whole siege, there were five; two we have already described.

After the failure of the storm on the 22d, a mine was directed under the same exterior line. It was exploded at midnight on the 29th, and a breach, erroneously deemed practicable, effected in the parapet. A storming party was immediately advanced, and at the same moment, for the purpose of diversion, a strong column was directed in front of the town. The storming party, however, missed its way, and thereby the affair failed.

Between the following day and the 4th of October, another mine was conducted near the same point, and the former breach was improved by fire from the batteries. This mine was exploded in the afternoon of the 4th, and the result was a second practicable breach. These two breaches were immediately stormed by the 2d battalion of the 24th, divided into two parties, under Captain Hedderwick and Lieutenants Holmes and Fraser. This assault was completely successful, and the allies were thus established within the exterior line of the castle.

The besieged, however, did not leave the allies in tranquil possession of this position: they made two vigorous sallies to interrupt the works against the second line, and continued their operations for the same purpose with very little intermission. A breach was effected, and a mine was in progress; but from want of siege-materials, particularly of a battering-train, the advances were slow, and it became obvious that success was doubtful. There were only three eighteen-pounders, and no materials or instruments but what were made upon the spot.

On the morning of the 18th of October, a breach having been effected and a mine having been prepared under the church of St. Roman, it was resolved that the mine should be exploded the same evening, and that upon such explosion, the breach should be stormed and the line (the second line) escaladed. Accordingly, at the appointed time in the evening the attacking party was divided into three columns: the one under Lieutenant Colonel Browne, composed of Spanish and Portuguese, were to attack the church; the second party, composed of a detachment of the German legion, under Major Wurmb, were to storm the breach; while the third party, composed of the guards, were to escalade the line. At this moment the mine blew up, and, being the appointed signal, the parties at once rushed forward to their assigned points.

The explosion of the mine carried away the whole of the wall which defended that point, and Lieutenant Colonel Browne succeeded in lodging his party on the ruins and outworks. The besieged retreated to a second parapet behind the church, over the heads of the advancing assailants. This occasioned much loss and confusion; and a flank fire of the enemy coming in aid, compelled the lieutenant colonel to suffer the retreat of his men, and to content himself with saving them from disorder.

In the mean time, Major Wurmb had directed his party against the breach. The breach was carried in an instant, and a considerable number of the party in the same moment got into the body of the place. But here began the conflict. The besieged opened upon them such a destructive fire, both from the third line and the body of the castle, that, after the loss of their leader and a great proportion of their force, they were compelled to retire.

The third party, the guards, experienced a similar success in the commencement, and a similar disappointment in the result. They succeeded in escalading the line, but were compelled to retire before the superiority of numbers and the fire of the enemy.

The army of Portugal and the army of the North, for they were so near each other as to constitute one army, had not suffered this siege to go on without some attempts to interrupt it; they had now, however, attained a strength and importance that demand our attention.

These two armies were stationed on the high road from Burgos to Miranda on the Ebro, a continuance of the great French road from Madrid, through Burgos to Bayonne. From Burgos to Miranda on the Ebro is forty English miles. Above the village of Monasterio, on that side of it furthest from Burgos, was a range of hills, which was the position of the British outposts. The army of Portugal was in the neighborhood of Bribiesca; and the army of the North, under General Cafferilli, had its head-quarters at Pancorvo.

The principal attempts of these armies were on the 13th and 18th of October. On the former of these days, General Macune, who was in command of the French at Bribiesca, moved forward a considerable body of infantry and cavalry against the posts of the allies at Monasterio, but was repulsed as well by the posts themselves as by a detachment of the German legion.

On the 18th, the army of Portugal, having been previously strongly reinforced by the arrival of levies from France, re-advanced against the said posts, and possessed themselves of the hills and town. It now, therefore, became necessary to lead the army against them, and accordingly, with the exception of that portion of it required for the siege, the marquis assembled the troops, and placed the allied army on some heights between Burgos and Quentana. This movement was made on the 19th of October. The enemy assembled their army at Monasterio on the same day. On the following evening, the 20th, they moved a force of nearly 10,000 men to drive in the outposts at Quentana, and which, according to order, withdrew as they approached. The marquis had now recourse to a flank movement; the result gave him an advantage; upon seeing which, the enemy again fell back upon Monasterio.

And this maneuver, was the last operation of the siege of Burgos, for on the following day, the 21st, a letter from Sir R. Hill reported such a state of affairs upon the Tagus, that the marquis found it to be an act of necessity immediately to raise the siege, and to fall back upon the Douro. Accordingly, the siege was raised the same night, and the army was in march on the following morning. —Robson.

BUSACO, A.D. 1810.—The Sierra Busaco is a range of mountains in Portugal, which runs from the northern shores of the Mondego about eight miles in a northerly direction, where it unites with the ridge which separates the valley of the Mondego from that of the Douro. It was on the summit of this ridge, that the Duke of Wellington resolved to post his troops, and there await an attack from the French marshal, Massena. On the evening of the 26th September, 1810, Wellington had made his dispositions, and with a force not exceeding 60,000 men, prepared to dispute the passage of this ridge with Massena, who had 72,000 men under his command. Next morning Massena commenced the attack at sunrise. Ney, at the head of three divisions, comprising 25,000 men, advanced against the British left, by the road which leads to the convent of Busaco; while, at the same time, Regnier with 16,000 men advanced to attack their right, about three miles distant. Ney's troops rapidly advanced up the wooded hollows, driving the British sharp-shooters before them. Crawford had his artillery so placed as to command the slope by which the French troops ascended; but, although the gunners worked their pieces with the greatest precision and rapidity possible, yet nothing could daunt the ascending troops. On they marched, till they emerged from the woods. Shouts of victory were now heard in the French lines, when Crawford with his 43d and 52d regiments, springing out of a hollow behind the highest part of the ridge, speedily charged the head of the French column, which, being fatigued by a toilsome march up the slope, was speedily broken and drove headlong, with dreadful loss, to the bottom of the hollow. Regnier's attack on the British right met with no better success. The ground there was easier to ascend than on the left, and notwithstanding the fire of twenty pieces of cannon, which continued to pour destructive volleys on the ascending column, they continued to press on, till they had gained the summit of the position. A Portuguese regiment attempted to oppose their further progress, but these were speedily routed, and the French troops establishing themselves on the summit commenced to deploy, in order to attack the British at the same time in front and on both flanks. At this moment the position appeared to be almost carried; when Generals Leith and Picton brought up their divisions and charged the enemy with such impetuosity, that, after a desperate struggle, they were forced from the ridge and hurled down the hill in disorder, the British firing on them but not pursuing, lest the ranks should be broken and the ridge again carried. The other division of Regnier's corps, which advanced up the slope, to the left of his main column, was promptly repulsed by the left of Picton's division before they reached the summit. This was the last attempt made by the French to carry this ridge. Though Loison and Marechand for a long time maintained an obstinate and bloody conflict in the hollows below, they were, however, effectually held in check by the united brigades of Peck and Spencer. Toward evening, Massena finding it impossible to carry the English position, and weary of this fruitless carnage, gave orders for his troops to withdraw. In this engagement the French general sustained a loss of 1,800 killed and 3,000 wounded, among whom were Generals Foy and Merle, who had received their wounds in ascending the slope. The loss of the allies was not so great.

BYBLOS, B.C. 454.—Inarus, a prince of Libya, favored by the Athenians, proclaimed himself king of Egypt, at the time that country was under the subjection of Artaxerxes Longimanus, King of Persia. Irritated at the revolt, Artaxerxes sent three hundred thousand men to quell it. He gave the command of this army to Megabyzus. Inarus could not resist such an inundation, and he at once abandoned Egypt and shut himself up, with a few of his countrymen and 6,000 Athenians, in Byblos, a city of the isle of Prosopitis. This city, surrounded by the waters of the Nile, was constantly revictualled by the Athenians, and for a year and a half the Persians made useless efforts to gain possession of it. Tired of such protracted labors, the Persians formed the plan of turning, by numerous cuttings, the arm of the Nile in which the Athenian fleet lay. They succeeded; and Inarus, terrified at the probable consequences, surrendered upon composition; but the bold bearing of the Athenians, their admirable discipline, and the order of their battalions, made the host of Persians afraid to attack them. They were offered an honorable capitulation; they accepted it, gave up Byblos, and returned to Greece, proud of having been thought invincible by a multitude of barbarians.

BYZANTIUM, B.C. 408.—Byzantium is the former name of the city of Constantinople.

The first memorable siege of Byzantium was undertaken by Alcibiades, in the year 408, B.C., when the ungrateful Athenians had recalled him to the head of their armies. His triumphs were as rapid as his wishes: he prevailed in the Peloponnesus, subdued the revolting cities, and laid siege to Byzantium. Alcibiades is another of the commanders we can scarcely fancy at a siege: an eager, sanguine, impetuous man, with ambitious views boiling in his brain, is not at home in such enterprises, whatever may be his talents. Tired of the length of the siege, and despairing of taking Byzantium by force, he had recourse to stratagem. He gave it out that the Athenians recalled him, embarked his army, and set sail. During the night he returned, landed a great part of his soldiers at a distance from the city, and himself appeared, in a menacing position, with his fleet before the port of Byzantium. The Byzantines rushed to the shore to drive off the fleet, which Alcibiades, by his maneuvers, made them believe was their most imminent danger. In the mean time, the troops landed during the night drew near the walls on the other side, and took possession of the city before the inhabitants were aware even of their approach.

Second Siege, B.C. 341.—The Byzantines were in great peril when Philip, the father of Alexander the Great, besieged Perinthus. Byzantium having granted some succors to that city, Philip divided his army, and laid siege to it likewise. The Byzantines were reduced to the last extremity when Phocion came to their assistance. The grateful Perinthians and Byzantines decreed a crown of gold to the people of Athens.

Third Siege, A.D. 196.—The Emperor Severus, enraged with the Byzantines, laid siege to their city. They defended themselves with great resolution and firmness, and employed all kinds of stratagems to drive off their enemy, but they could not prevent the attacks of famine. Decimated by this horrible calamity, they were constrained to open the gates to the Romans. The conquerors exercised the rights of war in all their rigor; the city was plundered, and most of the citizens were slaughtered.

Fourth Siege, A.D. 323.—Immediately after the battle of Adrianople, Constantine undertook the siege of Byzantium, which was attended with great labor and uncertainty. In the late civil wars, the fortifications of that place, so justly considered as the key of Europe and Asia, had been repaired and strengthened; and as long as Licinius remained master of the sea, the garrison was much less exposed to the danger of famine, than the army of the besiegers, which consisted of 120,000 men, Constantine immediately summoned his naval commanders to his camp, and directed them positively to force the passage of the Hellespont, as the fleet of Licinius was lying in those narrow straits. Licinius's fleet consisted of 350 large galleys of three banks of oars, while that of his enemy numbered only about 200 galleys, much inferior in size and strength to his own. Crispus, Constantine's eldest son, was intrusted with the execution of the daring enterprise, which he performed with so much courage and success that he deserved the esteem, and most probably excited the jealousy of his father. The engagement lasted two days; and in the evening of the first, the contending fleets, after a considerable and mutual loss, retired into their respective harbors of Europe and Asia. The second day, about noon, a strong south wind sprung up, which carried the vessel of Crispus against the enemy; and as the casual advantage was improved, by this skillful intrepidity, he soon obtained a complete victory. A hundred and thirty vessels were destroyed, 5,000 men were slain, and Amandus, the admiral of the Asiatic fleet, escaped with the utmost difficulty to the shores of Chalcedon. As soon as the Hellespont was open, a plentiful convoy of provisions flowed into the camp of Constantine, who had already advanced the operations of the siege. He constructed artificial mounds of earth of an equal height with the ramparts of Byzantium, and erected lofty towers upon them. From these towers the besieged were galled with large stones and darts from military engines, and the battering-rams had shaken the walls in several places. Licinius perceived that if he remained much longer in the defense he exposed himself to be involved in the ruin of the place, and, therefore, before he was surrounded he prudently removed his person and treasures to Chalcedon in Asia. Such were still the resources, and such the abilities of Licinius, that after so many successive defeats he collected in Bithynia a new army of 50,000 or 60,000 men, while the activity of Constantine was employed in the siege of Byzantium. The vigilant emperor, however, did not neglect the last struggle of his antagonist. A considerable part of his victorious army was transported over the Bosphorus in small vessels, and the decisive engagement was fought soon after their landing on the heights of Chrysopolis, or, as it is now called, Scutari. The troops of Licinius, though they were lately raised, ill armed, and worse disciplined, made head against their conquerors with fruitless but desperate valor, till a total defeat, and a slaughter of 25,000 men, irretrievably determined the fate of their leader, who, soliciting and accepting pardon from Constantine, for his offenses, laid himself and his purple at the feet of his lord and master, and was raised from the ground with insulting pity. The same day he was admitted to the imperial banquet, and soon afterward he was sent away to Thessalonica, where he was placed in confinement, which was soon terminated by his death.—Gibbon. See Adrianople.

CADIZ, A.D. 1596.—Cadiz, a city and seaport of Spain, is situated on the island of Leon, off the south-west coast of Andalusia. On the 12th of June, 1596, an English fleet, consisting of 170 vessels, 17 of which were ships of war, the rest transports and small vessels, and a fleet of 20 ships from Holland, bearing a force of 6,360 soldiers, 1,000 volunteers, 772 seamen, beside the Dutch allies, set sail from Plymouth for Cadiz. The land forces were commanded by the Earl of Essex; the navy, by Lord Effingham, high admiral. Lord Thomas Howard, Sir Walter Raleigh, Sir Francis Vere, Sir George Carew, and Sir Convers Clifford had commands in this expediton, and were appointed council to the general and admiral. Before the fleet were sent some armed vessels, which intercepted every ship that could carry intelligence to the enemy; and when they came near Cadiz, they took an Irish vessel, by which they learned that the port was full of merchant ships of great value, and that the Spaniards imagined themselves in perfect security, without any apprehension of an enemy. After a fruitless attempt to land at St. Sebastian's, on the western side of the island, it was, upon deliberation, resolved, by council of war, to attack the ships and galleys in the bay. Essex was so much delighted at this determination, that he threw his hat into the sea, and gave other symptoms of the most extravagant joy. His ardor, however, was abated, when Effingham informed him that Queen Elizabeth, dreading the effect of his youthful enthusiasm, had recently given orders that he should not be permitted to command the van in the attack. That duty was assigned to Sir Walter Raleigh and Lord Thomas Howard; but Essex no sooner came within reach of the enemy, than he forgot the promise which the admiral had exacted from him, to keep in the midst of the fleet; he broke through and pressed forward into the thickest of the fire. Emulation for glory, avidity of plunder, animosity against the Spaniards proved incentives to every one; and the enemy was soon obliged to ship anchor, and retreat further into the bay, where they ran many of their ships aground. Essex then landed his men at the fort of Puntal, and immediately marched to the attack of Cadiz, which the English soon carried, sword in hand. The generosity of Essex, not inferior to his valor, made him stop the slaughter, and treat his prisoners with the greatest humanity, and even affability and kindness. The English made rich plunder in the city; but missed of a much richer, by the resolution of the Duke of Medino, the Spanish admiral, who caused his ships to be set on fire, to prevent their falling into the hands of the victors. It was computed that the loss which the Spanish sustained in this enterprise amounted to 20,000,000 ducats.

CADORE, A.D. 1797.—In the year 1797, an action took place near Cadore, on the Piave, in northern Italy, betwen the Austrians and French armies, in which the former were defeated.

CAEN, A.D. 1346.—This city is situated between two meadows, at the confluence of the Orne with the Odon, in France.

In 1346, France was invaded by Edward III., of England, with an army consisting of 4,000 men at arms, 10,000 archers, 10,000 Welsh infantry, and 6,000 Irish. The intelligence of this unexpected invasion soon reached Paris, and threw Philip IV. into great perplexity. He issued orders, however, for levying forces in all quarters, and dispatched the Count of Eu, Constable of France, and the Count of Taucarville, with a body of troops, to the defense of Caen, a large and prosperous city, which lay in the neighborhood of the English army. The temptation of so rich a prize soon allured Edward to approach it; and the inhabitants, encouraged by their numbers, and by the reinforcements which they daily received from the country, ventured to meet him in the field.

But their courage failed them on the first shock; they fled with precipitation: the Counts of Eu and Tancarville were taken prisoners; the victors entered the city along with the vanquished and a furious massacre commenced without distinction of age, sex, or condition. The citizens, in despair, barricaded their houses, and assailed the English with stones, bricks, and every missile weapon; the English made way by fire to the destruction of the citizens, till Edward, anxious to save both his spoil and his soldiers, stopped the massacre; and, having obliged the inhabitants to lay down their arms, gave his troops license to begin a more regular and less hazardous plunder of the city.

The plunder continued for three days; the king reserved for his own share the jewels, plate, silks, fine cloths, and fine linen; and he bestowed all the remainder of the spoil on his army. The whole was embarked on board the ships, and sent over to England, together with three hundred of the richest citizens of Caen, whose ransom was an additional profit, which he expected afterward to levy. This dismal scene passed in the presence of two cardinal legates, who had come to negotiate a peace between the two kingdoms.

In 1417, Caen was again taken by the English; and was rescued from them in 1540, by Dunois, who captured the Duke of Somerset and 4,000 English troops, who had retreated to the castle.

CAER CARADOC, OR CRADOK HILL, A.D. 51.—In Shropshire, England, at the confluence of the Coln and Teme, stands a lofty hill, called Caen Caradoc, still retaining the vestiges of the camp which the celebrated Caractacus, in the year 50, so gallantly defended against the Romans. The bank of the river was lined with soldiers, and the ascent of the hill was fortified with ramparts of loose stones. At the approach of the Romans, the Britons bound themselves by an oath to conquer or die, and defied, with loud exclamations, the attack of the enemy. Ostorius, the Roman general, hesitated at the sight; but at the demand of the legions, the signal of battle was given, and the Romans, under showers of darts, mounted the hill, burst over the ramparts, and drove the Britons from the summit. The wife and daughter of Caractacus fell into the hands of the victors; his brothers soon after surrendered; and the king himself was delivered in chains to Ostorius, by his step-mother, Cartismandua, Queen of the Brigantes, under whose protiction he had hopèd to elude thé vigilance of his pursuers. Caractacus was carried to Italy, where his fame had preceded him, and all were anxious to behold the man who, for nine years, had braved the power of Rome. As he passed through the imperial city, he expressed his surprise that men who possessed such palaces at home should envy the wretched hovels of his subjects, in Britain. The Emperor Claudius received the defeated monarch graciously, restored him to liberty, and, it is plausibly surmised, invested him with princely authority over a portion of conquered Britain.

CAHORS, A.D. 1580.—Of the numerous sieges on both sides which marked the struggle of Henry IV. of France for his crown, that of Cahors best displays the character of that hero and the men and times he lived in.

Henry IV., while King of Navarre, resolved to gain possession of Cahors. That city is surrounded on all sides by the Lot, which serves it as a fosse. It had a garrison of 2,000 men, and Vesins, its governor, was a soldier of acknowledged valor and great experience. Its citizens, always armed, were never off their guard. Henry assembled his council of war, composed of valiant and tried captains, and all pronounced the enterprise hazardous. Their representations were useless. "Every thing is possible to me," said he, "with men as brave as those I consult." On the 5th of May, he set out from Mantauban, in excessively hot weather, and arrived in the middle of the night within a quarter of a league of Cahors. His troops there quenched their thirst at a fountain which flowed under a nursery of young walnut-trees. Twelve soldiers marched forward for the purpose of fastening a petard to the gates of the city. Fifty men, commanded by Captain St. Martin, followed them closely; Roquilaure came next, with forty gentlemen and sixty soldiers; and after them, Henry of Navarre, with nine hundred men. Twelve hundred arquebusiers, in six platoons, closed the march. There were three gates to be forced. The petard attached to the first made so small an opening, that it was necessary to enlarge it with axes. The first passed through with difficulty; but the soldiers who followed them had time to file through in sufficiently great numbers. A furious storm which raged at the time did not permit the inhabitants to distinguish between the noise of the thunder and the report of the petards, which had broken down their gates. Henry's soldiers, on first entering the city, met with forty men and two hundred arquebusiers, almost naked. The Baron de Salignac cut them to pieces, and advanced into Cahors; but he was stopped in his march by the inhabitants, who, from the tops of the houses, hurled stones, tiles, pieces of wood, and other missiles upon the heads of his soldiers. In the mean time, the King of Navarre entered Cahors by another gate, with which the petard had succeeded better. At length day appeared, persons and objects were distinguishable, and all either rushed to the attack or stood firm in defense of the place. In all the streets it became necessary to force barricades and repulse a garrison much more numerous than the besiegers. Henry commanded and fought everywhere at the same time; his valor shrunk from no danger, though the blows of all the enemies seemed to be directed against him. He broke two partisans, and his armor was pierced in twenty places. This terrible combat lasted five days and five nights. The besieged, in full expectation of assistance, said not a word about surrendering. The assailants, fatigued with the weight of their armor and the excessive heat, maintained their posts with the intrepid courage their leader knew how to inspire. On the fourth day they learned that the succors promised to the city were drawing near. At this news, his captains assembled around Henry, and conjured him to secure a retreat before the enemy could reach Cahors. Henry, too courageous to know what fear meant, and heedless of the pain caused by his wounds, replied, with that coolness which inspires confidence: "It is decreed above what is to become of me on this occasion. Remember that my retreat from this city without having taken it, will be the retreat of my life from my body." Reanimated by these words, his soldiers made fresh efforts; and fortune seconded the efforts of the brave Béarnais. He received a reinforcement of a hundred horse and five hundred arquebusiers; he secured his posts in the interior, and marched out to meet the approaching enemy. He repulsed them; and on his return to the city, the inhabitants having lost all hope, laid down their arms. There were but few killed in Henry's army, but many wounded.—Robson.

CALAHORRA, B.C. 72.—This place, known in ancient history as Calagurris, is situated on the right bank of the Ero, in Spain. In the year 72 B.C., it was besieged by the army of Pompey the Great. The inhabitants made a desperate resistance; but after enduring the most dreadful sufferings from famine, they were obliged to yield, and the city fell into the hands of the conqueror.

CALAIS, A.D. 1346.—This celebrated city is situated on the Straits of Dover, 29 miles north of Boulogne. The town is of a square form, and is well fortified; being surrounded by walls and bastions. On the west side it is protected by a strong citadel, commanding the town and harbor, and toward the sea by several forts. The country round, may also, in case of necessity, be laid under water by means of sluices.

In the year 1346, Edward III., of England, laid siege to the city of Calais, which was defended by John de Vienne, an experienced commander, who was supplied with every thing necessary for the defense. Edward, however, knowing the difficulty of taking so strong a town by force, resolved to reduce it by famine. He ordered a large castle to be constructed of strong timbers, in order to cut off all communication with the sea. This castle he built and embattled in such a manner, that it could not be destroyed; and garrisoned it with 40 men-at-arms, and 200 archers, who were provided with springalles, bombardes, bows, and other artillery. These men guarded the port of Calais so closely, that no vessels could go out or come in without being sunk or taken. These operations, though slow, were successful. The inhabitants were soon reduced to the utmost extremities by the want of provisions. King Philip, of France, who felt that his subjects in Calais must be severely oppressed, determined to march to their relief; and he approached the English with an army, which the writers of that age make amount to 200,000 men. With this immense body of troops, the French king marched toward Calais. They approached Calais in the evening. The moon was shining brilliantly, and the polished arms and fluttering banners of the French host, presented a gorgeous appearance as they glistened and waved in the soft moonlight. Edward's army, however, was so surrounded by morasses, and secured by intrenchments, that, without running on inevitable, destruction Philip concluded it impossible to make an attempt on the English camp. His only resource then was to send his rival a challenge to meet him in the open field; but this was refused, and he was obliged to decamp with his army, and disperse them into their various provinces. The siege had now lasted nearly twelve months, and John de Vienne, governor of Calais, now saw the necessity of surrendering his fortress, which was reduced to the last extremity by famine, and the fatigues of the inhabitants. Mounting the walls, he made a signal to the English sentinels that he desired a parley. Upon learning this, the King of England sent to him Sir Walter Manny, and Lord Basset. "Brave knight!" cried the governor, as they approached him, "I have been intrusted by my sovereign with the command of this town. It is almost a year since you besieged me; and I have endeavored, as well as those under me, to do my duty. But you are acquainted with our present condition; we are perishing with hunger, and we have no hopes of relief. I am willing, therefore, to surrender; and desire, as the sole condition, to insure the lives and liberties of those brave men who have so long shared with me every hardship and danger." To this Sir Walter Manny replied, "John, we are aware of the intentions of the king, our master. Know then, that it is not his pleasure to allow you to escape thus. He is determined that you shall surrender solely to his will; and that he will liberate or put to death such persons as he may think proper. You have done him so much mischief, and have by your obstinate resistance cost him so many lives, and so much money, that he is mightily enraged." "But consider," replied Vienne, "that this is not the treatment to which brave men are entitled; if any English knight had been in my position, your king would have expected the same conduct from him. The inhabitants of Calais have done for their sovereign what merits the esteem of every prince; much more of so gallant a prince as Edward. But I inform you, that if we must perish, we shall not perish unavenged; and that we are not yet so reduced but we can sell our lives at a high price to the victors. It is the interest of both sides to prevent these desperate extremities; and I expect that you, yourselves, gentlemen, will interpose your good offices, with your prince, in our behalf."

Struck with the justice of these sentiments, Manny represented to Edward the danger of retaliation, in case he should thus treat the inhabitants of Calais. Many barons who were present, supported this opinion, and at length the king was persuaded to mitigate the conditions demanded. "Gentlemen," said he, "I am not so obstinate as to hold my opinion alone against you all. Sir Walter, inform the governor of Calais, that the only grace he must expect from me is, that six of the principal citizens of Calais march out of the town, with bare heads and feet, with ropes around their necks, and the keys of the town and castle in their hands. These six persons shall be at my absolute disposal, and the remainder of the inhabitants pardoned." When this intelligence was conveyed to Calais the inhabitants were filled with consternation. To sacrifice six of their fellow-citizens to certain destruction, for the signalizing their valor in a common cause, appeared to them even more severe than that general punishment with which they were before threatened; and they found themselves incapable of coming to any resolution. They had been called together in the market-place to consult upon the conditions offered them by the English king; but the alternative was so cruel, that unable to come to a decision, they filled the air with lamentable groans and cries. Even the lion-hearted Vienne, wept bitterly, as he gazed upon the melancholy spectacle. At length, one of the principal citizens, Eustace de St. Pierre, whose name deserves to be recorded, arose and said: "Citizens! it would, indeed, be mournful to allow so many people to die through famine, if any means could be found to prevent it; and in the eyes of our Saviour, it would be highly meritorious to avert such an evil. I have such trust and faith in finding grace before God, if I die, to save my fellow townsmen, that I name myself as first of the six." When Eustace had ceased speaking, the people all arose, and almost worshiped him; many cast themselves at his feet with tears and groans. Another wealthy citizen, animated by the noble example of Eustace, made a like generous offer; a third and fourth presented themselves to the same fate, and the whole number was soon completed. These six heroic citizens appeared before Edward, clad in the guise of malefactors, and laid at his feet the keys of the city. Edward gazed angrily at them for a moment, and then ordered that their heads should be struck off. But the entreaties of his queen saved his memory from the infamy of this barbarous deed. Casting herself at his feet, with streaming eyes, she entreated that their lives might be spared. The king looked at her for some moments in silence, and then said: "Ah, lady, I wish you had been anywhere else than here; I can not deny your entreaties. Take the men and do with them as you please." The queen conducted the six citizens to her apartment; the halters were taken from their necks, and they were presented with new clothing, and after having served them with a splendid repast, she caused them to be escorted out of the camp in safety.

Edward immediately took possession of the town; knowing that, notwithstanding his pretended title to the crown of France, he was regarded as a mortal enemy by every Frenchman, he ordered all the inhabitants of Calais to evacuate the town, and he peopled it anew with English; a policy which probably preserved it so long to his successors the dominion of that important fortress. Through the mediation of the Pope's legates, Edward concluded a truce with France; but even during the cessation of arms in 1349, he very nearly lost Calais, the sole fruit of all his boasted victories. The king had intrusted the place to Aimeny de Pavie, an Italian, who was a brave but treacherous man. This man agreed to deliver up Calais for the sum of 20,000 crowns; and Geoffrey de Charni, who commanded the French forces in that quarter, and who knew that if he succeeded in this enterprise, he would not be disavowed, ventured, without consulting his master, to conclude the bargain with him. Edward, informed of this treachery by means of Aimery's secretary, summoned the governor to London on other pretenses; and, having charged him with the guilt, promised him his life, on condition that he would turn the contrivance to the destruction of the enemy. The Italian easily agreed to this double treachery. A day was appointed for the admission of the French; and Edward, with 300 men at arms, and 600 archers, under the command of Sir Walter Manny, carrying the Prince of Wales with him, secretly departed from London, and arrived in the evening at Calais without being suspected. He placed his men in ambuscade in the rooms and towers of the castle, and gave the entire command of the enterprise to Sir Walter Manny. "You," said he to that gallant knight, "shall be chief; I, and my son, will fight under your banner." On the appearance of Charni, a chosen band of French troops were admitted at the postern, and Aimery, receiving the stipulated sum, promised that, with their assistance, he would immediately open the great gate to the troops, who were awaiting with impatience for the fulfilling of his engagement. The French who entered were immediately slain or taken prisoners: the great gate was opened, and Edward, followed by his men, rushed forth with cries of battle and of victory. Though astonished at the event, the French behaved valorously, and a fierce and bloody engagement ensued. At daybreak the king, who was not distinguished by his arms, and who fought as a private man under the standard of Sir Walter Manny, observed a French gentleman, Sir Eustace de Ribeaumont, who exerted himself with singular bravery and vigor; and he was seized with a desire to try a single combat with him. Stepping forth from the troop he challenged Ribeaumont by name. The hardy knight instantly sprang forward to the struggle. Twice was the English monarch beaten to the ground by the vigorous strokes of the Frenchman, and twice he recovered himself. In the confusion of battle, the two combatants were separated from the others; the blows were redoubled with equal force on both sides, till the French knight perceiving himself almost alone, cried out to his antagonist, "Sir knight, I surrender myself your prisoner; the glory of the day must fall to the English," and at the same time he delivered up his sword to the king. The French, being overpowered by numbers, and intercepted in their retreat, were nearly all either slain or made prisoners. The French officers who had fallen into the hands of the English were conducted into Calais; where Edward discovered to them the antagonist with whom they had had the honor to be engaged, and treated them with great regard and courtesy. They were even entertained in the evening, with a grand supper in the castle, at which both the king and his son were present. After supper the king remained in the hall, and went about conversing familiarly with his guests. Approaching Sir Eustace de Ribeaumont, he said smilingly, "Sir Eustace, you are the most valiant knight in Christendom that I ever saw attack his enemy or defend himself. I never yet met any one in battle, who, body to body, has given me so much to do, as you have done to-day. I adjudge to you the prize of valor in token of my esteem for your bravery." Then taking a string of pearls, which he wore about his own neck, he cast it over the head of Ribeaumont, and continued, "Sir Eustace, I present this chaplet to you, as being the best combatant of the day, and I beg of you to wear it this year, for love of me. I know that you are lively and amorous, and love the company of ladies and damsels; therefore say, wherever you go, that I gave it to you. You are no longer a prisoner; I acquit you of your ransom; and you may set out to-morrow if you please, to go whither you will."

In the year 1436, the Duke of Burgundy, laid siege to the city of Calais, for the purpose of wresting it from the hands of the English; but terrified at the large force which the Duke of Gloucester was about to bring against him, he raised the siege, and made good his retreat before the arrival of the enemy.

For more than 200 years Calais remained in the possession of the English, who made it the chief market for British commodities, and who strongly fortified it at different times. In the year 1557, during the reign of Mary of England, war was declared against France, which country at that time was engaged in a war with Spain.

In England, preparations were made everywhere for attacking the French with vigor. An army of 10,000 men was raised, and sent into Flanders. A battle gained by the Spaniards at St. Quintin seemed to promise great success to the allied arms; but soon the Duke of Guise performed a deed, in the midst of the winter of 1558, which turned the scale in favor of the French, and strongly affected the interests of England, and touched its honor to the quick. This action was the taking of Calais. The English deemed this place impregnable; but all the fortifications which were raised before the invention of gunpowder were ill able to resist the attack of a regular battery from cannon. Coligny, the French general, had remarked to the Duke of Guise, that as the town of Calais was surrounded by marshes, which, during winter, were impassable, except over a dyke, guarded by two castles, St. Agatha and Newman Bridge, the English were of late, accustomed to some expense, to dismiss a great part of the garrison during that season of the year, and recall them in the spring. Upon this circumstance he had founded the design of making a sudden attack on Calais. He had caused the place to be secretly viewed by some engineers, and a plan of the whole enterprise being found among his papers, it served, though he himself was made prisoner at the battle of St. Quintin, to direct the measures of the Duke of Guise. The duke, on various pretenses, caused several bodies of troops to defile toward the frontiers; and the whole army suddenly assembled, formed an army, with which he made an unexpected march toward Calais. At the same time, a great number of French ships, being ordered into the channel under cover of cruising against the English, composed a fleet which made an attack by sea on the fortifications. The French assaulted St. Agatha Castle with 3,000 arquebusiers; and the garrison, after a gallant defense, were obliged to abandon the place, and retreat to the castle of Newman Bridge. The siege of the latter place was immediately undertaken, and at the same time, the fleet battered the risbank which guarded the entrance of the harbor, and both of these posts were in imminent danger. The Governor of Calais, Lord Wentworth, finding that the greater part of his weak garrison was inclosed in the castle of Newman Bridge, and the risbank, he ordered them to capitulate, and to join him at Calais, which, without their assistance, he was utterly unable to defend.

The garrison of Newman Bridge happily effected this purpose; but that of the risbank could not obtain such favorable conditions, and were obliged to surrender at discretion. Calais was now completely blockaded by sea and land, and the Duke of Guise determined to attack the place at once. He planted his batteries against the castle, where he made a large breach. Having ordered Andelot, Coligny's brother, to drain the fosse, he commanded an assault. The French troops gallantly advanced to the breach, where they were met by its brave defenders. After a sharp struggle, in which both parties fought with great valor, the French drove back the English, and effected a lodgment in the castle. The following night, Wentworth attempted to recover this post, but having lost 200 men in a furious attack which he made upon it, he found his garrison so weak that he was obliged to capitulate. Thus, in less than eight days, the Duke of Guise recovered a city that had been in the possession of the English since the time of Edward the Third, and which had cost that monarch a siege of twelve months, at the head of a numerous army, which had that very year been victorious in the battle of Crecy. While the people of France gave way to the most extravagant joy at this victory, and loaded the Duke of Guise with every honor a grateful nation could bestow, the British kingdom was filled with murmurs, and the queen with despair. "When I am dead," she was heard to exclaim, "the name of Calais will be found engraven on my heart." Mary did not long survive the loss of Calais.

CALCUTTA, A.D. 1756.—Calcutta, the capital of the British dominions in the East, stands in a level plain, on the east side of Hooghly river, an arm of the Ganges, in Hindoostan.

In the year 1756, Suraja-ul-Dowlah, the soubahdar of Bengal, declared war against the British settlement at Calcutta, and levying a numerous army, laid siege to that place. But it was not in a state of strength to defend itself against the attack even of barbarians. The fort was taken, having been deserted by the commander; and the garrison, to the number of 146 persons, were made prisoners. They expected the usual treatment of war, and were therefore less vigorous in their defense; but they soon found what mercy was to be expected from a savage conqueror. They were all crowded together into a narrow prison called the Black-Hole, about eighteen feet square, and receiving air only by two small iron windows to the west, which by no means afforded a sufficient circulation of air. It is terrible to reflect on the situation of these unfortunate men, shut up in this narrow place in the burning climate of the East, and suffocating each other. Their first efforts, upon perceiving the effects of this horrible confinement were to break open the door of the prison; but as it was large and heavy, and opened inward, they soon found the task impossible. They next endeavored to excite the compassion or the cupidity of their guard, by offering him large sums of money, for his assistance in removing them to separate prisons; but with this he was unable to comply, as the viceroy was asleep, and no person dared to disturb him. They were now left to die without hopes of relief; and the whole prison was filled with groans, shrieks, contest, and despair. Soon, however, this turmoil sunk into a silence still more terrible; their efforts of strength and courage were over, and an expiring languor succeeded. In the morning, when the keepers came to visit the prison, all was horror, silence, and desolation. Of 146, who entered alive, 23 only survived, and of these the greater part died of putrid fever upon being released.

Six months afterward, Colonel Clive, and Admiral Wilson arrived before Calcutta with two British ships. The barbarians seemed determined to stand a regular siege. The English ships received a furious fire from all the batteries of the town, which they immediately returned with great effect, and in less than two hours the natives were obliged to abandon their fortifications. The English were again in possession of Calcutta. In order to repair his loss, the native prince assembled an army of 10,000 horse and 15,000 foot, and professed a firm resolution of expelling the English from all their settlements in that part of the world. Upon the first intelligence of his march, Clive obtained a reinforcement from the admiral's ships, and advanced with his little army to fight these numerous forces. He attacked the enemy in three columns, and though the numbers were so disproportionate, victory soon declared in favor of the English. The whole Indian army was put to flight and routed with terrible slaughter. Shortly afterward, Dowlah was again defeated by the British troops, and Ali Khan, his prime minister, was proclaimed by Colonel Clive, viceroy of Bengal, Bahar, and Arixa, in the room of the nabob, who was solemnly deposed, and soon after put to death by his successor.

CALDIERO, A.D. 1796.—In 1796, the Austrian army under Alvinzi, occupied Caldiero, a village of northern Italy, nine miles east of Verona, and twenty-four miles east of Arcola. Napoleon, with his army, was at the same time in Verona, and although the enemy occupied an almost impregnable position, by a series of brilliant maneuvers he drew them from their post, and gained one of his most famous victories. See Arcola.

In 1805, an action took place near Caldiero, between the French, under Massena, and the army of the Archduke Charles of Austria, which resulted in the defeat of the former.

CALVI, A.D. 1794—The citadel of Calvi, in Corsica, was taken by the British, in 1794, after a siege of 51 days.

CAMDEN, A.D. 1780.—On the east bank of the river Wateree, in South Carolina, is situated the village of Camden, famous in American history as the scene of two sanguinary engagements between the British troops and the Americans.

On the night of the 15th of August, 1780, the American army, 4,500 strong, under General Gates, marched from their encampment at Clermont, toward Camden, which was occupied by Lord Cornwallis, with 2,000 men. The British general, resolving to attack the enemy in their camp, was on his way from Camden to Clermont. At half past two in the morning of the 16th, he encountered the advanced parties of the American army, at a place called Sander's creek, about half way between Clermont and Camden. A sharp skirmish ensued, in which the Americans were worsted. The militia, dispirited by the result of the encounter, retreated to the main body of their army. At day-break, both parties prepared for a general battle. In the center of the American army, the corps of General Caswell, the North Carolina division, and the artillery were posted. The second Maryland brigade formed the right wing, which was covered in flank by a morass; while the left wing was composed of the Virginia militia, and the North Carolina infantry, and was also flanked by some boggy ground. A body of men, under General Smallwood, was posted about 300 yards in the rear of the American line, as a reserve. The 23d and 33d regiments of foot, under Lieutenant Colonel Webster, formed the right wing of the British line; the left was guarded by some Irish volunteers, the infantry of the legion, and part of Hamilton's regiment, under the command of Lord Rawdon. In the rear, the cavalry, 300 strong, was stationed, with the 71st regiment, as a line of reserve. The battle began by the advance of 200 British troops in front of the American artillery. They were received by a steady fire; and Gates ordered the Virginia militia, under Colonel Stevens, to charge them with the bayonet. The gallant colonel vainly endeavorgd to lead his troops to the charge; but the militia, panic-struck by the stern demeanor of the troops of Colonel Webster, who were advancing, with loud cheers, to attack them, threw away their weapons, and fled from the field, in the utmost disorder. The continental troops, which formed the right wing of the American army, and were commanded by the Baron de Kalb, bravely maintained their position, although deserted by the center and left wing. Lord Rawdon charged them with the utmost vigor; both parties resorted to the bayonet, and a bloody conflict raged for nearly an hour. In the mean time, the British on the left of the second Maryland brigade, rapidly gained ground, taking many prisoners.

At this moment the American reserve was attacked by the left wing of the enemy with such vigor that it was thrown into disorder; but the soldiers soon rallied, and renewed the action with unimpaired energy. Again did they yield to the overwhelming force of the enemy, and again they rallied, and covered the flank of the Maryland brigade, which was still gallantly striving for the victory. The whole British fire was now directed upon these two brigades. Still they did not yield an inch. Cornwallis, observing that the enemy had no cavalry, now pushed his dragoons forward, and ordered a general charge with the bayonet. Onward, with terrible force, dashed that bright array of bristling steel against the gallant band, while the heavy cavalry, at the same instant, charged upon them at full speed. Unable to resist this combined attack, the American line was broken, and the combatants were mingled on the field, in confusion. The struggle which ensued was fearful; hand-to-hand they fought until at length the Americans, overwhelmed by numbers, fled in every direction. During this fearful conflict, the Baron de Kalb, who fought on foot with his soldiers, fell, covered with wounds. Lieutenant du Buysson his aid-de-camp, received him in his arms, and announcing the rank and nation of the wounded man to the surrounding foe, entreated them to spare his life. While thus nobly endeavoring to save the life of his friend, Du Buysson received several severe wounds, and was taken prisoner with his general. Shortly afterward, De Kalb expired. His latest moments were spent in dictating a letter, expressing the warmest affection for the officers and men of his division, and the most exalted admiration of their courage and good conduct. All the baggage and artillery of the Americans fell into the hands of the victors; and the British cavalry pursued the fugitives many miles from the original scene of action.—See Hobkirk's Hill.

CANNÆ, B.C. 216.—The site of the ancient city of Cannæ is adjacent to an inconsiderable place bearing the same name, on the river Ofanto (the ancient Aufidus) in Naples, eight miles west-south-west of Barletta. The battle was fought on the right bank of the river, near its entrance into the Adriatic.

In the year 217, B.C., C. Terentius Varro and L. Æmilius were chosen consuls at Rome. In this campaign, which was the third year of the second Punic war, the Romans did what had never been practiced before, that is, they composed the army of eight legions, each consisting of 5,000 men, exclusive of the allies. The Roman army, under command of the two consuls, set out from Rome with the determination to fall upon Hannibal's forces at the very first opportunity. At length both armies came in sight of each other near Cannæ. The two forces were very unequal. The Roman army, including the allies, consisted of 80,000 foot, and a little more than 6,000 horse, while the Carthaginians numbered only 40,000 foot, and 10,000 horse. Æmilius commanded the right wing of the Romans, Varro the left, and Servilius, one of the consuls of the last year, was posted in the center. Hannibal, who had the art of turning every incident to advantage, had so posted himself that the Sirocco, or hot wind, which rises at stated times, should blow directly in the faces of the Romans during the fight, and cover them with dust; thus keeping the river Aufidus on his left, and posting his cavalry on his wings, he formed his main body of the Spanish and Gaulish infantry, which he posted in the center, with half of the African heavy-armed foot on the right, and half on the left, on the same line with the cavalry. His army being thus drawn up, he put himself at the head of the Spanish and Gaulish infantry, and, having drawn them out of the line, advanced to give battle, rounding his front as he drew nearer the enemy, and extending his flanks in the form of a half moon, in order that he might have no interval between his main body and the rest of the line, which consisted of the heavy-armed infantry, who had not moved from their posts. And now the fight began; the Roman legions that were in the wings, seeing their center warmly attacked, advanced to charge the enemy in flank. Hannibal's main body being furiously attacked on all sides by an overwhelming force, gave way, after a brave resistance, and retired through the interval they had left in the center of the lines. The Romans pursued them hotly, when suddenly the two wings of the African infantry, which were fresh, well armed, and in good order, wheeled about toward the void space in which the Romans, already fatigued and in disorder, had thrown themselves, and attacked them vigorously on both sides. In the mean time, the two wings of the cavalry had defeated those of the Romans, which were much inferior to them. They then left in the pursuit of the broken and scattered squadrons of the enemy, only as many forces as were necessary to keep them from rallying, and advanced and charged upon the rear of the Roman infantry who were contending against the Africans. Thus the Romans were exposed to the attacks of the Carthaginians on all sides. A fearful slaughter ensued. The Romans fought with the desperate valor of despair; but, fairly surrounded by the enemy's horse and foot, they were all cut to pieces. Æmilius, covered with darts which stuck in his wounds, sat down in anguish and despair, waiting for the enemy to dispatch him. His head and face were so disfigured with bruises, and stained with blood, that it was not easy to recognize him. He was afterward slain by a body of the enemy to whom he was not known. Among the Roman leaders slain, were two quæstors; twenty-one military tribunes; many who had been consuls or prætors; Servilius, one of the last year's consuls; Minucius, a late general of horse, and eighty senators. Seventy thousand men of the Roman army were slain, and so great was the fury of the Carthaginians, that they did not give over the slaughter till Hannibal, in the very heat of it, called out to them several times, "Stop, soldiers, spare the vanquished." Ten thousand men who had been left to guard the camp, surrendered themselves prisoners of war, after the battle. Varro, the consul, retired to Venusia, with only seventy horse; and about 4,000 men escaped into the neighboring cities. Hannibal lost 4,000 Gauls, 1,500 Spaniards and Africans, and 200 horse. As an evidence of the implacable hatred of the Romans for the Carthaginians, it is said that when the Carthaginians were stripping the dead, among other moving objects, they found a Numidian, yet alive, lying under the dead body of a Roman, who had thrown himself headlong upon his enemy, and beat him down; but being unable to make use of his weapons, because he had lost his hands, had torn off the nose and ears of the Numidian with his teeth, and in that fit of rage expired. Soon after the battle of Cannæ, Hannibal dispatched his brother Mago to Carthage, with the news of his victory, and to demand succors, in order that he might put an end to the war. Upon his arrival, Mago made, in full senate, a lofty speech, in which he extolled his brother's exploits. To add to the effect of his words, he poured out, in the middle of the senate-chamber, a bushel of gold rings which had been taken from the fingers of such of the Roman nobility as had fallen in the battle of Cannæ.—See battles of Ticinus, Trebia, Thrasymenus, Nero and Asdrubal, and Zama.

CANNSTADT, A.D. 1796.—In 1796 a battle was fought near Cannstadt, a town of Wirtemberg, between the French under General Moreau and the Austrians under the Archduke Charles.

CANTON, A.D. 1840.—This city, called Sang-Ching by the Chinese, is situated on the north bank of the Chookiang, or Pearl river, and the east bank of its affluent, the Pe-kiang. The city is inclosed by a wall, partly of brick and partly of sandstone, about twenty or twenty-five feet thick and from twenty-five to forty feet high. A line of battlements, with embrasures at intervals of a few feet raised on the top of the walls all round, are in some places mounted with cannon. The city is further defended by three forts on the land side, and two on Pearl river.

The former city of Canton was utterly destroyed in 1650, by the Tartars, after a siege of eleven months, in which vast numbers of persons are said to have been slain.

On the 28th of June, 1840, Canton was blockaded by a British fleet of fifteen sail and several war vessels, having 4,000 troops on board, by orders from Sir Gordon Bremer. On the 26th of February, 1841, a battle took place between the English forces under Sir Gordon Bremer, and the Chinese, in which the latter were defeated. Admiral Kwan was killed, and the Bogue forts with 459 guns were captured. On the 25th of May, 1841, the British troops under Sir Hugh Gough, stormed the heights behind Canton and captured ninety-four guns.

CARTHAGE, B.C. 252.—Carthage was situated on the north shore of Africa in the immediate neighborhood of Tunis. Although Carthage was long the rival of Rome, with whom she waged a long, desperate, and doubtful contest for the empire of the world, still her precise position has been matter of dispute among the learned.

The Roman army, consisting of 15,000 foot and 300 horse, commanded by Regulus, having taken possession of Tunis which brought them near Carthage, encamped there. The Carthaginians were in the utmost alarm. Upward of 200 of their principal towns had surrendered to the Romans, and they expected every moment to see their capital besieged. Reduced to the last extremity, and having happily received a reinforcement out of Greece, the Carthaginians determined to give battle to the enemy. Xanthippus, the Lacedemonian leader of the Greeks, was appointed commander of the Carthaginian army, which, with its new addition, was composed of 12,000 foot, 4,000 horse, and about 160 elephants. At an appointed time Xanthippus conducted his army out of Carthage against the enemy. When he had arrived within a little more than 1200 paces of the Roman army, which was drawn up in battle array near Tunis, he consulted with the Carthaginian generals, and they unanimously deferred to his opinion to give battle to the enemy the next day. The Carthaginians spent the night in anxiety, for the success of this battle, however inconsiderable it may appear from the small number of the combatants was, nevertheless, to decide the fate of Carthage. The disposition of both armies was as follows: Xanthippus drew up all his elephants in front. Behind these, at some distance, he placed the Carthaginian infantry, in one body or phalanx. The foreign troops in the Carthaginian service were posted one part of them on the right, between the phalanx and the horse, and the other, composed of light armed soldiers, in platoons, at the head of the two wings of the cavalry. On the side of the Romans, as they apprehended the elephants most, Regulus, to provide against them, posted his light-armed soldiers on a line, in the front of the legions. In the rear of these he placed the cohorts, one behind another, and the horse on the wings. Now the two armies eagerly awaited the signal of battle. The signal was given. The Carthaginian elephants dashed forward to break the ranks of the enemy while the two wings of the cavalry charged the Romans vehemently in flank. The Romans with loud shouts, while they clashed their weapons together, advanced rapidly upon the coming enemy. But the heavy Carthaginian cavalry fell upon the Roman horse with such power that the latter, unable to stand against them, turned and fled. The infantry of the left wing, to avoid the attack of the elephants, and to show how little they feared the mercenaries who formed the left wing of the enemy, attacked it, and put it to flight, fiercely pursuing the fugitives back into their camp. The first rank which was opposed to the elephants was broken and trodden under foot. The balance of the main body, by reason of its great depth, stood firm for some time. But when the rear, being attacked by the Carthaginian cavalry, was obliged to face about to receive the charge, and those who had broken through the elephants met the phalanx of the Carthaginians, which had not yet been engaged, and which received them in good order, the Romans were routed on all sides, and totally defeated. The greater part of them were crushed to death by the enormous weight of the elephants, while the remainder, scorning to fly or to yield, stood in their ranks and were shot through and through with arrows from the enemy's horse. Only a few fled, and of these the most were killed either by the elephants or the cavalry which pursued and overtook them. About 500 were taken prisoners, with Regulus their commander. The Carthaginians lost in this battle 800 mercenaries, who were opposed to the left wing of the Romans. Of those Romans, who by pursuing the right wing of the enemy, had drawn themselves out of the engagement, only 2,000 escaped. All the rest, Regulus and those who were taken excepted, were left dead on the field of battle. The 2,000 who had escaped the slaughter, retired to Clypea, and were saved in an almost miraculous manner. The Carthaginians, after stripping the dead, entered Carthage in triumph, dragging after them the unfortunate Regulus, and 500 prisoners.

CARTHAGE, 148, B.C.—Carthage, the envy of Rome and the second city in point of size, magnificence, and population, in the world, was about to fall. The Romans, jealous of the power of their rivals, commenced the third Punic war with the determination that it should end only with the total ruin and destruction of their beautiful city. In vain had the Carthaginians sued for peace; in vain had they humbled themselves before their enemies; the hatred of the Romans was implacable, and nothing but the fall of Carthage would appease it. The Romans, with a large fleet, on board of which were 80,000 foot, and about 4,000 horse, under the command of the two consuls, M. Manlius, and L. Marcius Censorinus, were on their way toward the doomed city. As soon as they had arrived at Utica, in Africa, the Carthaginian deputies repaired to their camp, and assured the Romans that they were sent from Carthage, in order to receive their commands, which they were ready to obey. The consuls, after praising their good disposition and compliance, commanded them to deliver, without fraud or delay, all the arms stored in Carthage. This severe mandate was immediately obeyed, and all the weapons and warlike preparations that were in Carthage were sent to the Roman camp. The arms consisted of 200,000 complete sets of armor, a numberless multitude of darts and javelins, and 2,000 catapults, huge engines for shooting stones and darts. The immense train of wagons which conveyed these arms, was accompanied by the Carthaginian deputies and many of the most venerable senators and priests, who went to the Roman camp for the purpose of endeavoring to move their enemies to compassion. Their countenances were clouded by anxiety, for the safety of their beloved city was in jeopardy; the moment had arrived when its fate, for good or evil, should be decided forever. They were received kindly by the Roman consuls, and were complimented for the expedition they had used in obeying their commands. But finally they were assured that it was the will and pleasure of the Romans that all the inhabitants of Carthage should depart out of the city, and remove into any other portions of their dominions which they should deem proper, providing it should be at the distance of twelve miles from the sea. As for Carthage, that city the Romans had resolved to destroy, and nothing could move them from this determination. The Carthaginians heard this decree with despair. They wept aloud; they prayed first to the gods and then to the Romans, but both the gods and men were deaf to their entreaties. They tore their hair, and prostrated themselves in the dust, and rent the air with their shrieks and lamentations. Even the hearts of the stern Roman warriors were touched by this display of grief, and many an eye among them was moistened with tears. But their resolution was stronger than their sympathy, and the Carthaginians were obliged to return in despair. No words can express the terror and dismay which filled the hearts of the people of Carthage, when they learned the immovable determination of the Romans to destroy their city. Carthage was filled with howlings, shrieks, madness and fury. But at length they banished terror, and resolved to contest the entrance of the Romans, with the energy of despair. As they had delivered up all their weapons to the Romans they now applied themselves to the making of arms with incredible dexterity and expedition. Palaces, temples, markets, and squares were all turned into so many arsenals. One hundred and forty shields, 300 swords, 500 javelins, 1000 arrows, and a great number of engines to discharge them, were made every day. Men and women, all engaged in the work. Being in want of material to make ropes, the women cut off their hair, which furnished an abundant supply.

Carthage at this time contained 700,000 inhabitants. It stood at the bottom of a gulf, surrounded by the sea, and in the form of a peninsula, whose neck, that is, the isthmus which joined it to the continent, was a league and a quarter in breadth. The peninsula was eighteen leagues in circumference. On the west side there projected from it a long neck of land, twelve fathoms broad, which, advancing into the sea, divided it from a morass, and was fenced on all sides with rocks and a single wall. On the south side, toward the continent where stood the citadel called Byrsa, the city was surrounded with a triple wall, thirty cubits high, exclusive of the parapets and towers, with which it was flanked all round at equal distances, each interval being eighty fathoms. Every tower was four stories high; and the walls only two. The walls were arched, and in the lower story were stalls to hold 300 elephants with their fodder, and over these were stables for 4,000 horses, and lofts for their provender. There likewise was room enough to lodge 20,000 foot, and 4,000 horse. In one place only the walls were weak and low, and that was a neglected angle, which begun at the neck of land above-mentioned, and extended as far as the harbors, which were on the west side of the city. The harbors, of which there were two, communicated with each other; but had only one entrance for both, which was seventy feet broad, and was closed with chains. The first was appropriated for the merchants, and had several distinct habitations for the seamen. The second or inner harbor, was for the ships of war. In the center was an island called Cothon, lined, as the harbor was, with quays, in which were distinct receptacles for sheltering from the weather 220 ships; over these were magazines or storehouses, wherein was lodged whatever is necessary for arming and equipping fleets. The entrance into each of these receptacles was adorned with two marble pillars of the Ionic order. So that both the harbor and island represented on each side two magnificent galleries. In this island was the admiral's palace, and, as it stood opposite to the mouth of the harbor, he could thence discover whatever was doing at sea, although no one thence could see what was transacting in the inward part of the harbor. Carthage, therefore, may be divided into three parts: the harbor, which was double, and sometimes called Cothon, from the little island of that name; the citadel, named Byrsa; the city properly so called, where the inhabitants dwelt, which lay around the citadel and was called Megara.

The Romans at length advanced toward the city in order to besiege it. Censorinus attacked it on one side, and Manlius on the other. The Carthaginians met the assaults of the Romans with the utmost vigor. They made frequent and bold sallies on the besiegers, endeavoring to burn their engines and to harass their foragers. The Roman tribune Scipio, afterward surnamed Africanus, distinguished himself above all the rest of the Roman officers, both by his prudence and bravery. He extricated the troops on several occasions from imminent danger, into which their leaders had plunged them. The bravest of the Carthaginian officers feared him, and one of great renown, Phamaeas by name, who was commander of the cavalry, and continually harassed the foragers, did not dare even to keep the field when it was Scipio's turn to support them, so capable was he of keeping his troops in good order and posting himself to advantage. His great ability won him such a lofty reputation that many officers his equal in rank, were at first jealous of his achievements; but his modesty and reserve at length changed their envy into esteem and respect, so that when deputies were sent from Rome to inquire into the state of the siege, the whole army unanimously commended him. The soldiers, officers, generals, all united in praising and extolling the abilites and boldness of the youthful tribune. Phamaeas, the Carthaginian, esteemed Scipio so highly, that he finally forsook the cause of his countrymen, and joined the Roman army with 2,000 horse. He afterward was of great service during the siege. In the spring of the following year (147 B.C.), Calpurnius Piso, the consul, and L. Mancinus, his lieutenant, arrived in Africa. Nothing remarkable was transacted during this campaign. The Romans were even defeated on several occasions, and carried on the siege slowly. The Carthaginians, on the contrary, had recovered their spirits. Their troops had considerably increased, and were better armed. Allies also arrived to their aid every day. They even sent a messenger to Philip, the Pretender, of Macedon, who was at that time engaged in a war with the Romans, to exhort him to carry it on with vigor, and promising to furnish him with men, money, and ships. All this occasioned great uneasiness at Rome. The people began to doubt the success of the war, which grew daily more uncertain, and was more important than they had at first imagined. They condemned all the generals for their dilatoriness, and were loud in their murmurs against the manner in which the siege of Carthage was conducted. Scipio alone they applauded. His praise was on every lip, and they could not sufficiently extol his rare virtues and abilities.

Scipio was in Rome, where he had gone for the purpose of standing candidate for the edileship. The instant he appeared in the assembly, his name, his countenance, his reputation, induced a general belief that the gods had designed him to end the third Punic war, as the first Scipio, his grandfather by adoption, had ended the second. The people were so strongly impressed by these several circumstances, that, though contrary to the law, they, instead of the edileship which he sued for, at once conferred the consulship upon him, in spite of the opposition of the ancient men, who looked with horror on this utter disregard of the law. Africa was assigned him for his province, without casting lots for the provinces, as usual, and as Drusus, his colleague, demanded. As soon as Scipio had completed his recruits, he set out, in the year 146, B.C., for Africa, and arrived, soon after, in Utica. His arrival proved most timely, for Mancinus, Piso's lieutenant, had rashly planted himself in a position where he was surrounded by the enemy, and his troops undoubtedly would have been cut to pieces that very day, had not the new consul immediately hastened to his assistance.

Scipio's first care, after his arrival, was to revive discipline among the troops. The officers had lost all command over the troops. The Roman camp was a complete picture of insubordination, confusion, and disobediance. The soldiers thought of nothing but rapine, feasting, and revelry. Scipio soon put an end to all this. He drove all useless persons from the camp, banished all dainties and luxuries, and ordered the sutlers to provide the men only with plain food. Having made all these regulations, which he strictly observed himself, he prepared to carry on the siege with vigor. Having ordered his troops to provide themselves with axes, levers, and scaling-ladders, he led them, in the dead of the night, to the district of the city called Megara. He had given strict orders that his soldiers should make no noise during the march, and they arrived at the walls of Megara, without alarming the inhabitants. Obeying his commands, his troops now gave a general shout, and began the assault. The Carthaginians, surprised at this sudden attack, at first made but feeble resistance, but soon recovering from their terror, they defended themselves so vigorously, that the Romans were unable to scale the walls. Scipio, at this juncture, perceived a tower that had been abandoned, and which stood without the city, very near the walls. He immediately detached thither a party of bold and daring soldiers. These men quickly entered the tower, and by means of light wooden bridges, they gained the walls, whence they easily entered the city. They then hastened to the gates and broke them down. Scipio and his troops instantly entered, and drove the Carthaginians from that quarter of the city. Imagining that the whole city was taken, the Carthaginians fled to the citadel, Byrsa, whither they were followed by all their forces that were encamped without the city, who, abandoning their camp to the Romans, thought only of flying to a place of security. These troops were under the command of Asdrubal.

Asdrubal, in his heart, hated his countrymen, for the humiliation they had heaped upon him, when they entreated peace from the Romans before the commencement of the war. He had commanded the Carthaginian army during the war between Numidia and Carthage. This war the Romans had seized upon as a favorable pretext for declaring war with the Carthaginians, for Massinissa, King of Numidia, was a friend and ally of the Romans. In their eagerness to avoid a quarrel with the Romans, the Carthaginians had not only abruptly terminated the war with Massinissa, but they had also impeached Asdrubal, as guilty of high treason for being one of the authors of the war against the King of the Numidians. This insult Asdrubal had never forgiven; his honor had been tarnished forever, and he meditated a revenge most terrible. His malice against his countrymen was equaled only by his implacable hatred for the Romans. He considered both as the authors of his disgrace.

The sun rose the next morning, after the Romans had gained an entrance into Megara, upon a spectacle which appalled the hearts of the Carthaginians, and inflamed the rage of the Romans to ungovernable fury. Asdrubal, stung to madness, by his late defeat, and wishing to revenge himself both upon the Romans and the Carthaginians, placed all the Roman prisoners he had taken upon the walls of the citadel, in sight of the whole army, and then commanded his minions to torture them. This he thought would exasperate the Romans to such a pitch, that they would give the inhabitants no quarter, when they made themselves masters of the city. The prisoners were put to the most exquisite torture; their eyes were forced from their sockets; their noses were cut off; the skin was torn from their bodies with iron rakes and harrows, and their tormenters did not cease the cruel work until death had relieved them from their agonies, and then their lifeless bodies were thrown headlong from the battlements, to the very feet of their friends and countrymen. The Carthaginians themselves witnessed these barbarities with horror and dismay. Several senators ventured even to oppose Asdrubal's tyranny; but in his rage he murdered them also.

Scipio, finding himself absolute master of the isthmus, burned the camp which the enemy had deserted, and built a new one for his troops. It was of a square shape, surrounded with large and deep intrenchments, and fenced with strong pallisades. On the side which faced the Carthaginians, he built a wall twelve feet high, flanked at proper distances with towers and redoubts. On the middle tower he erected a very high wooden fort, whence could be seen whatever was doing in the city. This wall extended the entire breadth of the isthmus, that is a league and a quarter. During the whole time that the Romans were engaged in making this wall, the Carthaginians, who were within bow-shot, employed their every effort to put a stop to the work; but as the whole Roman army was incessantly employed upon it, working night and day, the wall was finished in twenty-four days. Scipio reaped a double advantage from this: first, his forces were lodged more safely and commodiously than before; secondly, he cut off all provisions from the besieged, to whom none could be brought but by sea; which was attended by many difficulties, both because the sea is frequently very tempestuous in that place, and because the Roman fleet kept a strict guard. This proved one of the chief causes of the famine which raged, soon after, in the city. Besides, Asdrubal distributed the corn that was brought only among the 30,000 men who served under him, caring very little what became of the rest of the inhabitants. Scipio, in order to distress them still more by the want of provisions, attempted to stop up the mouth of the haven, by a mole, beginning at the isthmus, which was near the harbor.

The besieged at first looked at this attempt as ridiculous, and accordingly greeted the workmen with all manner of insults. But the Romans made such rapid progress every day, that at length the Carthaginians began to fear that they would succeed. Accordingly, they took proper measures to prevent the success of the attempt. Every man, woman, and child among them immediately commenced working; but so privately, that Scipio could learn nothing of their proceedings. At length, however, the Carthaginians having completed their operations, he was suddenly informed of the nature of their employment, by the appearance, at sea, of a numerous fleet, which they had just then built with the old materials found in their magazines, and for which they had constructed a new outlet on the other side of the haven. Instead of attacking the Roman fleet at once, in which case they must have certainly taken it, they only offered a kind of insult or bravado to the Romans, and then returned into the harbor. Two days afterward, they brought out their ships with a resolution to fight in good earnest, and found the enemy ready for them. The battle was to decide the fate of both parties. The conflict was long and obstinate. The Romans fought with the valor of conquerors, while the Carthaginians, fighting for home and country, were inspired with the desperate courage of despair. The galleys of the Carthaginians were far superior in speed and lightness to those of the Romans, and were managed with greater ability. They ran their small ships along under the enormous but awkward hulks of the Roman galleys, and broke to pieces sometimes their sterns, and at other times their rudders and oars. In vain did the Romans endeavor to crush the apparently fragile vessels of the enemy; no sooner were they fiercely attacked at one point, than they retreated with surprising swiftness, returning immediately to renew the charge at another. In this manner, the fight was continued until sunset, neither party having gained a decided advantage. At length the Carthaginians saw fit to retire, not because they thought themselves overcome, but in order to refresh themselves, and to make preparations to renew the conflict on the morrow. A portion of their ships, however, were not able to enter the harbor with sufficient rapidity, because the mouth of it was too narrow. They therefore took shelter under a large terrace, which had been thrown up against the walls to unload goods. On the side of this terrace a small rampart had been raised during the siege, to prevent the enemy from possessing themselves of it. The Roman fleet, which had closely pursued the Carthaginians, fiercely attacked the ships which had drawn under the cover of the terrace, and a battle ensued which continued till late at night. Many of the Carthaginian vessels were taken, and the few which escaped sailed to the city for refuge. Early the next morning, Scipio attacked the terrace, which was vigorously defended by the Carthaginian forces stationed there for its protection. But at length they were driven back into the city, and Scipio made a lodgment and fortified himself on the terrace. He now built a wall of brick on the terrace, close to the wall of the city, and of the same height. Upon the completion of the wall, he stationed 4,000 men on its summit, with orders to discharge from it an incessant shower of arrows and javelins upon the enemy. These weapons did great execution; the two walls being of equal height, almost every dart took effect. Thus ended the summer campaign.

During the winter, Scipio endeavored to overpower the enemy's troops without the city. These forces had caused him much trouble and annoyance by harassing his forages and convoys. They also served as a protection to such convoys of provisions as were sent to the besieged. He accordingly attacked a neighboring fort called Nepheris, where they used to shelter themselves. After sustaining a siege for twenty-four days the fort was carried, with great bloodshed on both sides. In the last action, 70,000 of the enemy, soldiers and peasantry, were cut to pieces. The seizure of this fort was followed by the surrender of almost all the strongholds of Africa, and contributed greatly to the taking of Carthage itself, as after that time it was almost impossible to convey provisions into the city. Early in the spring, Scipio attacked, at one and the same time, the harbor called Cothon and the citadel. The Romans, after gaining the walls which surrounded this port, threw themselves into the great square of the city that was over it. From the city was an ascent to the citadel, up three streets. The streets were lined on either side with houses, from the tops of which the Carthaginians hurled javelins and arrows down upon the Romans. The Romans thus assailed, were obliged to force the houses they came first to, and post themselves in them, in order to dislodge thence the enemy who fought from the neighboring houses. The Carthaginians fought for their firesides with a fury unparalleled. For six days the combat was carried on in every part of the houses, from top to bottom. The slaughter which occurred during those six days was most terrible. Men, women, and children were massacred by the Roman soldiers, and while still quivering with life, and gasping for breath, the carcasses were thrown headlong from the houses into the streets. So encumbered were the streets with the slain, that the Romans were compelled to drag aside the bodies with hooks, and cast them into pits, in order to make a passage for their troops. In this bloody toil, which was continued without intermission, day and night, the soldiers were relieved from time to time by fresh ones, without which their strength would have been wholly exhausted. Scipio alone did not sleep during the whole time. He seemed to be present everywhere, giving orders and directions, scarcely without allowing himself leisure to take the least refreshment. At length, the Carthaginians, appalled by the sight of this bloodshed, determined to surrender. On the morning of the seventh day, a company of men in the posture of suppliants approached Scipio, and entreated him to spare the lives of all those who should be willing to leave the citadel. Scipio granted this request, excepting, however, the deserters, whom he resolved to punish with death. Accordingly, 50,000 men and women departed from the citadel, and under a strong guard were sent into the fields. The deserters, who numbered about 900, finding they would be shown no mercy, fortified themselves in the temple of Æsculapius, with Asdrubal, his wife, and two children.

The temple stood on a high hill upon rocks, the ascent to which was by sixty steps. Asdrubal abandoning his wife and children to their fate, left the temple secretly, and bearing an olive-branch in his hand, he approached Scipio, and, throwing himself at his feet, entreated the conqueror to spare his life. Scipio immediately conducted him to a place whence he could be seen by the deserters. Transported with rage and fury at this sight, they vented a million of imprecations against him, and set fire to the temple. Asdrubal's wife dressing herself as splendidly as possible, placed herself in sight of Scipio, and her base husband, and addressed him in a loud voice. "I shall not curse thee, O, Roman," said she, "for the fortune of war is with thee. But may the gods of Carthage, and thou in concert with them, punish, according to his deserts, the false wretch who has betrayed his country, his gods, his wife, his children. And thou, perfidious Asdrubal, thou basest of men! thou shalt see this fire presently consume thy wife and children. Then go, most unworthy general of Carthage, and adorn the gay triumphs of thy conqueror, and in the sight of all Rome, suffer the tortures thou so justly deservest." At the conclusion of these words she seized her children, cut their throats, hurled them into the flames, and sprang after them into the burning mass. The fire spread rapidly, and the temple was entirely consumed with all the deserters. Carthage had fallen. The Roman soldiers eager for plunder, and heated with victory, pillaged the city, and laid it in ruins. The gold, silver statues, and other offerings which they found in the temples, were collected together, and sent to Rome. When the news of the fall of Carthage reached Rome, the whole city rejoiced. Rome now stood without a rival. All the cities in Africa, which during this war had joined the Carthaginians, were by the orders of the Roman senate, raised to the ground. To the citizens of Utica was made a grant of the whole country lying between Carthage and Hippo. All the rest was reduced into a Roman province to which a prætor was sent annually. Matters being thus settled, Scipio returned to Rome, where he made his entry in the most magnificent triumphal procession that had ever been witnessed before.

CARTHAGENA, B.C. 216.—This city is called by ancient writers Carthago Nova (New Carthage), it having been a principal colony of the Carthaginians. It stands in Spain, on a bay of the Mediterranean, 27 miles south of Murcia.

The younger Scipio, charged with the prosecution of the war in Spain, after the death of his father and his uncle, evinced from the early age of twenty-four, the wisdom and prudence of a consummate captain. Anxious to weaken Carthage, he undertook the siege of Carthagena, one of its most important colonies. This strong city served the Carthagenians at once as a magazine, arsenal, and entrepôt; they kept within its walls the hostages which answered for the fidelity of Spain. Scipio made all his preparations during the winter; in the spring, (216, B.C.) he blockaded Carthagena with his fleet, at the same time that he invested it by land. On the day following, the armies, both by land and sea, commenced hostilities. Scipio ordered his soldiers to mount to the assault; and they executed his orders with ardor and celerity. Mago, the brother of Hannibal, who commanded in the place, had but a thousand soldiers, and thought himself lost. He armed the citizens, picked out 2,000 of the best, and made a sortie. Victory was for a long time doubtful; but the Carthaginians were driven back within their walls. This first defeat would have produced the most complete discouragement in Carthagena, if the Romans had not been forced, by the height of the walls, to abandon the escalade and sound a retreat. This untoward circumstance restored hopes of succor to the besieged; but they were not unacquainted with the activity of Scipio. While the sea was at ebb, he placed 500 men with ladders along the lake where the walls of Carthagena were lowest; he surrounded these walls with fresh troops, and exhorted them to fight like Romans. The ladders were applied, and the soldiers shortly filled the whole extent of the walls. The besieged, although astonished, kept a good face everywhere, and defended themselves with courage. The sea retired, and left the lake everywhere fordable. This phenomenon seemed a marvel to the Romans; they hastened to climb the walls of Carthagena, destitute on that point of defenders, and penetrated into the city without meeting an obstacle. The confused Carthagenians rushed to the citadel, and the Romans entered with them. Mago and his troops surrendered to Scipio, and the city was given up to pillage.

CASSANO, A.D. 1160.—In the year 1160, a battle was fought near Cassano, in Italy, between the forces of Frederic I., Barbarossa, the German emperor, and the Milanese. The Milanese drawn up in battle array awaited the attack of the enemy; in their center stood the sacred car, or carroccio. This carroccio, consisted of a four-wheeled car, painted red, and drawn by eight oxen with red caparisons. A lofty flag-staff terminated by a gilt ball, rose from the center of the car, and bore the standard of the city of Milan, between two white banners. Half way down the staff was a crucifix; and upon the platform stood a number of sentinels, chosen especially for their valor, a band of trumpeters and a priest. The army of Frederic commenced the attack. Like a thunder-storm they swept across the plain upon the enemy, and driving them back, attacked the sentinels in the car with such vigor that they abandoned it precipitately; and the standard of the city fell into the hands of the Germans, with the golden crucifix which decorated its staff, and the oxen were slain. The Milanese considered the defense of this car a most sacred military duty, and stung to fury by the intolerable shame of losing it, they rallied and charged the enemy with such overwhelming impetuosity that they were broken; the car was recaptured, and the soldiers of the emperor fled in wild disorder, leaving the Milanese complete masters of the field.

In the year 1715 a battle was fought near Cassano, between the French under Vendome, and the forces of Prince Eugene. The battle was long and bloody; but was indecisive, both parties claiming the victory.

CASSEL, A.D. 1528.—Philip, of Valois, scarcely seated on his own throne, turned his arms toward Flanders, to assist the count in subduing his rebellious subjects. His noble army consisted of 30,000 men, among whom were 14,000 gendarmes. Philip mached straight toward the city of Cassel, and laid siege to it. The rebel army, much less numerous than the French, was composed entirely of infantry: they were fishermen, peasants, and artisans. A small dealer in fish, named Colin Zannequin, was at their head, a bold, daring man, in whom audacity and cunning made up for deficiency in military experience. Such was the singular champion opposed so the King of France; such were the troops destined to contend with the proudest nobility of Europe; and this ignoble assemblage was very near destroying the haughty battalions which held them in rather too much contempt. Never was any army more determined or more insolent in its bearing than these newly-made soldiers, encamped and intrenched within sight of Cassel, upon an eminence very difficult of access. They had the audacity to hoist upon one of the towers of the city a kind of standard, upon which was painted a cock, with this inscription:

"Quand ce coq chanté aura, Le roi Cassel conquérera."*

Zannequin conceived a project which might, if successful, have proved of great importance. In his character of a dealer in fish, he went every day, with reckless confidence, to exercise his trade in the royal camp. He sold his fish at a moderate price, in order to get a footing, and afford him an opportunity of seeing what was going on. He found that they sat a long time at table, that they gambled a great deal, that they danced, and they slept in the afternoon. In short, such negligent guard appeared to be kept, that the audacious Fleming conceived the design of carrying off the king and all his quarter. On the 23d of August, 1528, about two o'clock in the afternoon, at the time when he knew the French were taking their daily nap, he divided his troops into three bodies, ordered one to march quietly to the quarter of the King of Bohemia, the second to advance in silence against the battle commanded by the Count of Hainault, while he placed himself at the head of the third. He entered the camp without shouting the war-cry, which was at that time always done before commencing a battle, and penetrated nearly to the king's tent, where too good a watch was not kept. When they appeared, they were supposed to be a reinforcement just arrived, and Renaud Delor, a noble cavalier, came toward them with a smile, saying it was not polite to disturb their friends' slumbers. He was answered by a javelin through his heart. This proved the signal for fight. The Flemings drew their swords and slaughtered all they met. The alarm was soon spread through the French camp; loud cries announced the danger, and all flew to arms. The king was roused by a Dominican, his confessor. He laughed at the worthy father, telling him that fear disturbed his imagination; but Miles de Noyer, who bore the oriflamme, soon rushed in, confirming the news, and entreating the king to arm. But there was neither squire nor knight to assist his majesty, and the duty was performed by the clerks of his chapel. He sprang upon his war-horse, and marched straight against the assailants. Miles de Noyer stopped him, advising him to wait till his troops should be sufficiently increased to turn the Flemings, and afterward to take them in flank. This brave and prudent knight then raised the royal standard on a point from which it could be seen at a great distance. At this signal, the cavalry drew up around their prince. The Flemings were surrounded, broken, and then cut to pieces. Of 16,000 men, who composed this army, not one gave ground, but not one escaped. The French lost but few in the action: armor was then very complete, and the ill-protected Flemings had but little chance against the French chivalry. The other rebel battalions dispersed immediately. Cassel was taken, razed to the ground, and reduced to ashes. After having restored peace, Philip returned to his own dominions, saying to the Count of Flanders: "Be more prudent and more humane, and you will have fewer rebels." This was certainly a well-merited reproof; but it came very ill from such a man as Philip of Valois.—Robson.

CASSOVIA, A.D. 1389.—The city of Cassovia, in Lower Hungary, was often the theater of the exploits of the Germans and the Turks, after the entrance of the latter into Europe. In 1389, Amurath I., conquered in these plains the Hungarians, the Wallachians, the Dalmatians, and the Triballian confederates. After a long and sanguinary battle, the sultan went to survey the dead, and walked over the field of carnage. When he had for some time contemplated these sad trophies of his success—"I am astonished," said he to his grand vizier who accompanied him, "to see only young beardless men among these dead, and not one old man."

"It is that that has given us the victory," replied the vizier; "youth only listens to the wild fire which animates it, and comes to perish at your feet; old age is more tranquil and prudent."

"But that which still more surprises me," said the grand seignor, "is, that I have triumphed. I dreamed last night that an unknown enemy's hand pierced my side. Nevertheless, thanks to God! thanks to His prophet! I triumph, and I live!"

He had scarcely pronounced these words when a Triballian soldier, concealed among the dead, sprang up in a rage and plunged his dagger into the sultan's bowels. The murderer was instantly cut to pieces. The proud sultan saw his dream accomplished: a conqueror in thirty battles. He expired two hours after, from the stroke of this assassin.

CASTALLA, A.D. 1813.—On the 13th of April, 1813, an action took place between the French on the one side, and the English and Spanish on the other, at the town of Castalla, in Spain. The French army, consisting of 16,000 infantry, and 2,000 horse, with 30 guns, was commanded by Marshal Suchet. The allied army, consisting of 27,000 infantry, 3,000 horse, with 37 guns, was commanded by General Murray. The left wing was formed of the Spaniards under Wittingham, who were posted on the rugged side of Castalla; the right consisted of Clinton's British division and Roche's Spaniards, and was planted on the low ground, with the bed of a torrent in their front; while the center, consisting of Mackenzie's British division, occupied the town and old castle of Castalla on a conical hill in the center, and all its approaches being strongly guarded by artillery. Suchet determined to attack the British in their position. For this purpose he resolved to force the pass of Brai, which led to the British position. The allied advance-guards stationed at that pass, were assailed by superior numbers of the French, and retreated, bravely fighting up the rugged defile. The French pursued with great viger, their skirmishers swarming up the rocky ac-clivities on either side of the pass with extraordinary agility and determination.

The ascent on the left, however, where Whittingham's Spaniards were posted, was so steep and rugged, that the assailing party gained the summit with great difficulty. But they succeeded in reaching the top, and were proceeding along it, when they were met suddenly by the 27th regiment, who, lying down concealed among the rocks, sprang up, and gave the French such a volley, within pistol-shot, as sent them headlong, with frightful loss, down the side of the ridge. An event happened during this struggle which recalls the heroic ages of the Iliad, or Amadis de Gaul. As the French were deploying their columns, a grenadier officer, advancing alone, in a loud voice challenged any English officer to single combat. The offer was immediately accepted by Captain Waldron of the 27th, who sprang out of the company to meet him. The hostile lines looked on without firing a shot; and at the first encounter the Frenchman's head was cleft asunder. The British, with a loud shout, brought down their arms, and gave the volley which hurled the French down the steep. The attack on the other points was likewise repulsed by the allies, and at length Suchet, despairing of success, drew off his men through the pass of Brai. The British general, satisfied with having repulsed the enemy, drew off his forces, and allowed the French to make their way unmolested through the defile. In this action the French lost 1,800 men killed or wounded. The loss of the allies was trifling.

CASTIGLIONE, A.D 1796.—On a hill, twenty-two miles north-west of the city of Mantua, in Italy, is situated the town of Castiglione-delle-Stiviere. It is surrounded by a low wall, and contains several churches, the ruins of a castle, and a conventual seminary; but is chiefly noted for a decisive victory gained here by the French over the Austrians on the 5th of August, 1796, from which Marshal Augereau derived his title of Duke de Castiglione.

The battle was fought in the plain of Castiglione. A series of heights, formed by the last range of hills belonging to the Alps, extend from Chiesa to the Mincio, by Lonato, Castiglione, and Solferino. At the foot of these heights lies the plain which served for the field of battle. The Austrians, under Wurmser, were 30,000 strong; the French 22,000. Both parties were drawn up in the plain at right angles to the mountains, on which each rested a wing. The left wing of the Austrians was covered by the mill of Medola; while the French right was uncovered. Augereau commanded the center, Massena the left, and Verdier the right; but the principal hopes of Napoleon were rested on the division of Serrurier, which had orders to march all night, and fall, when the action was at its height, on the rear of the enemy. The battle commenced at day-break. Wurmser, impatient to attack, moved his right along the heights; Bonaparte, to favor this movement, drew back his left, formed by Massena's division, while he kept his center immovable, in the plain. Soon he heard Serrurier's fire in the rear of the enemy. Then, while he continued to draw back his left, and Wurmser to prolong his right, he ordered the redoubt of Medola to be attacked. At first he directed twenty pieces of light artillery upon that redoubt, and, after briskly cannonading it, he detached General Verdier, with three battalions of grenadiers, to storm it. That brave general advanced, supported by a regiment of cavalry, and took the redoubt. The left flank of the Austrians was thus uncovered, at the very moment when Serrurier, arriving at Cauriana, excited an alarm upon the rear of the enemy. Wurmser immediately moved part of his second line upon the right, deprived of support, and placed it en potence, to make head against the French, who were debouching from Medola. The rest of his second line he moved back to cover Cauriana, and thus contrived to make head against the enemy. But Napoleon, seizing the moment with his wonted promptness, immediately ceased to refuse his left and his center; and he gave Massena and Augereau the signal which they were impatiently awaiting. Massena, with the left, and Augereau with the center, rushed upon the weakened line of the Austrians, and charged it with impetuosity. Attacked so briskly on its whole front, and threatened on its left and its rear, it began to give way. The ardor of the French redoubled. The Austrians, pressed in front by Augereau and Massena, threatened in rear by the division of Serrurier, and turned on their left by Verdier, fell back at all points, and the French remained masters of the field. The Austrians lost on this occasion 2,000 killed and wounded, 1,000 prisoners, and twenty pieces of cannon.

CASTILLON, A.D. 1452.—This siege was the scene of the "last fight" of one of the bravest and most esteemed heroes that do honor to English annals.

The army of Charles VII. of France, on the 13th of July, 1452, laid siege to Castillon, a little city of Perigord, on the Dordogne, ten leagues from Bordeaux, then in the occupation of the English. Marshals Lohéac and Jalognes had the conducting of it; Jean Biereau, grand master of the artillery, commanded 700 cannoneers. The place, surrounded by lines of circumvallation and an intrenched camp, was brought to bay, when the brave English general, Talbot, came to its aid. He at once put to flight a body of free archers. Seduced by this easy success, he marched straight to the intrenchments of the French camp. Its fortifications astonished him, without abating his courage: he gave the assault. During two hours, he braved all the efforts and the murderous fire of the French—at eighty years of age, he fought with the ardor of youth: the English gave way; twice he brought them back to the charge, and twice he was repulsed; and the French, falling upon the rear-guard of the English, with the utmost fury, overwhelmed it.

In vain Talbot, sword in hand, covered with blood and dust, rode through the ranks, animating his men by his words and his example. His war-horse, struck down by a culverin, encumbered him in his fall. He was on the point of expiring, when his son flew to his assistance. "Retire!" cried the generous old man, "reserve your young days for a more useful occasion. I die fighting for my country; live, my son, to serve it."

After uttering these words, he expired. His son, the young Lord Lisle, fell a few minutes after, while endeavoring to avenge his death. The English fled; and Castillon surrendered the next day.

"Thus perished Talbot," writes a French historian, "whom the English of that day called their Achilles. He had, it is true, the valor of one: he was not only brave, but an excellent negotiator, a faithful subject, a sincere friend, and a generous enemy."

This defeat put a period to the English dominion in France.

CASTLEBAR, A.D. 1798.—At the northern extremity of Lake Castlebar in Ireland, is situated a town bearing the same name, which, in the year 1798, was the scene of a struggle between the royal forces of England and the French who landed in Ireland to the aid of the Irish insurgents. On the 22d of August, 1798, 1,100 French soldiers, under command of General Humbert, setting sail from Rochefort, landed at Killala, in Ireland; and with the aid of Napper Tandy, the Irish revolutionist, speedily commenced the organization of a provisional government, and the enrollment of revolutionary legions in the province of Connaught. The landing of the French troops was announced by two proclamations, one from the French general, the other from Napper Tandy to his countrymen. The first bore: "United Irish! The soldiers of the great nation have landed on your shores, amply provided with arms, artillery, and munitions of all sorts, to aid you in breaking your fetters and recovering your liberties. Napper Tandy is at their head; he has sworn to break your fetters, or perish in the attempt. To arms! freemen, to arms! the trumpet calls you; do not let your brethren perish unavenged; if it is their destiny to fall, may their blood cement the glorious fabric of freedom." That from Napper Tandy was still more vehement: "What do I hear? The British government talks of concessions! Will you accept them? Can you for a moment entertain the thought of entering into terms with a government which leaves you at the mercy of the English soldiery, which massacres inhumanly your citizens—with a ministry which is the pest of society and a scourge to the human race! They hold out in one hand the olive-branch; look well to the other, you will see in it the hidden dagger. No, Irishmen, you will not be the dupe of such base intrigues: feeling its inability to subdue your courage, it seeks only to seduce you. But you will frustrate all its efforts. Barbarous crimes have been committed in your country; your friends have fallen victims to their devotion to your cause; their shades surround you; they cry aloud for vengeance. It is your duty to avenge their death; it is your duty to strike the assassins of your friends on their bloody thrones. Irishmen! declare a war of extermination against your oppressors; the eternal war of liberty against tyranny." Immediately after the landing of the French at Killala, they marched to Castlebar, in the expectation of a rising of the people. Lake, the British general in Ireland, marched to oppose them with an army of 4,000 men, consisting in part of yeomary and militia. The two armies came in collision at Castlebar on the 28th of August, and in spite of the superior numbers of the enemy, the French troops attacked them with such impetuous valor that they were entirely routed and defeated, with the loss of 600 prisoners, and seven pieces of cannon. Enthusiastic at this success the French troops continued their march through the country toward Tuam. In the mean time Lord Cornwallis, commander of the British forces in Ireland, collected a large army, and marching against the enemy he attacked them with his overwhelming force. The French soldiers fought with the utmost valor; but Humbert, finding it useless to contend against such prodigious numbers, at length surrendered. On the 8th of September, a French force, consisting of the Hoche of seventy-four guns, and eight frigates, having on board 3,000 men, eluded the vigilance of the British fleet in the channel, and arrived on the coast of Ireland; but there they were attacked by the British squadron under the command of Sir John Borlase Warren, and, after a brief and bloody action, the French fleet was defeated, and all their ships were taken with the exception o.

two frigates which effected their escape and reached the shores of France. On board the Hoche, the victors found the celebrated Irish leader Wolfe Tone, who, after having, with great firmness, undergone a trial for high treason, was condemned, and being refused a military death, prevented a public execution by suicide.

CAVERYPAUK, A.D. 1754.—In the year 1754 a battle was fought near Caverypauk between the French, and their allies, and the English, in which the former were defeated with considerable loss.

CAXAMALCA, A.D. 1532.—At the time the Spaniards, under Pizarro, invaded Peru, that country was the scene of a civil war. Atahuallpa, the reigning inca, had just vanquished his brother, with whom, by the desire of his father, he should have divided the empire, and now he was passing through the country with an immense army, compelling his brother's subjects to acknowledge his own authority. Pizarro, some time after his easy victory over the islanders, at Puna,* passed over to the main land, and entered Tumbez, on the confines of the Peruvian empire. This city he found deserted and in ruins. Thence, leaving a portion of his army in the city, he set out on a reconnoitering expedition, and, having selected a suitable site, founded a settlement, in the fertile vally of Tangarala, ninety miles south of Tumbez. This place he called San Miguel, which name it still bears. Pizarro then removed his army from Tumbez to San Miguel. He now determined to enter upon his work of conquest in earnest. Leaving a garrison of fifty men at the new town, he struck off boldly toward the interior of the country. As he proceeded on his march toward the east, he was met by an embassy from the Peruvian monarch, inviting the strangers to visit him in his camp on the mountains. Pizarro dismissed the messengers with presents, telling them to say to their monarch, that hearing of the fame of his victories, they had come from their country, across the waters, to visit him and aid him against his enemies. As Pizarro advanced into the interior, the country presented evidences of civilization far superior to any thing he had seen nearer the coast. At length the Spanish army arrived at the base of the mountain barrier which separated them from the camp of the Peruvian monarch. Pizarro's force, all told, consisted of one hundred infantry and sixty-seven horse, and he was provided with two small pieces of artillery; and with this small army, he was marching into the very teeth of a powerful prince, whose mighty armies, already occupied in active warfare, were as countless as the sands of the sea-shore. But, nothing daunted, the bold adventurers commenced the ascent of the Andes, and after incredible toil and many hair-breadth escapes, the van, led by Pizarro himself, reached the crest of the Cordillera. Here they were visited by an embassy, bearing greetings from the inca, who desired to know when the Spaniards would arrive at his encampment, at Caxamalca, that he might make preparations for their entertainment. The messenger was dismissed with the reply, that the Spaniards would speedily present themselves before the inca. As they advanced through the defiles of the Cordilleras, the Spaniards encountered a third embassy from Atahuallpa, bearing a message of like import. The messenger was dismissed with the same reply, and the Spaniards commenced the descent of the sierra on the eastern side of the mountains. They had now occupied seven days in crossing the mountains, and it was with no little satisfaction, that, on the seventh, they saw opened out before them the vally of Caxamalca, alive with verdure and teeming with all the glories of cultivation. The valley is about fifteen miles in length by nine in breadth, and is of an oval form. It was inhabited by a people greatly superior to those which Pizarro had hitherto encountered, and its extreme length and breadth everywhere exhibited evidences of a high civilization. But a portion of this beautiful landscape was less pleasing to the eyes of the Spaniards. The slope of the hills on the opposite side of the valley, was white with the tents of an immense army. But it was now too late to retreat, and Pizarro, dividing his army into three bodies, marched down the slopes toward the city of Caxamalca. On entering he found it deserted. Pizarro at once sent an embassy to the encampment of the inca, informing him of his arrival. On the arrival of the messengers, they were led into the presence of the inca, who received them graciously, and assured them that he would visit their general on the following morning. The embassy returned to Pizarro with a dismal account of the magnitude and strength of the inca's army; and the Spanish general saw that the most desperate measures alone would avail against such a mighty force. He determined on nothing less than to secure the person of the Peruvian monarch, at all hazards, and leave the rest to fate. The possession of the inca's person would be an invaluable guaranty of safety from the attacks of the Peruvians; and, once a prisoner, the Indian monarch would be compelled to make such terms as the Spaniards should dictate. He called a council of his officers, and submitted the plan to their consideration, and, after some deliberation, it was adopted.

At day-break the next morning (it was the 16th of November), the Spanish army was under arms. Pizarro in a few words informed his soldiers of his intentions, and disposed his army for the assault, which was to be made immediately on the entrance of the inca. The great square of the city was flanked on three sides by low ranges of buildings. These buildings consisted of roomy halls, whose doors, of considerable width, opened into the square. Pizarro stationed his cavalry in two of these halls, under the command of his brother Hernando de Soto. He placed the greater part of the infantry in another of the buildings and stationed De Candia, with a few troops and the two pieces of artillery, in a fort which stood at the opposite side of the square at its entrance. Twenty picked men were to act with himself, ready for any emergency. It was not until noon that the inca emerged from his encampment, and commenced his march toward the Spanish quarters. He was borne in a gorgeous litter on the shoulders of his principal nobles, and was followed by a long train of warriors, dressed in their most magnificent array. The greater bulk of his army, however, occupied the fields which lined the road, and were spread over the surrounding plain until they were lost to sight in the distance. Upon arriving within a short distance of the city the Indian procession halted, and commenced making preparations. Soon after, a messenger was sent to Pizarro informing him that the inca would not enter the city until the following morning. Pizarro heard this with vexation, and the impatience of his soldiers at the tardiness of the Peruvians found vent in words of rage and disappointment. The Spanish general determined to make one more effort to induce the inca to visit him while he was prepared to receive him. Accordingly he returned an answer to Atahuallpa by the messenger, that he had provided every thing for his entertainment, and he expected him to sup with him that night. The Peruvian monarch was induced by this message to change his intentions, and striking his tents he resumed his march. Having arrived at the gates of the city, the inca ordered the greater part of his warriors to remain outside, and then entered the city accompanied by a few only, whom by his directions were unarmed. The leading files of the procession entered the great square, and dividing to the right and left, allowed the royal retinue to pass between. The inca advanced into the square followed by his people until several thousand had entered. Atahuallpa glanced around in search of the Spaniards; but they did not appear in the square; and turning to his attendants, the monarch inquired where the strangers were. At this moment a priest advanced from one of the buildings bearing a Bible in one hand and a crucifix in the other, and, accompanied by an interpreter, approached the inca. He told Atahuallpa that he was instructed by Pizarro to expound to him the doctrines of the true faith. This he did to his own if not to the Peruvian monarch's satisfaction, and concluded by stating that Atahuallpa must acknowledge himself a vassal of the Emperor of Spain. The eyes of the inca flashed fire at this insult, and snatching the book from the hands of the priest, he dashed it violently to the ground. The priest returned to Pizarro and abjured him to revenge the insult offered the sacred volume. Pizarro gave the signal, and shouting his battle-cry "St. Jago to the rescue!" he sprang through the doorway of the hall followed by his soldiers and rushed into the midst of the crowd of Indians. The other divisions of the Spanish army poured from the various halls in which they were concealed, horse and foot, and charged upon the defenseless Indians with the utmost fury. The cannon from the fort played with incessant energy upon the Peruvians; the cavalry dashed through their midst trampling them under foot, and cutting them down right and left, and the infantry poured rapid and well-directed volleys of musketry on them, or with their lances at rest charged furiously into the thickest of the crowd, dealing rapid and deadly thrusts till the pavement was strewn with corpses, and running with gore. In vain did the affrighted throng endeavor to escape; the entrance of the square was blocked up with dead bodies, forming an effectual barrier in that direction, and gathering in one body against the wall in their frantic exertions to escape, they burst through the wall leaving a breach of more than a hundred paces wide.

The inca was the principal object of the Spaniards' desire. His nobles forming a living wall around his sacred person, were struck down by scores, before the strokes of the enemy, who gradually hewed their way through the mass. Yet clinging to the legs of the horsemen, and grasping the Spanish soldiers in a desperate embrace they wrestled with them with an energy which for a time baffled their efforts, and several of the cavaliers, fearing that the royal prize might escape after all, were preparing to end the affray by taking the inca's life, when Pizarro in a loud voice commanded them to spare him. A Spanish cavalier, however, rushing at full speed at the inca, would have slain him with his lance had not Pizarro interposed and received the blow on his own arm. Now the struggle raged furiously around the inca. His litter swaying to-and-fro above the crowd, seemed every moment ready to fall. At length the bearers, bleeding from hundreds of wounds, tottered, and the litter fell to the ground. But the Spaniards preserved the monarch uninjured, by catching him in their arms. In an instant the imperial insignia was torn from his brow, and borne on the shoulders of his captors, the unfortunate monarch was hurried to a neighboring building and closely confined. The Indians now fled in wild confusion, and the Spaniards eager for blood, pursued, striking down the fugitives with relentless fury. The Peruvian army encamped in the neighboring plains, hearing the dismal tidings, scattered and fled in all directions. The Spaniards kept up the bloody pursuit, until the shades of evening, when they rallied once more at the sound of the bugle in the fortress of Caxamalca. On this occasion 10,000 Peruvians are said to have been slain. Of the Spaniards not one even was wounded, with the exception of Pizarro, who received a slight wound while warding off a blow intended for Atahuallpa. That night the inca supped with Pizarro. He offered for his ransom a chamber filled with gold as high as he could reach. For this purpose he collected gold from all parts of his empire, and had nearly paid his ransom, when he was executed by order of the Spanish commander.—Prescott's Conquest of Peru.

CEMPOALLA, A.D. 1520.—From the city of Cholula, Cortez and his army continued their march toward the city of Mexico, which he reached without molestation. Here he conducted himself with so much energy that soon the proud Montezuma was his complete tool. Cortez in fact governed the whole empire: Montezuma was only the semblance of a monarch. The unfortunate emperor submitted entirely to the will of the Spaniards. It was only when Cortez requested him to relinquish his religion, and accept the Christian faith, that he refused. But, while the Spanish general was endeavoring to secure a permanent control over the government and religion of the Mexicans, he was menaced by a danger which seemed to forebode his destruction. He learned that Valasquez, the governor of Cuba, had sent Narvaez, with an army of 880 men, of whom 80 were cavalry, with 12 pieces of cannon from Cuba, for the purpose of seizing him, and carrying him to Cuba as a rebel. And this army was on its way from Vera Cruz. Cortez immediately adopted the most vigorous measures. Calling his men together, he informed them of the new danger; and gave them directions how to act in the emergency. He seriously felt his deficiency in cavalry, and strove to counterbalance the great superiority of his enemies in this respect. He armed his spearmen with lances, with copper heads of such great length, that a footman could readily use it against a mounted enemy. Having informed Montezuma, who had been made acquainted with the arrival of the strangers, that the newcomers, although his countrymen, were rebels to his monarch; and that he was about to set forth to punish them for their rebellion, Cortez set forth to meet the enemy, leaving 150 Spanish soldiers, and 10,000 Tlascalan warriors in the city for the purpose of watching the movements of the emperor.

Arriving at Cholula, Cortez there found Valasquez de Leon, with 120 men who had been left behind for the purpose of founding a colony. With this reinforcement, Cortez proceeded on his march, and shortly afterward encountered a body of about sixty soldiers, who had left the garrison at Vera Cruz, for the purpose of joining him. They were accompanied by several descrters from Narvaez's army. This unexpected reinforcement was most opportune, and Cortez's hopes revived as he surveyed his band of warriors. His force consisted of 266 men, of whom only five were cavalry. The most of them were armed with the long copper-headed lances, a few only being provided with muskets and crossbows. Narvaez, with his army, marched immediately from Vera Cruz to Cempoalla, where he established his head-quarters. Cortez had sent embassies to Narvaez, stating his willingness to greet him as a brother soldier, and to share equally with him the fruits of his enterprise. Narvaez, however, refused his offers with contempt; but upon his soldiers the reports which the agents of Cortez industriously circulated among them, created an entirely different feeling. They secretly sympathized with the general who had so boldly and bravely marched into the very heart of a country teeming with enemies, and who divided his spoils so lavishly with his companions. Narvaez dismissed the embassy of Cortez with the answer that he should be treated as a rebel deserved. But when the army of Cortez had arrived within about fifteen miles of Cempoalla, he was met by an embassy from Narvaez, which offered Cortez more lenient terms. Narvaez demanded that Cortez should acknowledge his supreme authority, and offered to convey all who might desire, into Cuba, with their property, unmolested. Cortez, however, refused to accept these terms, and dismissed the envoys, who returned to their camp, and spread highly-colored reports of the magnanimity and generosity of Cortez, and the wealth of his soldiers.

The army resumed its march, and at length reached a river about two miles from Cempoalla. During the whole day, the rain had poured in torrents, and this stream, which was usually small, was now swollen to a river. Night came on. The storm thickened, and the black clouds shading the moon, filled the air with darkness. Cortez now determined to assault the enemy's camp that very night. Accordingly, after allowing his troops a brief period for rest and refreshment, he announced to them in a brief and fiery harangue, his intention to make an immediate attack. His soldiers replied to his words with acclamations of joy. He then made his dispositions for the attack. Selecting sixty of his most experienced soldiers, he intrusted them to the command of Gonzale de Sandoval, with orders to take Narvaez, dead or alive. The balance of the army, with the exception of twenty men, he placed under the command of Christoval de Olid, and he reserved for himself the twenty men, to act in any sudden emergency. Then giving the watchword, "Espiritu Santo," to each of his men, he sought a fordable point on the river.

The preparations that Narvaez had made to resist the assault were few and feeble. True, by the advice of the old cacique of the city, he put himself at the head of his soldiers, and sallied forth on the same day on which Cortez reached the river to meet him. When he arrived at the river, however, seeing nothing of the enemy, and moved by the murmuring of his men who were drenched to the skin by the soaking rain, he returned to the city; but not without the precaution of posting two sentinels at a short distance from the stream, to warn him of the coming of the enemy.

Having found a fordable part of the stream, Cortez, at the head of his troops, crossed to the opposite side. They did not cross without difficulty, for the current was rapid, the bottom uneven and stony, and the night was dark and tempestuous. Two of the Spaniards were swept from their footing by the velocity of the torrent, and were carried into deep water, where they perished. After gaining the shore, the army immediately marched toward the city. As they proceeded they suddenly fell in with the two sentinels whom Narvaez had stationed to give warning of their coming. One of them was seized, bound, and conveyed to Cortez; the other broke from the grasp of his captors and made good his escape. He returned to the city to warn Narvaez of his danger: but no heed was paid to his words; and Cortez, after vainly endeavoring to gain some information from the other sentinel, continued to advance toward Cempoalla without molestation. Arriving near the city, the Spanish general saw a light gleaming in one of the lofty towers. He pointed it out to Sandoval, saying, "There are the quarters of Narvaez, let that light be your guide." Silently and unperceived the Spaniards entered the city; but as they were marching through the principal streets, they were suddenly discovered, and soon the city was in a state of uproar and confusion. Narvaez amid the sound of trumpets, the shouting of men, the neighing of horses, and the din of preparation, buckled on his armor, calling his men around him, and demanding aid from the chief men of the city. The next moment the Spaniards appeared marching toward the towers. In an instant the guns of Narvaez opened upon them; but the pieces were elevated to such a degree that the shot passed harmlessly over the heads of the assailants. Before the enemy had time to reload their pieces, Cortez shouted the watchword, "Espiritu Santo," and Christoval, at the head of his men, charged upon the guns, and knocking down or piercing the artillerymen, with their lances, captured the cannon. Meanwhile, the cavalry of Narvaez emerged from their quarters; but they were instantly attacked by another division of Christoval's men, who kept them engaged while Sandoval with his brave men hastily ascended the stairway of the tower. But as they neared the summit they were assailed by a cloud of arrows and volleys of musketry, which for a moment stopped their further progress. But it was only for a moment; the next moment and they stood upon the platform at the head of the stairway, battling with their enemies, hand-to-hand. In the midst of his soldiers stood Narvaez, fighting bravely. Around him the combat raged furiously; he was the main object of the enemy's hate: they pushed toward him, fighting fiercely at every step with his men, who stood with equal ardor to force back the assailants. But the long spears of Cortez's men were superior to the swords of their enemies. Narvaez, himself, was wounded severely several times, and his standard bearer, pierced by a lance, fell dead at his feet. At length a soldier, thrusting his spear with cruel aim, struck out his left eye. "I am killed," he shouted, and fell. In an instant the cry was taken up and the shouts of victory arose from the ranks of the assailants. The men of Narvaez, crowding around their fallen commander, shielded him from the blows of the enemy, with their bodies, and after a furious conflict, succeeded in bearing him into the interior of the tower.

Enraged to madness at thus seeing their prey wrested from their very grasp, the assailants endeavored, with furious energy, to force the entrance; but the assailed, with the utmost courage and obstinacy, maintained their post, and prevented their entrance. Finally, however, a soldier, seizing a lighted torch, cast it upon the thatched roof, and in an instant it was wrapped in flames. The troops of Narvaez, suffocated by the dense smoke which filled the room, rushed through the entrance. At this moment, a soldier grasped Narvaez, and instantly he was seized by a dozen hands, and dragged down the stairs, where he was loaded with fetters. Upon the capture of their commander, his troops immediately surrendered.

During this conflict, Cortez, with the troops of Christoval, were engaged with the enemy's cavalry. After a short but obstinate struggle, the cavalry were worsted, after several of them had been slain by the long pikes of the soldiers of Cortez. Cortez now turned his attention to the other towers of the city, which were all strongly garrisoned by the troops of the enemy. They each refused to surrender; upon which Cortez brought the artillery which he had captured to bear upon the towers, and, after one volley, they capitulated. Having secured his victory, Cortez required each of the soldiers of the conquered army to swear fealty to him, as Captain-general of the colony. His commands were obeyed the more readily, as the greater number of the troops of Narvaez were both anxious and willing to share the fortunes of their magnanimous conqueror. In this struggle, Cortez lost only six men killed; Narvaez lost twelve killed, and a great number wounded. Narvaez, under the escort of a strong body of men, was sent to Vera Cruz; and, on the following day, Cortez, having adopted every possible measure to tranquillize and subsidize the various elements which now composed his army, he turned his attention to further plans of conquest and discovery.—Prescott's Conquest of Mexico.

CERESOLE, A.D. 1544.—On the 14th of April, 1544, a battle occurred near Ceresole, a village of Piedmont, between the Austrians and the French, in which the former were defeated with great loss.

CERRO GORDO, A.D. 1847.—Cerro Gordo is an immense hill, of a conical form, rising to the height of about 1,000 feet, in Mexico, nineteen miles from Puente Nationel, on the main road from Vera Cruz to the city of Mexico. Thirteen miles from Puente Nationel is Plan del Rio, crossing the great highway to the city. The road runs through a ravine for some distance, descending toward the river, which it passes on a strong bridge of stone. Immediately after passing the stream, a small plain is formed by the receding mountains on either side of the road. From this plain the river derives its name. The pass of Cerro Gordo is four miles from Plan del Rio. The road from the river, gradually ascending, winds its way through a narrow defile of the mountains. On the right the road is alternately shut in by heights, and skirted by a dense chapparal; and on the left it is guarded for two miles before reaching the hill of Cerro Gordo, by a rugged and almost inaccessible ridge, eight hundred feet in height.

On the 16th of April, 1847, the whole American army, consisting of 8,000 men, under the command of General Scott, was encamped at Plan del Rio; being on its way from Vera Cruz to the city of Mexico. The Mexicans, in great force, had concentrated in the vicinity of the height and pass of Cerro Gordo, to dispute the passage of the American army. Santa Anna, the Mexican general, had fortified himself on the ridge on the left of the pass of Cerro Gordo, and on the hill of Cerro Gordo. He had also established two batteries across the road—one at the head of the pass, near the base of Cerro Gordo; and the other farther up the road, toward Jalapa. The Mexican works on the height on the left, consisted of a series of breast-works, armed with cannon. These breast-works were so arranged that they not only commanded the road, but served as a protection to each other, so that should the first line be taken, the second might be opened against it: and so on to the end. Timber and other obstructions were thrown along the slope of the heights and the front of the batteries, to impede the progress of the storming-parties. The left of this position was covered by the river of the Plan, which ran along the base of the ridge in that direction. It was necessary, therefore, that the American army should pass up the road—between which and the river, the ridge, formed, as it were, a tongue—or flank position by the right. The extreme left of the Mexican position rested on the height of Cerro Gordo. This hill was surrounded by two breast-works, one near the base, the other near the summit. It was defended by eight pieces of cannon, and a numerous body of infantry. By its superior elevation, it commanded all the rest of the Mexican works, and might be regarded as a key to their whole position.

On the evening of the 16th, General Scott ordered General Twiggs to storm the ridge, on the right of the road. Accordingly, the next morning, the division of General Twiggs was put in motion. At about eleven o'clock, the column, having arrived within seven hundred yards of the Mexicans' main works, a company of the 7th infantry, commanded by Lieutenant Gardner, was detached to occupy the crest of a hill, to the left, to observe the enemy's movements. During the execution of this order, he was attacked by a picket of the enemy, against which, although much his superior in numbers, he maintained himself, until he was reinforced and relieved by the regiment of riflemen—now dismounted—under Major Sumner, and Lieutenant Colonel Childs. In the mean time, the Mexicans received reinforcements, and a bloody struggle ensued. At length the Americans succeeded in driving the enemy from the first position. The Mexicans took possession of a second hill, within cannon-range of the batteries of Cerro Gordo. Here they made a stand; but the Americans, boldly mounting to the assault, through a storm of grape and canister from Cerro Gordo, carried the enemy's new position, and held it in spite of all their efforts to dislodge them. In the height of their enthusiasm, about sixty Americans, of the 1st Artillery, under Captains Capron, Naumon and Burke, rushed down the hill, on the opposite side, and gaining the foot of Cerro Gordo, they effected a lodgment there, and maintained a fire of musketry upon the Mexican lines, until they were recalled. The main attack was not to be made till the next day. The victorious Americans slept on the second hill which they had gained. During the night, a heavy twenty-four pounder and two twenty-four pound howitzers were brought to this point. This was effected not without great labor and difficulty. The heavy pieces were to be lifted up the almost perpendicular sides of the eminence, hundreds of feet high. Five hundred men were attached to each gun; and it was not until three o'clock in the morning, after eight hours of unremitting labor, that the three pieces were planted on the summit. An eight-inch howitzer was also placed in position, on the other side of the river, opposite to the advanced batteries of the Mexicans, on the right. The same evening, General Scott, having been informed of General Twiggs's operations, drew up his orders of battle, for the next day, dated at his headquarters, at Plan del Rio. He ordered Twiggs "to move forward before daylight, to-morrow, and take a position across the national road, in the enemy's rear, so as to cut off his retreat toward Jalapa." General Pillow was to "march at six o'clock, to-morrow morning, along the route he has carefully reconnoitered, and stand ready, as soon as he hears the report of arms on our right—or sooner, if circumstances should favor him—to pierce the enemy's line of batteries, at such point—the nearer the river the better—as he may select. Once in the rear of that line, he will turn to the left or right, or both, and attack the batteries in reverse; or, if abandoned, he will pursue the enemy with vigor till further orders." Thus General Twiggs was to attack the enemy on their right flank; and General Pillow on the left, the other details being left to the direction of the generals. Twiggs's division consisted of two brigades: the 1st brigade commanded by Colonel Harney, and the second by Colonel Riley. On the night of the 17th, this division was reinforced by the brigade of General Shields. General Twiggs adopted the following order of battle. Shields and Riley were to flank the enemy's right, and place themselves in the road to Jalapa, a short distance in the rear of the hill of Cerro Gordo. Colonel Harney was to storm the height of Cerro Gordo itself. General Pillow's brigade consisted of four regiments of infantry, a company of Kentucky volunteers, and a detachment of cavalry. This force he divided into two storming parties, each of which was supported by a strong reserve. These parties were commanded respectively by Colonels Haskell and Wynkoop; and they were to storm, simultaneously, the angles of the enemy's batteries, numbers 1 and 2, near his extreme left. Colonel Haskell was supported by Colonel Campbell, and Colonel Wynkoop by Colonel Roberts. In brief, the Mexicans were fortified in a mountain pass, two miles in length—their batteries were perched on a height, extending, in a curve, more or less regular, to the head of the pass, where the road debouches between this height, which here terminates, and the opposite height of Cerro Gordo. Santa Anna's forces amounted to 7,000 men. General Twiggs had possession of a hill near Cerro Gordo, on which he had planted some cannon, and held his division in hand for a forward movement; and General Pillow, on the extreme right of the enemy, was preparing for the assault. At the foot of the pass, was posted a body in reserve; and General Worth held himself ready to support Twiggs, if necessary. On the morning of the 18th, the Mexicans discovering the American batteries on the hill, opened a plunging fire upon it. Twiggs, in turn, poured destructive volleys upon the intrenchments below. Colonel Harney pushed forward. Major Loring, with the rifles, along the ravines, to the left of his position, to engage the enemy in that quarter, and hold them in check, in case they should attempt to reinforce Cerro Gordo, moved forward, with the remainder of his command, to the assault of the latter. In taking up their position, the rifles were exposed to a murderous fire of grape and canister, but Major Loring executed his orders with steadiness and courage. Before reaching the base of Cerro Gordo, Colonel Harney's column was also frequently under fire. The road was exceedingly rough, through a growth of tangled shrubbery and over rocks and chasms. As the column approached the foot of the mountain, it was torn by a rapid and well directed fire of grape and canister. Dividing into two columns, Colonel Harney's men gradually ascended the steep acclivity, amid constant and terrible discharges of musketry and cannon from the enemy. Slowly but steadily the American soldiers approached the first breastwork, which was filled with infantry, who poured incessant and destructive volleys upon the advancing columns. Soon the Americans reached the work, for a moment the contending parties struggled with crossed bayonets; when the Mexicans, flying to their second line, abandoned the breastwork to the Americans. Although deprived of their first line of defense, the Mexicans continued to deluge the Americans with missiles of destruction, and seemed as active in their resistance as before. But upward marched the assailing columns; they neared the second breastwork, and clubbing their muskets, with loud shouts, they leaped into the works, and soon made themselves masters of the entire hill. Meanwhile, the brigade of Shields and Riley had been dispatched to continue Twiggs's flank movement, and thus turning the enemy's whole position, to gain his rear in the Jalapa road. This movement was executed with success, under guidance of Captain Lee, of the engineers. As General Shields was about to debouch upon the main road, a battery of five guns, hitherto undiscovered, supported by a body of lancers, opened a volley of grape-shot upon him. Shields immediately ordered a charge. At the head of his men the gallant general dashed forward, and attacked the enemy so fiercely that they were obliged to abandon their guns, and fly in disorder.

In this charge Shields was shot through the lungs; the wound, however, was not mortal. A large body of the enemy had withdrawn to this point, Santa Anna, among the rest, with the view of making their escape, in the contingency which had occurred. They immediately took to flight, and were pursued by Worth's and Twiggs's division within sight of Jalapa. While these operations were going on on the Mexican left, General Pillow was operating on the right. Pillow, as soon as he was aware that Twiggs was engaged, moved up a storming party under Colonels Haskell and Wynkoop, to assail the batteries on the ridge. The Mexicans discovered Haskell's men before he could place them in position, and opened such a destructive fire upon him, that it became necessary for him either to fall back under cover, without executing his orders, or to rush forward unsupported and unorganized. He gallantly, but unwisely, chose the latter alternative, and dashed forward at the head of his men, into the open space in front of the batteries. For 300 yards this interval was covered with the brush of a chapparel, which had been cut down, and suffered to remain, rendering it very difficult to advance. In addition to this, a battery of six or seven guns, which had been previously masked, suddenly blew a cloud of brush in the air, as the battery opened upon him, and began to cut down his men by scores. So fierce and destructive was the fire that the Americans were obliged to recoil, and fell back in good order under shelter, leaving the ground behind them strewn with the slain. While General Pillow was organizing his attack, and bringing up his column, he was wounded. At length he heard the enemy's fire slacken on the American right, and correctly judging that the battle was over, he suspended further operations. The Mexicans in fact were defeated, and shortly afterward surrendered at discretion. Five Mexican generals, and nearly 6,000 men, were made prisoners of war. The loss in killed and wounded on both sides was about 500 men. A large quantity of ammunition, thirty pieces of cannon, together with the private baggage and money-chest of Santa Anna fell into the hands of the victors.

CEUTLA, A.D. 1519.—The battle of Tabasco gave the Spaniards a firm foothold on the soil of Yucatan; but in an enemy's country, and in the midst of enemies whose recent conduct proved not only their courage but their military experience, the position of the invaders was any thing but enviable.

On the morning following the battle, Cortez detached Alvarado and his men to reconnoiter. Francisco, with another detachment, was ordered out on a similar errand. Francisco had gone but a short distance when he was fiercely attacked by an overwhelming body of Indians. In vain did his men endeavor to check the furious charges of the enemy.

Overpowered by numbers, they were driven back, and obliged to take shelter in a large stone building near the road. Here he was closely besieged by the natives, who, shouting vehemently, repeatedly assaulted the house. No longer fearing the roar of the fire-arms, they would have soon carried the place, had not their loud shouts reached the ears of Alvarado and his men, who hastened to the relief of their companions, and enabled them to force a passage through their enemies. The Spaniards then hastily retreated toward the town eagerly pursued by the natives. Upon hearing the uproar of the chase, Cortez advanced from the town to their support, and compelled the enemy to retire. From the prisoners taken in this skirmish Cortez learned that the whole country was in arms. A body of natives many thousand strong, was concentrated, from the neighboring provinces, in the vicinity of the town, and had determined upon a general assault the next day.

Cortez immediately called his officers together, and declared that it was his intention to march out of the place, and give battle to the enemy on the following morning. All such as were disabled by their wounds, he sent back to the ships, and the remainder of his forces were ordered to join him at Tabasco. All the horses and six of the large guns were also brought off from the ship. Cortez gave the command of the artillery to Mosa, an experienced soldier who had seen service in the Italian wars. Diego de Ordaz commanded the infantry; and Cortez himself took the command of the cavalry. The cavalry consisted only of sixteen men; but they were the flower of his little band.

The little army was mustered at day-break. Cortez had learned that the Indians were encamped on a level piece of ground, called the plain of Ceutla, a few miles distant from the city. The Spanish commander now made his preparations for the battle. Ordaz was to advance with the infantry and artillery across the country and attack the enemy in front, while Cortez was to make a circuit with the cavalry, and fall upon their flank or rear.

It was the 25th of March; the morning air was fresh and invigorating; but as the day wore on, the heat increased and the troops advancing through plantations of maize and cocoa, cut up by numerous canals and reservoirs of water, used for irrigating the soil, proceeded on their weary way with painful toil. Fortunately the country was intersected by a narrow causeway, over which the cannon were dragged.

At length they came upon the margin of the plain of Ceutla, expanding out before them like a lake of verdure. Along the distant verge of the plain extended the dark lines of the Indian army, occupying a most advantageous position. The Indians did not wait for the attack, but rushing forward in a body, with loud shouts, they hurled clouds of arrows, stones, and spears upon the approaching enemy, wounding them to right and left. Floundering in the mud of a morass, the Spaniards could not reply; but finally gaining the firm ground, they planted their cannon in a favorable position, and opened a hot fire upon the dense masses of the enemy with terrible effect. Huge gaps appeared in the Indian ranks, as the deadly messengers of death plowed their way through them. But the brave savages were not dismayed. With the sound of trumpets, and with shouts and yells of defiance, they again discharged their weapons upon their foe. Onward, like a huge billow, they rolled toward the brave little band of Spaniards; they were repulsed. With renewed energy they again pressed forward, and hand to hand the foemen fought with an animosity and fierceness rarely paralleled. The Spaniards, almost overwhelmed by the numbers of their enemy, were cramped in their movements; they could not work their guns effectually, and they seemed on the very verge of defeat.

But for a whole hour they stood their ground, contesting, with the energy of despair, against an enemy whose voice was already raised in shouts of anticipated victory. Clad in their thickly-padded cotton armor, which resisted the pricks of the arrows, and the thrusts of the lances of the Indians, the Spaniards suffered more from fatigue than from the blows of the enemy. Human endurance, however, could not long hold out against a force capable of crushing them by its very weight. Vainly did they look for the arrival of the cavalry. It came not. Anxiety and care clouded the countenances of the soldiers; the officers ran from man to man, and urged them on to battle; they fought sternly with the determination to conquer or to die. Ah! the enemy wavers; a cry resounds above the din of battle. The weary Spaniards renew their efforts. "San Jago and San Pedro!" shouts a Christian voice from the very midst of the enemy. "San Jago and San Pedro!" cry the now re-inspirited soldiers, and rush forward upon the Indian army, which, assaulted in the rear by the Spanish cavalry, sways and heaves like an uneasy ocean. The bright swords of the cavalry flash above the dark cloud of the enemy, gleaming in the air, and striking in the cloud to right and left, dealing death on every side. Cortez and his men had come in time. Ten minutes later, and his gallant little army would have been crushed. Retarded by the uneven nature of the country, Cortez had been delayed, and when he arrived, the Indians were so hotly engaged that he was upon them before they were aware of his approach. With lances leveled at the heads of their foemen, the Spanish cavalry rushed into the rear of the struggling mass. Terrified and bewildered by the unexpected attack, the Indians were seized with a panic, and were thrown into complete disorder. Ordaz now ordered a general charge. The Spanish infantry obeyed with such alacrity that the Indians were forced back with great slaughter. The natives made but a feeble resistance; the sudden appearance of the enemy's horse had dispirited and terrified them to such a degree, that they fled in the utmost confusion across the plains, many of them throwing away their weapons in their flight. Cortez, content with his victory, did not pursue; but assembling his soldiers beneath a grove of palm-trees, offered up thanks to God for having given victory to his arms.

In this battle, the Spanish lost, according to their own report, two men killed, and one hundred wounded. The Indians, whose army was at least 40,000 strong, suffered enormously. The actual number of the killed and wounded is uncertain; but they must have been counted by thousands. The battle-field was made the site of a town named Santa Maria de la Vitoria, which afterward was the capital of the province.—Prescott.

CHÆRONEA, B.C. 447.—Chæronea, an ancient city in Bœotia, in Greece, has been rendered famous by three battles which were fought in its vicinity. In the year 447, B.C. an Athenian army, commanded by Tolmidas, marched against the Bœotian exiles who had seized Orchomenus and Chæronea, and some other cities of Bœotia. Having taken and inslaved Chæronea, they placed a garrison in it, and withdrew. But upon their march, they were attacked by a body of men consisting of Bœotian exiles from Orchomenus, and their partisans, and a bloody battle ensued. The Athenians, after a desperate resistance, were finally defeated with great loss. Their general was slain, and many were taken prisoners. The Athenians now evacuated Bœotia, and to get the prisoners released consented to a peace.

In the year 338, B.C., Philip of Macedon entered Bœotia with all his forces. He had threatened to march against Athens; the Athenians applied to the Bœotians for succor, and a league was established between the two nations. The troops of the confederate army, after the league was formed, assembled at Chæronea. Philip immediately sent ambassadors to the council of Bœotia, the chief of whom was Python, one of the ablest orators of his time. Python, in a most eloquent speech, endeavored to persuade the Thebans not to assist the Athenians. He was answered, however, by Demosthenes with such powerful appeals and arguments, that the souls of the Thebans were inspired with a renewed zeal for their country; the love of liberty rose within their hearts, and they resolved to aid their countrymen at all hazards. The Athenian army set out immediately, and marched to Eleusis, where they were joined by the Thebans. The confederate army then encamped near Chæronea, and waited the approach of the enemy. Philip's army consisted of 30,000 foot, and 2,000 horse. The confederate army was not quite so numerous. The Macedonians encamped near the city of Chæronea, within sight of the enemy. Philip gave the command of his left wing to his son Alexander, who was then only sixteen or seventeen years old, and having posted his ablest officers near the youthful general, he himself took the command of the right wing. In the confederate army, the Thebans formed the right, and the Athenians the left wing. At sunrise, the signal for battle was given on both sides. The struggle which ensued was obstinate and bloody. Alexander was animated with a noble ardor for glory, and endeavored to signalize himself in this, his first essay as a commander. Although so young, yet his bravery knew no bounds; at the head of his troops, he dashed into the midst of the enemy, and fought with all the courage and capacity of a veteran. The flower of the Theban army, the sacred battalion, after a desperate struggle, was scattered and dispersed by the troops of the gallant prince. On the right wing, Philip, determined not to be outdone by his son, charged the Athenians with a vigor which compelled them to give way. But, stung to the quick by their discomfiture, the Athenians rallied and fought with such valor that they recovered their original position. Lysicles, the Athenian general, charged upon the center of the Macedonians, and having forced his way through them, imagined himself already victorious. "Come on, my lads," cried he, enthusiastically, "let us drive them back into Macedon." But Philip quickly perceived that instead of profiting by the advantage they had gained, to take his phalanx in flank, pursued his troops too vigorously, said coolly, "The Athenians do not know how to conquer." He immediately commanded his phalanx to wheel about to a little eminence. The Athenians, in the utmost disorder, were in hot pursuit of the troops they had broken, wholly unconscious of Philip's movements. Now Philip charged them with his phalanx, and attacking them both in flank and rear, made such havoc upon their troops, that they were entirely routed and put to flight. Demosthenes, more an orator than warrior, threw away his arms, and fled with the rest. It is said, that in his flight, a bramble having caught his robe, and he, imagining that an enemy had seized him, cried out in accents of terror, "Spare my life!" Over 1,000 Athenians were left dead upon the field of battle, and 2,000 were taken prisoners. The loss was equally as great on the Theban side. Immediately after the victory, Philip, in the elation of his heart, committed a thousand excesses. He drank to intoxication, and dancing over the gory field, insulted the dead with songs and ribaldry.

In the year 86 B.C., a terrible battle was fought near Chæronea, by the Roman army under Sylla, and the forces of Mithridates, King of Pontus, commanded by Archelaus.

Tuxiles, one of Mithridates's generals, having arrived in Greece with an army of 100,000 foot, and 10,000 horse, with 90 chariots, whose wheels were armed with scythes, was joined by the forces of his brother Archelaus, who had been sent into Greece with an army of 120,000 men, two years before. To Archelaus was given the command of this mighty army. Urged on by the solicitations of his generals, Archelaus commenced his march toward the Romans who were incamped on a fertile hill in the middle of the plains of Elateia. He was followed by an army, which, when it arrived within sight of the enemy, filled the whole plain with horses, chariots, bucklers, and targets. The clamor and hideous roar of so many nations seemed to rend the very sky; and the pomp and splendor of their magnificent array, struck terror to the hearts of the Romans. The arms of the warriors were richly adorned with gold and silver, and the colors of their Median and Scythian vests, intermixed with polished brass and steel, glistened as they moved, like brilliant, waving lines of flame. The Romans numbered only 15,000 foot, and 1,500 horse, and stricken with terror at the overwhelming army which was approaching them, they shut themselves up within their intrenchments, and Sylla could not with all his arguments remove their fears, and, as he did not choose to force them into the field in this dispirited condition, he sat still, and bore with great reluctance the boasts and jeers of the barbarians. Archelaus passed on in triumph, destroying and sacking cities before the very eyes of the Romans. Sylla now bethought himself of a stratagem. He compelled his soldiers to dig ditches, to draw the river Cephisus from its channel, and made them work at it without intermission; standing inspector himself, and severely punishing all whom he found remiss. At length, as he had expected, his soldiers became weary of their work, and, on the third day of their drudgery, as Sylla passed by they called out to him to lead them against the enemy. Sylla at first refused; but when he saw the ardor of his soldiers increase at his opposition, he made them stand to their arms, and marched against the enemy. The barbarians, in the mean time, had possessed themselves, with a great body of troops, of a very advantageous post, called Thurium, near Chæronea. It was the ridge of a steep mountain, which extended itself upon the left flank of the Romans and was well calculated to check their motions.

Archelaus with the main body of his army had strongly intrenched himself on a spot of ground, near by, between Mount Edylium and Acontium. When Sylla had arrived at Chæronea, two citizens of that place came to him and promised to drive the enemy from their post on Mount Thurium, if he would give them a small number of chosen troops. Sylla did as they requested. In the mean time he drew up his army in order of battle. The cavalry he placed in the wings. He gave the command of the left wing to Muræna, reserving the right wing for himself. Gallus and Hortensius, his lieutenants, commanded the second line. Hortensius on the left, supported Muræna, while Gallus on the right did the same for Sylla. Archelaus now commenced making preparations, by extending his wings, which consisted of an infinite number of horse, and all his light-armed foot troops which could move with great agility, into a circle, to encompass the second line and charge it in the rear. The two Chæroneans, having, meanwhile, gained the summit of Thurium, without being perceived by the enemy, suddenly showed themselves. The barbarians, struck with consternation and dismay, sought refuge in flight. They rushed down the steep declivity in such confusion and haste that many were slain. Unable to find a secure footing as they precipitated themselves headlong down the hill, a great number fell upon the uplifted points of the spears of those before them, and many falling, were trampled to death. All this time the Romans were slaughtering them behind. Three thousand were killed before they reached the foot of the mountain. Some who reached the plain in safety were attacked by Muræna and cut to pieces, while others who escaped, fled to the main body, under Archelaus, where the news of their defeat caused such terror and dismay, that the whole army was thrown into confusion and disorder. Sylla, taking advantage of this state of affairs, advanced upon the barbarians and charged them with such vigor, that he prevented the effect of their armed chariots. The chief strength of these chariots consisted in the length of the course, and the rapidity of their movements. But here the course was so short, that the chariots moved at first so slow, and their attacks were so impotent, that the Romans clapped their hands and received them with the utmost ridicule. They even called for fresh ones as they used to do in the Hippodrome, at Rome. The chariots were now removed, and the two main bodies engaged in the conflict. The barbarians presented their long pikes, and locking their shields close together, endeavored to keep themselves in good order. But the Romans, after using their lances to no effect, cast them away, and drawing their swords, precipitated themselves into the midst of their enemies. Their fury was increased by the sight of 15,000 slaves whom the barbarians had stolen from them, and had placed among the heavy-armed infantry, with the promise of liberty if they would fight for it.

These slaves were thus inspired with such determination and courage, that they withstood the charge of the Romans without giving ground, and they were not repulsed and put in disorder, until the archers and slingers of the second line of the Roman army discharged all their fury upon them. Archelaus now extended his right wing, in order to surround the Romans, and Hortensius, with the cohorts under his command, pushed down to take him in flank. But Archelaus, suddenly turned against him, with 2,000 horse, and gradually drove him toward the mountains. Hortensius, thus separated from the main body, was in danger of being entirely hemmed in by the enemy. Sylla, hearing this, immediately hastened with his right wing, which had not yet engaged, to the assistance of Hortensius. Upon this Archelaus left Hortensius and hastened back to the right of the Roman army from whence Sylla had advanced, hoping to find it without a commander. At the same moment Tuxiles led on his foot, armed with brazen shields, against Muræna. And now both sides set up a shout, which echoed throughout the valley. Sylla immediately dispatched Hortensius with four cohorts to the assistance of Muræna, and with the fifth he hastened to the support of his right wing. He there found that his troops, without him, had withstood the assault of the enemy without giving ground, but his sudden appearance among them, animated them to such a degree, that they rushed forward against their foes, and drove them with great slaughter from the field. This success did not cause Sylla to forget the danger of Muræna. With a reinforcement he hastened to that quarter; but upon his arrival he found them already victorious, and therefore nothing remained for him to do, but to join in the pursuit. One hundred and ten thousand of the barbarian army were slain, while Sylla says that he missed only fourteen of his men, and two of them returned the same evening. For this reason, he inscribed his trophies to Mars, to Victory and Venus, to show that he was no less indebted to good fortune, than to capacity and valor, for the advantages he had gained. Of the barbarian army only 10,000 men, out of so many myriads, reached a place of safety.

CHALONS, A.D. 451.—Around the city of Chalons-sur-Marne in France, extends a broad expanse of plains called by the ancients Campi Catalaunici, through which the river Marne winds its way. About five miles from Chalons, near the little villages of Chape and Cuperly, the plain is diversified by ranges of grassy mounds and trenches, which prove to the experienced eye, that this quiet spot has once been the fortified position of a large military host. These ancient earthworks, are known in local tradition as Attila's Camp. Attila, the most powerful heathen king that ever ruled in Europe, was retreating before his victorious enemies. It was during this retreat, it is said, that he assumed the title of "The scourge of God for the chastisement of the Christians." On the appearance of the Romans, he had abandoned the siege of Orleans, and re-crossing the Seine, encamped in the plains of Chalons, whose level surface was adapted to the operations of his Scythian cavalry. But his retreat was not undisturbed; the Romans and their allies continually pressed on and sometimes engaged his rear-guard, and the bloody conflict of the Gepidæ and the Franks, in which 15,000 barbarians were slain, was a prelude to a more general and decisive battle. A height which commanded the camp of Attila, was the first object of dispute. The young and valiant Torismond first occupied the summit; the Goths rushed with irresistible weight on the Huns, who labored to ascend from the opposite side: and the possession of this advantageous post inspired both the troops and their leaders with hopes of victory. This defeat increased the anxiety of Attila; and he consulted his priests and haruspices. They foretold his own defeat, with the death of his principal adversary. But, instead of desponding, the Hunnish king endeavored by every means in his power to arouse the courage of his followers. "I myself," said he "will hurl the first javalin, and the wretch who refuses to imitate the example of his king, shall surely die." His words were received with enthusiastic shouts, and the Huns impatiently clamored to be led against the foe. Attila immediately formed his order of battle. He placed himself in the center of his line, at the head of his brave and faithful Huns, while the nations subject to his empire were extended on either hand over the ample space of the Catalaunian plains. The right wing was commanded by Ardaric, king of the Gepidæ, and the three brothers who reigned over the Ostrogoths were posted on the left to oppose the kindred tribes of the Visigoths. Ætius, the Roman general, also prepared for battle. Langiban, the faithless king of the Alauni, was placed in the center where his motions might be closely watched. Ætius assumed the command of the left, and Theodoric of the right wing; while Torismond still continued to occupy the heights which he had won. After the mutual and repeated discharges of missile weapons, in which the archers of Scythia might signalize their superior dexterity, the cavalry and infantry of the two armies furiously mingled in close combat.

The Huns, who fought under the eye of their king, pierced through the feeble and doubtful center of the allies, separated their wings from each other, and wheeling, with a rapid effort, to the left, directed their whole force against the Visigoths. As Theodoric rode along the ranks, to reanimate his troops, he received a mortal stroke from the javelin of Andages, a noble Ostrogoth, and immediately fell from his horse. The wounded king was oppressed in the general disorder and trampled under the feet of his own cavalry; and this important death served to explain the ambiguous prophecy of the haruspices. Attila already exulted in the confidence of victory, when the valiant Torismond descended from the hills, and verified the remainder of the prediction. The Visigoths, who had been thrown into confusion by the flight or defection of the Alauni, gradually restored their order of battle; and the Huns were undoubtedly vanquished, since Attila was compelled to retreat. He had exposed his person with the rashness of a private soldier; but the intrepid troops of the center had pushed forward beyond the rest of the line; thair attack was faintly supported; their flanks were unguarded; and the conquerors of Scythia and Germany were saved by the approach of night from a total defeat. They retired within the circle of wagons that fortified their camp; and the dismounted squadrons prepared themselves for a defense, to which neither their arms nor their temper were adapted. The event was doubtful, but Attila had secured a last and honorable resource. The saddles and rich furniture of the cavalry were collected by his order into a funeral pile; and the magnanimous barbarian had resolved, if his intrenchments should be forced, to rush headlong into the flames, and to deprive his enemies of the glory which they might have acquired by the death or captivity of Attila.

But his enemies had passed the night in equal disorder and anxiety. Torismond pressed forward in the pursuit with an ardor which drew him unexpectedly in the midst of the Scythian wagons, with only a few followers, and the young prince, in the confusion of a nocturnal encounter, must have perished like his father, had he not been rescued by the intrepid zeal of his companions. Ætius on the left, also passed the night in ignorance of the victory of his allies. But the imperial general was soon satisfied of the defeat of Attila, who still remained within his intrenchments. The body of Theodoric was discovered under a heap of the slain, and his funeral rites were performed with tears and groans. The Goths declared Torismond his successor; and the new king accepted the obligation of revenge as a sacred portion of his paternal inheritance. Meanwhile Attila maintained an undaunted front. It was determined, in a general council, to besiege the Hunnish king in his camp; but the impatience of the barbarians, and the caution of the Roman general, who feared that, after the extirpation of the Huns, the republic would be opposed by the pride and power of the Gothic nation, prevailed, and it was finally concluded to separate and molest Attila no further. After the departure of the Goths and the separation of the allied army, Attila was surprised at the vast silence that reigned over the plains of Chalon; the suspicion of some hostile stratagem detained him several days within the circle of his wagons, and at length his retreat beyond the Rhine confessed the last victory of the Western empire. The Franks, observing a prudent distance, and magnifying the opinion of their strength, by the numerous fires which they kindled every night, contrived to follow the rear of the Huns until they reached the confines of Thuringia. The Thuringians served in the army of Attila; they traversed, both in their march and their return, the territories of the Franks; and it was perhaps, in this war that they exercised the cruelties which, above fourscore years after, were revenged by the son of Clovis. They massacred their hostages as well as captives; two hundred young maidens were tortured with exquisite and unrelenting rage; their bodies were torn asunder by wild horses, or their bones were crushed under the weight of rolling wagons; and their unburied limbs were abandoned on the public roads, as a prey to dogs and vultures. Such were those savage ancestors, whose imaginary virtues have sometimes excited the praise and envy of civilized ages!—Gibbon.

CHALONS-SUR-SAONE, A.D. 1274.—On the 1st of May, 1274, Edward I. of England, on his return from Palestine, received a challenge from the Count of Châlons to a friendly tournament at Châlons on the Saône in France. On the appointed day, Edward entered the lists with 1,000 champions, partly on foot, and partly on horseback, and was met by his antagonist with a retinue nearly double in number. But the image of war was soon turned into stern reality. Edward and his retinue were so successful in the jousts that the French knights, provoked at their superiority, made a serious attack upon them; but Edward's archers drove their opponents out of the field, killed a great number of them, and left the tilting-ground strewn with dead.

CHAPULTEPEC, A.D. 1847.—This strong fortress is situated about two miles southwest of the city of Mexico. It consists of a rock rising to the height of 150 feet, and crowned by a castle. The entire length of the fortification is 900 feet, that of the main building and the terre pleine, 600 feet. By a series of masterly movements, General Scott succeeded in blinding the eyes of the Mexican general as to the real point of his intended attack on the capital; and while the enemy were awaiting him in anxiety and bewilderment, he suddenly appeared before the castle of Chapultepec, which was occupied by a Mexican garrison under General Bravo, and which guarded the approach to the city by a causeway bearing the same name. In order to carry this fortress with the least loss, Scott determined to batter it with heavy ordnance, before making the assault. Accordingly, on the evening of the 11th of September, 1847, four batteries were erected on a ridge of land in front of the fortress, directing toward Molino-del-Rey, at the foot of Chapultepec. These batteries were placed in position by the engineer officers, Huger and Lee, and were commanded respectively by Captains Drum, Hagner, and Brooks, and Lieutenant Stone. On the morning of the 12th the batteries on both sides commenced their fire, which was maintained furiously during the entire day. On the 13th, all arrangements were made for the assault. General Smith's brigade, which on the afternoon of the 12th, had moved up to Piedad, had now arrived on the ground. The attack was to be made in two columns: one on the west side, under the command of Pillow; and one on the south-east, under the command of Quitman. Each was to be preceded by a storming party: that of Pillow, by 250 men, volunteers from Worth's division; under Captain McKenzie, of the 2d Artillery; that of Quitman, by the same number of men, under Captain Carey, of the 2d Infantry. Each of the storming-parties was furnished with scaling-ladders. The signal for the attack was given by a momentary cessation of fire, on the part of the American batteries. This was at eight o'clock on the morning of the 13th. The divisions of Pillow and Quitman moved forward, while the American batteries, when they had opportunity, threw shot and shells over the heads of the assailants, to deter the enemy from reinforcing the castle. While this was going on, the reserve, under Worth, was to turn Chapultepec, and gaining the north side, either to assist in the attack or cut off the enemy's retreat. The assaulting column, under General Pillow, advanced on the west, through an open grove filled with Mexican sharpshooters, which were speedily dislodged, and rapidly gained the foot of the rocky acclivity. Here Pillow was wounded by a shot in the ankle; and the command devolved on General Cadwallader. At this point the main battle occurred. The broken acclivity was still to be ascended, and a strong redoubt, midway, to be carried before reaching the castle on the heights. The advance of our brave men, led by brave officers, though necessarily slow, was unwavering, over rocks, chasms, and mines, and under the hottest fire of cannon and musketry. The redoubt now yielded to resistless valor, and the shouts that followed announced to the castle the fate that impended. The enemy was steadily driven from shelter to shelter. The retreat allowed not time to fire a single mine, without the certainty of blowing up friend and foe. Those who, at a distance, attempted to apply matches to the long trains, were shot down by our men. There was death below, as well as above ground. At length the ditch and wall of the main work were reached; the scaling-ladders were brought up and planted by the storming-parties; some of the daring spirits first in the assault were cast down, killed or wounded; but a lodgment was soon made; streams of blood followed; all opposition was overcome, and several of our regimental colors flung out from the upper walls, amid long continued shouts and cheers, which sent dismay into the capital. No scene could be more animating or glorious. While this was going on to the west of Chapultepec, the column of Quitman was performing a similar part on the east. Having to advance on a causeway, flanked by deep ditches, he had little room for maneuvering. In front was a strong body of the enemy and two batteries. These were soon carried; and the volunteers of New York, South Carolina, and Pennsylvania, with the gallant Rifles, under General Smith, arrived in time to join the storming-party of Pillow's division and capture together this formidable fortress. The enemy was chased in every direction, many killed and many more captured. In the castle were crowds of prisoners of every rank and color; among whom were fifty general officers and about 100 cadets of the Mexican Military Academy. The latter were pretty little fellows from 10 to 16 years of age. Several of them were killed while fighting like demons; and, indeed, they showed an example of courage worthy of imitation by some of their superiors in rank. The American loss in killed and wounded was not great; but among the slain were included the gallant officers Major Twiggs and Lieutenant Ransom. Generals Shields and Pillow were wounded. The fall of Chapultepec removed the last obstacle which lay between the American army and the Mexican capital; General Scott immediately attacked the city itself, and the capture of Mexico followed speedily.

the French under Luxembourg, and the army of the Prince of Waldreck, consisting of German, Dutch, Spanish, and English troops. After a protracted and bloody struggle, the allies were signally defeated, with great loss.

On the 26th of May, 1794, the French army crossed the river Sambre, and on the 29th succeeded in investing Charleroi, after a desperate engagement with the allied English and Austrian army. But, on the 3d of June, an attack was made upon the French with such vigor that they were compelled to raise the siege and retire across the Sambre, with the loss of 2,000 men. On the 4th, however, Jourdan arrived with 40,000 men, and in a few days the French army, now increased to 60,000 men, recrossed the river and resumed the siege of Charleroi. The imminent danger to which the city was exposed by this attack, induced the allies to make the utmost efforts to raise the siege. The allied army consisted of 35,000 men, who attacked the French by detached columns. The French were again defeated, and driven over the Sambre, with the loss of 3,000 men. Again the French army, on the 18th of June, crossed the river and commenced the bombardment of Charleroi, for the third time. The Prince of Coburg, who commanded the allied army, now saw that the decisive battle was to be fought under the walls of Charleroi. Accordingly, the major part of the allied forces were moved in that direction. But, though his force amounted to 100,000 men, Coburg delayed till the 26th of June to attack the French army. Jourdan, who was fully aware of the importance of acquiring the fortress of Charleroi, took advantage of the respite which this delay afforded him to prosecute the siege with the utmost activity. He pushed the operations so briskly, that in a week the guns of the fortress were silenced, and every preparation was made for the assault. On the 25th of June, the commandant of the fortress sent an officer, with a letter, to treat. St. Just, who still ruled in the French camp, refused to open the letter, and sent back the officers, saying, "It is not a piece of paper, but the fortress we want." On the very evening that Coburg's army came in sight of the French lines, the fortress capitulated, and the garrison marched out. The Austrians remained ignorant of the surrender of Charleroi. The possession of this place rendered the position of the French army more secure, and the battle, that was about to be fought on the plains of Fleurus, less dangerous to them. The French army, which now amounted to 89,000 men, was posted in a semicircle around Charleroi. The Imperialists, adhering to their system of attacking the enemy at all points, divided their forces into five columns, intending to assail, at the same time, all parts of the French position. The battle commenced at day-break on the 26th of June, and raged with great vigor throughout the whole day. The first column, under the command of the Prince of Orange, attacked the left of the French, under General Montaign, and drove them back to the village of Fontaine l'Eveque. There, however, the French were reinforced by fresh troops, and, meeting the repeated charges of the enemy, succeeded in maintaining their ground and repulsing each attack. During a successful charge, however, the French horse were themselves assailed by the Austrian cuirassiers and driven back in confusion upon the infantry, who gradually lost ground, and at length were compelled to fall back to the heights in front of Charleroi. The moment was critical, for the Austrians were on the point of carrying the village of Marchiennes-au-pont, which would have intercepted the whole communications of the French army. Jourdan, however, who was alarmed at the advance of the enemy in this quarter, moved up Kleber to support his left. That intrepid general erected several batteries on the heights, and sent Bernadotte, at the head of several battalions, to the support of Montaign. The allies were thus assailed both in front and flank, and, in spite of their every effort to maintain their position, they were gradually driven back, and before four in the afternoon, all the ground they had gained in that quarter was abandoned.

During these operations on the French left, the center, where the village of Fleurus was occupied by 16,500 troops, and strongly strengthened by intrenchments, was the scene of an obstinate conflict. The village was vigorously attacked in front and flank by the allies, and the great redoubt was upon the point of being taken, when Jourdan hastened to the scene of danger with six battalions, who were formed in close columns, and checked the advance of the enemy. The French cavalry, under Dubois, made a furious charge upon the Austrian infantry. With the utmost rapidity they dashed across the plain, and plunging into the midst of the enemy, dealing death on all sides, they overthrew every thing before them. The Austrians fled in disorder, leaving in the hands of the French fifty pieces of cannon. The French cavalry, however, disordered by the impetuosity of their advance, were suddenly attacked by the Austrian cuirassiers, and were not only defeated in turn, but lost the whole artillery they had taken, and retreated back to their own lines. In the mean time the battle was raging still more violently on the left of the allies, under Beaulieu, nearer to the Sambre, at Wagne and Lambusart. After various attacks the Austrians carried the village of Lambusart, and the French troops, for the most part, were driven across the Sambre. But several French battalions under Marceau, threw themselves into Lambusart, resolved rather to perish than to abandon that post contiguous to the men; and which was an indispensable support to the extreme right of the French army. Lefebvre threw troops into Lambusart to support Marceau's efforts; and this spot became the decisive point of the battle. Beaulieu, perceiving this, directed thither a third column. Jourdan immediately dispatched the rest of his reserve to the point of danger, and the action was maintained on both sides with the greatest vigor. So brisk was the firing that the volleys could no longer be distinguished. The corn and huts of the camp took fire, and the combatants were soon fighting amid a conflagration. At length the French expelled the enemy from the village; and Lambusart remained in the hands of the Republicans. At this moment the French, at first repulsed, had succeeded in restoring the battle at all points. Kleber on the left had covered the Sambre, Morlot in the center, having fallen back to Gomlies, maintained himself there; Championnet had retaken the redoubt at Fleurus, and Lambusart remained in the hands of Lefebvre. Coburg, now for the first time, learned that Charleroi was in the possession of the French; and daring no longer to persist, ordered a general retreat. Thus terminated the battle of Fleurus, in which the allies lost about 8,000 in killed, wounded, and prisoners. The French lost between four and five thousand killed and wounded. In this memorable battle the French made use of a balloon to reconnoiter the enemy's army, an experiment which, it is said, contributed to the success of the day. The battle was fought along a semicircle of ten leagues; and was called the battle of Fleurus, though that village acted but a secondary part, because the Duke of Luxemborg had already shed a luster on that name in the time of Louis XIV.

CHARLESTON, A.D. 1776.—Charleston is the largest city of South Carolina, and is situated on a tongue of land between the rivers Ashley and Cooper, which unite immediately below the town, forming a spacious harbor, and communicating with the Atlantic at Sullivan's Island seven miles below.

The British ministers had resolved that in the campaign of 1776, a vigorous blow should be struck against the southern colonies, because they were satisfied that the friends of the English were more numerous there than at the North. The British fleet designed to act against the southern provinces, was commanded by Admiral Sir Peter Parker, and arrived at Cape Fear during the first of May, bearing many land troops, with Cornwallis, Vaughan, and several other generals. Here Parker was joined by General Clinton from New York, who, from seniority, took the supreme command. The approach of the fleet had been discovered in time to allow the Carolinians to prepare for defense, and Washington perceiving their danger, sent Generals Lee and Armstrong to aid them. The British generals, thinking that the reduction of Charleston would secure the conquest of the whole of South Carolina, resolved at once to advance against that city. But the patriots had neglected nothing to secure the means of defending South Carolina. Charleston, especially, was strongly fortified. They had constructed a strong fort on Sullivan's island; and had armed it with 36 pieces of heavy cannon, and 26 of smaller caliber. This fort so commands the channel which leads to the port, that all vessels which enter it must pass under its cannon. It was constructed of palmetto logs in sections and filled in with sand. On the 4th of June the British fleet appeared off Charleston Bar, and several hundred troops were landed on Long Island, which lies to the east of Sullivan's Island, being separated from it by a narrow creek only. The people of South Carolina were now in a state of the greatest activity. The militia of all the province were called in haste to the defense of the city; and soon an army of 6,000 men, consisting of the militia and regulars of South Carolina, and the troops of the northern colonies, under Lee and Armstrong, was concentrated in the vicinity of Charleston.

The first regiment of the South Carolina regulars, was stationed at fort Johnson, situated on James Island, three miles from Charleston, under command of Brigadier Gadsden; and the second and third regiments occupied Sullivan's Island. Colonel William Moultrie, who commanded the second regiment, was intrusted with the defence of the fort.* Colonel Thomson commanded the third regiment, which consisted chiefly of riflemen, and was stationed at the eastern extremity of Sullivan's Island. There was also a strong force at Haddrell's Point, under the immediate command of General Lee. The garrison in the city was under the command of Governor Rutledge, who made vigorous efforts to secure its defense, should the British fleet pass the forts and land their troops in the city. The most rigorous course of martial law was pursued. Valuable warehouses on the wharves were demolished, and a line of defenses was made in their places; the streets near the water were barricaded. The command of the entire army was intrusted to General Lee, to whom the troops and the people looked with confidence. Meanwhile Sir Henry Clinton was actively employed in making preparations for a combined attack by sea and land. He caused two batteries to be constructed on Long Island, opposite to those of Thompson, on Sullivan's Island. The fleet was anchored to the north of Sullivan's Island. It consisted of two ships of war, the Bristol and Experiment, of fifty guns; four frigates, the Active the Acteon, the Soleboy, of twenty-eight; the Sphinx of twenty, the Friendship of twenty-two; two smaller vessels, and a bomb-ketch called the Thunder. The English generals had arranged their plan of attack as follows: The ships were to cannonade Fort Moultrie in front, while the body of troops on Long Island, should cross the narrow arm of the sea which separates it from Sullivan's Island, under the cover of the British batteries, and assail the rear of the fort, at which point it was weaker than at ony other. At about half-past ten o'clock, on the morning of the 28th of June, Sir Peter Parker made the signal for attack on board his flag-ship, the Bristol. The ketch Thunder, protected by another vessel, took its station in front of the fort, and began to throw bombs into it, while the rest of the fleet advanced. About eleven o'clock, the Bristol, the Experiment, the Active, and the Soleboy arrived in front of the fort. At the moment they anchored, the cannon of the fort opened a burning fire upon them; and each vessel responded with a broadside. The Sphinx, the Acteon, and the Syren advanced to take a position to the west between the point of Sullivan's Island and the city, in order to sweep the interior of the fort, and to intercept all communication between the island and the main land; but by the unskillfulness of the pilots, the three vessels struck upon a shoal called the Middle Ground, where they were exposed to the fire from the fort. The Sphinx finally was set afloat, but not until after losing her bowsprit; and the Syren after receiving considerable injury was also got off. These vessels withdrew to another part of the harbor; but the Acteon was totally stranded, and could not be moved. Meanwhile, Clinton's batteries on Long Island, and some floating batteries in the creek, opened upon Thompson's battery on Sullivan's Island; and a number of British troops, under cover of their artillery, embarked in boats, to force their way through Thompson's men, and assail the fort on the west. Thompson allowed the British boats to approach within musket shot, when he ordered his men to fire. The Americans poured forth volley after volley from their rifles and artillery with such terrible effect that Clinton, perceiving that his troops could not land in the face of the enemy's fire, ordered them to return. During this time the vessels in front of the fort had kept up a furious bombardment. The Americans responded warmly, and the air fairly shook with the thunder of the cannon. In the city of Charleston the most intense anxiety prevailed; the house-tops and the steeples were crowded with spectators, and many were the prayers which were sent up for the safety and success of the noble little garrison in Fort Moultrie, who were defending themselves against such an overwhelming force. Lee saw the retreat of the British land forces with joy: in it he beheld an omen of victory. At about two o'clock the garrison ceased firing, having exhausted their ammunition. The deficiency was immediately supplied by Lee from Haddrell's Point, and the firing from the fort was renewed with greater ardor. The fire from the British ships was incessant, yet that little band in the fort (they numbered only about 350 men) remained firm, replying to the enemy's fire with an accuracy which told with fearful effect. The Thunder, after having discharged sixty bombs, was so much disabled, that she discontinued her fire; but the others maintained it with increased fury.

For ten long hours the Americans maintained the fight with the utmost bravery. Amid the tempest of balls which was hailed upon them from the fleet, they preserved their coolness, aiming with such precision that the British ships were shaken at every discharge. "While the continued thunder from the ships," says a British historian, "seemed sufficient to shake the firmness of the bravest enemy, and daunt the courage of the most veteran soldier, the return made by the fort could not fail of calling for the respect, as well as of highly incommoding the brave seamen of Britain. In the midst of the dreadful war of artillery, they stuck with the greatest firmness and constancy to their guns, fired deliberately and slowly, and took a cool and effective aim. The ships suffered accordingly; they were torn to pieces, and the slaughter was dreadful. Never did British valor shine more conspicuous, and never did our marines, in an engagement of the same kind, with any foreign enemy, experience as rude an encounter. The springs of the Bristol's cable being struck by the shot, she lay exposed in such a manner to the enemy's fire, as to be most dreadfully raked. The brave Captain Morris, after receiving a number of wounds, which would have justified a gallant man in retiring from his station, still, with a noble obstinacy, disdained to quit his duty, until his arm being at length shot off, he was carried away in a condition which did not afford a possibility of recovery. It is said that the quarter-deck of the Bristol was at one time cleared of every person but the commodore, who stood alone, a spectacle of intrepidity and firmness, which have seldom been equaled, never excelled. The others on that deck were either killed or carried down to have their wounds dressed. Nor did Captain Scott, of the Experiment, miss his share of the danger and glory, who, beside the loss of an arm, received so many other wounds, that his life was at first despaired of." But if an English writer can thus speak of the performance of the British fleet on this occasion, in what terms should an American depict the gallantry of the garrison of Fort Moultrie? Almost entirely without practice in the art of war, they held at bay the most experienced seamen of Great Britain, returning fire for fire with the coolness of tried soldiers, and displaying a courage which called forth the applause of even their enemies. Even when their ammunition was expended they preserved their firmness, and awaited the arrival of a fresh supply with calmness; and when it did arrive, returned to their guns with an ardor which finally compelled the hostile fleet to withdraw. Colonel Moultrie was the soul of the garrison, animating his men by words and action; and many were the daring feats of personal valor performed on that day. Sergeant Jasper especially distinguished himself by a deed of heroism which has rendered his name immortal. At the commencement of the action the staff of the American standard was cut away by a ball, and fell outside upon the beach. Jasper sprang after it to the ground, and amid a terrific tempest of iron, walked coolly the whole length of the fortress, and remounting the parapet, fastened the flag to a sponge-staff, and fixed it firmly upon the rampart in full view of the enemy. A cheer arose as he rejoined his companions within the bastion which reached the ears of the British seamen, who were themselves filled with admiration at the daring conduct of the American hero. Finally, the British perceiving the futility of their attack, and the disabled condition of their vessels, and finding that the troops which were to have come up from Long Island, did not make their appearance, resolved to abandon the enterprise. Parker ordered the crew of the Acteon to set fire to her and abandon her. The order was obeyed; and the seamen quitted the ship leaving her colors flying and guns loaded. The Americans immediately took possession of the deserted vessel, and secured her colors and three boat loads of stores, and then, having fired her guns at the British, abandoned her to the flames. In a short time the magazine exploded, shattering the vessel to fragments. Thus ended the battle. The entire loss of the British in killed and wounded, was 225. The Americans lost only ten killed and twenty-two wounded. Among the slain was the gallant Sergeant Macdonald, who, with his latest breath, exhorted his companions to fight on for the cause of liberty and their country.

During the night the British fleet retired, and the following morning their ships were under way two miles from the island. A few days afterward the troops on Long Island were re-embarked and the fleet set sail for New York.

SIEGE OF CHARLESTON, A.D. 1779.—In the month of September, 1778, General Lincoln was appointed commander-in-chief of the American army in the South. At the close of 1778 the belligerent forces occupied almost the same relative position that they did in the fall of 1776. The British army for two years had accomplished but little in the way of conquest. On the 3d of November, 1778, the French fleet under D'Estaing sailed for the West Indies, in order to attack the British colonies there.

The English were well aware of the weakness of the garrisons in these islands; and on the same day, Commodore Hotham, with six British ships of war, set sail from New York for the West Indies, followed shortly afterward by the whole fleet. As this movement prevented the British army and navy from uniting in any operation against the patriots at the North, it was decided that an army should be sent to the southern provinces, against which both the fleet and the army might operate. Accordingly, on the 27th of November, Sir Henry Clinton sent Colonel Campbell, from New York, with about 2,500 English and Hessian troops, upon an expedition against Georgia. Campbell was conveyed by Commodore Hyde Parker, with a squadron of five ships. At the same time Clinton sent orders to General Prevost, who commanded in the Floridas, to collect all the troops that could be spared from the defense of those provinces, and to march also against Georgia. At the close of December, Colonel Campbell arrived at the isle of Tybee, situated near the mouth of the Savannah; and on the morning of the 29th landed at Savannah. Savannah, at that time, was occupied by 1,000 American troops, under General Howe. The British at once attacked Savannah;* and the Americans defended it with the utmost valor; but, overwhelmed by numbers, they were compelled to retire. They fled in confusion, and sought refuge in South Carolina. Once securing a foothold in Georgia, the British troops soon overran the whole province.

On the 26th of December, Lincoln marched from Charleston, with about 1,200 men, for the Georgia frontier; but on their way he met the Americans flying from Savannah. He accordingly came to a halt, and established his head-quarters at Purysburg, on the northern bank of the Savannah. At the close of January, 1779, he was joined by General Ashe, with 1,100 North Carolinians; and he set at once about recruiting and organizing an army, in the vicinity of Purysburg. Meanwhile, General Prevost joined Campbell, at Savannah, with 700 British regulars. Learning that Lincoln, with the main body of his army, was far up the river, near Augusta, Prevost resolved to attempt the capture of Charleston. Early in April, with about 2,000 British and Hessians, and a strong body of Tories and Indians, he crossed the Savannah, at Purysburg, and advanced along the coast toward Charleston. Lincoln, to guard against any such movement on the part of the enemy, had stationed General Moultrie, with 1,500 men, in front of Prevost, in order to dispute his passage across the Savannah; but the militia, under Moultrie, surprised and dismayed at the number of the enemy, fell back, on the approach of Prevost, toward Charleston. As soon as Lincoln was convinced of the reality of Prevost's designs, he detached Colonel Harris, with 300 cavalry, to reinforce Moultrie; and marched, with the balance of his army, in pursuit of Prevost. At the same time, Governor Rutledge, who had been at Orangeburg, on a recruiting expedition, advanced, from that place, with 600 men. Thus four different forces were pressing toward Charleston. Rutledge, with his recruits; Moultrie, pursued by Prevost; Prevost, pursued by Lincoln, and the 300 cavalry, under Colonel Harris. On learning of the threatened danger, the people of Charleston made all the preparations for defense which the shortness of the time allowed. All the houses in the suburbs were burned, and a line of fortifications was thrown up across the neck, armed with several cannon. The garrison of Fort Moultrie, under Colonel Marion, was strengthened, and the battery on Haddrell's Point was duly manned. All these preparations consumed three days, and it was fortunate for the people of Charleston that Prevost, in his hesitancy, halted a sufficient length of time to allow them to complete them. As Prevost advanced through the country, his soldiers applied the torch, and plundered the Whigs, without mercy. On the evening of the 9th of May, he arrived on the south side of the river Ashley; and on that and the day following, Rutledge, Harris, and Moultrie reached Charleston, with their respective forces. The Count Pulaski, with the dragoons of his legion, was at Haddrell's Point, and the presence of all these troops filled the inhabitants of the city with joy. The Americans passed the whole night under arms; and the whole city was illuminated. On the morning of the 11th of May, Prevost with 900 regulars, crossed the Ashley, and advanced toward the fortifications on Charleston neck.

Approaching within cannon-shot, the British general summoned the town to surrender. He at first received no response. Count Pulaski, in the course of the forenoon, entered the town with his legion. At about twelve o'clock, he sallied forth at the head of his infantry, and fell upon the advanced guard o the British. But the British received him with so much firmness that he was repulsed, and a great number of his men were killed, wounded, or made prisoners. Pulaski, himself, barely escaped to the American lines. The British now advanced toward the enemy's works; but when within a mile of the American lines, their progress was checked by a brisk cannonade. The British general renewed his demand for a surrender; and proposals were made on both sides which were not accepted. The negotiation was continued throughout the who day; neither party accepting the proposals of the other; and finally Prevost, finding that the Americans would not submit to his conditions, and momentarily expecting the approach of Lincoln, withdrew during the night and retreated toward Georgia. And thus terminated the second attempt of the British to gain possession of the city of Charleston. The battle of Stono Ferry soon followed; but although a victory to the invaders, it did not, nevertheless, aid them in their operations against the capital of South Carolina.

Second Siege of Charleston, A.D. 1780.—On the 25th of December, 1779, Sir Henry Clinton, with a land army of 5,000 men, set sail from New York for the South, leaving the Hessian general, Knyphausen, in command in that city. The British fleet was under Admiral Arbuthnot, and was manned by 2,000 seamen. The fleet encountered many heavy storms on its passage, in one of which a transport vessel, carrying heavy seige pieces and horses, was lost. The fleet finally arrived on the coast of Georgia in January, 1780, and on the 10th of February advanced against Charleston, S. C. On the 11th Clinton's troops were disembarked upon the islands, on the shores of the Editeo inlet, thirty miles below the city; and the British general commenced making preparations to besiege the place. He performed his operations with so much tardiness, however, that the Americans had time to put Charleston in a state of defense. General Lincoln, with about 1,400 men was in Charleston; and upon receiving intelligence of the arrival of the British fleet he was about to evacuate the place, and retreat with his feeble army into the interior. But the tardiness of the enemy caused him to change his purpose; and, aided by Governor Rutledge, at once set about making preparations for a vigorous defense. He first strengthened the works upon Charleston neck by planting new cannon and mortars, and throwing up a trench across the neck from the Ashley to the Cooper. The works when completed, on the land side, consisted of a chain of redoubts, lines, and batteries, extending across the neck, from the Ashley to the Cooper, and covered by an artillery of eighty cannons and mortars. A trench filled with water was also constructed from river to river. The works were also protected by two rows of abbatis, the trees being buried slanting in the earth, so that their heads faced outward, forming a sort of frieze-work against the assailants. These works protected only the land side of the city. On the two sides which front the rivers, the Americans erected numerous batteries, constructed of palmetto wood and earth. Fort Moultrie, on Sullivan's Island, and the redoubts at Haddrell's Point, were strengthened and well manned. The garrison of Fort Moultrie was intrusted to the command of Captain Pinckney. All parts of the shore where it was possible to land, were secured by strong pallisades. The defenses on shore were supported by a considerable fleet in the harbor, consisting of eight American, and one French, frigate, besides several smaller vessels, chiefly galleys. These were stationed at a narrow pass between Sullivan's Island and the Middle Ground. The citizens of Charleston were greatly alarmed at the approaching storm; and wishing to save the little army of Lincoln, earnestly advised him to evacuate the place; but the American general, expecting reinforcements, and confident in the strength of his fortifications, resolved to maintain a siege in the hope that he might keep the enemy at bay until succor should arrive.

When Admiral Arbuthnot advanced with his ships to Charleston bar, the American flotilla, abandoning its station, and leaving Fort Moultrie to its own fortune, retired to Charleston; where most of the ships, with a number of merchant vessels, being fitted with chevaux-de-frize on their decks, were sunk to obstruct the channel of Cooper's river, where it flows between the left part of the town and a low sand-bank called Shute's Folly.

Thus, with the exception of Fort Moultrie, there remained nothing to prevent the British fleet from entering the harbor, to cooperate with the land forces. In this manner, the inhabitants prepared to defend themselves valiantly against the attack of the enemy; but they still founded their hope on the succor of their neighbors of North Carolina and Virginia. As soon as Lincoln had completed all his preparations, the 29th of March, having left a detachment to guard his magazines at Wappoo Cut, he passed the Ashley river without opposition, twelve miles above Charleston. Immediately after his debarkation, he sent a body of infantry and cavalry to occupy the great road, and scour the country to within cannon-shot from that place. The army then followed, and took post across the isthmus, behind the city at the distance of a mile and a half. From this moment, the garrison lost all communication with the land; the enemy being masters of both sides of the Ashley, there remained no way open for succors of men and provisions but across the Cooper on the left. The royalists had soon transferred to their camp, through the assistance of Captain Elphinstone, with his boats and armed galleys, all the heavy artillery, stores, and baggage. On the night of the 1st of April, they broke ground within eight hundred yards of the American works; and in a week, their guns were mounted in battery. In the mean time, Admiral Arbuthnot had made his dispositions for passing the bar, in order to gain the entrance of Charleston harbor. The frigates, as drawing less water, passed without any difficulty; but the ships of the line could not be got over till after having been lightened of their artillery, munitions, and even their water; the whole squadron passed over on the 20th of March. Arbuthnot came to anchor at Five Fathom Hole; he had still, however, to surmount, before he could take an active part in the siege of Charleston, the obstacle of Fort Moultrie, occupied by Pinckney. The British admiral, taking advantage of a southerly wind and flood tide, weighed anchor on the 9th of April, and passing it under full sail, took his station within cannon-shot of the city near James Island. Pinckney had opened all his artillery on the British fleet at the moment of its passage; but such was the rapidity of the vessels, that the fire did them but little damage. The British lost about thirty in killed and wounded, and set fire to and abandoned a transport. The place was thus already invested by sea and land, and the batteries being ready to be opened, Clinton and Arbuthnot sent a joint summons to Lincoln, representing the fatal consequences of a cannonade and storm, and stating the present as the only favorable opportunity for preserving the lives and property of the inhabitants. The American general answered spiritedly that he was resolved to defend himself. The English immediately commenced their fire; the Americans replied warmly from the town and fortifications, and a terrible cannonade from both parties was maintained from that time until the 20th. But the British had the advantage of a more numerous artillery, particularly in mortars, which made great ravages. The pioneers and miners, under the direction of Moncrieffe, pushed forward the works with great rapidity. The second parallel was already completed, and furnished with its batteries, and every thing promised the English an approaching victory; but the Americans had assembled a corps on the upper part of the Cooper river, at a place called Monk's Corner. They were under the command of General Huger; and from that position, they could invest the besiegers on their rear, revictual Charleston, and in case of extremity, enable the garrison to evacuate the place, and retreat with safety into the country. Clinton, therefore, detached 1,400 men, under Lieutenant Colonel Webster, to disperse this body of republicans. Colonel Webster was accompanied by Tarleton and Ferguson. The American camp was established on the left bank of the Cooper; their cavalry was stationed on the right bank, having passed the river on Biggin's bridge. This position was strong, the bridge being accessible only by a causeway, through an impracticable morass; but the Americans were off their guard, having neglected to post videttes, and to reconnoiter the environs. Moreover, their dispositions were defective: they had placed the cavalry in front, and the infantry in rear. The English arrived unexpectedly at three in the morning; their attack was impetuous; it routed the Americans in a few instants; all perished save those who sought safety by flight. General Huger and the Colonels Washington and Jamieson, threw themselves into the morass, and were fortunate enough to escape under cover of the darkness. Four hundred horses fell into the hands of the victors, with many carriages loaded with arms, clothing, and stores. The royalists took possession of the bridge, and soon after secured another passage further down, and overrun the country on the left side of the river, particularly the district of St. Thomas.

In this manner, the besieged were deprived also of the Cooper river, and Charleston found itself completely inclosed. The garrison was not judged sufficiently strong to warrant any opposition to this enterprise. The Americans attempted only to fortify a point on the left bank, called Point Lamprey; but Webster's corps being considerably reinforced, and Lord Cornwallis having taken the command on that side of the river, they found themselves constrained to abandon this last post. The British foraged without obstacle, prevented the assembling of the militia, and cut off every species of succor. A few days after, Tarleton, having advanced with incredible celerity upon the banks of the Santee river, attacked and routed another body of republican cavalry, commanded by Colonel Buford. Adverse fortune continued to pursue the republicans. Admiral Arbuthnot landed on Sullivan's Island a body of seamen and marines, and began to inclose Fort Moultrie. The garrison, seeing the impossibility of relief, surrendered on the 7th of May. Thus Fort Moultrie, which four years before had repulsed all the forces of Admiral Parker, fell, without firing a shot, into the hands of the royalists. Meanwhile, the besiegers had completed their third parallel, which they carried close to the wet trench, and by a sap pushed to the dam, which supplied it with water on the right, they had drained it in several places to the bottom. They hastened to arm this parallel with its batteries, and to complete the traverses and other mines of communication. Now, fully prepared to storm the place by land and sea, Clinton again summoned Lincoln to surrender. A negotiation was opened, but the American commander required not only that the citizens and militia should be free with respect to their persons, but that they should also be permitted to sell their property, and retire with the proceeds wherever they might see fit; the English general refused these conditions. He insisted that the whole garrison should surrender at discretion, and as to property, he would agree to nothing further than that it should be given up to pillage. The conferences were broken off, and hostilities renewed. The fortifications were battered with violence by the heavy artillery; bombs and carcasses overwhelmed the town, and lighted frequent conflagrations; the Hessian marksmen felled all that showed themselves at the embrasures or on the ramparts. Neither shelter nor retreat remained to the besieged; every thing indicated that the moment of surrender must soon arrive. The fire of the place was already become languid; its artillery was in part dismounted, and its best cannoneers either killed or out of service; and the English had pushed on their works till they issued in the ditch of the place. The city was menaced with an assault, discord began to break out within; the timid, and those attached to the royal party, murmured aloud; they conjured Lincoln not to expose to inevitable destruction so rich, so important a city. They represented that the stock of provision was nearly exhausted; that the engineers considered it impossible to sustain a storm; in a word, that there was not the least way of safety left open. In so terrible an extremity, Lincoln divested himself of his natural inflexibility, and on the 12th of May the capitulation was signed. The garrison was allowed some of the honors of war, but they were not to uncase their colors, nor their drums to beat a British march. The continental troops and seamen were to keep their baggage, and to remain prisoners of war until they were exchanged. The militia were to be permitted to return to their respective homes, as prisoners on parole, and while they adhered to their parole, were not to be molested by British troops in person or property. The citizens of all sorts to be considered as prisoners on parole, and to hold their property on the same terms with the militia. The officers of the navy and army to retain their servants, swords, pistols, and their baggage unsearched. As to General Lincoln, he was to have liberty to send a ship to Philadelphia with his dispatches*

At noon, on the 12th of May, the Americans marched out with the Turk's march and piled their arms. General Leslie immediately marched in and took possession of the town. For forty days they had maintained a gallant and desperate defense, but, unable to cope with the superior arms and numbers of the enemy, they finally were forced to surrender. Although the utmost valor and skill was displayed on both sides during this siege, yet it was not a bloody one. Both parties suffered nearly equally. The Americans lost, exclusive of the inhabitants of the town, not bearing arms, 92 killed, and 148 wounded. The British lost 76 killed, and 189 wounded. About 5,000 prisoners fell into the hands of the victors, together with 400 cannon, and a considerable quantity of ammunition. Two American frigates, and two French vessels, were also taken possession of by the English. The victory of Charleston was of the utmost importance to the British; it paralyzed the efforts of the patriots at the South, and it was confidently believed that the war was now decided in favor of the royalists; but subsequent events proved that the spark of liberty, although dimmed, was still alive and ready to burst forth into an unextinguishable flame.

CHAMPAUBERT, A.D. 1814.—This village is in the department of Marne, in France, 27 miles west of Châlons. Here, February 10th, 1814, the advanced guard of the Russians and Prusians, received a check in their advance against Paris, from the troops of Napoleon. The allies were totally defeated with a loss of 3,000 men, killed, wounded, and prisoners, besides 12 guns and 17 caissons. The French lost 600 men in killed and wounded.

CHATEAU GOUTHIER, A.D. 1793.—The French republican army were greatly astonished to find, after the signal defeat of the Vendean army at Cholet, that they had again crossed the Loire and were making preparations for another battle. General Lechelle, after much hesitation, concluded to divide his army into two columns, cross the river at different points, and then unite for the pursuit of the royalists. Lechelle found them occupyiug the town of Laval, and immediately commenced an attack. Larochejaquelin flew through the ranks of his army encouraging them in every possible manner, and assuring them of success. Leseure, one of the wounded commanders, insisted upon being carried in a litter through the ranks, and sharing their dangers. Animated by these circumstances, the royalists advanced to the combat in close columns. Stofflet, by a vigorous charge with a small body of cavalry, took some pieces of cannon, which were instantly turned against the enemy; Larochejaquelin pressed on in front, while another column attacked them in the rear. The Vendeans were again brought in conflict with the famous garrison of Mayence, but despair gave them courage, and never had they fought with such enthusiastic valor. After a desperate struggle the republicans began to give way, the royalists were close upon them and drove them into the town of Château Gonthier. Here their progress was arrested for a moment by the cannon of the enemy, but Larochejaquelin captured the guns and pursued the enemy through the town with great slaughter. In this battle the garrison of Mayence, which had inflicted such losses on the Vendeans, was almost entirely destroyed; the total loss of the republicans was 12,000 men, and 19 pieces of cannon, and of their whole army, hardly 7,000 could be rallied after the action. General Lechelle was so affected by his great discomfiture, that he relinquished his command and retired to Tours, where he afterward died of anxiety and chagrin.

CHERRY VALLEY, A.D. 1778.—Cherry Valley, in Otsego county, N. Y., witnessed, on the 10th of November, 1778, a scene of bloodshed and cruelty, the very contemplation of which causes the soul to shrink with horror. Led on by the notorious Walter Butler, 700 Tories and Indians fell furiously upon the peaceful and flourishing settlement, and ruthlessly murdered its inhahitants. Women, children, old men, and invalids, all fell under the murderous stroke of the cruel tomahawk of the Indian, or the no less cruel bayonet of bloodthirsty white men. Of 48 who were slain, 32 were women and children. The soul sickens at the recital of the horrors of that day. Volumes have been written of the sufferings of the inhabitants of Tryon county, as that part of the country was called during the revolutionary war, but the limits of the present volume forbid our dwelling upon them.* After the massacre, the village was plundered and set on fire; and the successful marauders marched away in triumph, bearing with them 40 prisoners.

CHERUBUSCO, A.D. 1847.—The village of Cherubusco, in Mexico, is situated on the main road from San Augustine to the city of Mexico. The distance from San Augustine to the city is nine miles. The Mexicans, in their endeavor to stop the progress of the American army toward their capital on that road, had placed their first fortification in a village called San Antonio, about two miles and a half from San Augustine. Two miles and a quarter further on toward the city, they had placed a second in the village of Cherubusco, from which village the road was opened free of obstructions to the city gates. On the 18th of August, 1847, the American troops, under General Scott, established themselves in and near the village of San Augustine. From this village two roads conducted to Mexico; the first on the right, led through the villages of San Antonio and Cherubusco; the second diverging to the left, toward Contreras,† passed through the villages of San Angel and Coyocan. The Mexicans had strongly fortified these roads; and the American general determined to force his way over both. While the left wing of the American army was assaulting the Mexican position at Contreras, the right, under General Worth, was to open the main road to Mexico, by carrying the position at San Antonio with the bayonet, and then pushing forward, to assail the enemy at Cherubusco, at which place they were to be joined by the left wing, as it was General Scott's intention to move forward to the assault of Cherubusco with his whole army. The division of General Worth, on the 20th, advanced to San Antonio. The Mexicans made but a slight resistance; they had heard of the fall of Contreras, and affrighted, they speedily retreated along the causeway toward Cherubusco. The Americans closely pursued the fugitives.

In the mean time the left wing of the American army, having carried the Mexican position at Contreras, advanced toward Cherubusco. The route taken by General Scott from Contreras, was along the road from that village through the village of San Angel, and thence to Coyocan, which was one mile distant from Cherubusco. Thus, Worth's division approached Cherubusco, by the great causeway of San Antonio leading to Mexico, while Scott's advanced against the same village by the road from San Angel. The Mexicans had strongly defended both these approaches. In the rear of the village of Cherubusco is a wide and deep canal, cutting the San Antonio causeway, and continuing over the plain perpendicularly to the road, a long distance to the right. The causeway crossed the canal by a bridge, at the head of which was constructed a field-work, which commanded the main approach by the causeway, and that also by its left flank. The works were defended by four guns, two being in front, and two being on its left flank. Along the banks of the canal extend dykes, which were constructed in ages gone by to guard against inundation, and which were now for the distance of a mile and a half to the left of the tête-du-pont, at the bridge, converted into ramparts, and occupied by dense masses of Mexican infantry. The ground in front of these dykes was level, affording no protection to the assailants. To the right of the tête-du-pont, about three hundred yards from it, and somewhat in advance of it, on the road debouching into the causeway from Coyocan, the Mexicans had established another fortified position, commanding the approach from that direction. This work—the fortification of San Pablo—consisted of a stone church that served as a sort of citadel, and two walls one within the other. This work was open on the rear and on the right flank, that portion of it not having been completed. The flat roof of the church and the steeple afforded excellent positions for marksmen, who could see every one who approached, while they themselves were covered by parapets and walls. The nature of the ground on the Mexican right, was such as it has been described on the left. This position was to be assailed by General Scott. The Mexicans had, besides the seven pieces of artillery in the two fortified positions, various other batteries of movable pieces on the ground. Santa Anna's troops, all told, numbered about 25,000 men: long lines of infantry and cavalry being drawn up on the causeways, and many detachments occupying houses—every house in itself being a fortification—on both sides of the road, and the cross dykes that cut up the fields. Both divisions of the American army, numbered, together, about 8,000 men. Scott, after arriving at Coyocan—one mile from Cherubusco—halted to make a hasty reconnoissance. He then despatched General Twiggs, with Smith's brigade, less the Rifles, and Captain Taylor's field battery to attack the fortified position of San Pablo; following the movement soon afterward himself. He then directed General Pierce, with his brigade to follow another road, to the left, with a view to attack the enemy's right and rear, and at the same time favor Twiggs's movement. He subsequently reinforced this brigade with that of Shields's, composed of the South Carolina and New York regiments. Shields, being Pierce's senior, assumed the command of the whole. Before the close of the action Shields, was further reinforced by the Rifles, and by Captain Sibley's company of dragoons. Twiggs was soon hotly engaged, and Taylor's battery which had imprudently been placed in an exposed position, was disabled by the enemy's heavier metal, and compelled to retire. Shields advancing about a mile toward the right and rear of the enemy, on the road leading in that direction, left the road, at this point, and bent his course more toward the causeway, passing through a heavy cornfield, and reaching a position in a swampy meadow, in the rear of the enemy. His object was to penetrate the causeway, if possible, and attack the enemy in rear, or intercept their retreat when they should be driven from their position in front by Worth and Twiggs. 4,000 of the enemy's infantry were drawn up on the causeway, covered by some 3,000 cavalry extending to the right. Shields attacked the Mexican line in front. The American line advanced steadily, opening their fire as they approached the enemy. The Mexicans discharged incessant and destructive volleys upon the approaching line; but the Americans, although forced by greatly superior numbers, maintained the battle with the utmost vigor.

In the mean time Worth approached Cherubusco by the San Antonio road. As he reached the tête-du-pont at the bridge, the enemy opened first the artillery and then the musketry upon the advancing columns. And now a tremendous roar of artillery and musketry was heard from one end of the Mexican line to the other, extending more than a mile. Worth attacked the tête-du-pont and the Mexican infantry along the dykes simultaneously.

After an obstinate and bloody conflict with greatly superior forces, the Americans drove the enemy from their favorable position upon the dykes; and carried the têtes-du-pont at the point of the bayonet; men and officers rushing pell-mell, into the embrasures and over the walls, without the help of ladders. No sooner had they gained the works, than they seized upon the enemy's artillery, and turned it upon San Pablo, where Twiggs was still held in check. At the same time Duncan's battery, which had been kept in reserve, was hurriedly brought up to the front, and opened also upon San Pablo. The effect was speedy and decisive. The devoted fortress, which up to this moment had not in the least slacked its fire, having now its artillerists driven from their guns, and their sharpshooters from the church-top and steeple, succumbed at once, and hung out a white flag; upon which Worth ordered the fire to be discontinued, and dispatched an officer to accept the surrender. In the mean time, Shields, with his men, was bravely contending against the enemy; but thus far without success. But hearing the shouts of Worth's victorious troops, the Mexicans on the causeway wavered, and Shields, with the remnants of his gallant regiment, rushed forward, and gained the causeway, just as Worth's column, in hot pursuit of the flying enemy, came up. He fell into their ranks, and joined in the pursuit. The Mexicans, at all points, were now flying toward the city of Mexico. The pursuit was continued for about two miles, when General Scott caused it to be discontinued. The Americans lost in this bloody battle, 700 men, killed and wounded The Mexican loss was but little, if any, superior to that of the Americans, owing to their having fought behind defenses, and to their wonderful speed of foot, when routed. A large number of prisoners were taken in San Pablo—the Mexicans having retreated from the tête-du-pont into that work. Among others, were captured some 27 deserters from the American army; most of whom had deserted during the war, and entered voluntarily into the enemy's ranks. The penalty of death awaited them. "These wretches," says General Worth, in speaking of these miscreants, "served the guns—the use of which they had been taught in our own service—and with fatal effect upon the persons of their former comrades."—Semmes.

CHIPPEWA.—The village of Chippewa, in Canada, is situated on the Chippewa, near the confluence of that river with the Niagara river, about two miles above the Falls of Niagara.

On the third day of July, 1814, the American forces, destined for the invasion of Upper Canada, having been concentrated at Buffalo during the winter, for that purpose, crossed the Niagara river. The army was commanded by Brigadier General Brown, and consisted of two regular brigades, commanded by Scott and Ripley, and a brigade of volunteers and militia, with a few Indians, under General Porter. The army effected a landing on the Canada shore without opposition, and made themselves masters of Fort Erie, a strong fortification on the banks of the river, nearly opposite Buffalo, without firing a shot. The main British army, under General Riall, lay at Chippewa, about twenty miles further down the river. Scott, heading the advance, with his brigade, chasing before him, for sixteen miles, a detachment of the enemy, commanded by the Marquis of Tweedsdale, pressed on toward the British position at Chippewa. At dark, the marquis crossed the Chippewa, behind which lay the British army. This river enters the Niagara nearly at right angles. Two miles further up, Steed's creek joins the Niagara also, and behind it General Brown drew up the American forces. The two miles of space between the streams is an open plain, skirted on one side by the Niagara river, and on the other by a forest On the morning of the 5th, General Brown resolved to advance and attack the British in their position. The latter had determined on a similar movement, against the Americans, and unbeknown to each other, the one prepared to cross the bridge of Chippewa, and the other that of Steed's creek. The battle commenced in the woods on the left, and an irregular fight was kept up for a long time, between Porter's brigade, and the Canadian militia stationed there. The latter were at length driven back to the Chippewa, when General Riall advanced to their support. Before this formidable array, the American militia, notwithstanding the noble efforts of General Porter to steady their courage, broke and fled. General Brown immediately hastened to the scene, saying to Scott, as he passed on, "The enemy is advancing, you will have a fight." The latter, ignorant of the forward movement of Riall, had just put his brigade in marching order, to cross the creek for a drill on the level plain beyond. But as the head of the column reached the bank, he saw the British army drawn up in beautiful array, in the open field, on the further side, while a battery of nine pieces stood in point-blank range of the bridge over which he was to cross. Swiftly yet beautifully the corps of Scott swept over the bridge and deployed under the steady fire of the battery, The first and second battalions, under Majors Leavenworth and McNeil, took position in front of the left and center of the enemy, while the third, under Jessup, obliqued to the left, to attack their right, stationed in the woods, and which threatened to outflank the American line. It was a bright, hot July afternoon, the dusty plain presented no obstacle behind which either party could find shelter, and the march of the steady battalions over its surface, led on by bands of music, playing national airs, presented one of those stirring scenes which make man forget the carnage that is to follow. The heavy monotonous thunder of Niagara rolled on over the discharges of artillery, while its clouds of spray, rising from the strife of waters, and glittering in the sunbeams, contrasted strangely with the sulphurous clouds that heaved heavenward from the conflict of men beneath.

Both armies halting, firing, and advancing in turn, continued to approach until they stood within eighty yards of each other. Scott, who had been maneuvering to get the two battalions of Leavenworth and McNeil in an oblique position to the British line, at length succeeded, the two farthest extremities being nearest the enemy. Thus the American army stood like an obtuse triangle of which the British line formed the base.

While in this position, Scott, wishing to pass from one extremity to the other, and being in too great a hurry to go back of the lines around the triangle, cut directly across, taking the cross fire of both armies, as he spurred in a fierce gallop through the smoke. A loud cheer rolled along the American line as they saw this daring act of their commander. Riding up to Towson's battery, he cried out, "A little more to the left, captain, the enemy is there." This gallant officer was standing amid his guns enveloped in smoke, and had not observed that the British had advanced so far that his fire fell behind them. Instantly discovering his mistake, he changed the direction of his two remaining pieces, and poured a raking, destructive fire through the enemy's ranks, blowing up an ammunition wagon, which spread destruction on every side. At this critical moment, Scott rode up to McNeil's battalion, his face blazing with excitement, and shouted, "The enemy say that we are good at long shot, but can not stand the cold iron. I call upon the Eleventh instantly to give the lie to that slander—Charge."

Just as the order "charge" escaped his lips, came that destructive fire from Towson's battery. The thunder of those guns at that critical moment, was to Scott's young and excited heart like the shout of victory, and rising in his stirrups, and swinging his sword aloft, he cried, CHARGE—CHARGE THE RASCALS!" With a high and ringing cheer, the gallant battalion moved with leveled bayonets on the foe. Taking the close and deadly volleys without shrinking—never for a moment losing its firm formation—it struck the British line obliquely, crumbling it to pieces, as it swept on, and making awful havoc in its passage.

Leavenworth did the same on the right with like success, while Jessup in the woods, ignorant how the battle was going in the plain, but finding himself outflanked, ordered his troops "to support arms and advance." They cheerfully obeyed, and in the face of a most deadly fire, charged home on the enemy, and obtaining a better position poured in their volleys with tremendous effect. From the moment these charges commenced till the enemy fled, the field presented a frightful spectacle. The two armies were in such close proximity, and the volleys were so incessant and destructive, and the uproar so terrific, that orders could no longer be heard. But through his two aids, Lieutenants Worth and Watts, who galloped to and fro, and by their presence and gestures, transmitted his orders in the midst of the hottest fire, Scott caused every movement to be executed with precision, and not an error was committed from first to last.

The British fled over the Chippewa, tore up the bridge, and retired to their encampment.

In this battle, the American troops actually engaged numbered 1,900. The British were 2,100 strong. The British lost 138 killed, and 365 wounded and missing. The Americans lost 68 killed, and 267 wounded and missing.

General Brown, when he found that Scott had the whole British army on his hands, hurried back to bring up Ripley's brigade, but Scott's evolutions and advance had been so rapid, and his blow so sudden and deadly, that the field was swept before he could arrive. The Americans rested but two days after the battle, and then advanced over the Chippewa, Scott's brigade leading. The British retreated to Burlington Heights, near the head of Lake Ontario.—Headley's Second War with England.

CHOLET, 1793.—On the 15th of October, the republican army of France entered the city of Cholet, on the Moine, unmolested. The Vendeans, determined to repel the invaders, finally resolved to make one desperate effort to crush all the republican forces in the vicinity of Cholet. Two days after this resolution, the action took place, and was contested in a terrible manner on both sides. The forces were nearly equal, the royalists having 40,000 men, and the republicans 41,000. The latter had also thirty pieces of artillery; and their infantry was composed of some of the best troops in France. On the 17th of October, at three o'clock in the morning, the army was awakened by the booming of cannon, and hastened to headquarters to hear grand mass from the curate of the village, before the battle. The service was performed by torchlight; the priest, with great eloquence, beseeched them to fight bravely for their God, their king, and their children, and concluded by giving absolution to the armed multitude. The black darkness, the roaring of cannon which often interrupted the discourse, and the thoughts of what was soon to occur, filled all hearts with gloomy forebodings. The action commenced at ten o'clock in the morning. The republicans, under General Lechelle, were drawn up in three divisions; the garrison of Mayence, with the cavalry, forming the reserve. Stofflet commanded the left of the royalists, D'Elbée and Bonchamps the center, and Larochejaquelin the right. The Vendeans were destitute of artillery, and marched in a line in close column for the first time. Stofflet and Henri de Larochejaquelin attacked the center of the enemy, routed it by the fury of the onset, and drove them in confusion back into the town of Cholet, where the artillery was captured. The battle seemed to be lost, and the republicans, panic-stricken by the furious attack of the royalists, were flying on all sides, when Lechelle, as a last resource, ordered the cavalry to charge, and his reserve garrison to advance.

Again the battle was commenced with renewed vigor, the cavalry charged from right to left through the center of the Vendeans, and at the same time the iron bands of Mayence stopped the pursuit of the victors. In a moment the aspect of the action was changed; the royalists, seized with a sudden panic, fled in all directions, and the joy of victory was soon followed by the terrors of defeat. At this point Larochejaquelin, D'Elbée, and Bonchamps, collected 200 of the bravest troops, and by their heroic resistance drove back the victorious squadrons of the enemy, and gave time to many of the royalists to escape. D'Elbée and Bonchamps were mortally wounded in the middle of the charge. Larochejaquelin succeeded with much difficulty in collecting 5,000 men, and also removed the remains of his gallant companions to Beaupreau, while the rest of the army fled toward the Loire.

This defeat proved highly injurious to the Vendean cause. The republicans followed up their victory with the most energetic measures; the towns of Cholet and Beaupreau were burned to the ground, the inhabitants were indiscriminately butchered by the infuriated soldiery, and the trophies of victory were raised upon the smoking and blood-stained ruins. The retreat of the Vendean army was marked with horrors rarely paralleled. No less than 80,000 men, the half of whom were unarmed, hastened, with flying footsteps to the little valley which extends from the heights of St. Florent to the margin of the Loire. All, eager to put the river between themselves and the dreaded enemy, men, women, and children, crowded together on the shore of the river, whose broad bosom bore only twenty-five boats with which the frantic multitude might cross; but with these feeble means, by the coolness and intrepidity of the commander, the whole assemblage were ferried over the river before the republicans could reach the Loire. The entire baggage, however, being abandoned, fell into the hands of the enemy. See Château Gothier.

CHRYSTLER'S FIELD, A.D. 1813.—On the 11th of November, 1813, 1,500 American troops, under General Boyd, were attacked by about 1,000 British regulars under Colonel Morrison, at a place called Chrystler's Field, near Chrystler's Point, on the river St. Lawrence, about twenty miles above Cornwall. The conflict was obstinate and bloody. At length the British retired to their camp, and the Americans were contented to remain in their original position. The Americans lost about 200 in killed and wounded. General Covington was shot through the body while leading his men to the charge. The British loss was much less.

CITATE, A.D. 1854.—The town of Citate in European Turkey, was, on the 16th of January, 1854, the scene of a battle between the Turkish army under the Pachas Achmet and Ismail, and the Russians under General Fishback. The Turkish army consisted of 10,000 regular infantry, under Achmet and Ismail in person; 4,000 cavalry under Mustapha Bey; and 1,000 Bashi-Bazouks under Colonel Skender Bey. At nine o'clock on the morning of the 6th of June, these troops attacked the Russians in Citate, and gained a complete victory. They lost in the battle 900 men in killed and wounded. The Russians lost about 2,500 killed and a proportionate number wounded.

CIUDAD RODRIGO, A.D. 1810.—Ciudad Rodrigo is a city in Spain in the province of Salamanca. It is built on an eminence on the right bank of the river Agueda, which is here crossed by a stupendous bridge of seven arches.

The possession of the fortress of Ciudad Rodrigo has always been considered of paramount importance by an army carrying on hostilities on the Spanish and Portuguese frontiers.

Marshal Massena arrived to take the command of the French army on the 1st June, 1810, and finding himself at the head of 86,000 effective men, he at once resolved on active operations, and determined to besiege Ciudad Rodrigo, which was garrisoned by 4,000 Spaniards. Accordingly he invested the place with 20,000 men, and on the 25th June, the investment being complete, the breaching batteries opened their fire upon the place.

Lord Wellington having received information of these events, immediately hastened to the relief of the Spaniards, and took post on the Agueda. But finding the siege operations were covered by an army exceeding 60,000 men, and as he had only half that number of troops under his command, he did not feel justified in attacking the French under such disadvantageous circumstances. He, accordingly, slowly retired toward the frontier of Portugal, leaving this city to its inevitable fate.

The French, finding themselves unmolested in their operations, determined to press the siege with vigor. Such was the effect of their fire that on the 10th of July several large breaches in the walls were practicable. On the next day the governor, after having exhausted his means of defense, surrendered with 4,000 men and 125 guns.

In the month of December, 1811, Wellington conceived the design of besieging this fortress, which was garrisoned by French troops. In order the more effectually to deceive the enemy, as to his real intentions, he sent orders to General Hill to resume the offensive in Estremadura. Soult, imagining that he was about to attack Badajoz, assembled his troops for the protection of that fortress, thus leaving Wellington undisturbed in his operations against Ciudad Rodrigo.

The British troops, having previously constructed a portable bridge, laid it across the Agueda, and made preparations for crossing over on the evening of the 6th of January, 1812, but a heavy fall of snow prevented the troops from moving till the 8th, when the light division crossed, and immediately commenced the investment of the fortress. In the evening, an advanced redoubt situated on the Tesan, was carried by assault.

The first parallel was established the next day, and, a few days after, the convent of Santa Cruz was stormed. The garrison now became alarmed at the progress of the besiegers, and on the evening of the 14th, made a vigorous sortie, which was repulsed with considerable difficulty. However, the progress of the works was by no means interrupted by it. After the repulse of this sortie, the fortified convent of San Francesco was carried by escalade by the 46th regiment, and about half past four o'clock, just as night had thrown its shady mantle over all things terrestrial, the breaching batteries opened a terrific fire upon the fortress, and 30 heavy guns vomited forth their destructive missiles against the walls. The scene was at the same time terrible and magnificent. It is thus described in the eloquent words of an eye-witness (Colonel Napier): "Then was beheld a spectacle at once fearful and sublime. The enemy replied to the assailants' fire with more than 50 pieces; the bellowing of 80 large guns shook the ground far and wide; the smoke rested in heavy volumes on the battlements of the place, or curled in light wreaths about the numerous spires; the shells, hissing through the air, seemed fiery serpents leaping from the darkness; the walls crashed to the stroke of the bullets, and the distant mountains, returning the sound, appeared to moan over the falling city."

were exposed, they made a sensible impression on the defenses of the place; the walls came down in large masses, and by continued perseverance, two large breaches were practicable, on the morning of the 19th. As yet, none of the parapets had been injured, and this augmented other difficulties in storming the fortress; but two large armies were on their way to relieve the garrison, and this, added to the immense military stores in the city, confirmed Wellington in his resolve no longer to delay the assault. The place was immediately summoned, and the governor having returned a gallant answer, that he should not surrender, preparations were accordingly made for the attack.

To the light and 3d divisions, was committed this perilous honor, as on that day it was their turn to be on duty in the trenches. General McKinnon at the head of the 3d division, preceded by the light companies under Major Manners, was to attack the main breach. The Portuguese of the division were in reserve in the trenches, ready to advance if their services should be required. The latter, under General Vandeleur and Colonel Barnard, received orders to assault the lesser breach, and after having gained the summit, turn to the right, in order to take the defenders of the main breach in flank; and then assail in rear, the interior retrenchments, by which the enemy hoped to be able to stop the progress of the assailants, even should they carry the ramparts. After they had accomplished this, and effected a communication between the two columns, they were to make an effort to burst open the Salamanca gate, and admit the rest of the division. Pack, with his Portuguese brigade, was directed to make a false attack, by escalade, on the outwork of St. Jago, on the opposite side of the town, which he was at liberty to convert into a real attack, should a favorable opportunity present itself for penetrating.

The preparations of the besieged, however, were very formidable; innumerable quantities of bombs and hand-grenades lined the top of the breaches, ready to roll down on the heads of the advancing columns. Bags of powder were strewn among the ruins, which the bursting of the shells and grenades would cause to explode, as the assailants were ascending the slopes. Two heavy guns loaded with grape, flanked the summit of the larger breach, and a large mine was run under it to explode, if all other means of defense should fail.

But all these obstacles did not suffice to daunt the British troops, so well aware were they of the importance of the trust committed to them; and the last words of Wellington's instructions breathed the spirit of the whole army, as well as his own: "Ciudad Rodrigo must be carried by assault this evening at seven o'clock."

The evening was calm and delightful; the moon was in her first quarter, and threw a rather uncertain light over the scene, which rendered rude outlines distinctly visible, without disclosing particular objects. The bastions were distinctly visible from the British lines, projecting in the dark gloom, while with the yawning gulfs, half choked up with ruins which they surrounded, they presented a truly terrific appearance.

The British trenches were filled with soldiers, among whom not a whisper was heard, nor a movement perceptible, while the preparations of the French on the ramparts told plainly that they were not unprepared for their reception. As the great clock of the cathedral tolled seven, the order to advance was quietly passed along the ranks, and, leaping from the trenches, the men quickly pressed forward toward the breaches, headed by their respective forlorn hopes. Ensign Mackie, leading that of the 3d division, and General McKinnon, the storming party, while Mr. Greenwood led that of the light division, followed by Major Napier at the head of the storming party.

In crossing the open space between the trenches and the ramparts, McKinnon's division sustained a heavy and concentrated fire from the walls, of grape and musketry, but in a few minutes reached the counterscarp, which was discovered to be eleven feet deep. By the aid of the sappers, however, who immediately threw down their bags of hay, the distance was diminished one half, by which means the men were enabled to jump over, and soon reached the foot of the breach; but here, much greater difficulties awaited them. The shells and grenades, which the French were raining down on them, burst in their ranks, committing frightful devastation. At length they reached the summit; but no sooner had they gained it, than they were torn in pieces by a terrific discharge of grape shot from the guns which flanked them on either side, at a few yards' distance.

Before these could be reloaded, those immediately behind pushed forward, and rushing over the dead and mangled bodies of their comrades, gained the summit of the breach, from which they drove its brave and gallant defenders. But as they were endeavoring to penetrate the interior retrenchments, the mine beneath their feet suddenly exploded, and blew those who were farthest advanced, including the gallant McKinnon, into the air. Still the column held the ground which they had won, and seeing it was impossible to penetrate further, established themselves among the ruins, resolving to await the results of the other attacks.

Crawford and Pack's divisions were still more successful; they reached the lesser breach under a very heavy fire of grape and musketry, and from the steepness of the works, found it very difficult to ascend, but by indefatigable perseverance they succeeded. The resistance which they encountered was very great. When two thirds of the ascent had been won, so violent was the struggle that the troops paused, and every man snapped his musket at the enemy, as if by instinct, although not one was loaded. Major Napier, who was now struck down, wounded by a grape-shot, called to his men to trust to their bayonets. The officers sprang to the front, and in a few minutes the summit was won. Not forgetting their instructions, they turned to the right, and with the aid of the 3d division, which had assaulted the main breach, succeeded in forcing the interior retrenchments, which had been constructed by the French, in order to oppose their entrance into the town. They now rushed in, and some irregular fighting occurred in the streets, but all regular resistance was at an end. The governor delivered up his sword at the gate of the castle to Mr. Greenwood, who, though wounded, still kept his post at the head of the 3d division. Immediately, a frightful scene of violence, intoxication, and plunder, ensued. The churches were ransacked for valuables, and the wine and spirit cellars plundered for their liquors; soon the flames were seen breaking out in several parts of the city, and a number of houses were reduced to ashes; but, by the aid of fresh troops which Wellington immediately marched into the town, a great many buildings were rescued from destruction, and before morning, comparative order and quiet were restored in Ciudad Rodrigo.

The consequences of the capture of this fortress were immense. Of the garrison, which consisted, at the commencement, of 1,800 men, 1,500 were made prisoners; 150 guns, with immense military stores of every kind, fell into the hands of the victors, who lost in the assault 1,300 men, including Generals Crawford and McKinnon.

Throughout the whole siege, and at the assault, the French defended the ramparts with that constancy and heroism which, during the course of the war, they so often evinced, and succeeded in inflicting a heavy loss on the victors. So great were the transports of joy at this event throughout Spain, Portugal, and England, that the Spanish Cortes at once created Wellington Duke of Ciudad Rodrigo, and the Portuguese government conferred upon him the title of Marshal of Torres Vedas, while the British Parliament voted their thanks to the army, and settled on the earldom of Wellington a pension of £2,000 a year.

CLONTARF, A.D. 1039.—The battle of Clontarf was fought in the year 1039, between the Irish and Danes. The Irish were commanded by Bryan Boiroimhe, monarch of Ireland, who entirely defeated the invaders after an obstinate and bloody engagemont. Bryan's son was slain, and the king himself was so severely wounded that he died shortly after the battle. Many of the Irish nobility were slain; but they were amply revenged, for 11,000 Danes perished on the field of battle.

COBLENTZ, A.D. 1794.—Coblentz stands on the Rhine, at the influx of the Moselle, in Prussia. It was taken by the French, after an obstinate resistance, in 1794.

CONCORD.—See Lexington.

CONSTANTINA, A.D. 1837.—On the 13th of October, 1837, a battle was fought between the French and Arabs at Constantina, the former capital of Numidia. The French carried the town by assault, after a long siege; but their general, Daremont, was slain. Achmet Bey retired with 12,000 troops as the French soldiers entered Constantina as victors.

CONSTANTINOPLE, A.D. 559.—The majesty of the Roman people no longer commanded the respect of the universe, the valor of its legions no longer spread terror among the barbarians, in the time of Justinian. A king of the Huns, named Zabergan, ventured to advance, in 559, to the very walls of Constantinople, and to threaten the imperial city with pillage. There was but a feeble garrison within its ramparts, but in the moment of terror it was remembered that they possessed Belisarius. That great man was instantly dragged from the obscurity in which he languished. Called upon to drive from the walls of the capital the dangers by which it was surrounded, he resumed his genius, his activity, and his valor; no one could perceive that years had cooled his ardor. His first care was to surround the camp with a wide ditch, to protect it from the insults of the Huns, and to deceive them with regard to the number of his troops by lighting fires in all parts of the plain. There was only one passage by which the Huns could reach Constantinople, and that was through a hollow way, bordered on each side by a thick forest. Belisarius began by lining the two sides of this defile with 200 archers; he then advanced at the head of 300 soldiers, trained to conquer under his orders. He was followed by the rest of his troops, who were ordered to utter loud cries, and to drag along the ground large branches of trees, so as to raise vast clouds of dust round them. Every thing succeeded; the barbarians, charged in flank, blinded by the dust which the wind blew in their eyes, terrified by the cries of the Romans, and the noise of their arms, and attacked in front with vigor by Belisarius and his chosen band, took to flight without striking a blow. This horde of barbarians hastily departed, to carry the evils of plunder, fire, and death elsewhere.

Second Siege, A.D. 670.—Whilst Heraclius was absent, combatting the Persians, the Khan of the Abares appeared before Constantinople. For once the inhabitants of that magnificent city evinced bravery, and rendered the efforts of the khan useless. He regained his deserts, after having witnessed the destruction of the greater part of his troops.

Third Siege, A.D. 672.—Tezid, son of the Caliph Moavias, proved no less unfortunate in his expedition against Constantinople. His naval force was entirely destroyed, and that loss compelled him to raise the siege. Among the Mussulmans who signalized their courage in this expedition, was the captain Aboux Aioub, one of the companions of Mahomet in the battles of Bedra and Ohod. He was buried at the foot of the walls of the city. His tomb is the place at which the Ottoman emperors are girded with the sword.

Fourth Siege, A.D. 1203.— The great siege of Constantinople by the Latin Crusaders, is one of the most tempting subjects to dilate upon that history affords. But to relate all the particulars of this siege would require a volume, and we can only afford a few pages to it. In this predicament we turn from Michaud, to the more brief account of Gibbon, to whose words, or nearly so, we shall confine ourselves.

Europe had taken up the cross for the fifth time: the forces destined to act against the infidels were upon the point of embarking for the Holy Land, when young Alexius, son of Isaac Angelus, the Emperor of Constantinople, came to implore the succor of the Christian princes in favor of his father. An ambitious brother had dethroned him, deprived him of sight, and then confined him in a loathsome prison. Touched by his prayers, but still more by the advantages he offered, the Crusaders set sail for Constantinople.

"In relating the invasion of a great empire, it may seem strange that I have not described the obstacles which should have checked the progress of the strangers. The Greeks, in truth, were an unwarlike people; but they were rich, industrious, and subject to the will of a single man,—had that man been capable of fear when his enemies were at a distance, or of courage when they approached his person. The first rumors of his nephew's alliance with the French and Venetians were despised by the usurper; his flatterers persuaded him that in this contempt he was bold and sincere, and each evening, on the close of the banquet, he thrice discomfited the barbarians of the West. These barbarians had been justly terrified by the report of his naval power; and the 1,600 fishing boats of Constantinople could have manned a fleet to sink them in the Adriatic, or stop their entrance in the mouth of the Hellespont. But all force may be annihilated by the negligence of a prince or the venality of his ministers. The great duke, or admiral, made a scandalous, almost a public, auction of the sails, the masts, and the rigging; the royal forests were reserved for the more important purposes of the chase; and the trees, says Nicetas, were guarded by the eunuchs, like the groves of religious worship. From his dream of pride Alexius was awakened by the siege of Zara, and the rapid advances of the Latins; as soon as he saw the danger was real, he thought it inevitable, and his vain presumption was lost in abject despondency and despair. He suffered these contemptible barbarians to pitch their tents within sight of his palace, and his apprehensions were thinly disguised by the pomp and menace of a suppliant embassy. The sovereign of the Romans was astonished (his embassadors were instructed to say) at the hostile appearance of the strangers. If these pilgrims were sincere in their views for the deliverance of Jerusalem, his voice must applaud and his treasures should assist their pious design; but should they dare to invade the sanctuary of empire, their numbers, were they ten times more considerable, should not protect them from his just resentment. The answer of the doge and barons was simple and magnanimous. 'In the cause of honor and justice,' they said, 'we despise the usurper of Greece, his threats, and his offers. Our friendship and his allegiance are due to the lawful heir, to the young prince who is seated among us, and to his father, the emperor Isaac, who has been deprived of his scepter, his freedom, and his eyes, by the crime of an ungrateful brother. Let that brother confess his guilt and implore forgiveness, and we ourselves will intercede, that he may be permitted to live in affluence and security. But let him not insult us by a second message: our reply will be made in arms, in the palace of Constantinople.'

"On the tenth day of their encampment at Scutari, the Crusaders prepared themselves as soldiers and as Catholics for the passage of the Bosphorus. Perilous indeed was the adventure; the stream was broad and rapid; in a calm, the current of the Euxine might drive down the liquid and unextinguishable fire of the Greeks; and the opposite shores of Europe were defended by 70,000 horse and foot in formidable array. On this memorable day, which happened to be bright and pleasant, the Latins were distributed in six battles or divisions: the first, or vanguard, was led by the Count of Flanders, one of the most powerful of the Christian princes in the skill and numbers of his cross-bows. The four successive battles of the French were commanded by his brother Henry, the Counts of St. Pol and Blois, and Matthew of Montmorency, the last of whom was honored by the voluntary service of the marshals and nobles of Champagne. The sixth division, the rear-guard and reserve of the army, was conducted by the Marquis of Montferrat, at the head of the Germans and Lombards. The chargers, saddled, with their long caparisons dragging on the ground, were embarked in the flat planders, and the knights stood by the side of their horses in complete armor, their helmets laced and their lances in their hands. Their numerous train of serjeants and archers occupied the transports, and each transport was towed by the strength and swiftness of a galley. The six divisions traversed the Bosphorus without encountering an enemy or an obstacle; to land the foremost, was the wish; to conquer or die was the resolution of every division and of every soldier. Jealous of the pre-eminence of danger, the knights in their heavy armor leaped into the sea when it rose as high as their girdle; the serjeants and archers were animated by their valor; and the squires letting down the drawbridges of the palanders, led the horses to the shore. Before the squadrons could mount, and form, and couch their lances, the 70,000 Greeks had vanished from their sight; the timid Alexius gave the example to his troops; and it was only by the plunder of the rich pavilions that the Latins were informed they fought against an emperor. In the first consternation of the flying enemy, they resolved by a double attack to open the entrance of the harbor. The tower of Galata, in the suburb of Pera, was attacked and stormed by the French, while the Venetians assumed the more difficult task of forcing the boom, or chain, that was stretched from that tower to the Byzantine shores. After some fruitless attempts, their intrepid perseverance prevailed; twenty ships of war, the relics of the Grecian navy, were either sunk or taken; the enormous and massy links of iron were cut asunder by the shears or broken by the weight of the galleys; and the Venetian fleet, safe and triumphant, rode at anchor in the port of Constantinople. By these daring achievements, a remnant of 20,000 Latins preluded the astounding attempt of besieging a capital containing above 400,000 inhabitants, able, though not willing, to bear arms in defense of their country. Such an account would, indeed, suppose a population of near two millions; but whatever abatement may be required in the numbers of the Greeks, the belief of these numbers will equally exalt the fearless spirit of their assailants.

"In the choice of attack, the French and Venetians were divided by their habits of life and warfare. The latter affirmed with truth, that Constantinople was most accessible on the side of the sea and harbor; the former might assert with honor, that they had long enough trusted their lives and fortunes to a frail bark and a precarious element, and loudly demanded a trial of knighthood, a firm ground, and a close onset, either on foot or on horseback. After a prudent compromise of employing the two nations by sea and land in the service best suited to their character, the fleet covering the army, they both proceeded from the entrance to the extremity of the harbor. The stone bridge of the river was hastily repaired; and the six battles of the French formed their encampment against the front of the capital, the basis of the triangle which runs about four miles from the port to the Propontis. On the edge of a broad ditch at the foot of a lofty rampart, they had leisure to contemplate the difficulties of their enterprise. The gates to the right and left of their narrow camp poured forth frequent sallies of cavalry and light infantry, which cut off their stragglers, swept the country of provisions, sounded the alarm five or six times in the course of each day, and compelled them to plant a pallisade and sink an intrenchment for their immediate safety. In the supplies and convoys, the Venetians had been too sparing, or the Franks too voracious; the usual complaints of hunger and scarcity were heard, and perhaps felt; their stock of flour would be exhausted in three weeks; and their disgust of salt meat tempted them to taste the flesh of their horses. The trembling usurper was supported by Theodore Lascaris, his son-in-law, a valiant youth, who aspired to save and rule his country. The Greeks, regardless of that country, were awakened to the defense of their religion; but their firmest hope was in the strength and spirit of the Varengian guards of Danes and English, as they are named by the writers of the times. After ten days' incessant labor, the ground was leveled, the ditch filled, the approaches of the besiegers were regularly made, and 250 engines of assault exercised their various powers to clear the ramparts, to batter the walls, and to sap the foundations. On the first appearance of a breach, the scalingladders were applied; the numbers that defended the vantage-ground repulsed and oppressed the venturous Latins; but they admired the resolution of fifteen knights and serjeants, who, having gained the ascent, maintained their position till they were hurled down or made prisoners by the imperial guards. On the side of the harbor, the naval attack was more successfully conducted by the Venetians; and that industrious people employed every resource that was known and practiced before the invention of gunpowder. A double line, three bowshots in front, was formed by the galleys and ships; and the swift motion of the former was supported by the weight and loftiness of the latter, whose decks, and poops, and turrets were the platforms of military engines, that discharged their shot over the heads of the first line. The soldiers who leaped from the galleys on shore, immediately planted and ascended their scaling-ladders, while the large ships, advancing more slowly into the intervals and lowering a drawbridge, opened a way through the air from the masts to the rampart. In the midst of the conflict, the doge, a venerable and conspicuous form, stood aloft in complete armor, on the prow of his galley. The great standard of St. Mark was displayed before him; his threats, promises, and exhortations urged the diligence of the rowers; his vessel was the first that struck, and Dandolo was the first warrior on the shore. The nations admired the magnanimity of the blind old man, without reflecting that his age and infirmities diminished the price of life and enhanced the value of immortal glory. On a sudden, by an invisible hand (for the standard-bearer was probably slain), the banner of the republic was fixed on the rampart; twenty-five towers were rapidly occupied; and, by the cruel expedient of fire, the Greeks were driven from the adjacent quarter. The doge had dispatched the intelligence of his success, when he was checked by the danger of his confederates. Nobly declaring that he would rather die with the pilgrims than gain a victory by their destruction, Dandolo relinquished his advantage, recalled his troops, and hastened to the scene of action. He found the six weary battles of the Franks encompassed by sixty squadrons of the Greek cavalry, the least of which was more numerous than the largest of their divisions. Shame and despair had provoked Alexius to the last effort of a general sally; but he was awed by the firm order and manly aspect of the Latins; and after skirmishing at a distance, withdrew his troops in the close of the evening. The silence or tumult of the night exasperated his fears; and the timid usurper, collecting a treasure of 10,000 pounds of gold, basely deserted his wife, his people, and his fortune; threw himself into a bark, stole through the Bosphorus, and landed in shameful safety in an obscure harbor of Thrace. As soon as they were apprised of his flight, the Greek nobles sought pardon and peace in the dungeon where the blind Isaac expected each hour the visit of the executioner. Again saved and exalted by the vicissitudes of fortune, the captive, in his imperial robes, was replaced on the throne and surrounded with prostrate slaves, whose real terror and affected joy he was incapable of discerning. At the dawn of day, hostilities were suspended; and the Latin chiefs were surprised by a message from the lawful and reigning emperor, who was impatient to embrace his son and reward his generous deliverers.

"But these generous deliverers were unwilling to release their hostage till they had obtained from his father the payment, or, at least, the promise of their recompense. They chose four embassadors—Montmorency, our historian Villehardouin, and two Venetians, to congratulate the emperor. The gates were thrown open on their approach, the streets, on both sides, were lined with the battle-axes of the Danish and English guard; the presence-chamber glittered with gold and jewels—the false substitutes of virtue and power. By the side of the blind Isaac was seated his wife, the sister of the King of Hungary; and by her appearance the noble matrons of Greece were drawn from their domestic retirement, and mingled with the circle of senators and soldiers. The Latins, by the mouth of Villehardouin, spoke like men conscious of their merits, but who respected the work of their own hand; and the emperor clearly understood that his son's engagements with Venice and the pilgrims must be ratified without hesitation or delay. Withdrawing into a private chamber, with the empress, a chamberlain, an interpreter, and the four embassadors, the father of young Alexius inquired, with some anxiety, into the nature of his stipulations. The submission of the eastern empire to the pope; the succor of the Holy Land; and a present contribution of two hundred thousand marks of silver. 'These conditions are weighty,' was his prudent reply: 'they are hard to accept and difficult to perform. But no conditions can exceed the measure of your services and deserts.' After this satisfactory assurance, the barons mounted on horseback and introduced the heir of Constantinople to the city and palace. His youth and marvelous adventures engaged every heart in his favor; and Alexius was solemnly crowned, with his father, in the dome of St. Sophia. In the first days of his reign, the people, already blessed with the restoration of plenty and peace, were delighted by the joyful catastrophe of the tragedy; and the discontent of the nobles, their regrets and their fears, were covered by the polished surface of pleasure and loyalty. The mixture of two discordant nations in one capital might have been pregnant with mischief and danger; and the suburb of Galata, or Pera, was assigned for the quarters of the Franks and the Venetians. But the liberty of trade and familiar intercourse was allowed between the friendly nations; and each day the pilgrims were tempted by devotion or curiosity to visit the churches and palaces of Constantinople. Their rude minds, insensible perhaps of the finer arts, were astonished by the magnificent scenery; and the poverty of their native towns enhanced the populousness and riches of the first metropolis of Christendom. Descending from his state, young Alexius was prompted, by interest and gratitude, to repeat his frequent and familiar visits to his Latin allies; and in the freedom of the table, the gay petulance of the French sometimes forgot the emperor of the East. In their most serious conferences, it was agreed that the reunion of the two churches must be the result of patience and time; but avarice was less tractable than zeal; and a large sum was instantly disbursed to appease the wants and silence the importunity of the Crusaders. Alexius was alarmed by the approaching hour of their departure; their absence might have relieved him from the engagement he was yet incapable of performing; but his friends would have left him naked and alone, to the caprice and prejudice of a perfidious nation. He wished to bribe their stay, the delay of a year, by undertaking to defray their expense, and to satisfy, in their name, the freight of the Venetian vessels. The offer was agitated in the council of the barons, and after a repetition of their debates and scruples, a majority of votes again acquiesced in the advice of the doge and the prayer of the young emperor. At the price of sixteen hundred pounds of gold, he prevailed on the Marquis of Montferrat to lead him with an army round the provinces of Europe, to establish his authority and pursue his uncle, while Constantinople was awed by the presence of Baldwin and his confederates of France and Flanders. The expedition was successful; the blind emperor exulted in the success of his arms, and listened to the predictions of his flatterers that the same Providence which had raised him from the dungeon to the throne would heal his gout, restore his sight, and watch over the long prosperity of his reign. Yet the mind of the suspicious old man was tormented by the rising glories of his son; nor could his pride conceal from his envy, that while his own name was pronounced in faint and reluctant acclamations, the royal youth was the theme of spontaneous and universal praise.

"By the recent invasion, the Greeks were awakened from a dream of nine centuries, from the vain presumption that the capital of the Roman empire was impregnable to foreign arms. The strangers of the West had violated the city, and bestowed the scepter of Constantine; their imperial clients soon became as unpopular as themselves; the well-known vices of Isaac were rendered still more contemptible by his infirmities, and the young Alexius was hated as an apostate, who had renounced the manners and religion of his country. His secret covenant with the Latins was divulged or suspected; the people, and especially the clergy, were devoutly attached to their faith and superstition; and every convent and every shop resounded with the danger of the church and the tyranny of the pope. An empty treasury could ill supply the demands of regal luxury and foreign extortion; the Greeks refused to avert, by a general tax, the impending evils of servitude and pillage; the oppression of the rich excited a more dangerous and personal resentment; and if the emperor melted the plate, and despoiled the images of the sanctuary, he seemed to justify the complaints of heresy and sacrilege.

"During the absence of Marquis Boniface and his imperial pupil, Constantinople was visited with a calamity which might be justly imputed to the zeal and indiscretion of the Flemish pilgrims. In one of their visits to the city, they were scandalized by the aspect of a mosch, or synagogue, in which one God was worshiped without a partner or a son. Their effectual mode of controversy was to attack the infidels with the sword, and their habitations with fire; but the infidels, and some Christian neighbors, presumed to defend their lives and properties; and the flames which bigotry had kindled, consumed the most orthodox and innocent structures. During eight days and nights, the conflagration spread above a league in front, from the harbor to the Propontis, over the thickest and most populous regions of the city. It is not easy to count the stately palaces and churches that were reduced to a smoking ruin, to value the merchandise that perished in the trading streets, or to number the families that were involved in the common destruction. By this outrage, which the doge and barons in vain affected to disclaim, the name of the Latins became still more unpopular, and the colony of that nation, above 15,000 persons, consulted their safety in a hasty retreat from the city to the protection of their standard in the suburb of Pera. The emperor returned in triumph; but the firmest and most dexterous policy would have been insufficient to steer him through the tempest which overwhelmed the person and government of that unhappy youth. His own inclinations and his father's advice attached him to his benefactors; but Alexius hesitated between gratitude and patriotism, between the fear of his subjects and of his allies. By his feeble and fluctuating conduct, he lost the esteem and confidence of both; and while he invited the Marquis of Montferrat to occupy the palace, he suffered the nobles to conspire, and the people to arm, for the deliverance of their country. Regardless of his painful situation, the Latin chiefs repeated their demands, resented his delays, suspected his intentions, and exacted a decisive answer of peace or war. The haughty summons was delivered by three French knights, and three Venetian deputies, who girded on their swords, mounted their horses, pierced through the angry multitude, and entered with a fearless countenance the palace and presence of the Greek emperor. In a peremptory tone, they recapitulated their services and his engagements, and boldly declared that unless their just claims were fully and immediately satisfied, they should no longer hold him either as a sovereign or a friend. After this defiance, the first that had ever wounded an imperial ear, they departed, without betraying any symptoms of fear; but their escape from a servile palace and a furious city astonished the embassadors themselves, and their return to the camp was the signal of mutual hostility.

"Among the Greeks, all authority and wisdom were overborne by the impetuous multitude, who mistook their rage for valor, their numbers for strength, and their fanaticism for the support and inspiration of Heaven. In the eyes of both nations, Alexius was false and contemptible: the base and spurious race of the Angeli was rejected with clamorous disdain; and the people of Constantinople encompassed the senate, to demand at their hands a more worthy emperor. To every senator, conspicuous by his birth or dignity, they successively presented the purple; by each senator the deadly garment was repulsed. The contest lasted three days, and we may learn from the historian Nicetas, one of the members of the assembly, that fear and weakness were the guardians of their loyalty. A phantom who vanished in oblivion, was forcibly proclaimed by the crowd; but the author of the tumult and the leader of the war was a prince of the house of Ducas, and his common appellation of Alexius must be discriminated by the epithet of Mourzoufle, which, in the vulgar idiom, expressed the close junction of his black and shaggy eyebrows. At once a patriot and a courtier, the perfidious Mourzoufle, who was not destitute of cunning and courage, opposed the Latins both in speech and action, inflamed the passions and prejudices of the Greeks, and insinuated himself into the confidence and favor of Alexius, who trusted him with the office of great chamberlain, and tinged his buskins with the colors of royalty. At the dead of night, he rushed into the bedchamber with an affrighted aspect, exclaiming that the palace was attacked by the people, and betrayed by the guards. Starting from his couch, the unsuspecting prince threw himself into the arms of his enemy, who had contrived his escape by a private staircase. But that staircase terminated in a prison. Alexius was seized, stripped, and loaded with chains, and after tasting some days the bitterness of death, he was poisoned, or strangled, or beaten with clubs, at the command or in the presence of the tyrant. The emperor Isaac Angelus soon followed his son to the grave, and Mourzoufle, perhaps, might spare the superfluous crime of hastening the extinction of impotence and blindness.

"The death of the emperors, and the usurpation of Mourzoufle, had changed the nature of the quarrel. It was no longer the disagreement of allies who overvalued their services, or neglected their obligations; the French and Venetians forgot their complaints against Alexius, dropped a tear on the untimely fate of their companion, and swore revenge against the perfidious nation which had crowned his assassin. Yet the prudent doge was still inclined to negotiate; he demanded as a debt, a subsidy, or a fine, fifty thousand pounds of gold, about two millions sterling; nor would the conference have been abruptly broken, if the zeal or policy of Mourzoufle had not refused to sacrifice the Greek church to the safety of the state. Amid the invectives of his foreign and domestic enemies, we may discover that he was not unworthy of the character which he had assumed, of the public champion. The second siege of Constantinople was far more laborious than the first; the treasury was replenished, and discipline was restored by a severe inquisition into the abuses of the former reign; and Mourzoufle, an iron mace in his hand, visiting the posts, and affecting the port and aspect of a warrior, was an object of terror to his soldiers, at least, and to his kinsmen. Before and after the death of Alexius, the Greeks made two vigorous and well-conducted attempts to burn the navy in the harbor; but the skill and courage of the Venetians repulsed the fire-ships, and the vagrant flames wasted themselves, without injury, in the sea. In a nocturnal sally, the Greek emperor was vanquished by Henry, brother of the Count of Flanders; the advantages of number and surprise aggravated the shame of his defeat; his buckler was found on the field of battle; and the imperial standard, a divine image of the Virgin, was presented as a trophy and a relic to the Cistercian monks, the disciples of St. Bernard.

"Near three months, without excepting the holy season of Lent, were consumed in skirmishes and preparations, before the Latins were ready or resolved for a general attack. The land fortifications had been found impregnable; and the Venetian pilots represented that on the shore of the Propontis the anchorage was unsafe, and the ships must be driven by the current far away to the straits of the Hellespont; a prospect not unpleasing to the reluctant pilgrims, who sought every opportunity of breaking the army. From the harbor, therefore, the assault was determined by the assailants, and expected by the besieged, and the emperor had placed his scarlet pavilions on a neighboring height, to direct and animate the efforts of his troops. A fearless spectator, whose mind could entertain the idea of pomp and pleasure, might have admired the long array of two embattled armies, which extended above half a league, the one on the ships and galleys, the other on the walls and towers raised above the ordinary level by several stages of wooden turrets. Their first fury was spent in the discharge of darts, stones, and fire from the engines; but the water was deep; the French were bold; the Venetians were skillful; they approached the walls, and a desperate conflict of swords spears, and battle-axes was fought on the trembling bridges that grappled the floating to the stable batteries. In more than a hundred places the assault was urged, and the defense was sustained, till the superiority of ground and numbers finally prevailed, and the Latin trumpets sounded a retreat. On the ensuing days the attack was renewed with equal vigor, and a similar event; and in the night the doge and the barons held a council, apprehensive only for the public danger; not a voice pronounced the words of escape or treaty; and each warrior, according to his temper, embraced the hope of victory, or the assurance of a glorious death. By the experience of the former siege, the Greeks were instructed, but the Latins were animated; and the knowledge that Constantinople might be taken was of more avail than the local precautions which that knowledge had inspired for its defense. In the third assault, two ships were linked together, to double their strength; a strong north wind drove them on the shore; the bishops of Troyes and Soissons led the van; and the auspicious names of the Pilgrim and the Paradise resounded along the line. The episcopal banners were displayed on the walls; a hundred marks of silver had been promised to the first adventurers; and if their reward was intercepted by death, their names have been immortalized by fame. Four towers were scaled, three gates were burst open, and the French knights, who might tremble on the waves, felt themselves invincible on horseback, on the solid ground. Shall I relate that the thousands who guarded the emperor's person fled on the approach, and before the lance of a single warrior? Their ignominious flight is attested by their countryman, Nicetas: an army of phantoms marched with the French hero, and he was magnified to a giant in the eyes of the Greeks. While the fugitives deserted their posts and cast away their arms, the Latins entered the city under the banners of their leaders; the streets and gates opened for their passage, and either design or accident kindled a third conflagration, which consumed in a few hours the measure of three of the largest cities of France. In the close of the evening, the barons checked their troops and fortified their stations; they were awed by the extent and populousness of the capital, which might yet require the labor of a month, if the churches and palaces were conscious of their internal strength. But in the morning a suppliant procession, with crosses and images, announced the submission of the Greeks, and deprecated the wrath of the conquerors; the usurper escaped through the Golden gate: the palaces of Blachernæ and Boucoleon were occupied by the Count of Flanders and the Marquis of Montferrat; and the empire, which still bore the name of Constantine, and the title of Roman, was subverted by the arms of the Latin pilgrims.

"Constantinople, when taken by the Franks and the Venetians, was the most glorious emporium of objects of high art and fine taste the world has ever seen. With the conquerors nothing was valuable but money, and to obtain this all was sacrified: precious works of art were melted for the sake of the metals they were made of; others were mutilated to facilitate division, and numberless others were destroyed in hopes of finding treasures concealed within them. No building was held sacred that would pay for the demolition; no object remained in the place with which it was naturally associated, if it was of the smallest value elsewhere.

"Tired, rather than satisfied with plunder, the conquerors proceeded to the election of an emperor: Baldwin I. was crowned in the year 1204. This new domination only lasted fifty-seven years, under the name of the empire of the Latins. Under Baldwin II., brother of Robert de Courtenay, the Greeks revolted, drove out the Franks in 1261, and gave themselves and the throne to Michael Palæologus whose posterity reigned up to the taking of Constantinople by Mahomet II."

Fifth Siege, A.D. 1453.—Constantinople no longer preserved any thing but the proud remembrance of its ancient splendor. In that capital, once so flourishing and so respected, there still breathed an immense population; but that multitude, without force or without courage, seemed only to be waiting to crouch willingly under the strong hand that might be held forth to enchain them. Frivolous acquirements, agreeable arts, preferred by indolence and effeminacy, to the exercise of essential duties or useful labors, had annihilated love of country, and dried up the springs of life of this unfortunate empire. They wrote and they disputed: questions of philosophy and theological quarrels were the sole concerns of the lazy citizens, who had never stood in such pressing need of providing for their own safety. Instead of being the heart of an empire, the walls of Constantinople had become frontiers; it had no dominions beyond them. The enemy appeared at their gates: during the eight hundred years that Mahometanism had progressed, the city had often been threatened, and in vain; but the harvest was now ripe, the time was come, and the sickle, in the hands of Mahomet II., was employed in earnest workmanlike fashion. He began by constructing the castle of the Dardanelles, on the Bosphorus. Constantine Palæologus, who then reigned, in vain was anxious to prevent this: his own subjects thwarted his correct views; their presumption equaled their blindness; they boasted that they could destroy that fortress the moment it was any annoyance to them.

Five or six thousand men, taken from the very dregs of the people, composed the national force, which was augmented by a few European troops, under Justinian, a Genoese. These were the only resources of a city inhabited by men incapable of defending themselves, and who trusted entirely to a few mercenary strangers, who still deigned to protect them. All the Greeks individually boasted of their country and its fame; and yet not one of them would have sacrificed to its welfare his pleasures, his luxuries, his comforts, or his opinions. The emperor tried to induce them to contribute a portion of their riches to the defense of the state: but he could obtain nothing.

In this case the solitary virtue of Constantine was powerless—the corruption was deep and universal. Palæologus and his courtiers favored, at least in appearance, the union of the two churches of the East and West. The holy father promised to send some galleys and troops. The Greeks still further flattered themselves that the exhortations of the pontiff would prevail upon the Christian princes to undertake a crusade: that was their last hope. Cardinal Isidore came to Constantinople as legate from the Holy See. He celebrated divine service in the church of St. Sophia, according to the liturgy of Rome. This threw the whole city into a state of alarm. The people flocked in crowds to the retreat of the monk Gennadius, to consult with him what was to be done. The solitary affixed his reply to the door of his cell. He declared in this document that the agreement drawn up at Florence was not orthodox. He at the same time announced the greatest misfortunes to those who should adopt the impious reconciliation of the Greeks with the Latins. Immediately the devotees, the nuns who were under the direction of Gennadius, the abbots, the priests, the citizens, the soldiers—for the contagion spread to all orders—joined in one unanimous anathema! The church of St. Sophia was considered a defiled place. Communication with the Latins ceased: they would prefer, they said, to see the turban of Mahomet displayed, to the appearance of the Roman purple, or the cardinal's hat.

But now the sultan, having employed two years in preparations, marched toward Constantinople at the head of an army of 400,000 men. This fearful multitude was composed, for the most part, of newly-conquered nations, which he dragged after him. Out of all these he had not more than 30,000 horse and 60,000 foot of disciplined troops. The rest were nothing but a collection of slaves, torn by force from the places of their birth, without arms and almost naked, who were obliged to be driven to the combat by strokes of the whip or the cimeter. In all battles they were placed in front, in order to fatigue the enemy with the shedding of blood: the regular reserved troops were then to take advantage of their exhaustion; in sieges they served as fascines, to fill up ditches. Such was the manner of fighting with the Turks, so that when they came in contact with the Christians, it was generally remarked they had the disadvantage at the commencement of a battle, but won it at last.

While Mahomet was investing Constantinople by land, his fleet, consisting of 250 sail, advanced to the Dardanelles. This prodigious number of vessels could not, however, prevent four ships from the isle of Chio, after having fought for a whole day against the united strength of the Ottoman, and killed 1,000 of their men, from entering the port of Constantinople, and there landing a few troops and some provisions. Enormous iron chains barred the entrance of the Turkish ships. It is affirmed that Mahomet, to surmount this obstacle, had recourse to an expedient till that time unheard of:* he transported by land eighty galleys in the course of one night, and at daybreak launched them into the interior of the basin of the port, before the eyes of the besieged, terrified and astonished at this extraordinary spectacle. The vessels were drawn, by means of machines and human arms, along planks thoroughly greased, which covered a space of road two leagues in length. The sultan had at his command the most skillful engineers of Europe and Asia. The progress of these vessels offered a most curious exhibition. They were commanded by pilots, had their sails unfurled as if upon the sea, and advanced over a hilly piece of ground, by the light of torches and flambeaux, and to the sound of trumpets and clarions, without the Genoese, who inhabited Galata, daring to offer any opposition to the passage. The Greeks, fully occupied in guarding their ramparts, had no suspicion of the design of the enemy. They could not comprehend what could be the object or the cause of all the tumult that was heard during the whole night from the sea-shore, till at dawn they beheld the Mussulman standards flying in their port.

A Hungarian, who had not been able to procure employment among the Greeks, founded for Mahomet some pieces of artillery that would carry balls weighing 200 pounds. A modern author judiciously observes that each of these balls would have required nearly 100 pounds of powder, of which only a fifteenth part would have taken fire at the moment of the explosion. With a true Eastern imagination, Mahomet II. wished to have the largest and most powerful cannon that had ever been made, and a foundery was established at Adrianople. An enormous piece of ordnance was produced within three months; its bore was twelve palms, and it was capable of throwing a ball or stone weighing 600 pounds. It was tried in a vacant place before the new palace of Adrianople; but notice of its being fired was obliged to be published on the preceding day, to prevent the effects of astonishment and fear. The explosion is said to have been heard over a circuit of a hundred furlongs; the ball was cast by the gunpowder above a mile, and when it fell it buried itself a fathom deep in the ground. To convey this cannon, 30 wagons were linked together, and it was drawn by a team of 60 horses: 200 men walked by the sides of it, to poise it and keep it steady; 250 men went before, to level the way and repair the brides; and it required two months to draw it a distance of 150 miles.

The Turks, masters of the port, established batteries on the side next the sea, while the army pressed the city on the land side. They employed trenches, mines, and countermines. The besieged, who defended themselves with some spirit at first, repaired the breaches with incredible diligence. They even made some successful sorties. The hopes of being succoured by Huniades supported them for some time. Mahomet began to relax in his efforts; it is even said that he had thoughts of raising the siege. At length, however, he resolved to make one more attempt. Before he proceeded to the general assault, he proposed to Constantine to leave him the Peloponnesus, upon condition of his giving up the imperial city. He was anxious, he said, to prevent the destruction of Constantinople. The emperor replied he would rather be buried beneath the ruins of his capital. Both Christians and Mahometans prepared themselves, by fast and prayer, for the action of that morrow which was to decide the fate of the two empires. It was the 29th of May. On the evening before, Mahomet gave notice that he should abandon the plunder of the city to his soldiers, only strictly commanding that they should not set fire to any of the edifices.

The besieged, from their walls, contemplated with terror, the numbers of the enemy about to assail them. The disproportion was so great, that every Christian calculated he should have to combat fifty or sixty Turks. The sultan commenced the attack about three o'clock in the morning, by sending to the assault 30,000 of his worst troops, in order to fatigue the besieged, and that the heaped up bodies of this multitude might fill the ditches, and render access to the parapets the more easy. The stick and the cimeter were necessary to compel this forlorn hope to march: they all perished. At sunrise, Mahomet ordered the trumpets to sound a fresh signal; the artillery thundered from all quarters, and quickly drove away all who had appeared on the walls. The janizaries rushed to the breach, uttering horrible cries. Mahomet rode behind his troops upon a superb charger, in order to make them march forward with the greater celerity. Never was greater courage exhibited: the first janizary who mounted the walls of Constantinople was to be made a pacha, and be loaded with wealth. Some climbed over the ruins of the walls, through a shower of arrows, darts, stones, and fire-balls. Standing on the tops of their ladders, others fought with the besieged, who repulsed them with their pikes, while others raised themselves upon the shoulders of their comrades to get to the breach. The whole city was busied in succoring its brave defenders; women, children, and old men brought them stones, joists, and bars of red-hot iron to launch at the Turks. The cannons, directed to the point where the Turks were thickest, all at once opened their ranks, and the Ottomans, who already touched the summit of the walls, were hurled into the ditches. For two hours they fought thus, with a fury equal to the danger of the besieged and the value of the city to be conquered; a cloud of arrows, dust, and smoke shrouded the combatants. Thirty janizaries at length succeeded in mounting the walls, and killed and overthrew all who came in their way: they were soon followed by a crowd of daring comrades, animated by their example. In an instant the air resounded with cries of victory: the Turks had penetrated to the port. Zagan Pacha, who commanded the attack there, reproached the sailors with being less brave than the land troops. Encouraged by the success of the janizaries, they made one more furious charge upon the Greeks. The latter wavered in their resistance; the sailors gained possession of a tower, and hoisted the standard of the crescent, while other Turks hewed an opening, with their axes, at several of the city gates, through which the rest of the army poured in crowds. Constantine, accompanied by a few of his guards and some faithful servants, threw himself, sword in hand, into the thickest of the Ottoman battalions. Less afflicted by the loss of his crown than by the terror of being loaded with irons and led in triumph through Asia, he continued fighting bravely, when a Turk cut off the half of his face, with a stroke of his cimeter, and gave him the death he was seeking. With him fell the empire of the East, which had existed eleven hundred and forty-three years. One Constantine had founded it: another of the same name, not less brave but less fortunate, saw it perish. Mahomet caused his body to be sought for, and rendered it all the honors due to the sovereign of a great empire. More than 40,000 men were killed in this day's conflict, and more than 60,000 loaded with chains. Neither age nor sex, nor object ever so holy, was respected, during three days, in this unfortunate city; palaces, cloisters, sacred edifices, and private houses were stained with the blood of their wretched inhabitants, and disgraced by all the crimes that barbarism, cruelty, and lust could devise. At the end of three days order and discipline succeeded to carnage. Mahomet restored liberty to many of his captives, sent them back to their houses, promised them his protection, and engaged them to continue to cultivate the arts and commerce in a city he had chosen as the capital of his empire. This great event happened in the year 768 of the Hegira, and in the year of Christ 1453.

A.D. 1807.—The English expedition, under Admiral Duckworth, which, after passing the Dardanelles, made a useless and unsuccessful attack upon Constantinople, is not worthy of being ranked as a siege.—Robson.

CORINTH, B.C. 242.—This famous city of Greece is situated near the isthmus of the same name, between the gulfs of Lepanto on the west, and Egina on the east.

Antigonus Deson, King of Macedon, had taken possession of the isthmus and citadel of Corinth, which were called the fetters of Greece, because he who was the master of them dominated over that country. Aratus, chief of the Achæans, formed the project of depriving him of this important place; and the following is the manner in which he had the good fortune to succeed. Erginus, an inhabitant of Corinth, having come to Sicyon, formed an intimacy with a well-known banker, a friend of Aratus. In the course of conversation, they happened to speak of the citadel of Corinth, and Erginus said that, going to see his brother Diocles, who was in garrison there, he had remarked, on the steepest side, a little path, cut cross-wise in the rock, which led to a place where the wall was very low. The banker asked him, with a laugh, if he and his brother had a mind to make their fortunes? Erginus guessed what he meant, and promised to sound his brother upon the subject. A few days after he returned, and undertook to conduct Aratus to the spot where the wall was not more than fifteen feet high, and, with his brother, to aid him in the rest of the enterprise. Aratus promised to give them sixty thousand crowns if the affair succeeded; but the money must be deposited with the banker, for the security of the two brothers, and as Aratus had it not, and would not borrow it for fear of betraying his secret, the generous Achæan took the greater part of his gold and silver plate, with his wife's jewels, and placed them in pledge with the banker, for the whole sum. Several accidents delayed this noble enterprise; but nothing daunted the intrepid defenders of liberty. When all was ready, Aratus ordered his troops to pass the night under arms, and taking with him 400 picked men, the most part of whom were ignorant of what they were going to do, and who carried ladders with them, he led them straight to the gates of the city, by the side of the walls of the Temple of Juno. It was a beautiful moonlight night, which made them justly fear that they should be discovered. Fortunately, there arose on the side toward the sea a thick mist, which covered all the environs of the city, and created a complete darkness. There all the troops sat down, and took off their shoes, in order that they might make less noise in marching, and might ascend the ladders better. In the mean time, Aratus, with seven brave, determined young men, equipped as travelers, slipped into the city without being perceived, and in the first place killed the sentinel and the guards on duty. They then applied their ladders to the walls, and Aratus made a hundred of the most resolute ascend with him, desiring the others to follow as best they could. He drew up the ladders, descended into the city, and, at the head of his troops, marched, full of joy, straight toward the citadel, without being perceived. As they advanced, they met a guard of four men, who carried a light. The shade concealed the adventurers, and, crouching against some walls, they waited for these soldiers, who, on passing before the Achæans, were attacked all at once. Three of them lost their lives; the fourth, wounded by a sword in the head, fled away crying that the enemy was in the city. A moment after, all the trumpets sounded the alarm, and the whole city was roused by the noise. The streets were soon filled with people, who ran hither and thither; and were illuminated by a multitude of flambeaux, which were lighted everywhere, both down in the city, and upon the walls, the ramparts, and the citadel. Aratus, without being dismayed, held on his way, climbing, with difficulty, the steep sides of the rocks, from having missed the path, which led to the wall in a winding, circuitous manner. But, as if by a miracle, the clouds passed from before the moon, and revealed to him the whole labyrinth, till he had gained the bottom of the fortifications. Then, by a similar fortunate chance, the clouds gathered again, and the moon being concealed, replunged both besieged and besiegers into profound darkness. The 3,000 soldiers whom Aratus had left without, near the Temple of Juno, having obtained entrance into the city, which they found filled with confusion and tumult, and not being able to find the path their leader had taken, clung close to the foot of a precipice, under the shadow of a great rock which concealed them, and waited in that retired place to see how fortune should dispose of their fate. The general of the Achæans in the mean time was fighting valiantly on the ramparts of the citadel. They heard the noise of this combat, but could not tell whence it came, from the cries of the warriors being repeated a thousand times by the surrounding echoes. The Macedonians defended themselves with vigor: Archelaus, who commanded for King Antigonus, thought to overwhelm the Achæans by charging them in the rear. He placed himself at the head of a good body of troops, and, with sound of trumpet, marched against Aratus, filing before the three hundred concealed soldiers, without seeing them. The Achæans allowed him to pass on; then, rising all at once, as from an ambuscade in which they had been placed on purpose, they fell upon his party, killed many of them, put the rest to flight, and came to the succor of their general, uttering loud cries of victory. The moon once again shone forth in its splendor, and by favor of its light, the soldiers of Aratus united, and made so vigorous a charge that they drove the enemy from the walls, and when the first rays of the sun gleamed upon the citadel, it was as if to shed glory upon their victory. The Corinthians flocked to the standard of Aratus, who refused to sheath the sword until he had taken prisoners all the soldiers of the King of Macedon, and thus secured both his conquest and the liberty of Corinth.

Second Siege, B.C. 146.—When the Achæans became involved in a war with the Romans, Corinth was one of their principal strongholds. The Roman senate resolved upon the destruction of the city, and in spite of the efforts of Metellus, who, anxious to avert the catastrophe, had sent deputies to Corinth to bring about a reconciliation, the resolution of the senate was carried into effect. The Corinthians had contemptuously rejected the offers of Metellus, and his deputies were thrown into prison. The Consul Metellus was succeeded by Mummius, who appeared before the walls of Corinth with a powerful army, with the determination of subduing the Corinthians by one great effort. This city, in addition to its advantageous situation and its natural strength, was defended by a numerous garrison, composed of experienced and determined soldiers. These troops, perceiving that a corps-de-garde was negligently kept, made a sudden sortie, attacked it vigorously, killed a great many, and pursued the rest to their camp. This trifling success singularly inflamed the courage of these warriors, but it became fatal to them; for Dicæus, their leader, having rashly given battle to the Romans, who feigned to dread his forces, fell into an ambush laid by the consul, was beaten, took to flight, and lost the greater part of his men. After this rout, the inhabitants lost all hope of defending themselves. Without counsel, without a leader, without courage, without concert, no citizen put himself forward to rally the wrecks of the defeat, to make a show of resistance, and oblige the conqueror, who wished to terminate the war quickly, to grant them tolerable conditions. All the Achæans, and most of the Corinthians, abandoned, during the night, their unfortunate country, and sought refuge in other lands. Mummius entered the city without resistance, and gave it up to pillage. The furious and greedy soldiery immolated all who stood in the way of the sword, and bore away every thing that could feed their avarice. Women and children were sold by auction, like flocks of sheep. Statues, pictures, valuable furniture, all the superb ornaments of this opulent city, were sent to adorn the proud capital of the universe. The towers and walls were leveled with the ground; all the houses were set fire to, and during several days the whole city was nothing but one vast conflagration. It is pretended, but perhaps without foundation, that the gold, silver, and brass melted together in this fire, formed a new and precious metal, whose name became proverbial as Corinthian brass. It was in obedience to his masters, and not for his private interest, that the conqueror acted in this manner. Mummius was as disinterested a man as he was a great captain. To his virtues he joined that warlike simplicity so common among the Romans of his time, who made it their glory to be ignorant of the arts of refinement, or, indeed, of any thing which did not relate to the great arts of defending their country or fighting to promote its glory. He employed trustworthy persons to transport several pictures and statues of the most excellent masters to Rome. Had they been lost or injured, nothing could have replaced them; and yet the consul, while recommending care to be taken of them, said very seriously that if these things were damaged, others must be found in their place, and atthe expense of those who undertook to convey them!

The Achæan league was buried under the ruins of Corinth; and Rome, always inexorable toward obstinate courage, which preferred dangerous liberty to tranquil servitude, reduced the whole of Achaia to a province.

CORIOLI, B.C. 492.—Although we can not undertake to record every battle or siege by which the Roman power made regular but rapid rise in Italy, we shall endeavor not to omit such as have any interesting associations connected with them.

The Volscians tormented the Romans by continual attacks. In order to punish them, the siege of Corioli was resolved upon. It was one of their strongest places. In a sortie, the besiegers repulsed the Romans, and drove them back to their own camp. Furious at such a defeat, Marcius, a young patrician, with a handful of brave companions, returned to the charge, made the Volscians give way in their turn, penetrated with them into the city, and gave it up to pillage. That was the age when military talents were sure of their reward. After the taking of the city, the consul Cominius, before the whole army, ordered Caius Marcius to take a tenth of the booty, before any division was made of the rest, besides presenting him with a fine horse and noble trappings as a reward for his valor. The army expressed their approval of this by their acclamations; but Marcius, stepping forward, said, "That he accepted of the horse, and was happy in the consul's approbation; but as for the rest he considered it rather as a pecuniary reward than as a mark of honor, and therefore desired to be excused receiving it, as he was quite satisfied with his proper share of the booty. One favor only in particular I desire," continued he, "and I beg I may be indulged in it. I have a friend among the Volscians, bound with me in the sacred rites of hospitality, who is a man of virtue and honor. He is now among the prisoners, and from easy and opulent circumstances is reduced to servitude. Of the many misfortunes under which he labors, I should be glad to rescue him from one, which is that of being sold for a slave." This request of course was granted, and his friend was liberated.

COMPIEGNE, A.D. 1430.—Compiegne is situated on the Oise, in France, thirty-three miles east of Beauvais.

In the month of May, 1430, the Duke of Burgundy, with an army of English and Burgundians, undertook to reduce the city of Compiegne, which favored the cause of Charles VII. of France, against the Burgundians. The heroine Joan d' Arc marched to its relief. On her way thither, she met a body of Burgundians, and, after a bloody struggle, defeated them. She endeavored to exchange their commander, Franquet, for De Louis, who had fallen a prisoner into the hands of the enemy; but the judges of Languay condemned him to death. The garrison of Compiegne, on the arrival of the heroine with her troops, believed themselves invincible; but their joy was of brief duration. The besiegers, receiving reinforcements from every quarter, fell upon the French with such impetuosity that they turned their backs. Joan d' Arc immediately assumed the command of the rear guard, and repeatedly facing about, repulsed every attack of the pursuers. At length, however, the rear guard was broken; the Burgundians rushed upon the maid with loud shouts, and dragging her from her horse, felled her to the ground, when she surrendered. The garrison was grieved at the loss of their heroic defender, yet they maintained a resistance which defied every attempt of the assailants, until they were compelled to raise the siege on the appearance of the French army, under the Marshal de Boussac. The unfortunate Joan d' Arc was treated with neglect by her friends, with cruelty by her enemies "If ever prince had been indebted to a subject," says an English historian, "Charles VII. was indebted to Joan d' Arc. She had dispelled the terror with which success had invested the English arms, had reanimated the courage of the French soldiery, and had firmly established the king on the throne of his ancestors. Yet, from the moment of her captivity, she seems to have been forgotten. We read not of any sum offered for her ransom, or attempt made to alleviate her sufferings, or notice taken of her trial and execution. The bishop of Beauvais, a man wholly devoted to the English interests, presented a petition against Joan, on pretense that she was taken within the bounds of his diocese, and he desired to have her tried by an ecclesiastical court for sorcery, impiety, idolatry, and magic. The university of Paris was so mean as to join in the same request; the petition was granted, and several prelates were appointed her judges. The inquiry was opened at Rouen, on the 13th of February, 1431, and the maid, clothed in her former military apparel, but loaded with irons, was produced before the tribunal. On sixteen different days she was brought to the bar, and throughout the trial she endured the taunts and replied to the questions of her accusers with an undaunted spirit, proudly maintaining that she had been the inspired minister of the Almighty. But when the fatal day arrived, and the judge was about to pronounce sentence, she yielded to a sudden impulse of terror, and declared herself willing to recant, and promised upon oath never again to wear male attire; but the barbarous vengeance of her enemies was not satisfied with this victory. Suspecting that the female dress which she had now consented to wear was disagreeable to her, they purposely placed in her apartment a suit of man's apparel, and watched for the effect of that temptation upon her. On the sight of the dress in which she had acquired so much renown, her enthusiasm revived, her cell was again in her imagination peopled with celestial visitants calling her out to new scenes of military glory. She, in the solitude of her cell, again clothed herself in the forbidden garments; her insidious enemies caught her in that situation; she was dragged before the judges, who now were convinced of her confirmed heresy, and would hear of no recantation. She was sentenced, and no pardon could be granted. Sobbing and struggling she was led to the stake; the hope of heavenly deliverance filled her heart until she saw the flames kindled at her feet; but then she filled the air with her protestations of innocence, and cries of anguish. She died in the flames embracing a crucifix, and calling on Christ for mercy. Mercy on earth there was none for her.

CONTRERAS, A.D. 1847.—This celebrated battle-field is about fourteen miles south of the capital city of the republic of Mexico. The Pedregal, which the Americans crossed before the battle is an almost impassable field of lava.

Although gradually driven back toward the city of Mexico by the army of General Scott, still Santa Anna determined to throw every impediment possible in the road of the American army on their way to that capital. About the middle of the month of August, 1847, the American army had penetrated the country as far as San Augustin. This city, the head-quarters of the army, stands on a causeway bearing the same name, which leads into the great Acapulco highway to the Pacific ocean. This road is a raised, broad, well beaten track, leading in a straight line to the city of Mexico, which is nine miles distant from San Augustin. About two miles and a half from San Augustin, Santa Anna had placed his first fortifications, in a village called San Antonio; two miles and a quarter further on, he had placed a second in the village of Cherubusco, from which village the road was free and open to the gates of the city of Mexico. Diverging from San Augustin to the left, another road, leading over broken ground, in the direction of the village of Contreras, turned into a well-beaten track near that village, which afforded an open passage through the villages of San Angel and Coyocan, to the city of Mexico. On a height called Perdierna, near the village of Contreras, the Mexicans had established an intrenched camp to obstruct the passage of the Americans into this road. These were the only roads leading from the American position, and the question was, which to choose. At eight o'clock, on the morning of the 18th of August, General Worth's division was moved a couple of miles on the causeway of San Augustin, and took up a position in front of San Antonio. Scott established his head-quarters at a hacienda called Coupa, a few hundred yards to the right; and he now pushed forward reconnoitering parties on both roads. Judging from the reports of these parties, Scott determined first to carry the heights of Perdierna, near Contreras, and then to turn the position of the enemy at San Antonio. The distance from San Augustin to Contreras was about three miles, over a road exceedingly rough, leading through a vast field of volcanic rocks and lava, and broken eminences, intersected by ditches and covered with prickly pear. But, with some labor, the road might be made practicable for artillery, and Scott at once resolved to cut a road to the enemy's position near Contreras, and carry it with the bayonet. He accordingly dispatched Pillow's division, supported by General Twiggs, under the direction of Lee, the chief engineer, to open the road toward Contreras. When the American troops had proceeded about one and a half miles, they encountered the advance corps of the enemy. A slight skirmish ensued, in which the Mexicans were defeated, and fell back to their intrenchments. Between the Mexican intrenchments and the advancing American column, was a field of lava, which had been poured down upon the plain by volcanoes long since extinct. The field sloped down toward a ravine, which ran along the base and in front of the Mexican works. The Mexican position was strong and advantageous in the highest degree. They had twenty-two pieces of heavy artillery in battery, behind breast-works, and in embrasure, while the Americans had only light field-pieces and howitzers, which were entirely uncovered. Slowly the Americans forced their way toward the intrenchments. The ground, rough and rocky, and creased with ditches in all directions, impeded their progress, so that long before they could get into position, they were torn by constant discharges of grape, canister, and round-shot from the intrenchments. At length, after the utmost endeavors, three pieces only were got into battery. These three, comparatively light guns, responded but feebly to the heavy guns of the enemy. Yet for two hours the American infantry and artillerymen bravely stood their ground. At every discharge of the Mexican batteries the Americans would fall flat to the ground and let the iron tempest pass over them; then rising, they would serve their guns with the utmost vigor. The fire of the Mexican batteries was so well sustained and directed, that two of the American guns were dismounted, and most of the cannoneers killed or wounded. The Americans, thus baffled in their attempt, withdrew toward evening Why they made this attempt, no one can conceive. They had formed no plan of attack; indeed, they had not reconnoitered the ground for that purpose. In the mean time, General Persifer F. Smith, commanding the 2d brigade of Twiggs's division, was sent forward to support the American batteries in front of the Mexican position, near Contreras. He at once determined to attack the enemy on the left flank. On the evening of the 15th, the Americans entered Contreras and took possession of that important village. The positions of the two armies on the day before the battle were as follows. The village of Contreras was occupied by the brigades of Generals Smith, Cadwallader, Riley, and Shields. Smith's brigade, for the time being, was under the command of Major Dimick. The whole army consisted of 3,300 men, all infantry, and without artillery. On the hill of Perdierna was planted the Mexican army, under General Valencia. The first line of the Mexican army consisted of about 6,000 men; the second, within supporting distance, numbered 10,000 more. At three o'clock, on the morning of the 20th, the American troops were put in motion. The path was exceedingly rocky and narrow; the rain had fallen during the whole night; the men were fatigued and wet, having slept on their arms, in the mud, and without fire; and the morning was so dark, for it was still raining violently, that General Smith, in order to prevent his rear files from going astray, was obliged to order his men to keep within touch of each other. The order of the march was as follows:

First, Colonel Riley's brigade; next, General Cadwallader's, and lastly, General Smith's own brigade under Major Dimick. So tedious was the march that it was not until daylight that the head of Cadwallader's column emerged from the village, and entered the path leading to the ravine in front of the enemy's position. Having followed up the ravine, to a point whence it seemed possible to approach the work, Smith halted his column, and closed up the rear ranks. Riley, to whom was given the honor of the first assault, here caused his soldiers to examine their arms, and ordered such of them as were wet to be re-loaded. Then moving on, he turned to the left, in the direction of the rear of the enemy's camp, and leaving the ravine, he ascended a hill, on which the camp was planted. His soldiers, however, were sheltered from the enemy's fire by a slight swell in the ground. Having halted for a few moments to reform his ranks, Riley moved forward upon the swell and presented himself in full view of the enemy. No sooner did the Mexicans perceive the glittering bayonets of the American soldiers arising from behind the mound, than they opened a terrific fire of artillery and musketry upon them, not only from their intrenchments, but from a body of troops posted on Riley's right flank. The American general immediately threw out his first two divisions as skirmishers, to protect his flanks, and then, at the head of his men, rushed headlong into the enemy's works, which he soon cleared with the bayonet and clubbed musket. The engineer company, under Lieutenant Smith, and the rifles, having in the mean time, been thrown across a ravine, under the brow of the slope, swept it, from this position in front; and then inclining to the left, joined in the attack on the troops outside the left flank of the fort. Ransom, who had been detached by General Scott, to cause a diversion in favor of the main attack of the Americans, came up at this moment and poured a deadly fire into the works and upon the fugitives. Cadwallader moved on to the support of Riley, following the same route that had been taken by the latter. General Smith had ordered Dimick to follow Cadwallader, in turn; but when Dimick had come abreast of the enemy's work, a large body of Mexicans threatened his flank, and Smith immediately ordered him to attack in that direction. The Americans in line rushed forward upon the enemy with the greatest fury. The Mexicans made but a feeble resistance, and were soon put to rout. Their cavalry at first made a stand; but being put to flight by the bayonet, the horsemen urged back their horses in their retreat, over the infantry; trampling down under foot their own comrades and companions. The brigade of General Shields protected in a great measure the movement of General Smith, and intercepted great numbers of fugitives, who were either cut down under the deadly fire of the South Carolina Rifles, or were made prisoners. The victorious Americans pursued the flying enemy in every direction for a considerable distance, cutting them down by sword and musket-ball; and taking great numbers prisoners. Thus ended the battle of Contreras. The Mexicans lost 1,700 killed and wounded, and 800 prisoners. Twenty-two pieces of cannon; a large quantity of small arms, ammunition, stores, etc., and 500 pack mules fell into the hands of the victors.—Semmes.

CORUNNA, A.D. 1809.—Corunna is a city and seaport, situated in the province of Galicia, at the north-western extremity of Spain. It has acquired a celebrity in history, from being the point to which Sir John Moore directed his retreat, and from the fierce battle of which it was the theater on the 16th of January, 1809, between the British, under Sir John Moore, and the French, under Marshal Soult.

On the 14th of January, 1809, Sir John Moore, after a wearisome and disheartening retreat of 15 days' duration, reached Corunna, at the head of 14,000 men, followed by the French army, consisting of 20,000 men, under Marshal Soult, who had determined to prevent the embarkation of the British troops. Under these circumstances, Moore's only alternative was to risk a battle. Accordingly he made his dispositions and awaited the attack of the enemy. He drew up his army on a range of heights, which formed a sort of amphitheater around the village of Elvina, which is rather more than a mile distant from Corunna. General Hope, with his division, was stationed on the left; his flank being covered by the muddy stream of the Mero, which commanded the road to Lugo. Sir David Baird's division came next, immediately behind Elvina. General Fraser's division, with the Rifles, watched the coast road to St. Jago, and were to support any menaced point. General Paget, with the reserve, occupied the village of Airis, half a mile in the rear.

The French troops were advantageously posted on a semicircular ridge, which was higher than that occupied by the British. Laborde's division occupied the right. Merle's the center, and Mermet's the left. The light field-pieces were distributed along the front of this line. The dragoons, under Lahoussaye, Lorge, and Franceschi, to which the British had no cavalry to oppose, were stationed on the left of the infantry, and menaced the British right flank; while a battery of 12 heavy guns, situated on a steep eminence, between the infantry and cavalry, not 1,200 yards from Baird's division, were prepared to carry death and devastation throughout the British lines.

Soult remained inactive during the 14th and 15th, and, on the morning of the 16th, Moore, conceiving that the enemy did not intend disturbing his retreat, gave orders to his men to retire into the town, and proceed with the embarkation, as soon as night should permit them to leave their position without being discovered by the enemy. However, about two o'clock in the afternoon, four massy columns were observed descending from the heights which they occupied, and advancing, with a swift pace, toward the British line. Sir John Moore instantly rode to the front, his troops immediately stood to arms, and deployed into line, and thus awaited the attack of the French troops, who steadily advanced in long, deep columns, preceded by a body of light troops, as skirmishers. These drove in the British advanced posts, with great vigor, and made themselves masters of Elvina, in the confusion consequent on the retreat of the outposts. As they neared the center of the British position, they deployed into line, and it at once became evident, that they extended greatly beyond its extreme right; but the 4th regiment, which was stationed at that part of the line, by no means discouraged by this alarming circumstance, immediately threw back its right wing and presenting a front in two directions, advanced, and was soon warmly engaged with the enemy. Meantime Mermet's troops, after having carried Elvina, were bursting through the inclosures which lay between its houses and the British, with loud cheers and all the exultation of victory. At this time the action became very warm along the whole line. The French and English centers had now advanced within pistol-shot of each other, and exchanged a few volleys;

when the 50th and 42d regiments were ordered to charge Mermet's division. They advanced, and, at the point of the bayonet, forced them back, and drove them through Elvina, and a considerable distance up the slope on the other side. But the ardor and impetuosity of these brave troops carried them too far, and being disordered by their success, were assailed by a fresh body of French troops, who drove them back through the streets of the village, with considerable loss.

Sir John Moore, however, rallied the broken regiments and brought up a battalion of guards to support them, then animating the men with the remembrance of their past glories, he again led them forward to the charge. The shock was irresistible, the enemy were driven back to the village of Elvina, and there maintained a gallant and glorious resistance. However, after a sanguinary struggle, they were driven out, with great slaughter.

It was while leading on this decisive charge, that the gallant Sir John Moore received his death wound; he was struck by a cannon-shot in the breast, which shattered his shoulder to pieces, and laid open his breast and lungs. He died the same evening, and was interred on the ramparts of Corunna, where a monument has been erected over his uncoffined remains, by the generosity and magnanmity of Marshal Ney.

Sir David Baird was also severely wounded in this charge.

Soult, seeing it were vain to think any longer of forcing the British center, determined to renew his attempts, with Laborde's division, on their left, where he hoped, from his superiority in numbers, to be able to outflank them. But the ground was unfavorable for his operations, and General Hope, who commanded the left wing, baffled all his efforts, and succeeded, after a short combat, in repulsing Laborde's division, which he pursued to the village of Palairo Abaxo, which was close under the French position. After a short resistance this village was carried, and remained in the hands of the British till the close of the day.

Mermet's division again advanced against the British right, but General Paget, with the reserves, met the assailants, and charged them with such vigor, that they were thrown back upon Lahoussaye's dragoons, and all driven in confusion and disorder to the foot of the hill.

The want of cavalry was severely felt by the British, on this occasion, as with the aid of that powerful arm the French left wing would have been utterly routed. As it was, when night closed on this field of carnage, the French were driven back at all points, and the British line considerably advanced, and their embarkation secured without interruption.

In this engagement the British loss, in killed and wounded, amounted to 800 or 1,000; the French to at least 2,000.

COWAN'S FORD, A.D. 1781.—On the 1st of February, 1781, a battle was fought between a detachment of the American patriot army, under General Davidson, and a body of British grenadiers, commanded by General O'Hara, at Cowan's Ford, on the Catawba, Mecklenburg county, North Carolina. In the face of the enemy's fire, the British troops crossed the river, and falling fiercely on the Americans, who had warmly disputed their passage, put them to flight, with considerable loss. General Davidson was shot dead.

COWPENS, A.D. 1781.—This village is situated about midway between the Pacolet and Broad rivers, in Spartanburg district, South Carolina, four miles south of the North Carolina line.

At the close of December, 1780, Brigadier General Morgan, with 400 continental infantry, under Lieutenant Colonel Howard of Maryland; two companies of the Virginian militia, under Captains Triplet and Tate; 100 dragoons, under Lieutenant Colonel William Washington; a body of North Carolina militia, under Major McDowell, and some Georgia militia, under Major Cunningham, was incamped on the northern bank of the Pacolet river, near the Pacolet springs. Washington and his dragoons frequently sallied out from this camp, for the purpose of punishing the marauding bodies of Tories, who were in the habit of plundering and insulting the Whig inhabitants of the Carolinas. Washington's dragoons soon became the terror of the Tories, and Lord Cornwallis, who was stationed with his troops at Winnsborough, was alarmed at the successes of the American troopers, and resolved to break up Morgan's camp, and disperse his troops. Accordingly, he detached Tarleton with 300 cavalry, and about 700 foot, with two pieces of cannon, with orders to drive Morgan from his position. The British detachment commenced its march on the 12th of January, 1781, and on the 14th arrived in the vicinity of the Pacolet river. Morgan, on the approach of the British, was at first inclined to dispute their passage of the Pacolet; but receiving intelligence of the superiority of their numbers, he retreated and took up a position near the Cowpens, on the north side of Thicketty mountain. Tarleton pursued eagerly, and, on the evening of the 16th, reached Morgan's old camp, a few hours after the Americans had left. Leaving his baggage at this place, Tarleton pressed on in hot pursuit, riding all night, and taking a circuitous route around the western side of the Thicketty mountain. At eight o'clock, on the morning of January 17th, the British army came within sight of the advanced parties of the enemy. The Americans were drawn up in battle array awaiting Tarleton's approach. They occupied the summit and sloping side of a forest-crowned eminence. The first line consisted of 300 practiced riflemen, under the command of Colonel Andrew Pickens. About 150 paces behind these troops, the second line was stationed, occupying the summit of the eminence, and concealed among the trees. It consisted of 430 men, of whom 290 were Maryland regulars, and 140 Virginian militia. This line was under the command of Lieutenant Colonel Howard. At about 150 paces in advance of the first line, was stationed a body of picked riflemen, under the command of Cunningham, on the right, and McDowell on the left. Colonel Washington's dragoons, and McCall's mounted militiamen, of Georgia, were posted behind the second line. Morgan stationed himself near Howard, in the rear, as a reserve. When Tarleton arrived within 300 yards of the first line of the American army, upon the Spartanburg road, he halted, and made his dispositions for the approaching battle. The British army was drawn up in two lines, the infantry in the center, and the cavalry on the two wings. In the center of the first line were the two pieces of cannon. The first line was commanded by Major Newmarsh, the second by Major McArthurs. Tarleton placed himself in the first line. It was a glorious morning, the sun shining brightly upon the field which was so soon to be drenched with the blood of human beings. The crimson uniforms, and glistening weapons, of the British, presented a strong contrast to the homely guise and tarnished arms of the Americans; but the issue of the contest proved that the brown barrel of the American rifle was equal, if not superior, to the polished iron of the British musket and bayonet. And the motives of the combatants must have presented as strong a contrast, as was exhibited in their outward appearance. The British were actuated by a sense of duty as paid soldiers and loyal subjects of their king, and by a desire to uphold their character as valiant and experienced soldiers. The Americans were filled with a desire to revenge the wrongs and outrages which the Tories and English had committed upon their neighbors, their homes and themselves, and were resolved to a man to teach the insolent invaders that they were able to cope with them with their own weapons, even on unequal grounds. Tarleton gave the signal, and the soldiers of his first line, with a loud shout, rushed forward while the cannon in their center thundered furiously on the Americans. Cunningham and McDowell's riflemen greeted them with one terrific discharge, and then retired to the first line under Pickens.

The British, with prolonged shouts, rushed on, and delivered a close fire upon the militia, who threw rapid and destructive discharges upon the approaching enemy. The British column steadily advanced, and charged furiously upon the militia, who fled, those under McCall to their horses, and the others under Pickens to the right of the second line. The British now vigorously assailed the main body of the Americans; but they were received with such a warm resistance, that they wavered. The British reserve under McArthur was now ordered to advance. The conflict now raged furiously. When the battle was at its height, McArthur endeavored to gain the American right flank, under Howard. This maneuver was successful, and the American regulars gave way. Morgan now ordered the whole line to retreat to the eminence in front of the cavalry. This movement the British believed to be the precursor of flight, and followed up the Americans with shouts of victory. But when close upon the heels of the retreating Americans, Howard ordered his men to face about and fire. The words were obeyed with alacrity, and the Americans poured a deadly volley upon the pursuers, who, terrified at this unexpected movement, recoiled in disorder. Howard now ordered his men to charge. Like tigers the patriots sprung upon their foes and hurled them back reeling down the hill. At the same time, some British cavalry, gaining the rear of the Americans, fell upon McCall's mounted militia. But at this moment Colonel Washington, with his dragoons, charged like a hurricane upon them, scattering them before him like chaff. This decided the victory. The Americans making one general charge on the enemy drove them like sheep before them. Washington, hot in pursuit, outstripped his soldiers in the chase, and was close behind a body of British cavalry, with Tarleton and two of his aids at their head. Observing the recklessness of the American officer, Tarleton ordered his men to face about and capture him. A British officer was about to strike the gallant American with his sword, when his serjeant arrived and disabled his adversary's sword-arm. Another of Tarleton's officers was about to strike him, when he was wounded by a pistol ball from Washington's bugler. Tarleton, himself, then advanced to run the American officer through with his sword; but Washington parried the thrust and wounded the Briton in the hand. Tarleton wheeled his horse, and as he retreated fired his pistol at Washington, wounding him in the knee. The British army continued to retreat during the whole night, and the following day reached the camp of Cornwallis, at Turkey Creek, about twenty-five miles from the Cowpens. The Americans lost in this battle 70 men, of whom 12 only were slain. Tarleton lost in killed wounded and prisoners, more than 800 men, two pieces of cannon, 800 muskets, the colors of the 7th regiment, and all his carriages and baggage. One hundred dragoon horses also fell into the hands of the Americans. The battle of the Cowpens was one of the most decisive of the American Revolutionary war. It in fact paralysed the power of the Royalists in the South. It was to Cornwallis what the battle of Bennington was to Burgoyne.

CRANEY ISLAND, A.D. 1813.—On the 22d of June, 1813, fifty barges filled with troops, put off from the British fleet then lying in James river, in Virginia, and rapidly approached Craney Island, to make an attack on that island, the first obstacle in the way of their fleet between the mouth of the river and the city of Norfolk. The Americans had manned a fort on the north side of this island with 100 seamen, while they had placed gun-boats to command the channel on the opposite side. The barges avoiding the gun-boats came within range of the batteries on shore, which opened such a destructive fire upon them that many of the boats were cut in two and sunk, and the remainder compelled to retire. The British troops also made an attempt from the main land; but they were repulsed with loss by the Virginia militia. The English lost in this attack 300 men. The American loss was trifling.

CRANON, B.C. 322.—The Macedonians, under Antipater and Craterus, were victorious over the confederate Greeks, whom they defeated twice by sea, and once by land near Cranon, in Thessaly. The Athenians demanded peace, and Antipater, the conqueror, put their orators to death. Among them was Hyperides, who, that he might not betray the secrets of his country, when under torture, cut out his tongue.—Dufresnoy.

CRAYFORD, A.D. 457.—In the year 457, a battle took place between the Saxons and Britons near Cayford, in Kent county, England. The Saxons were commanded by Hengrist and Oise, his son. The Britons were under the command of Vortimer. The Saxons advanced fiercely to the fight, shielding themselves from the blows of the enemy with a target which they bore on their left arm, while with their right hand they dealt vigorous blows with their ponderous swords and battle-axes, or cast their spears and lances with the greatest accuracy. The Britons fled in wild disorder before the invaders. Four of the leaders were slain, and the battle-field was encumbered with their dead. The whole of Kent was abandoned to the Saxons, the fugitive Britons taking refuge in London.

CRESSY, A.D. 1346.—Cressy, an inconsiderable village, eleven miles north of Abbeville, in France, is famous in history for the battle fought in its vicinity by the English, under Edward III., and the French, under their king, Philip of Valois, on the 26th of August, 1346.

Edward chose his ground with advantage near the village of Cressy. He drew up his army on a gentle ascent, and divided them into three lines. The first line was commanded by the Prince of Wales (then only fifteen years of age), and under him, by the Earls of Warwick and Oxford, by Harcourt, and by the Lords Chandos, Holland, and other noblemen. The Earls Arundel and Northampton, with the Lords Willoughby, Basset, Roos, and Sir Lewis Tufton, were at the head of the second line. Edward took to himself the command of the third division, by which he proposed either to bring succor to the two first lines, or to push his advantages against the enemy. He had, likewise, the precaution to throw up trenches on his flanks; and he placed all his baggage behind him in a wood, which he also secured by an intrenchment.

The skill and order of this disposition, with the tranquillity in which it was made, served extremely to compose the minds of the soldiers; and the king, that he might further inspirit them, rode through the ranks with such an air of cheerfulness and alacrity, as conveyed the highest confidence into every beholder. He pointed out to them the necessity to which they were reduced, and the certain and inevitable destruction which awaited them, if, in their present situation, inclosed on all hands in an enemy's country, they trusted to any thing but their own valor, or gave that enemy an opportunity of taking revenge for the many insults and indignities which they had of late put upon him. He reminded them of the visible ascendant which they had hitherto maintained over all the bodies of French troops that had fallen in their way; and assured them, that the superior numbers of the army which at present hovered over them, was compensated by the order in which he had placed his own army, and the resolution which he expected from them. He demanded nothing, he said, but that they would imitate his own example, and that of the Prince of Wales; and as the honor, the lives, and liberties of all were now exposed to the same danger, he was confident that they would make one common effort to extricate themselves from their present difficulties, and that their united courage would give them the victory over all their enemies. It is related by some historians, that Edward, besides the resources which he had found in his own genius and presence of mind, employed also a new invention against the enemy, and placed in his front some pieces of artillery; the first that had yet been made use of on any remarkable occasion in Europe.

The invention of artillery was at this time known in France as well as in England; but Philip, the French king, in his hurry to overtake the enemy, had left his cannon behind him, which he regarded as a useless incumbrance. All his movements discovered the same imprudence and precipitation. Impelled by anger, a dangerous counselor, and trusting to the great superiority of his numbers, he thought that all depended on forcing an engagement with the English; and that, if he could once reach the enemy in their retreat, the victory on his side must inevitably ensue.

He made a hasty march, in some confusion, from Abbeville; but after he had advanced about two leagues, some gentlemen whom he had sent before to take a view of the English, returned to him, and brought him intelligence, that they had seen them drawn up in great order, and awaiting his arrival. They, therefore, desired him to defer the combat till the ensuing day, when his army would have recovered from their fatigue, and might be disposed into better order than their present hurry had permitted them to observe. Philip assented to this counsel; but the former precipitation of his march, and the impatience of the French nobility, made it impracticable for him to put it in execution. One division pressed upon another; orders to stop were not seasonably conveyed to all of them; this immense body was not governed by sufficient discipline to be manageable; and the French army, imperfectly formed into three lines, arrived, already fatigued and disordered, in presence of the enemy. The first line, consisting of 15,000 Genoese cross-bowmen, was commanded by Anthony Doria, and Charles Grimaldi; the second was led by the Count Alençon, brother to the king; the king himself was at the head of the third. Besides the French monarch, there were no less than three crowned heads in this army—the King of Bohemia, the King of the Romans (his son), and King of Majorca; with all the nobility and great vassals of the crown of France. The army now consisted of above 120,000 men, more than three times the number of the enemy. But the prudence of one man was superior to the advantage of all this force and splendor.

The English, on the approach of the French army kept their ranks firm and immovable; and the Genoese first began the attack. There had happened, a little before the engagement, a thunder-shower, which had moistened and relaxed the strings of the Genoese cross-bows, and their arrows, for this reason, fell short of the enemy. The English archers, taking their bows out of their cases, poured in a shower of arrows upon this multitude who were opposed to them, and soon threw them into disorder. The Genoese fell back upon the heavy-armed cavalry of the Count of Alençon, who, enraged at their cowardice, ordered his troops to put them to the sword. The artillery fired amid the crowd; the English archers continued to send in their arrows among them, and nothing was to be seen in that vast body but hurry and confusion, terror and dismay. The young Prince of Wales had the presence of mind to take advantage of this situation, and to lead on his line to the charge. The French cavalry, however, recovering somewhat of their order, and encouraged by the example of their leader, made a stout resistance; and having at last cleared themselves of the Genoese runaways advanced upon their enemies, and, by their superior numbers, began to hem them round.

The Earls of Arundel and Northampton now brought forward their line to sustain the prince, who, ardent in his first feats of arms, set an example of valor which was imitated by all his followers. The battle became, for some time, hot and dangerous; and the Earl of Warwick, apprehensive of the event, dispatched a messenger to the king, and entreated him to send succors to the relief of the prince. Edward had chosen his station on the top of the hill; and he surveyed in tranquillity the scene of the action. When the messengers accosted him, his first question was whether the prince was slain or wounded. On receiving an answer in the negative, "Return," said he, "to my son, and tell him that I reserve the honor of the day to him: I am confident that he will show himself worthy of the honor of knighthood, which I so lately conferred upon him; he will be able without any assistance to repel the enemy." This speech being reported to the prince and his attendants, inspired them with fresh courage; they made an attack with redoubled vigor on the French, in which the Count of Alençon was slain, and the whole line of cavalry was thrown into disorder; the riders were most of them killed or wounded; the Welsh infantry rushed into the throng, and put to death all who came in their way; nor was any quarter given that day by the victors.

The King of France advanced in vain with the rear to sustain the division commanded by his brother; he found it already discomfited; and this increased the confusion which was before but too prevalent in his own body. He had himself a horse killed under him; he was remounted; and though left almost alone, he seemed still determined to maintain the combat; when John of Hainalt seized the reins of his bridle, turned about his horse, and carried him off the field of battle. The whole French army took to flight, and was followed and put to the sword, without mercy, by the English, till the darkness of the night put an end to the pursuit. Edward, on his return to the camp, flew into the arms of the Prince of Wales, and exclaimed, "My brave son! persevere in your honorable cause; you are my son, for valiantly have you acquitted yourself to-day; you have shown yourself worthy of empire." In this battle there fell on the side of the French, by a moderate computation, 1,200 knights, 1,400 gentlemen, 4,000 men-at-arms, besides about 30,000 of inferior rank; many of the principal nobility, the Dukes of Lorraine and Bourbon, the Earls of Flanders, Blois, Vaudemont, Aumele, were left on the field. The Kings also of Bohemia and Majorca were slain. The fate of the former was remarkable. He was blind from age; but being resolved to hazard his person and set an example to others, he ordered the reins of his bridle to be tied on each side to the horses of two gentlemen of his train; and his dead body and those of his attendants were afterward found among the slain, with their horses standing by them in that situation. His crest was three ostrich feathers, and his motto these German words, Ich dien,* which the Prince of Wales and his successors adopted in memorial of this great victory. The action may seem no less wonderful for the small loss sustained by the English, than for the great slaughter of the French. There were killed in it only one squire, three knights, with very few of inferior rank, a demonstration that the prudent disposition planned by Edward, and the disorderly attack made by the French, had rendered the whole rather a rout than a battle, which, indeed, was a common case with engagements in those times.—Hume.

CREEK WAR, A.D. 1813–14.—We have deemed it advisable to give a condensed sketch of this war, rather than detailed accounts of its several battles.

The intelligence of the massacre of the whites at Fort Mimms, by the Indians, went through the States of Georgia, Tennessee, North and South Carolina, like a clap of thunder, arousing the people to the highest pitch of excitement and indignation. The citizens on all sides flew to arms; and at a mass-meeting held at Nashville, Tennessee, on the 17th of September, 1813, Andrew Jackson was unanimously nominated commander-in-chief of the troops of the State. The legislature confirmed the nomination, and $200,000 were appropriated to carry on the war. Jackson issued a stirring appeal, calling on the people to enroll themselves under his banner. "Already," said he, "are large bodies of hostile Creeks marching to your borders, with their scalping-knives unsheathed to butcher your women and children; time is not to be lost. We must hasten to the frontier, or we shall find it drenched in the blood of our citizens." A large number of citizens obeyed this call, and hastened to Fayetteville, the place of rendezvous, where Jackson joined them on the 7th of October. On the evening of the 8th, Jackson received a dispatch from Colonel Coffee, who, with a large detachment, was stationed at Huntsville, thirty miles from Fayetteville, stating that large parties of Indians were approaching the frontiers of Georgia and Tennessee.

On the morning of the 10th, Jackson advanced with his army toward Huntsville, where he arrived on the evening of the next day. The Creeks were now hemmed in by enemies. On the west of these settlements they were threatened by 600 Mississippi volunteers, and 600 regulars, under Colonel Russel; General Floyd, with 2,500 Georgia militia, was on the east; and on the north 5,000 Tennessee militia, were advancing; 2,500 under General Jackson, from west Tennessee, and the same number under Generals White and Cooke, from the eastern part of the State. From Huntsville Jackson proceeded to Dilto's Ferry, where Coffee was encamped. From this place he detaced General Coffee, with 600 men, to attack the Indians at Black Warriorstown, 100 miles south. On the 19th of October, Jackson, with his army, started for Thompson's Creek, where he arrived on the 22d. He had expected to find provisions at this place; but they had not arrived, yet he did not despair, but pushed on through the wilderness as far as Tenplands, where he erected Fort Slother, to serve as a dépôt, and to cover his retreat should such a movement be necessary. His soldiers were now wretchedly supplied with provisions, but they were not despondent. General Coffee, meanwhile, had returned successful from his expedition to Black Warriorstown; and was immediately ordered to attack a large body of Indians at Tallushatchee, about thirty miles from Fort Slother. Coffee, with 900 men, marched through the forest and fell upon the savages with so much vigor, that, although the Indians fought with the utmost desperation, nearly the whole body was cut off. A hundred and eighty warriors were slain, and their dwellings reduced to ashes. Having accomplished this, Coffee returned to Jackson's camp. On the 7th of November, an Indian runner brought to Jackson the intelligence that Fort Talladega, some thirty miles distant, was menaced by the Creeks, and being assured that if he did not march at once to its relief, the friendly Indians who had sought shelter within its walls, would be massacred, Jackson, with 2,000 men, advanced through the wilderness, and on the 8th, at dusk, arrived within six miles of the fort. The Creeks lay in great numbers about the fort. At four o'clock the Americans, in three columns, cautiously advanced toward the Indian encampment. Arriving within a mile of the enemy they prepared for battle. The American army was composed of 800 foot and 700 horse. Two hundred and fifty of the cavalry, under Lieutenant Colonel Dyer, were stationed in the rear of the center, to act as a reserve. The two brigades of Hall and Roberts occupied the center, while the right and left wings were composed of cavalry. The order to advance was given; the two wings of cavalry darted forward, the one on the right the other on the left, inclining their heads toward each other as they advanced until they met beyond the hostile encampment. Meanwhile the infantry pushed forward, keeping pace with the cavalry, until the enemy was completely surrounded. Then came the din of battle; the horsemen discharged their rifles with deadly aim, while the infantry sent volley after volley into the midst of the affrighted savages, who ran frantically around the fiery circle firing at random, and filling the air with whoops of impotent rage and despair. They fell on all sides before the withering fire of the Americans, like grass before the mower's scythe. At length they discovered an opening between the cavalry and infantry, and like a river poured through it, flying rapidly for the mountains. The horsemen pursued fiercely, and the sharp crack of their rifles, and the screams of the fugitives, plainly told how hot was the chase. The fugitives finally gained the mountains, and they were safe from further pursuit. Over 300 of the Indians were slain on the spot where the fight began, and 200 were wounded. A great number were also slain in the flight. The Americans lost ninety-five in killed and wounded. Having thus relieved Fort Talladega, Jackson returned to Fort Slother, where he remained with his army unemployed until the middle of January, 1814. General Clairborne, with his volunteers, meanwhile, was passing up the east side of Alabama, piercing to the towns above the Catawba, and destroying Indian villages. He encountered and defeated the Indians under their great chief Weathersford, with a loss of only one man killed and seven wounded. Having completely subdued the Indians in that part of the country, he returned to Fort Clairborne. About the middle of January, Jackson was reinforced by 800 men; and he resolved to make a diversion in favor of General Floyd, who was advancing from the east. Floyd, on the morning of the 29th, while advancing along the southern bank of the Talapoosa river, came suddenly upon the town of Autossee, where a strong body of Indians were posted. The Indians were taken by surprise; but they soon rallied and fought with the utmost desperation. Floyd at length got his artillery to bear upon them, and they fled in dismay, leaving the ground covered with their dead. Several hundred Indians were killed and wounded. The Americans lost sixty-five in killed and wounded. Among the latter was General Floyd, who was struck by a bullet while leading on his men. Jackson, hearing that a strong body of Indians were encamped at the junction of the Emuckfau Creek with the Talapoosa river, and wishing to divert their attention from General Floyd, marched thither, and arrived near their encampment on the evening of the 21st of January, 1814. Here he halted, intending to attack the enemy the next morning. To prevent a surprise, the Americans built watch-fires around their camp, and stood to their arms all night. The Indians had observed the approach of the Americans and resolved on an attack. Just before dawn, with a yell which resounded through the forest, the savages from all quarters rushed furiously into the camp. But a rapid and deadly discharge from the Americans sent them back howling into cover. At sunrise, General Coffee ordered a charge, which drove the Indians to their camp. He then advanced to attack the encampment, but found it too strong, and retired. The Indians then attacked the American camp, and they fought with such desperate valor, that the Americans were obliged to make repeated charges before the savages finally took to flight. The Indians lost many of their bravest warriors, and the Americans suffered considerably in this short conflict. Among other officers, General Coffee was severely wounded.

Having thus drawn the attention of the Indians from Floyd's force to his own, Jackson determined to retreat. On the 23d he began to retrace his steps, and at dusk arrived at the ford of Enotochopeo. Fearing a surprise at this place he moved about 600 yards further down the stream to another ford, where he encamped for the night. Early the next morning the troops commenced crossing. Jackson expected an attack while in the middle of the river, and therefore had formed his rear in order of battle. His expectations were correct. No sooner had a portion of the army gained the opposite shore than guns were heard in the rear. The savages in great numbers issued from the forest, and rushed upon the militia, who with their officers gave way in terror, and hurried in the utmost confusion into the river. The entire rear of the army was in imminent danger of being cut off; but General Carroll with Captain Quarles, and 25 men, turned fiercely upon the enemy, and with well directed volleys, held them in check. General Coffee sprang from his litter and leaping to his saddle, galloped hastily toward the scene of action. Jackson succeeded in rallying his troops, and with one charge the savages were put to flight. Jackson, after burying the dead and attending to the wants of the wounded, resumed his march, and on the 28th, reached Fort Slother in safety.

On the 27th of January, General Floyd, again advancing into the Creek country, was attacked, just before sunrise by a numerous body of savages. The Indians fought with desperate valor; but were at length put to flight by a vigorous charge of the bayonet, leaving 37 dead on the field. Jackson remained at Fort Slother until March, when having received large reinforcements he found himself at the head of 4,000 militia and volunteers, a regiment of regular troops, and several hundred friendly Indians. Having completed his arrangements, Jackson, with 4,000 men, on the 16th of March, marched into the Creek country. He established and garrisoned Fort Williams, at the junction of Cedar creek with the Coosa river, and then with about twenty-five hundred men marched toward the Emuckfau creek. The Indians about a thousand strong were posted in an intrenched camp on the Tallapoosa river, about five miles below the Emuckfau. The river at this point, wrapped itself around a tract of land, covering about one thousand acres, in the form of a horse-shoe, whence it is called Tohopeka land. The Indians had erected across the neck leading to the open plain, a breast-work of logs, about eight feet high, and pierced it with a double row of port holes. Behind this work, was an elevated piece of ground, and further back lay the village along the shore of the stream. The Indian warriors were awaiting the arrival of the enemy behind their breast-works, while their women and children were placed for security in the village. On the 25th of March the Americans advanced to the attack. The conflict was obstinate and bloody. The Americans, after setting fire to the village, at length forced an entrance into the enemy's works. The Indians would not yield and scorned to ask for quarter. The fight became a butchery, Jackson, wishing to spare the lives of the savages, sent an interpreter to them offering them pardon; but they sternly refused, fighting on with the desperation of demons; but their efforts were all in vain; the rifles and bayonets of the Americans rapidly thinned their numbers, and the survivors fled to the brush and timber on the hill. Jackson turned his cannon on the spot, but failing to dislodge them, ordered the grass and brush to be fired. Driven forth by the flames the Indians fled toward the river; but most of them were slain before reaching the water. Darkness alone put an end to the terrible slaughter. 557 Indians were killed, and 250 were wounded in and around the encampment; and many of them must have perished in their flight. The Americans lost, in killed and wounded, about 200. The next day Jackson took up his backward march to Fort William. The battle of Tohopeka, completely subdued the valor of the Indians; and Jackson returned to Tennessee covered with laurels. In a few months peace was restored between all the southern tribes, and the government of the United States.

CREMONA, B.C. 200.—On the left bank of the river Po, in Italy, stands the city of Cremona, melancholy and dreary. Everywhere it shows the symptoms of decay; the grass growing in its streets and its buildings seeming ready to tumble down in ruins. Yet this city has now a population of 28,000 inhabitants.

A numerous army of Gauls in the year 200 B.C., laid siege to Cremona. The prætor Lucius Furius marched to the succor of the allies of the Romans, in the absence of the consul. He gave battle the moment he arrived. The Gauls fought bravely, but at length took to flight, and retired in disorder to their camp. The Romans followed them thither, attacked the camp, and took it. Out of 35,000 combatants, scarcely 6,000 were saved. Eighty standards, and 200 chariots filled with booty were the trophies and the ornaments of the triumph. Amilcar, a Carthaginian general, who had joined the barbarians, fell in this engagement, together with three of the most distinguished Gaulish leaders.

SECOND SIEGE, B.C. 69.—Vespasian was just raised to the empire, but he still had to tear the diadem from the brow of the barbarous Vitellius, and maintain the choice of the legions with the sword. The new emperor sent Primus, one of his lieutenants, and a very skillful general, against the tyrant of Rome. After several advantages, Primus attacked two legions posted before Cremona. The Roman legions fought against each other like the most determined enemies. Primus was near losing the battle; but his courage rallied his troops when on the point of giving way, and he brought them back to the charge, and gained a complete victory. His army was eager to enter Cremona, but was prevented by the arrival of six legions of the opposite party. A fresh nocturnal combat instantly ensued between the victorious soldiers and their newly arrived enemies. Success was doubtful; in the obscurity of night, address and courage were equally useless; they slaughtered each other indiscriminately —their blows fell as frequently upon their friends as upon their foes. At length, however, the moon shed her beams over the bloody scene, and gave a more certain direction to the fury of the combatants; the troops of Primus had this friendly light at their backs. In this situation, the legions opposed to them, deceived by the shade, aimed their arrows badly, and shot them short of the mark. Primus profiting by this advantage, encouraged his soldiers, redoubled his exertions, and added the prudence of a consummate captain to the bravery of an enterprising soldier. Nothing could resist him; his enemies fled before him; and Primus was victor a second time.

This carnage was signalized by one of those tragical events which are only met with in civil wars; a son killed his own father without knowing him; he recognized him as he was expiring, and, transported with grief, he gave himself up to despair, cursing the war which had made him an involuntary parricide. The victorious troops were indefatigable; believing that nothing was done till all was done, they attacked and carried the camp which surrounded Cremona. This place must have fallen into their hands, and the inhabitants surrendered, in the hopes of meriting some clemency by a prompt and voluntary submission; but they were deceived; the greedy legions would not be disappointed of their booty. Cremona was pillaged, its walls were razed, its citizens were slaughtered, its edifices were burned, and the city was almost entirely destroyed by troops which ought to have respected the ancient allies of the Roman people, and the citizens of the same empire.

Third Siege, A.D. 1702.—Cremona was besieged in 1702 by Prince Eugene. Marshal de Villeroi was at the time within the walls. It was in the depth of winter, and the marshal was one day comfortably asleep, when he was awakened by a discharge of musketry; he arose in all haste, and was quickly on horseback. The first thing he met was a squadron of the enemy, by whom he was in an instant brought to the ground. A German officer, judging by his uniform that he was a general, made him his prisoner. As soon as he was on his feet, he whispered to the officer, "I am the Marshal de Villeroi; I will give you ten thousand pistoles, and the command of a regiment, if you will conduct me to the citadel." "I have for a long time," replied the officer, "served the emperor, my master, and I will not begin betraying him to-day." He led him to the most remote corps-de-garde. The Marquis de Crenan, a lieutenant-general, was mortally wounded close to the marshal. Villeroi, a prisoner, showed great regret at not being free, and declared that he envied him his fate. He was immediately taken out of the city, without knowing what was going on there.

Prince Eugene was already in Cremona. A priest named Cassoli, the prevôt of Sainte-Marie-la-Neuve, had introduced the Germans by a sewer. Four hundred soldiers, by means of this sewer, had gained the house of the priest, and had immediately killed the guards of two of the gates. Prince Eugene then entered with 4,000 men. And all this had been done without the Spanish governor having the least suspicion, and before Marshal de Villeroi was awake. The Spanish governor showed himself in the streets at the head of a few soldiers, but was speedily killed by a musket-shot. All the general officers were either killed or taken, with the exception of the Count de Revel and the Marquis de Praslin. And yet the prudence of Prince Eugene was confounded. The Chevalier d'Entragues was that day to review, in the city, the royal regiment of the marine, of which he was colonel. These soldiers were already assembled at one extremity of the city, precisely at the moment Prince Eugene entered by the other. D'Entragues began by hastily scouring through the streets with his soldiers, and resisting all the Germans he met with, which gave time for the rest of the garrison to come up. Officers and soldiers, pell-mell, some badly armed, and some half-naked, without commanders, without order, filled the streets and public places, fought in confusion, or intrenched themselves from street to street, or from place to place. Two Irish regiments, which formed part of the garrison, stopped the efforts of the imperialists. Never was city surprised with more art and prudence, and never was one better defended by courage and promptness. The garrison consisted of 5,000 men; Prince Eugene had not introduced more than 4,000. A large detachment of his army was expected to arrive by the bridge over the Po; his measures were well taken, but another event deranged them all. The bridge over the Po, badly guarded by a hundred French soldiers, was to be seized by the German cuirassiers. At the instant Prince Eugene entered the city, it became necessary that as the cuirassiers had entered by the southern gate, near to the sewer, they should go out of Cremona immediately at the north, by the gate of the Po, and should hasten to the bridge. They went thither, but the guide who conducted them was killed by a musket-shot from a window, and the cuirassiers mistook one street for another, which made their passage much longer. In this short interval, the Irish threw themselves into the gate of the Po, and fought and repulsed the cuirassiers. This resistance at first perplexed Prince Eugene. He sent Macdonald, one of their compatriots, to them, who had been the first man that entered the city. "Sir," said he, addressing the commanding officer, "Prince Eugene has sent me here to say, that if you are willing to change your party, and come over to that of the Imperialists, he will promise you better pay, and more considerable pensions than you have in the French service. The affection I bear for all persons of my nation, and for you, sir, in particular, obliges me to extort you to accept the offers I make you from this general; if you refuse, I do not see how you are to escape certain destruction. With the exception of your solitary post, we are masters of the whole city; and this is why his highness only waits for my return to attack you with the greatest part of his forces, and cut you to pieces." "Sir," replied the commander, "if his highness waits your return to attack us and cut us to pieces, he is not likely to do so very quickly; for I arrest you as a prisoner, not considering you the envoy of a great general, but as a suborner. It is by such conduct we would merit the esteem of the prince who sent you, and not by a treachery unworthy of a man of honor." At these words, the combat was renewed with fresh fury. Eugene, finding Macdonald did not return, at once comprehended that he was arrested; and being unwilling to resort to force, he conceived another stratagem to make them lay down their arms. He went to Marshal Villeroi: "You have passed through the city, monsieur," said he, "and you must have remarked that we are masters of it. There are still some of your trailleurs firing from the ramparts; if that continues, they will oblige me to put them all to the sword; order them to surrender." The marshal easily perceived that the prince's affairs were not going on so well as he could wish, and only coolly replied—"I have the misfortune not to be at liberty, and therefore can order nothing." Eugene made a fresh attempt upon the Irish, who still opposed a wall of fire and steel to the Germans. The Baron de Freibourg was charged with this attack. Mahoney, commanding a battalion of Dillon, seized the bridle of this officer's horse, exclaiming, "Quarter for M. de Freibourg." But the latter, looking at him with contempt, replied, "This is not a day for clemency; do your duty, and I will do mine." He spoke, and a discharge of musketry stretched him dead on the pavement. The Marqis de Praslin, during this engagement, broke down the bridge over the Po, so that the Germans could not obtain the succors they looked for, and the city was saved. Prince Eugene, after fighting all day, being still master of the gate by which he had entered, at length retired, taking with him Marshal Villeroi and several officers prisoners, but having missed Cremona. His activity and prudence had given him the place, but the valor of the Irish and the French prevented his keeping it.—Robson.

Cremona suffered considerable during the French revolutionary wars, but had no siege of sufficient interest to warrant a place in our record.

CRIMESUS, 343 B.C.—The troubles in Syracuse, arising from the death of the tyrant Dionysius, and the expulsion and restoration of Dionysius the younger, caused the Carthaginians to deem it a favorable time to seize upon all Sicily. Accordingly, they fitted out a mighty fleet, which, in the year 343 B.C., set sail for that island, the most beautiful and fertile of the Mediterranean. The Syracusans saw with dismay the approach of the Carthaginian fleet, and, feeling themselves incapable of defending their city against such a force, they intreated aid of the Corinthians, who had often assisted them, and who were, of all the nations of Greece, most renowned for their hatred of tyranny and their love of liberty. The Corinthians immediatly sent over Timoleon, a man of great merit, who had freed his country from tyranny at the expense of his own family. He had scarcely a thousand soldiers, but with this small body of men he advanced boldly to the relief of Syracuse. His small army increased perpetually as he marched. The Carthaginians, in the mean time, had made themselves masters of the harbor; but the foreign soldiers among them began to manifest some discontent, and Mago, their commander, glad to have a pretense to retire, sailed from the harbor and steered for Carthage. Great indignation was excited by his return, and the Carthaginians at once levied new forces, and sent a greater and more powerful fleet than the former to Sicily. It consisted of 200 ships of war, and upward of 1,000 transports. The army numbered 70,000 men. Immediately after the departure of Mago the Corinthians gained the entire possession of the city of Syracuse. The Carthaginian army landed at Lilybæum, under the command of Amilcar and Hannibal, who resolved to make an attack upon the Corinthians first. Timoleon immediately marched out to meet them. The inhabitants of Syracuse were struck with such terror that scarce 3,000, out of ten times that number, ventured to follow him. Of 4,000 mercenaries which were in his army, 1,000 gave way to their fears when he was upon the march. They turned back, crying, "Timoleon must indeed be mad, or in his dotage, to go against an army of 70,000 men, with only 5,000 foot and 1,000 horse." But the brave Corinthian was not discouraged, he rejoiced, rather, that the cowards had discovered themselves before the battle. Timoleon's army hastily marched toward the enemy, who were drawn together on the banks of the river Crimesus. A thick mist was rising from the river, and spreading throughout the air, completely concealed the enemy's camp. But the inarticulate and confused noises which issued from beneath the dark vail which covered the Carthaginian camp, convinced the Corinthians that they were in the vicinity of a great army. At length the Corinthians halted and laid down their shields to rest awhile. Now, like a huge curtain, the fog uprose, and a magnificent spectacle was discovered to the gaze of the Corinthians. Below them rolled the river Crimesus, which the Carthaginians were crossing. Their first line consisted of chariots, each drawn by four horses, and armed with formidable scythes. The chariots were followed by 10,000 men with white bucklers. These troops were native Carthaginians and marched with deliberation and in good order, but behind them came the troops of other nations, who advanced in a confused and tumultuous manner. Timoleon, observing that he had the power of engaging with what number of the enemy he pleased—for the main body of the Carthaginian army was divided by the river, a portion having crossed, and a portion preparing to cross—ordered his cavalry to attack the enemy before they had time to range themselves in order of battle. But the Corinthian cavalry could not come to close quarters with the enemy, by reason of the armed chariots that ran to and fro in front of their army. Now Timoleon called for his buckler, and with a shout which was heard by his whole army, he called upon his infantry to follow him. His soldiers, believing him to be inspired from heaven, obeyed him with enthusiastic cries. The trumpet sounded, and the Corinthians, following their brave leader, rushed down upon the enemy. The Carthaginians sustained the first shock with great spirit; they were strongly protected with breast-plates of iron and helmets of brass, and covering themselves with their large shields, they could easily repel the thrusts of spears and javelins. The Greeks determined to decide the battle with the sword, a weapon which requires art as well as strength; they pressed, therefore, upon the enemy with such vigor, that the latter were compelled to defend themselves with the sword alone. At this moment, a severe storm of rain and wind arose. The tempest drove directly into the faces of the Carthaginians, who, blinded by the rain, and incumbered by their heavy armor, fought at a great disadvantage. The Greeks cut to pieces 400 men who composed the front ranks of the enemy, and then their whole body was put to flight. The Greeks pursued, overtaking many of the fugitives and putting them to the sword. A great number of them attempted to cross the river, but the stream, swollen by the rain, was impassable, and they were drowned. Among 10,000 Carthaginians slain, 3,000, it is said, were natives of Carthage, of the highest rank. So many native Carthaginians never before fell in one battle. 5,000 prisoners and 200 chariots were taken. The Carthaginian camp and baggage fell into the hands of the conquerors. Around Timoleon's camp were gathered immense piles of spoils, among which were 1,000 breast-plates of exquisite workmanship, and 10,000 bucklers. The bodies of the slain were arrayed in such costly armor, that those who stripped the dead rejected every thing save gold and silver. So great was the wealth of the vanquished army, that three days elapsed before the victors could gather the spoils. Then the Corinthians erected a trophy of victory on the field of battle, and Timoleon, after directing his mercenary troops to lay waste the Carthaginian province, returned to Syracuse.

CULLODEN, A.D. 1746.—The moor or plains of Culloden are situated about three miles from the city of Inverness, in the highlands of Scotland. They are surrounded by hills, except on the side next the sea.

It was here that Prince Charles, the Pretender to the crown of Scotland, with the rebel army, determined to await the royal army, under the Duke of Cumberland, and decide the fate of Scotland by a single blow.

The forces of the rebels, which consisted of 8,000 men, were drawn up in three divisions, with a few pieces of badly-manned, ill-served cannon in the front of their lines.

The battle commenced at one o'clock in the afternoon, on the 16th of April, 1746, when the cannon in the king's army committed frightful devastation in the ranks of the enemy, while at the same time theirs could made no adequate reply. The rebels did not feel at all comfortable under this heavy fire. They became impatient, and a body of 500 men made a furious irruption on the English left wing. The first line was broken and thrown into disorder by this onset, but two battalions coming up to their support, they opened a close and murderous fire upon the rebels, while, at the same time, Hawley's dragoons and the Argyleshire militia destroyed a park wall which had covered their flank, and fell upon them, sword in hand, with great slaughter.

Scarcely had thirty minutes elapsed, ere they were all routed, and the field covered with the bodies of the slain, to the number of 3,000. Some French troops, who had been in the field as allies of the rebels, were not engaged during the whole contest, but stood merely as spectators, delivered themselves up as prisoners of war. Besides much unnecessary cruelty was shown by the Duke of Cumberland, after the victory was secure. No quarter was given, and numbers were sabered who had not been in the rebel army, but had been attracted thither by curiosity.

This battle was the last fought by the Pretender. His forces were utterly routed, and his cause beginning to appear desperate; so with a few of his adherents, he set sail for France, where he arrived in a few days; he continued to reside some time at Morlaix, and died at Rome, in 1788.

CUNAXA, Battle of, and Retreat of the 10,000 Greeks, B.C. 400.—Cyrus was the youngest son of Darius, King of Persia, and brother of Artaxerxes. Darius, being at the point of death, desired both his sons to attend him. Artaxerxes, the eldest, being then present, he sent for Cyrus, whom he had appointed general of all the people who assemble in the plain of Castolus, in Asia. Cyrus immediately complied with his father's request, and came to court, accompanied by Tissaphernes, whom he then considered his friend, and attended by 300 heavy-armed Greeks, under the command of Xenias, a Parrhasian. After the death of Darius, Artaxerxes ascended the Persian throne. Cyrus saw the elevation of his brother with pain, and at the very time that Artaxerxes was taking possession of his throne, he attempted to deprive him of his crown and life together. Artaxerxes was not insensible of what he had to fear from his brother, and upon Cyrus being accused of treason by Tissaphernes, he caused him to be arrested, with the design of putting him to death; but the tears and prayers of his mother prevailed, and by his orders Cyrus was sent back to his government in Asia. Cyrus enraged at this fancied insult, thought of nothing but how to devise means whereby he might destroy his brother and mount the Persian throne himself. He received all who came to his court with the greatest affability, and sent them back more disposed to favor him than the king. His mother, who had a greater love for Cyrus than the King Artaxerxes, warmly seconded him, and he rapidly gained friends throughout the whole empire. His care and kindness attracted the affections of the barbarians over whom he ruled, and he soon trained them to be good soldiers and true to his cause. He also levied an army of Greeks, with all possible secrecy, that the king might not be aware of his measures, and make preparations to meet them. At length, by intrigue, and the efficient aid of his many friends, he collected an army of 13,000 Greeks; 100,000 barbarians, and 20 chariots armed with scythes. Clearchus, the Lacedæmonian, commanded all the Peloponnesian troops, except the Achæans, of whom Socrates of Achæa, was leader. The Bœotians were under Proxenus, the Theban, and the Thessalians under Menon. The barbarians were commanded by Persian generals, of whom the chief was Arieus. Cyrus carefully concealed from the Greeks the true object of his expedition. Having determined to march from Sardis, where he had collected his troops, to the upper provinces of Asia, he pretended that his design was to drive the Pisidians, who had infested his provinces by their incursions, entirely out of the country. Clearchus alone was acquainted with his real intentions. Tissaphernes, who was posted at Miletus, observing all these preparations, considered them greater than were necessary to be used against the Pisidians. He, therefore, hastened to the king, and informed him of the intended expedition of Cyrus. Artaxerxes immediately prepared himself to oppose him. Cyrus now set his army in motion, and advanced continually by long marches, until they arrived at Tarsus, a large and rich city of Cilicia. Here the Greeks refused to proceed any further. They rightly suspected that they were marching against the king. Clearchus endeavored to force his men to go on; but as soon as he began to march, they threw stones at him and his sumpter horses, so that he narrowly escaped being stoned to death. He turned toward his troops and addressed them. With tears in his eyes, he entreated them not to desert the cause of Cyrus. "But," said he, to his soldiers, in conclusion, "I have determined, at all events, to give you the preference, and with you to suffer any thing that may happen. Neither shall any one say, that, having led the Greeks among barbarians, I betrayed the Greeks and preferred the friendship of the barbarians. Since you refuse to obey me and to follow me, I will follow you, and share in all your sufferings; for I look on you as my country, my friends and fellow-soldiers, and that with you I shall live in honor wherever I am; but without you, that I shall neither be useful to my friends nor formidable to my enemies. Be assured, therefore, that whithersoever you go, I am resolved to go with you."

The soldiers, hearing this, commended him for declaring that he would not march against the king. Cyrus was much perplexed at this state of affairs; but Clearchus privately dispatched a messenger to him with encouragement that it would soon take a favorable turn; and that it would tend only to strengthen his cause in the eyes of the soldiers. He advised Cyrus to send for him publicly, at the same time informing him that he did not design to go to him. Cyrus did as he was advised, and then Clearchus assembling his soldiers again addressed them: "I know," said he, "that Cyrus thinks himself unjustly treated by us, and therefore shame prevented me from going to him when he sent for me. I am conscious myself of having deceived him, and I must confess that I was also afraid to go to him, lest he should cause me to be apprehended and punished for the wrongs he thinks I have done him. I am, therefore, of opinion that this is no time for us to sleep or to neglect the care of ourselves, but to consult what is to be done. If we stay, we are to consider by what means we may stay with the greatest security; and if we resolve to go away, how we may go with the greatest safety, and supply ourselves with provisions, for without these, neither a commander, nor a private man can be of any use. Cyrus is a very valuable friend, when he is a friend; but he is also an enemy to be dreaded when he is an enemy. He is also master of that strength in foot, horse, and at sea, which we all both see and are acquainted with, for truly we do not seem to be encamped at a great distance from him; so that this is the time for every one to advise what he judges best." Here he stopped. Here many arose of their own accord and gave various opinions. One said it would be impossible to return to Greece without the consent of Cyrus, and another insisted that without his consent they could not remain where they were. At length it was decided to send deputies to Cyrus, to ask him in what service he intended to employ them. Clearchus was appointed one of the deputies. The deputation now waited on Cyrus, who had been secretly apprised by Clearchus, of every thing that had transpired, and asked him the question appointed by the army. Cyrus replied: "I am informed that Abrocomas, my enemy, lies near the Euphrates, at the distance of twelve days' march. My intention, therefore is, if I find him to punish him by leading my army against him; but if he flies from the place, I will there consider what we are to do." When this answer was repeated to the Greeks, although they suspected that they were in reality to be led against the king, they resolved to proceed, and only demanded an augmentation of their pay. Cyrus, instead of one daric a month to each soldier, promised them one and a half. As Cyrus advanced through the country by long marches, he was informed, from all parts, that the king did not intend to come directly to a battle; but had resolved to wait in the heart of Persia until all his forces were assembled; and that, to stop his enemies, he had ordered to be dug in the plains of Babylon a ditch five fathoms broad, and three deep, extending the space of twelve leagues from the Euphrates to the wall of Media. Cyrus, having advanced into the country of Babylon, reviewed his forces, both Greeks and barbarians, in a plain, about midnight. He gave the command of the right wing to Clearchus, and that of the left to Menon, the Thessalonian, while he himself drew up his own men. After the review he marched onward in battle array, and passed the ditch dug by the king, without molestation. He now thought that his brother had abandoned all intention of fighting, and therefore, he proceeded with more negligence. At length, unexpectedly, Artaxerxes approached with his army in excellent order. The place where the battle was fought, was called Cunaxa, about 25 leagues from Babylon. The army of Cyrus consisted of 13,000 Greeks, 10,000 barbarians, and 20 chariots, whose wheels were armed with scythes. Artaxerxes's army amounted in all to about 1,200,000 men, under the four generals, Tissaphernes, Gobryas, Arbaces, and Abrocomas, who had each the command of 300,000 men; but of this number 900,000 only were present at the battle, together with 150 chariots armed with scythes. Abrocomas, with 300,000 men, was on his way from Phœnicia, and did not arrive until five days after the action. The sudden arrival of the king's army occasioned a general confusion among the Greeks, all expecting that he would charge them before they could put themselves in order. Cyrus immediataly leaped from his car, and putting on his corslet, and taking his javelin, mounted his horse. He rode swiftly through his army, commanding every man to take his post. His generals warmly seconded him, and by his directions quickly formed their troops. Clearchus took command of the right wing of the Grecian army. The left was under the control of Menon, while the center was composed of the men under Proxenus, and the other Grecian generals. One thousand Paphlagonian horse, of the barbarians, were planted with the Greek targeteers, next to Clearchus on the right. The left wing of the entire army consisted of the barbarian forces, and was under the command of Ariæus, Cyrus's lieutenant-general. Cyrus placed himself in the center of the left wing. He was surrounded by 600 horsemen, armed with large corslets and cuirasses. They all wore helmets except Cyrus, who stood ready for the charge with his head uncovered. The horses were armed with both frontlets and breastplates, and the horsemen with Greek swords. About three o'clock in the afternoon a great cloud of white dust arose, and announced that the army of the great king was upon them. Soon a black line stretched itself across the entire plain, and the glittering of armor, and lances, flashed along the line, like vivid lightning through a dark cloud. Now the heavy tramp of armed men shook the ground, and like distant thunder fell upon the ears of Cyrus and his army. The left wing of Artaxerxes's army was under the command of Tissaphernes, and consisted of cavalry armed with white cuirasses, and of light-armed infantry; the center was composed of the Egyptian heavy armed foot, who carried huge wooden shields, which covered their bodies from head to foot, and the right wing consisted of the rest of the light-armed infantry, and the cavalry. The troops marched according to their respective countries, each nation being drawn up in a solid oblong square. The king had posted himself in the main body of his army. His guard consisted of 6,000 horse, commanded by Artagersis. In the front of the army were disposed, at a considerable distance from one another, 150 chariots, armed with scythes fixed aslant at the axle-tree, or under the body of the chariot, pointing downward, that they might cut asunder every thing they encountered. Cyrus relied most on the valor and experience of the Greeks. Observing that the front of the king's army so much exceeded in extent, that of his own, that Artaxerxes, although in the center, was beyond his left wing, Cyrus commanded Clearchus to bring his men opposite to the center of the enemy, that they might attack the king. But Clearchus, however, fearing that the enemy, so greatly his superior in numbers, might surround him on both sides, would not be prevailed on to withdraw his right from the river; but answered Cyrus he would take care all should go well. The enemy in the mean time advanced slowly and in good order. Cyrus rode to a small distance before his ranks, and surveyed attentively both Artaxerxes's army and his own. While he was thus engaged, Xenophon, an Athenian, spurred directly up to him, and asked whether he had any thing to command. Cyrus ordered him to tell the Greeks that the sacrifices and victims promised success. Cyrus now immediately returned to his post. The two armies were now within a short distance from each other. The Greeks sung their battle hymn, and slowly advanced against the enemy. But in a fluctuation of the line of battle, a few who were left behind hastened forward, and urged on their comrades to a greater speed. Then, with a general shout, they ran with their greatest speed against the enemy, striking their shields with their darts, and prolonging their shouts. Their enemies, frightened at the terrible noise, turned their horses and fled, before a blow was struck. Tissaphernes, with a small body of his troops, alone stood his ground. The Greeks pursued the flying enemy, calling to one another not to run, but to follow in ranks. Many of the chariots of the enemy were driven back into their own ranks, without their charioteers; others were borne through the Greeks, who, seeing them, divided and escaped uninjured. The chariots committed great havoc upon the king's troops; but did not injure one of the Grecians. Cyrus rejoiced when he saw the Greeks victorious, and those about him worshiped him almost as a god, and proclaimed him king at once. But he did not yet consider himself a victor, and therefore did not leave his post to join in the pursuit. Artaxerxes now wheeled his right to attack Cyrus in flank. Upon perceiving this, Cyrus marched directly against him with his 600 horse. With his own hand he killed Artagersis, who commanded the king's guard of 6,000 horse. On the death of their general the guards fled, and Cyrus, perceiving his brother, cried out, his eyes sparkling with rage, "I see the man." Then running furiously at him, he broke through the king's attendants, and striking him on the breast, wounded him through the corslet. At the same time Cyrus received a wound under the eye, from a well-directed javelin cast from the hand of one of the king's attendants. The two brothers now engaged in a furious hand-to-hand combat, while their retainers madly fought with each other in defense of their respective leaders. Imbued with deadly hatred and envy, Cyrus and Artaxerxes furiously struck at each other, each endeavoring to plunge his sword into his opponent's heart, and to assure himself of the throne by the death of his rival. By a well-directed stroke Cyrus killed his antagonist's horse, which fell, bringing his rider to the ground. The king quickly mounted another horse, when Cyrus attacked him again, and wounded him a second time. The king, foaming with rage, spurred his horse against his enemy, who was on the point of again striking him with his weapon. Cyrus plunged headlong into the midst of a flight of darts, which were discharged at him from all sides. The king, with all his strength, hurled his javelin at his brother, wounding him severely. At the same instant the king's attendants discharged their weapons against the wounded man, and, pierced through and through with a multitude of arrows, Cyrus fell dead to the ground. When Artapolis, the favorite minister of Cyrus, saw him fall, he leaped from his horse, and throwing himself upon the body of his master, embraced it, and while in that position, was killed by order of the king. Ariæus, who ought to have been the foremost of all his adherents, fled with the left wing of the army, as soon as he heard of his death. All of his other friends and favorites died fighting for him. Artaxerxes caused the head and right hand of his brother to be cut off by the eunuch Mesabales, and then pursued the enemy into their camp. Ariæus had not stopped there, but having passed through it, continued his retreat to the place where the army had encamped the day before, which was about four leagues distant. The king with his forces plundered the camp; there he found Cyrus's mistress, Aspasia, a woman of great beauty and wit. He made her his captive, but her companion, a young girl, escaped to the quarter of the Greeks who were left to guard the baggage. Thus warned, they killed many of those who came to plunder their camp, and finally succeeded in driving them from the spot, with but slight loss to themselves. Tissaphernes, after the defeat of the greater part of his left wing by the Greeks, led on the rest against them, and by the side of the river passed through the Grecian light-armed infantry, which opened to give him passage. As he passed through the Greeks they discharged a shower of arrows upon him, which wounded many of his men. Tissaphernes continued his march, without returning to the charge, and went forward to Cyrus's camp, where he joined the forces of the king, who were plundering it. The army of Artaxexes, and the main body of the Greek army, were at a considerable distance from each other; the Greeks pursuing the flying barbarians as if they had won a complete victory, while Artaxerxes was plundering Cyrus's camp and preparing to seize on the baggage of the Greeks, as if he also had been everywhere victorious. But when the Greeks were informed that the troops of the king were plundering their camp, and Artaxerxes, on his side, learned from Tissaphernes that the Greeks had put those before them to flight, the former halted and held a council, while the latter marched his army toward them. The two armies were soon very near each other, and the Greeks, seeing that the enemy drew near in order of battle, chanted their hymn of battle, and hastily advanced to engage them. But the barbarians did not wait to receive them. They again took to their heels, and ran further than before, and were pursued to a village at the foot of a hill, upon which their cavalry halted. The king's standard, which was a golden eagle with extended wings, upon a pike, was observed to be there. The Greeks instantly prepared to pursue them; but they also abandoned the hill, and fled precipitately in the utmost disorder and confusion. Clearchus drew up his troops at the foot of the hill, and ordered Lycias, the Syracusan, and another, to ascend it, and observe what passed in the plain. They returned with an account that the enemy were flying on all sides, and that their army was entirely routed. As it was almost night, the Greeks laid down their arms to rest themselves, much surprised that neither Cyrus, nor any from him, appeared. They imagined that he was either engaged in the pursuit of the enemy, or was making haste to possess himself of some important place, for they were still ignorant of his death, and the defeat of the rest of his army. Thereupon they determined to return to their camp, where they passed the night, concluding that Cyrus was alive and victorious. The next day they learned that Cyrus was dead, and that Ariæus had retired to their former camp. They therefore sent deputies to Ariæus to offer him, as victor, the crown of Persia, in the room of Cyrus. At the same time arrived Persian heralds at arms from the king to summon them to deliver up their arms. They answered, with a haughty air, that such messages were not to be sent to conquerors; that if the king wanted their arms he might come and take them, but that they would defend them with their lives. They said, furthermore, that if the king would receive them as his allies, they would serve him with valor and fidelity, but if he imagined to reduce them to slavery, as conquered, he might know that they were prepared to defend themselves to the last, that they would lose their lives and liberty together. The heralds added, that they had orders to tell them that if they continued in the place where they were, they would be allowed a suspension of arms; but if they advanced or retired, that they would be treated as enemies. "Let your king know," replied Clearchus, "that we are of the same opinion with him." "What is that?" inquired the heralds. "If we stay," continued Clearchus, "there may be peace, but if we march or retire, war." Again the heralds asked, "Shall we report peace or war?" Clearchus replied, "Peace, if we stay; war, if we retire or advance." But he did not decide what he proposed to do, in order to keep the king in a state of constant suspense and uncertainty; and with this answer, the heralds were obliged to return. Ariæus, having refused the offer of the Persian crown, sent for the Greeks to join him without delay. Clearchus, with the advice of the officers, prepared to depart. When the night came, Miltocythes, the Thracian, who commanded forty horse and about 300 foot, of his own country, went and surrendered himself to the king; and the rest of the Greeks began their march, and at about midnight arrived at the camp of Ariæus. After they had drawn up in order of battle, the principal officers waited on him in his tent, where they swore alliance with him, and the barbarian engaged to conduct them out of the country without fraud. A plan for the retreat of the army was now agreed upon, and early in the morning of the following day they commenced their march northward. Toward evening, the scouts who had been sent out in advance returned, with the news that the enemy of the Persian king was near at hand. Clearchus immediately directed the army to encamp for the night. The next morning, at sunrise, the Greeks were drawn up in battle array and presented so bold an appearance that the king was terrified, and sent heralds, not as before to demand their arms, but to propose a treaty of peace. The Greeks boldly and ingeniously replied that they preferred war, unless they were supplied with food. The king complied with their demands, and in the interim of negotiations led them to villages abounding in provisions.

Three days afterward Tissaphernes was sent by the king to ask them why they had borne arms against him. "We call the gods to witness," replied Clearchus, "that we did not enlist ourselves to make war with the king, or to march against him. Cyrus, concealing his true motives under different pretexts, brought us almost hither, without explaining himself, the better to surprise you. When we saw him surrounded by dangers, we considered it infamous to abandon him after all the favors we had received from him. But now that Cyrus is dead, we neither intend to contend with the king for his kingdom, nor to ravage his country, nor to molest him, providing he does not oppose our return. However, if any man offers an injury to us, we shall, with the assistance of the gods, endeavor to revenge it. And we shall not be ungrateful toward those who render us any assistance." Tissaphernes conveyed this answer to the king, and in three days returned, and made a treaty with the Greeks, on these conditions: that the Persians should faithfully lead back the Greeks to their own country, and supply them with provisions; and that the Greeks should either purchase their provisions, or procure them unpurchased without detriment to the territory. In the mean time, the Greeks began to form suspicions of the sincerity of Ariæus, whose friendship for them appeared to cool every day more and more. On the arrival, therefore, of Tissaphernes, to conduct them on their march, they encamped apart by themselves; while Ariæus with his troops encamped with the barbarians under Tissaphernes. The aversion of the Greeks to the barbarians was, moreover, constantly augmented by their daily quarrels for wood and forage. At length the whole army commenced its march, and in three days arrived at the wall of Media, near Babylon. The cowardice and pretended snares of the Persians continually increased the distrust of the Greeks. Having halted three days at the river Zabalus, the Greeks were confirmed in their suspicions against the good faith of the Persians; and Clearchus, in a conference with Tissaphernes, used his utmost effort to bring matters to a more amicable footing. Tissaphernes replied with such civility, that the next day, Clearchus proposed in the assembly to go to Tissaphernes, with the several commanders of his troops, in order to be apprised of the persons who by calumnies had endeavored to excite animosity between the two nations. Many of the assembly objected; but Clearchus continued to insist upon his proposal, till it was agreed that the four other commanders, with 20 captains, and about 200 soldiers, should accompany him to the Persian camp. When they came to the tent of Tissaphernes, the generals, Clearchus, a Lacedæmonian, Proxenus, a Bœotian, Menon, a Thessalian, Agias, an Arcadian, and Socrates, an Achæan, were admitted; while the captains were ordered to remain without. No sooner had they entered, than on a concerted signal, the five generals were seized, and the captains were put to the sword. Immediately afterward a troop of Persian horse scoured the plain, and killed all the Greeks they encountered, both freemen and slaves. The Greeks, with surprise, beheld these excursions from the barbarians' camp, and were in doubt of what they were doing, till Nicurches, an Arcadian, came flying into the camp, so severely wounded that he bore his bowels in his hands. On this the Greeks in amazement and terror ran to their arms, expecting an immediate attack. But they were not molested. Ariæus, however, came with his attendants to the Grecian camp, and in the name of the King of Persia, demanded the immediate surrender of their arms. The Greeks, through Cleanor, the Orchomenian, returned a contumelious answer, and the barbarians, after conferring together for a considerable time, departed. The five Grecian commanders, after having been seized by Tissaphernes, were sent to the king, who ordered their heads to be struck off. And now the 10,000 Greeks, who had followed the standard of the ambitious Cyrus, were more than 600 leagues from home, in a country surrounded on every side by a victorious enemy, without money, or provisions, or a leader. All gave themselves up to despair. They felt, that they were still 2,000 miles from the nearest part of Greece, close to the vast armies of a king who was determined that they should not convey the news of their glorious victory, or the dastardly conduct of his army out of the country. They were surrounded on all sides by tribes of barbarians, who would supply them with nothing but at the expense of blood and blows. They had no guide acquainted with the country, no knowledge of the deep and rapid rivers that intersected it, and no cavalry to explore the road, or to cover their rear on their march. In this strait arose Xenophon, the Athenian, who began to arouse the courage of the colonels who had been under Proxenus. A certain Appolonides made a stupid opposition to the discourse of Xenophon, and was, therefore, deprived of his rank and occupation. The rest of the surviving generals assembled, and were addressed by Xenophon in a vigorous speech. He exhorted them to be of good cheer, and to encourage the minds of their soldiers, so that after the appointment of new commanders nothing might be neglected to repel the attacks of the enemy. Xenophon's recommendation was approved by all, and new commanders were immediately elected. And now the 10,000 Greeks, supported by the ardent desire of preserving their liberty, and of returning to their native land, commenced their march, and made their retreat before a victorious army of 1,000,000 of men, traversing more than two thousand miles, notwithstanding vast rivers and innumerable defiles, and at length arrived in their own country, through a thousand fierce and barbarous nations, victorious over all obstacles in their way.

CUNNERSDORF, A.D. 1759.—On the 12th of August, 1759, the King of Prussia, with 50,000 men, attacked the Russian army of 90,000 men, in their camp near Cunnersdorf, with so much vigor, that the Russians fled precipitately. The Prussians, anxious to make the victory complete, followed the Russians with so much eagerness that their ranks became disordered. The Russians at this moment rallied, and charging back upon their pursuers, overwhelmed them and drove them from the field with a loss of 20,000 men in killed and wounded, and 200 pieces of artillery.

CURNOUL, A.D. 1815. — This place, a strongly fortified town of India, was taken by the British on the 14th of December, 1815.

CUZCO, A.D. 1536.—This city, formerly the capital of the Incas of Peru, stands at the foot of some hills fronting an extensive valley to the south-east; and is 400 miles south-east of Lima. The city at the present time is greatly inferior to what it was in the time of Pizarro. It now contains a population of about 40,000 inhabitants; but then, if we can credit the words of the Spanish writers, it boasted of a population of over 200,000. The buildings were of stone; and the city contained many elegant palaces as each Inca built a residence for himself. The fortress was built of stone, and planted on a solid rock, reared its summit above the surrounding buildings, commanding a magnificent view of the surrounding country. The approaches to the fortress were guarded by three semicircular parapets, composed of huge masses of rock.

No sooner had Atahuallpa, the Peruvian inca, fallen into the hands of Pizarro at Caxamalca, than the conquest of Peru seemed accomplished. From blood-stained Caxamalca, Pizarro, with an army greatly augmented by reinforcements, marched toward Cuzco. His progress was slightly impeded by the Peruvians, who, although awe-stricken by the presumptuous daring of the Spanish general, endeavored to throw every possible obstacle in his path. The Spanish army now consisted of about 450 men, of whom 100 at least were cavalry. Upon their arrival at Cuzco, Pizarro caused the immense treasure which had been gathered to pay the inca's ransom, to be divided between his soldiers. His next care was to elevate a new monarch to the Peruvian throne. For this purpose he selected Manco, a legitimate of the ancient line of Cuzco, who received the empty title of inca; but submitted entirely to the control of the Spaniards. He next organized a municipal government, appointing Spanish alcaldes and regidores. Having accomplished this, Pizarro, leaving his brother Juan in Cuzco, marched with the greater part of the army toward the sea-coast, to watch the movements of several bands of Spanish adventurers, of whose entrance into the country he had received intelligence. Shortly afterward, Hernando Pizarro returned to Peru from Spain where he had been sent by Pizarro, with that part of the prize set aside for the Spanish monarch, and proceeded to Cuzco. Meanwhile the Spaniards in the city of Cuzco indulged in every excess; they rifled the private houses of the citizens for gold, and even violated the graves of the dead in their eager search. They insulted the Peruvian women before the very eyes of their fathers, brothers, and husbands; and they carried their outrages to such extremities that even the mild Manco was aroused. The Spaniards did not watch him closely, for they considered him their dependent and willing tool. He took advantage of their carelessness to consult with his nobles in the city, and it was decided that the inca should leave the city and present himself among his people and arouse them against the invaders. Manco had no difficulty in escaping from the city; but his movements were watched by an enemy more vigilant than the Spaniards. There was in the capital a tribe of Indians, numbering about 1,000, hostile to the Peruvians, and no sooner did they detect the absence of the inca, than they reported it to Juan Pizarro. The Spanish commander immediately marched, at the head of a small body of cavalry, in pursuit of the fugitive monarch. They discovered him in a marsh a short distance from the city, where he had endeavored to conceal himself, and he was brought back and confined in the fortress. The inca, however, contrived to win the confidence of Hernando Pizarro, who displayed a friendly disposition toward him. He first awakened the cupidity of Hernando, by stating his knowledge of a cavern filled with gold; and then by promising to bring the treasure to him, he succeeded in gaining the consent of that officer for his departure. Hernando sent with the inca two soldiers, rather to assist him in bringing home the gold, than as a guard; but seven days elapsed and the inca did not return.

Perceiving his error, Hernando at once took steps to repair it. Juan Pizzaro was sent with a body of sixty cavalry in search of the fugitive. But he traversed the environs of the city without success; not a trace of the inca could he discover. As he approached the mountains that hem in the valley of Yucay, about 18 miles from Cuzco, he met the two soldiers who had been sent out with Manco. From them Juan heard that the inca was at the head of an immense army preparing to march against the city. He had allowed them to return in safety. Juan determined to attack the inca's army without delay. Accordingly, guided by the two soldiers, he marched toward the Peruvian camp. Arriving at the river Yucay, he saw drawn up in battle order, the enemy's army. The Indian force consisted of many thousand warriors; and at their head, surrounded by gayly dressed officers, was the Inca Manco, the former captive of the Spaniards. The Indians, as was their custom, had placed a river between themselves and the enemy. For a moment the Spanish general gazed at the warlike army before him, and he could not but have contrasted in his own mind the inferiority of his own numbers. But he lost no further time in thought. Followed by his little band he spurred his horse into the river, which though deep was not wide, and swam his horse through a hurricane of stones and arrows to the other side. The Spaniards gained the bank, and urged their horses forward against the Peruvian front, which as they approached gradually retired. But before the Spaniards could form for a charge, the Indians returned, and encompassing them with their greatly superior numbers, assailed them with a fury which for a time threw the cavaliers into disorder. But recovering from their confusion they formed in a solid phalanx,—"St. Jago! St. Jago!" they cried, and charged fiercely into the thickest of the enemy. The Peruvians were scattered before the charge like the falling leaves of autumn in a whirlwind; yet soon they collected and retreated in good order, turning at intervals to discharge their deadly missiles at the enemy, or to deal sturdy blows with their war clubs and pole-axes. Juan drove the enemy from the plain to the mountains, where they were secure from further pursuit. With his troops he encamped at the base of the mountain, trusting that the terrible slaughter which he had inflicted on the Peruvians would crush their hopes of a successful resistance. Though conquerors the Spaniards had won a dear victory. Several men and horses had been slain during the conflict, and nearly all were suffering from the effects of severe wounds. The next morning, however, proved that the Peruvians although defeated were not subdued. The mountains were fairly alive with warriors, whom the Spaniards strove vainly to dislodge from their advantageous position. During the entire day Juan repeatedly charged the enemy; but at each attempt he was met by such a terrific tempest of stones, arrows, and darts, that he was obliged to retire. At dusk he encamped on the plain near the mountain; and on the succeeding day renewed hostilities with no better effect. The Indians still maintained their position on the mountains. Juan was making preparations for another assault when a message arrived from Cuzco, stating that the city was besieged by the enemy, and demanding him to return to the city with all speed. Juan immediately began his retreat, followed by the Peruvians, who celebrated his defeat with triumphant and defiant shouts. As he approached the city a sight met his eye which filled him with astonishment and dismay. The plains around the city were occupied by an immense army, consisting, it is said, of 200,000 men! They were armed with long lances tipped with copper, and huge battle-axes, of the same metal, and their dense array encompassing the city, stretched back to the very mountains. Clothed in gorgeous raiment, with banners and plumes filling the air, and with their bright weapons glistening in the rays of the sun, the Peruvians, like a large lake lay around the city, as if ready to overrun and sweep it from the plain. The Spaniards halted in dismay; but Juan urged them forward determined to hew a way through the masses of the enemy with the sword. The Indians, however, seemed to shun an encounter; they opened and left a free passage into the city. The besieged greeted this seasonable reinforcement with joy; for even now the whole Spanish force did not exceed 200 horse and foot. Their Indian allies numbered only a thousand, and with this small force they were to oppose an army of tens of thousands.

The siege of Cuzco, commenced early in the month of February, 1536, and is one of the most famous sieges recorded in the history of the western continent. The Peruvians made no hostile movements until the day after the return of Juan and his followers. Night had scarcely relinquished its throne at the approach of day, when the Spanish garrison was aroused by a terrible tumult of sounds. The wild notes of the conch and atabal, mingled with the hoarse yells of the Indians, while the sharp rattle of missiles falling in showers within the city, proved that the siege had commenced in earnest. For a time, the tempest of stones and arrows was incessant; but gradually it lulled, and finally died away, only to be followed by another storm more fearful and effective. Burning arrows and red-hot stones wrapped in cotton, saturated with an inflammable substance, came in clouds from the besiegers' camp, filling the air with fire and smoke, and falling upon the roofs of the buildings, which were soon enveloped in flames. From all quarters the fiery tempest raged; building after building was set on fire, until the whole city seemed an ocean of flame. The Spaniards encamped in the great square of the city were encompassed by the conflagration on all sides, and half-stifled by the smoke, they gazed upon the flames without an effort to suppress them. For nearly a week the fire raged, until more than one half of the city was laid in ruins. But although the Spaniards made no effort to extinguish the flames, they met the repeated assaults of the besiegers with such vigorous sallies, that the Peruvians were invariably compelled to retire with heavy losses. But the streets, filled with fallen timbers, and the rubbish of houses, were inaccessible to the movements of cavalry, and as often as the Spaniards removed the impediments, the Peruvians planted stakes and barricaded the streets. At length, however, by dint of the most arduous exertions, the Spaniards, in the face of incessant volleys of stones and arrows, cleared away the obstacles, and opened a free passage for the horse. With the fury of a long pent-up tempest, the Spanish cavalry rushed on the besiegers, cutting them down by hundreds, and forcing them back to their lines. But the Indians, returning with fresh numbers to the assault, fought with a fury that compelled the Spaniards to retire. The bow, the sling, and the lasso were their favorite weapons, and they used them with a skill that cost many a Spaniard his life. The fortress of the city, which had been abandoned by the garrison on the approach of the enemy, was in the possession of the Peruvians. This building commanded the great square, and from this elevated position the besiegers hurled clouds of deadly missiles into the Spanish camp. Hernando Pizarro saw the necessity of dislodging the enemy from this important position at once. But before making this desperate attempt, he resolved on a general sortie, in order to intimidate the besiegers, and to divert their attention from the fortress. Accordingly, he divided his little army into three bodies, and placed them under the command of Gonzalo Pizarro, Gabriel de Rojas, and Hernon Ponce de Leon, who were directed to move simultaneously along the main avenues of the city, toward the besiegers' incampment. The Indian allies were sent forward to clear away the rubbish which obstructed the streets, and close in their rear followed the Spanish foot and horse. As they advanced, they encountered numerous bodies of stragglers, who were soon cut to pieces, and the three divisions of the Spanish army issuing from the city at the same time, rushed into the Peruvian lines with the utmost impetuosity. The Peruvians, taken by surprise, were unprepared to make a resistance, and were slaughtered by hundreds. At length, however, the Indians recovered from their confusion, and coming into order, received the assaults of the Spaniards with the coolness of brave men. The sword and lance of the Spaniards were crossed with the pole-axe, and spiked copper-headed club of the Peruvian, and the rattle of musketry on the one side, and the whizzing of stones and arrows on the other, proved that European science and American barbarism were striving for the mastery. The Indians fought with a courage and with a discipline which astonished the Spaniards.

Many of the Peruvians were armed with weapons, and in several instances were mounted on horses, which they had taken from the Spaniards. Manco, himself, clothed in European costume, rode a war-horse, and with a long lance in his hand, cheered on his followers, by word and action. Yet the Spaniards advanced steadily into the very midst of the enemy, cutting them down with their swords, trampling them under the feet of the horses, or sweeping them off by scores with an incessant discharge of musketry, which inflicted a terrible loss on the Indians, now slowly retreating. At length, weary of slaughter, Hernando ordered his soldiers to retire to their camp in the city. He next turned his attention to the fortress. It stood on a high rocky eminence, which overhung the northern part of the city. The hill rising in an abrupt acclivity from the city, was defended at its base by a single wall; but it presented in its steepness an obstacle which effectually prevented an assault on the fortress from that quarter. On the opposite side, however, it was more accessible. There it was defended by two semicircular stone walls each about 1,200 feet in length, and of great strength and thickness. The interval of ground between the walls was raised to a sufficient height to allow the garrison to discharge its artillery on the assailants, while they themselves were secure from danger behind the rampart. The fortress, consisting of three strong towers, stood within the interior wall. One of the towers was of great height, and with a smaller one was now occupied by the Peruvians, under the command of a warrior of great experience and valor. To Juan Pizarro the duty of reducing this stronghold of the enemy was intrusted. In order to gain the mountain passes behind the fortress, Juan, without attracting the attention of the enemy, left the city in the evening, with a chosen body of horse, and marched in an opposite direction to that which he intended to pursue. But, covered by the darkness of night, he changed his course and marched directly for the mountains which faced the fortress. He found the passes unguarded, and, without alarming the garrison, reached the outer wall of the citadel. The only entrance, which was a narrow opening in the wall, was now filled with stone, so that it resembled the rampart itself. With cautious hands the Spaniards cleared the opening, without disturbing the Peruvians. Having accomplished this arduous task, the cavaliers passed through the entrance, and advanced to the second rampart. Thus far they had moved with such silence that the garrison was unalarmed. The Peruvians, not anticipating a night attack, had not even posted a sentinel; but when the Spaniards had arrived at the second parapet, they found the interior court filled with warriors. As the assailants advanced they were saluted by shower after shower of missiles, which falling thick and fast in their midst, compelled them to halt. Juan now ordered one half of his troops to dismount, and prepared to remove the stones with which the entrance, as before, was closed. Some days previous, he had received a severe wound in his cheek, and as his helmet irritated the sore, he removed it, trusting to his buckler for defense. The Spaniards, led by their gallant commander, boldly commenced to demolish the wall, in the face of a tempest of deadly missles, which swept through them with the fury of a hurricane. But as soon as one fell, another took his place, and the work was continued until a breach practicable for cavalry was made in the parapet. This accomplished, the Spaniards, remounting their horses, followed their intrepid leader through the opening, and dashed furiously into the court, cutting down and overwhelming all who opposed them. The Peruvians, flying before the vigorous assault of the enemy, sought shelter on a platform near the main tower. Here they made a stand, and discharged their artillery in thick clouds, while their companions in the fortress hurled huge stones and heavy pieces of timber down on the heads of the assailants. Juan, shouting his battle-cry, mounted the platform, and, followed by his soldiers, fell fiercely on its defenders. But, at this moment, a heavy stone, striking on his unprotected head, stretched him on the ground. Yet his voice rang loud above the din, cheering on his men, until the Peruvians on the platform, fighting to the death, were cut to pieces. Juan was then removed to the city below, and the assault, for the moment, was suspended.

But Hernando Pizarro no sooner heard of the misfortune of his brother than he hastened to the hill, and putting himself at the head of the assailants, renewed the siege with greater activity. After an obstinate struggle, one of the towers was carried, but the other, with a formidable garrison, still held out. The Peruvian commander was a man of gigantic proportions, and armed with a Spanish cuirass and buckler, and wielding a heavy spiked war-club, he was seen on the battlements, striding from point to point, and striking down with his formidable weapon all who attempted to force an entrance into the tower. Hernando now determined to scale the walls. Ladders were planted at intervals against the sides of the tower, and the Spaniards eagerly ascended. The Indian commander, running from ladder to ladder, as the assailants reached the summit, with stalwart blows hurled them lifeless to the ground. Hernando could not but admire the bravery of this warrior, and bade his followers to take him alive. The Spaniards, completely surrounding the tower with ladders, at length gained a footing within its walls, and with cries of triumph rushed on the defenders and soon overpowered them. The commander of the garrison refused to be taken. Avoiding the grasp of his enemies, he ran to the battlements, and casting aside his mace, leaped headlong to the earth. Having stationed a small force in the fortress, the Spanish general returned triumphantly to the city. Weeks passed by, and yet the Peruvians maintained the siege with stern obstinacy. The Spaniards soon began to feel the want of provisions, and hearing nothing from Pizarro, they were filled with the most dismal apprehensions. But that officer, who was stationed at Lima, did not neglect the garrison of Cuzco. He sent four detachments, at different times, to their relief. Each detachment consisted of at least seventy-five foot and twenty-five horse; but none of them reached their place of destination. They advanced into the interior of the country unmolested; but when intangled in the intricate passes of the Andes, they were surrounded by hordes of Indians, who poured showers of missiles on their heads from the rocky cliffs, or loosened huge rocks, which, rushing down the steep declivities, plowed bloody furrows through their ranks. Nearly every detachment was entirely destroyed; a few bruised and bleeding stragglers only found their way back to Lima, to tell the tale of death. The siege had now continued for five months. It was in the month of August, the planting season, and the necessities of the Peruvians did that which the arms of the Spaniards were unable to accomplish. Manco was well aware that if his people neglected to plant, a famine, more terrible even than the presence of their enemies, would ensue. He therefore disbanded the bulk of his army, reserving a considerable force for his own protection, and directed them to return to their usual employments, and after they had finished their labors at home to return and resume the blockade of the city. Manco, with his remaining force, removed to Zambo, a strongly fortified town in the valley of Yucay. The Spaniards, greatly rejoiced at their unexpected release, sent out foraging parties to scour the country for provisions, and in this manner the garrison was soon placed beyond the reach of want. Hernando, moreover, determined to advance against the inca himself, and by one bold stroke secure his person, and thus put an end to the war. A strong body of Spaniards marched against Zambo, but they met with such a warm reception by the Indians, that they were compelled to retire with considerable loss. The inca never resumed the blockade of Cuzco. He had gained his last victory. The loss experienced by the Spaniards, during this siege, is not stated. Juan Pizarro died from the effects of the wound he received at the storming of the fortress. The losses of the Peruvians must have been enormous, for at each of the numerous sallies of the Spaniards, they were slaughtered in great numbers.—Prescott's Conquest of Peru.

CYZICUM, B.C. 408.—Alcibiades, with a fleet of eighty-six ships, arrived, in the year 408 B.C., at Proconnesus, a small island near Cyzicum, and being informed that the Peloponnesian generals, Mindarus and Pharnabazus were together at Cyzicum, he exhorted the Athenians to give them battle. He said it was necessary to fight them both by sea and land, nay, even to contend against stone walls, if it should be required, in order to come at their enemies. They must win a complete victory or they could not expect to secure the treasure and money which were stored in the wealthy city. He had arrived at Proconnesus under the cover of a thick fog, which prevented the enemy from discovering his operations. As soon as the weather cleared up, the Peloponnesian ships were seen riding at anchor in the road of Cyzicum. Fearful that the enemy would be alarmed at the largeness of his fleet, and save themselves by disembarking, he directed many of his officers to slacken sail, and keep out of sight, while he advanced with forty ships only, and challenged the Lacedæmonians to the combat. This stratagem was successful. The Lacedæmonians despising the small number of galleys, which they saw, immediately weighed anchor and set out, and fiercely attacked the enemy. But now the rest of the Athenian fleet advanced, and the Lacedæmonians, struck with terror, fled. Alcibiades pursued them to the shore, landed, and killed a great number of them in the flight. Mindarus and Pharnabazus, who hastened to the assistance of the flying Lacedæmonians, opposed the enemy with great energy and valor. But after incredible exertions their troops were overpowered. Mindarus was slain, and Pharnabazus sought safety in flight. The Athenians remained masters of the field, and of all the spoils. They took all the ships of the enemy, and having possessed themselves of Cyzicum, which was abandoned by Pharnabazus, and deprived of the assistance of the Peloponnesians, who were almost all cut off, they not only secured the Hellespont, but entirely cleared the sea of the Lacedæmonians.

CYNOCEPHALÆ, B.C. 197.—THE MACEDONIAN WAR.—In the year 200 B.C., the Romans declared war against Philip, King of Macedon. They had witnessed the progress of that prince with uneasiness, and, having ended their war with Carthage, they thought it advisable to prevent the enterprises of the Macedonian king, who might become formidable, in case they should give him time to increase his strength. Upon their first entrance into Macedon, the various nations of Greece waited the event in order to declare themselves for the victor. A battle was fought near a village called Octolophos, which resulted in the victory of the Romans. The consul, Publius Sulpicius, who commanded the Roman forces in Macedon, was shortly afterward recalled, and Titus Quintius Flamininus was appointed in his place. The Achæans, Ætolians, and Spartans, after a long delay, declared for the Romans.

In the year 197 B.C., after a vain endeavor to conclude a peace, both the Romans and Macedonians made active preparations for a battle which was to decide the war.

Quintius, the Roman commander, learning that Philip had entered Thessaly, followed him; but being unable to discover exactly the place where the Macedonians were encamped, he commanded his soldiers to cut stakes in order to make use of them, should they be required.

Both the Greeks and Romans used stakes with which to fortify their camp. But the Greeks did not adopt the most convenient mode of using them, either with respect to carriage or for the purpose of strengthening their camp. They cut trees, both too large and too full of branches for the soldiers to carry them easily along with their arms, and after they had fenced their camp with a line of these, to demolish them was no difficult matter; for the trunks, appearing to view, with great intervals between them, and the numerous and strong shoots, affording the hand a good hold, two or three young men, uniting their efforts, used to pull out one tree; which, being removed, left a wide breach, and there was nothing at hand with which it could be stopped up. The Romans, however, cut light stakes, mostly of one fork, with three or four branches, so that a soldier, with his arms slung on his back, could carry several of them together. Then, they planted them so closely, and interwove the branches in such a manner, that it could not be seen to what stake any branch belonged. Nor could any man pull up those stakes by thrusting his hand into the branches, as they were so closely intertwined, that no vacant place was left; besides which, all the ends of them were sharp pointed. Nay, even if by accident, a stake should be pulled out, it left but a small opening, which was very easily filled up.

After the Roman general had taken the precaution of providing his soldiers with stakes, he marched out at the head of all his forces, and arrived near Scotussa nearly at the same time with the Macedonian army. During the march, several slight skirmishes had occurred between the two armies, in which the Ætolian cavalry signalized themselves, and were always victorious. The two armies were separated by the hills called Cynocephalæ, and the day after their arrival, Philip detached a body of troops with orders to seize upon the summit of the hills. Quintius also detached ten squadrons of horse, and about 1,000 light-armed troops to reconnoiter the enemy. This detachment met that of the Macedonians which had seized the eminences. Both parties were surprised at the meeting, and a sharp skirmish ensued. The Macedonians fought valiantly, but the Romans receiving reinforcements from Quintius, at length compelled them to fly to the hills, whence they sent to Philip for succor. Philip immediately dispatched three bodies of troops to their aid. When this reinforcement joined them, the courage of the Macedonians revived; they returned to the charge, and drove the Romans from the hills. They even would have gained a complete victory, had it not been for the resistance made by the Ætolian cavalry, who fought with astonishing courage and intrepidity.

This Ætolian cavalry was the best of all the Grecian cavalry, and was particularly famous for skirmishes and single combats. They so well sustained the charge of the Macedonians that had it not been for their bravery, the Romans would have been repulsed into the valley. Couriers came every moment to inform Philip that the Romans were terrified and flying, and that the time had arrived for defeating them entirely. Philip was not pleased either with the place or the weather; but he could not resist the repeated shouts and entreaties of his soldiers, who besought him to lead them on to battle. Accordingly, he led them out of their intrenchments. Quintius, the Roman commander, also left his camp, and drew up his army in order of battle. The two armies were equal in numbers; each consisting of about 25,000 men.

Fired by the speeches and promises of their leaders, the soldiers, who on the one side called themselves victors of the East; and on the other conquerors of the West, prepared for battle. Flamininus, having commanded the right wing not to move from its post, placed his elephants in front of this wing; and marching with a haughty and intrepid air, led on the left wing in person against the enemy. The skirmishers now seeing themselves supported by the legions, returned to the charge and began the attack. Philip, with his light-armed troops, and the right wing of his phalanx, hastened toward the mountains; commanding Nicanor to march the rest of his army immediately after him. When he approached the Roman camp, and found his soldiers engaged, he was exceedingly pleased at the sight; but presently, observing his men give way, and in exceeding want of support, he was obliged to sustain them and to engage in a general battle, though the greater part of his phalanx was still upon its march toward the hills which he now occupied. In the mean time he received such of his troops as had been repulsed; posted them, both horse and foot, on his right wing, and commanded the light-armed soldiers and the phalanx to double their files, and to close their ranks on the right. As soon as this was done, the Romans being near, he commanded the phalanx to march toward them with their pikes presented, and the light-armed troops to extend beyond them on the left and right. Quintius had also received at the same time, into his intervals, those who had begun the fight, and then charged the Macedonians. The battle was now fairly begun. The soldiers on each side set up the most terrible cries. Philip's right wing had visibly the advantage; for, as he charged with impetuosity from the heights, with his phalanx on the Romans, the latter could not sustain the shock of troops so well closed and covered with their shields, and whose front presented an impenetrable hedge of pikes. The Romans were obliged to give way. But it was different with Philip's left wing which had just arrived. As its ranks were broken and separated by the hillocks and uneven ground, Quintius flew to his right wing, and vigorously charged the left wing of the Macedonians: persuaded could he but break it, and put it in disorder, it would draw after it the other wing, although victorious. The event answered his expectations. As this wing, on account of the unevenness and ruggedness of the ground, could not keep in the form of a phalanx, nor double its ranks to give it depth, in which the whole strength of the body consisted, it was entirely defeated. On this occasion, a tribune, who had not more than twenty companions under him, made a movement which contributed very much to the victory. Observing that Philip, who was at a great distance from the rest of the army, was charging the left wing of the Romans with vigor, he left the right in which he was, and consulting only his own reason, and the present disposition of the armies, marched toward the phalanx of the enemy's right wing, and charged them in the rear with all his troops. The Macedonian soldiers, on account of the prodigious length of their pikes, and the closeness of their ranks, could not face about to the rear, nor fight man to man. The tribune broke the phalanx, killing all before him as he advanced; and the Macedonians, unable to defend themselves, threw down their arms and fled. The Romans who had first given way, now rallied, and attacked the phalanx in front at the same time that it was assailed in the rear. Philip at first thought he had obtained a complete victory; but when he saw his soldiers throw down their arms, and the Romans pouring on them from behind, he drew off with a body of his troops, to a distance from the field of battle, and thence took a survey of the whole engagement. Upon perceiving that the Romans, who pursued the left wing, extended almost to the summit of the mountains, he gathered together all the Macedonians and Thracians he could assemble, and endeavored to save himself by flight. After the battle, in every part of which victory had declared for the Romans, Philip retired to Tempe, where he halted to wait for those who had escaped the defeat. The Romans pursued for some time those who fled. The Ætolians were accused of having occasioned Philip's escape, for they amused themselves in plundering his camp, while the Romans were employed in pursuing the enemy. When the former returned, they found scarcely any thing left in the enemy's camp, and they at first reproached the Ætolians on that account, and afterward quarreled with them outright, each side loading the other with the grossest invectives. The Romans, in this battle, lost about 700 men, and the Macedonians 13,000, of whom 8,000 died on the field, and 5,000 were taken prisoners. Thus ended the battle of Cynocephalæ, which terminated the Macedonian war, and which restored to the Greeks their ancient rights and liberties.

CZENSTOCHOW, A.D. 1665.—In 1665, a bloody battle was fought near Czenstochow, between the army of the King of Poland, and that of Lubomirski.

DAMASCUS, A.D. 642.—This city stands in a plain at the east foot of the Anti-Libanus, in Syria. The Saracens, in the year 642, attacked Damascus, with the hopes of a speedy capture; but the inhabitants made a gallant resistance; the troops within the city were so enraged at the Saracens, that they were with difficulty restrained from rushing out to attack them. At the moment the troops of the Emperor Heraclius came to the succor of the city, two brothers, commanders of Damascus, made a vigorous sortie, pillaged the rearguard of the Saracens, and carried off their women. The most important prisoner was Caulah, sister of Derar, one of the early heroes of Mahometanism, whose fanatical zeal produced such miraculous triumphs.

Dazzled by the charms of his prize, Peter, one of the commanders of Damascus, wished to treat her as a conquered captive; but Caulah repulsed him with contempt. As if by a pre-concerted movement, she and her companions in misfortune seized the tent-poles, and ranging themselves back to back, refused to go to Damascus. Whilst hesitating to fight with women, though thus armed and resolute, Caled, the sword of God, came up, charged the Romans, and made a horrible carnage; the army of Heraclius was defeated at Ainadin. Caled re-appeared before Damascus, carried it by assault, and all the inhabitants were given up to indiscriminate slaughter. When Heraclius learned the fall of Damascus, he exclaimed, "Farewell to Syria!"

SECOND SIEGE, A.D. 1148.—Being compelled by the interest they inspire, to give at considerable length several of the sieges in which the Crusaders were engaged, we can not spare room for more than a notice of that of Damascus, referring our readers for details, which will repay the research, to the pages of Michaud and Gibbon.

Louis VII., King of France, in company with Conrad III., Emperor of Germany, who had led armies from Europe for the recovery of the Holy Land, laid siege to Damascus, one of the most delightfully situated and splendid cities in the world. By its populousness and wealth, Damascus excited the envy of Antioch, Jerusalem, and Tripoli, which were in the hands of the Christians, and probably affected their commerce. But it was neither the religion of the inhabitants nor the beauty of its position that tempted the Crusaders; it was enough for them to know that it was one of the richest cities of the East: nothing so soon induced a knight of the cross to buckle on his spurs and take his lance, as the prospect of the plunder of an oriental city. Damascus was well fortified on the east and on the south; but on the north, a multitude of gardens, inclosed with hedges and canals, formed its principal bulwark. Every hedge was an ambuscade; every tree was filled with archers, and the Crusaders found this quarter of the town more difficult of access than they had imagined. It required five days to carry all the positions in these gardens, which the Saracens defended with the greatest valor; and the Crusaders would have taken the place had it not been for the usual enemy, Discord; they quarreled for the sovereignty of the city before they had taken it. By the perfidious advice of the Syrian barons, they abandoned the attack on the northern side, to make others on the east and the south. The Saracens immediately re-possessed themselves of the gardens, which was the only vulnerable point of the place, and the Crusaders disgracefully raised the siege.—Robson.

DANTZIC, A.D. 1807.—Dantzic, in West Prussia, was besieged in 1807 by the French, and surrendered after a defense of four months, on the 5th of May in the same year. Dantzic was besieged by the allies in 1812, and after a gallant resistance, surrendered to them on the 1st of January, 1812.

DARIK, A.D. 1516—On the 17th of August, 1516, a battle was fought at Darik, near Aleppo, in Syria, between the Egyptians and the Turks. The battle was long and obstinately contested on both sides. The Egyptian army was commanded by the Sultan Ghori, whose troops were put to route by the Turks, and himself slain. This battle was followed soon by the fall of Cario.

DEFILE, BATTLE OF THE A.D. 1519.—As Cortez proceeded through the country toward the capital of Mexico, he collected recruits from the various villages through which he passed, so that now his whole army consisted of 3,000 men. As the sun arose on the morning after the last battle, the army was called to arms, and after hearing mass, they commenced their march again. After proceeding a short distance, they were joined by the two Indian envoys whom Cortez had sent to the Tlascla, and who had escaped from their enemies the previous night. From these Cortez learned that the enemy had concentrated in great force, to obstruct the march of the invaders. Soon the Spanish general saw before him a body of Indians about 1,000 strong, who, with screams of defiance, brandished their weapons at the advancing army. As was his custom, Cortez ordered his interpreter to proclaim that he was their friend, and merely wished a free passage through their country.

The proclamation was answered by a shower of stones, arrows and darts, which fell among the allied army, inflicting many a stinging wound and awkward bruise; but the thickly-quilted cotton armor of the Spaniards protected them, in a great measure, from the weapons of the enemy; their Indian allies, however, were not so fortunate. Many were grievously wounded. Galled to madness by the pain of their wounds, the Spaniards rushed toward their enemies, shouting their battle-cry, and falling upon them with such ferocity that the Tlascalans were obliged to give ground, and at length finally to retreat. But the commander of the Indian army hit upon a scheme which proved nearly fatal to the Spaniards. In the rear of his army was a narrow defile, through which ran a stream of water. He so arranged the retreat of his army that he drew the pursuing Spaniards into this defile, which would not only render their artillery of no service, but forbade the operations of cavalry, then concentrating his forces at the opposite opening of the glen, he awaited the coming of the enemy. The Spanish soldiers, hot in pursuit, pressed forward through the defile. What a spectacle met their eyes, as they reached the gorge! Before them stood an immense body of men armed with uncouth weapons, and clothed in brilliant and fanciful garments. Above the heads of the warriors waved gorgeous banners, and their bright helmets reflected the rays of the sun, as they moved like the troubled surface of an immense lake of polished brass. A low murmur arose from the countless throng, as the Spanish appeared at the gorge, and was protracted into a hideous cry of rage and defiance which caused a thrill of fear to run through the stoutest heart in the Spanish ranks.

With beating drums, and whoops, and shouts, the Indians swept on toward the enemy. The Spaniards received the charge with closed ranks, and with a courage which checked and drove back the Indians. Again and again they renewed the attack, but with like success. At length, however, a body of the enemy fell upon one of the cavalry, at one time, and, before his companions could afford him aid, they tore him from his saddle, killed his horse, and trampled the unfortunate soldier under their feet. The Spaniards hastened to the relief of their comrade, and a furious struggle ensued, over the body of the prostrate man. The Indians strove like demons to drive back the soldiers and bear away their prize, while the Spaniards emulated to the greatest exertions by the danger of their beloved comrade, fought with a fierceness equally terrible. In spite of their armor ten of the Spaniards were severely wounded, before they succeeded in forcing back the enemy. The unfortunate soldier had suffered so severely during the struggle that he died the next day of his wounds, many of which had been inflicted by his countrymen. The Indians bore off the carcass of the horse in triumph. The body was cut to pieces and sent to the various villages of the country. Aided by their Indian allies the Spaniards, with one tremendous effort, forced back their enemies, and passing rapidly through the gorge, cleared a space with their cavalry; planted their artillery and opened a hot fire upon the dense masses of the Indian army. With terrible effect the iron messengers of death plowed their way through the living walls, scattering death on all sides and lading the earth with the mangled and bleeding carcasses of dead and dying men. In vain did the Indians endeavor—as was their custom—to bear their dead and wounded from the field, as soon as they were struck. The cannon-shot of the enemy was aimed with such fatal accuracy that they could not perform the labor with sufficient rapidity. The bearers of the dead were shot down, and fell by the side of the bodies they were endeavoring to remove from the blood-stained field. Horror-struck at the devastation produced upon them by the powerful weapons of the enemy, and dismayed and disheartened at the little effect produced upon the Spaniards by their own arms, the Indians fell back at all points. Eight of their chieftains had been slain, and the carnage in their midst continued with unabated vigor. At length Xicotencall, the Tlascalan general, ordered a retreat. Abandoning their dead and wounded, the Indian army slowly and in good order retired from the field, and once more the path before the Spaniards was free and unmolested. Placing his wounded in litters, Cortez resumed his march. At dark, the army arrived at an eminence, called the hill of Tzompach, where the army encamped. The night was spent in feasting and revelry, in celebration of the well-earned victory.

DENNEWITZ, A.D. 1813.—The battle of Dennewitz, in Prussia, was fought on the 6th of September, 1813, between the forces of Bernadotte, Prince of Ponte Corvo (afterward Charles XIV., King of Sweden), and the French, under Marshal Ney. The French were defeated after an obstinate conflict, in which thousands on either side were slain. This battle, with the defeat of Napoleon at Leipsic, on the 18th of October following, closed the series of reverses experienced by his arms in the memorable and disastrous campaign of this year. The French, it is stated, at the battle of Dennewitz, lost

BATTLE OF CYNOCEPHALÆ.

10,000 men. The loss of the allies was 7,000 men killed and wounded.

DETROIT, A.D. 1812.—This beautiful city is situated on the west bank of the Detroit river, seven miles below the outlet of Lake St. Clair, and 18 miles above the western extremity of Lake Erie. The ground occupied by the city is elevated thirty feet above the surface of the river.

On the 15th of August, 1812, Brock, the British general, erected batteries on the bank of the river opposite Detroit which was occupied by the American army, under General Hull, and summoned the American general to surrender; stating that he should otherwise be unable to restrain the Indians from committing their usual atrocities. To this summons General Hull replied in a spirited and decided manner; declaring that the fortress would be defended to the last extremity. The American position was exceedingly advantageous. The fort of Detroit was of great strength, surrounded by a deep, wide ditch, and strongly pallisaded, with an exterior battery of two twenty-four pounders. The American army consisted of 2,500 men, of whom, 1,200 were militia. The fort was occupied by 400 regulars, while 400 more lay behind a high picket fence, which flanked the approach to it. Three hundred more with the militia held the town. The British general's army consisted of 330 regulars, 400 militia, and 600 Indians. Upon receiving Hull's answer to his summons, Brock opened a fire from his newly erected battery, to which the Americans made a spirited reply. The fire on both sides continued with little effect till the next day. General Hull by this time had become so much alarmed as to betray his cowardice to his own officers and men, by his appearance and his hasty and irregular measures. On the morning of the 16th, the British general resumed his fire, and the British troops began to cross the river under cover of two ships of war. They succeeded in effecting a landing on the opposite shore without the loss of a single man. The troops then formed in columns of twelve deep, and marching along the shore, soon emerged in view, about 500 yards from the fort. The columns advanced steadily toward the formidable American array; but not a shot was fired to arrest their progress. The Americans, anticipating an easy victory, anxiously awaited the orders of their general to fire. Two four-pounders loaded with grape were planted on an eminence, ready to sweep the assailing columns. M'Arthur and Cass on their return from their expedition to the river Raisin, were ready to attack the British troops in the rear; and the militia, who had never been under fire were eager for the conflict, so confident were they of victory. But unmolested, the British columns advanced. No sooner had they reached the fort, than General Hull ordered the troops to withdraw to the outer posts, and stack their arms, and a white flag was lifted above the works. A cry of indignation arose from every American soldier. Lieutenant Anderson, in a paroxysm of rage, broke his sword over one of the guns and burst into tears. A British officer rode up to ascertain why the flag was raised. A communication was opened between the commanding generals, which speedily terminated in a capitulation. The fortress of Detroit with its garrison, and munitions of war, were surrendered. Colonels M'Arthur and Cass, and their detachment who had been sent to the river Raisin, together with that intrusted with supplies, were included in the capitulation. The disgrace of the surrender seemed heightened in every circumstance. Hull did not even call a council of his officers. Fear alone prompted him to capitulate. His only object seemed to have been to escape the scalping-knife and tomahawk of the Indians. Hull was, after he was exchanged, tried by a court-martial. He was charged with treason, cowardice, and neglect of duty,—and was found guilty of the two latter charges, and sentenced to be shot. His life, however, was spared in consideration of former services. In the year 1813, by General Harrison's victory at the Thames, the Americans regained possession of all the posts which had fallen into the hands of the British on the surrender of General Hull.

DITTINGEN, A.D. 1743.—This small village of Bavaria, stands on the river Maine, eight miles north-west of Aschaffenburg. On the 26th of June, 1743, the allied British and Hanoverian army under George II., and the Earl of Stair, engaged the French forces, under Marshal Noailles. The French forces, numbering 60,000 men, were assembled upon the east bank of the river Maine. The British army, consisting of 40,000 men, were on the other side of the river, in a country where they were entirely destitute of supplies and provisions of any kind, the French having cut off all their communications. The King of England arrived at the camp while his army was in this deplorable situation, and at once decided to push forward to join 12,000 Hanoverians and Hessians, who had reached Hanau. With this view he decamped; but before his army had marched three leagues, he found himself inclosed on every side by the enemy, near the village of Dittingen. The position of the English monarch was now extremely dangerous; if he fought the enemy, it must be at the greatest disadvantage; if he continued inactive, there was a certainty of being starved; and as for a retreat, that was impossible. The impetuosity of the French troops saved his whole army. They passed a defile, which they should have been contented to guard; and under the conduct of the Duke of Grammont, their horse charged the English foot with great fury. They were received however, with such intrepidity and resolution, that they were obliged to give way and recross the Maine with precipitation. The King of England with great personal courage exposed himself to a severe fire of the enemy's cannon, and in the midst of the engagement encouraged his troops by his presence and his example. The English had the honor of the day; but were soon obliged to leave the field of battle, which was taken possession of by the French, who treated the wounded English with the clemency peculiar to that generous nation. In this engagement the French lost 5,000 men killed and wounded; the allies about 2,000.

DETMOLD, A.D. 9.—A battle occurred in the vicinity of Detmold, a town of northwest Germany, in the year 9, between the army of Varus and the Germans under Hermann, in which the former was defeated with the loss of his entire force. In 1838 a monument was erected on the battle-field to commemorate the event. See Winnefeld.

DINANT, A.D. 1466.—This town is built on the declivity of a rocky eminence on the Meuse in Belgium. The hill is crowned by the citadel, and in 1300 Dinant was so strongly fortified that it was deemed impregnable. Dinant has been besieged several times; and one siege, especially, deserves mention. In 1466, Philip the Good of Burgundy, appeared before Dinant with an army of 30,000 men, and a formidable array of artillery, and demanded the garrison to surrender; but the latter, trusting in the strength of their fortifications, mocked him, and hung his messengers on their walls, in sight of the besieging camp. Philip immediately planted his batteries, and plied his artillery with such effect that a practicable breach was soon made in the fortifications, and the Burgundians were ordered to the assault. Enraged at the cruel treatmant of the messengers by the besieged, and panting for vengeance, the Burgundians rushed to the breach with the utmost impetuosity, overwhelming all that opposed them, and carried the place with great slaughter. Philip resolved to punish the Dinanters for their cruelty, and caused 800 of the inhabitants to be tied in couples, back to back, and thrown into the Meuse, and that he might not lose the sight of the struggles of his victims, he, although suffering from sickness, entered a litter, and was carried to a spot which afforded a favorable view of the river, and there witnessed the revolting spectacle.

DOROGOBOOZH, A.D. 1812. — On the 12th of October, 1812, the French army was defeated by the Russians near Dorogoboozh, a town of Russia about fifty miles east of Smolensko.

DOVER, A.D. 1216.—The English barons, disgusted with the levity and tyranny of John, very inconsiderately offered the crown of England to Louis, son of Philip Augustus, and heir to the kingdom of France. This prince, who did not want for spirit, in spite of the anathemas of the court of Rome, under the protection of which the weak John had placed himself, embarked with an army on board a fleet of 700 vessels, landed at Sandwich and took possession of the county of Kent, with the exception of Dover. This place was well provided against an attack, and was governed by Hubert du Bourg, an intrepid and skillful soldier. Louis being unable to overcome his firm resistance, had recourse to more seductive advances, offering him a considerable bribe; but to his honor, Du Bourg repulsed it more indignantly and quite as firmly as he had resisted his arms. The French were obliged to raise the siege.

DRESDEN, A.D. 1813, — This beautiful city of Germany is situated on both sides of the river Elbe, sixty-one miles east of Leipzig. It is delightfully located in the midst of the most beautiful and richly cultivated portion of the valley of the Rhine. It is divided into the Old and New Towns, the first on the right or south bank of the river, and the latter on the north bank, and has four suburbs extending all round the Old Town, of which that called Frederickstadt, lying to the west of the small river Weisentz, near its confluence with the Elbe, is the most important. The Old and New Town are connected by a noble stone bridge across the Elbe, of sixteen arches.

On the 23d of August, 1813, Napoleon Bonaparte halted with his army at Louenberg. That very day he had heard that an immense army, composed of Russians, Prussians, and Austrians, were around Dresden, with a prodigious train of artillery. St. Cye, the French general, protected the passes to this city with a force of 30,000 men; but the overwhelming numbers of the enemy rendered it absolutely necessary that he should be reinforced, or the French could no longer retain possession of that city.

Early on the morning of the 24th, Napoleon commenced his march toward Dresden, and on the 26th, arrived with his guards in Dresden. Schwartzenberg, who commanded the Austrian army, had established batteries on the semicircular heights around Dresden; and at four o'clock in the afternoon of the 26th, he opened a terrible fire from more than one hundred guns, upon the works and buildings of the city. The bombs and cannon-balls fell on all sides, and over the whole extent of the city. Several houses speedily took fire. The inhabitants, in despair, took refuge in the cellars and vaults to avoid the effects of the bombardment; while the frequent bursting of shells in the streets, the loud thunder of the artillery from the ramparts and redoubts, the heavy rolling of the guns and the ammunition-wagons along the pavement, the cries of the drivers, and the measured tread of the marching men, who forced their way through the throng, combined to produce a scene of unexampled sublimity and terror. Every street and square in Dresden, by this time, was crowded with troops. About 60,000 men had defiled over the bridges into the city since ten o'clock, and the balls fell, and the bombs exploded with dreadful effect among their dense masses. The attack of the allies was indeed terrible. At the signal of three guns fired from the head-quarters on the heights of Rochnitz, six columns deep and massy, descended from the heights, each preceded by fifty pieces of artillery, and advanced with a steady step against the city. It was an awful but yet an animating spectacle, when these immense masses, without firing a shot, descended silently toward the walls of the city. No force on earth seemed capable of resisting them; so vast, yet orderly was the array, that their tread, when hardly within cannon-shot, could be distinctly heard from the ramparts. Soon the beautiful buildings of Dresden were enveloped in smoke and flame; the French kept up an incessant fire from the works, while the allied batteries on the heights around, sent a storm of projectiles through the air, and the moving batteries in front of their columns steadily advanced toward the embrasures of the redoubts. The attack was almost irresistible; but at half-past six o'clock, the gate of Plauen was thrown open, and the dense masses of the Guard, under Ney, rushed furiously out; while a quick discharge of musketry from the loopholed walls and windows of the adjacent houses favored their sortie. Onward rushed the French troops; and the Austrian columns little anticipating so formidable an onset, fell back in disorder. The French guards taking advantage of the moment when the gate was free, defiled rapidly out, and forming a line on either side of it, by their increasing mass and enthusiastic valor, rapidly gained ground on the enemy. Similar sorties took place at the gate of Pirna, and at the barriers of the Dippodis Walde: at all points the allies lost ground, and finally withdrew to await a pitched battle on the adjacent heights the next morning. The allies, during the night received reinforcements until, notwithstanding they had lost 6,000 men in the assault, they had nearly 160,000 men in line, independent of the forces under Klenau, who it was hoped would come up before the action was over. They resolved, therefore, to await the attack of the enemy on the following morning; withdrawing altogether from cannon-shot of the ramparts, they arranged their formidable masses in the form of a semicircle on the heights around the walls, from the Elbe, above the suburb of Pirna, to the foot of the slopes of Wolfintz, near Priesnitz, below the city. The weather, which for some days previous, had been severe and intensely hot, now suddenly changed; the skies were clouded, and soon the rain fell in torrents.

Regardless of the storm, Napoleon traversed the city after it was dark, and waited on the bridge till Marmont and Victor's corps began to defile over; and as soon as he was assured of their arrival, retired hastily through the streets again, issued forth on the other side and, by the light of the bivouacs, visited the whole line occupied by his troops, now entirely outside the city, from the barrier of Prina to the suburb of Frederickstadt. He had now accumulated a force of at least 120,000 men, of whom 20,000 were admirable cavalry; an army sufficient in strength not only to repel any further attack which might be directed against the city, but to resume the offensive at all points. Napoleon disposed his troops after the following manner: the right wing, composed of the corps of Victor, and the cavalry of Latour Marbourg, was stationed in front of the gate of Wildsdrack, and in the fields and low grounds from that down the Elbe toward Priesnitz; the center, under the emperor in person, comprising the corps of Marmont and St. Cyr, having the infantry and cavalry of the Old Guard in reserve, supported by the three great redoubts; on the left Ney had the command, and directed the four divisions of the Young Guard, and the cavalry of Kellerman, which extended to the Elbe, beyond the suburb of Pirna. 120,000 men were, by daylight on the following morning, assembled in this position, having Dresden, bristling with cannon, as a vast fortress to support their center. The allies arranged their forces in the following manner: on the right, Wittgenstein commanded the Russians on the road to Pirna, and Kleist, the Prussians, between Streisee and Strehlen; in the center, Schwartzenberg, with the corps of Colloredo, Chastellar, and Bianchi's grenadiers in reserve, occupied the semicircle of heights, which extend from Strehlen by Raeckmitz to Plauen; while beyond Plauen, on the left, were posted the corps of Giulay, and one division of Klenau's troops which had at length arrived. But from the extreme allied left, at the foot of the heights of Wolfmitz to Preisnitz, was a vacant space wholly unoccupied, destined for the remainder of Klenau's men when they should come up.

Both armies passed a cheerless night, drenched to the skin by the unceasing torrents of rain. Napoleon was on horseback at six in the morning and rode out to the neighborhood of the great redoubt, which had been the scene of such a desperate contest the day before. Ghastly traces of the combat were to be seen on all sides: out of the newly-made graves hands and arms were projecting, which stuck up stark and stiff from the earth in a most frightful manner. The cannonade soon began along the whole line; but it was kept up for some hours only in a desultory manner, the excessive rain and thick mist rendering it impossible either to move the infantry or point the guns with precision. In the mean time the French right gradually gained ground upon the detached corps of Austrians, beyond the ravine on the allied left, which was equally incapable of maintaining itself by its intrinsic strength, or obtaining succor across the chasm from the center, and Klenau, though strenuously urged to accelerate his movements had not yet arrived. Napoleon was not long in turning to the best account this state of matters in the allied line. Occupying himself a strong central position, and in a situation to strike at any portion of the vast semicircular line which lay before him, he had also this immense advantage, that the thick mist and incessant rain rendered it impossible not only for the allied generals to see against what quarter preparations were directed, but even for the commanders of corps to perceive the enemy before they were close upon them. This last circumstance proved fatal to their left wing. Unperceived by the enemy, Murat had stole around in the rear of Victor's men, and, entirely turning the flank of the Austrians, got with Latour Maubourg's formidable cuirassiers into the low meadows which lie between Wolfnitz and the Elbe, in the direction of Preisnitz, where it was intended that Klenau's corps should have completed the allied line to the river. Shrouded by the mist, he had thus got with his whole force close to the Austrian left, and almost perpendicular to their line, before they were aware of his approach. Murat, in order to divert the enemy's attention from this decisive attack, caused Victor's infantry to occupy Lobda, in their front, whence they advanced in column against the line, and kept up a heavy cannonade from a strong battery posted on an eminence on their left; and when the action had become warm with the foot, suddenly burst, with 12,000 chosen horsemen, out of the mist, on their flank and rear. In a few moments the Austrian line was broken through and pierced in all directions, and cut to pieces. A few battalions next the center escaped: the whole remainder, being three fourths of the entire corps, with General Metsko, were killed or made prisoners. No sooner was Napoleon aware, by the advancing cannonade on his right, that Murat's attack had proved successful, than he gave orders for his left to advance against Wittgenstein; while the action in the center was confined to a distant cannonade, Ney had concentrated the four divisions of the Young Guard between the Cross Garten and the Elbe, and with them and Kellerman's dragoons, he immediately made a vigorous attack upon the enemy. The Russians posted at the villages of Seidnitz and Grass Dobritz, after a gallant resistance, were at length obliged to give way before the repeated attacks of Ney's men. Ney gradually advanced along the Elbe, driving the enemy before him, until his flank was opposite the enemy's center. At this moment the famous General Moreau, who was in earnest conversation with the Emperor Alexander, was struck by a cannon-shot from a French battery in the center, which almost carried off both his legs, the ball passing through his horse. This event excited a very deep sensation at the allied head-quarters, and for a time averted Alexander's attention at the most critical moment of the action. The allied generals now held a council of war, in which, after much discussion, it was resolved to retreat. Accordingly, on the evening of the 27th, the whole allied army, in three columns, commenced their march, leaving the field in the possession of the victorious French. Early on the morning of the 28th, Napoleon visited the field of battle. It may be conceived what a ghastly spectacle was presented by the ground, on which, within the space of a league round the walls of the city, nearly 300,000 men had combatted for two days, with determined resolution, under the fire of above 1,000 pieces of cannon. The wounded had, for the most part, been transported during the night into the town, by the efforts of the French surgeons, and the unwearied zeal of the inhabitants. But the dead, still unburied, lay accumulated in frightful heaps, for the most part, half naked, having been stripped by those fiends in woman's form, whom so prodigious a concourse of men had attracted to the scene of woe. Cuirasses, sabers, muskets, helmets, belts and cartouch-boxes, lay about in endless disorder; while the ground was plowed in all directions, by vast numbers of cannon-balls. The allies lost, on this occasion, at least 25,000 men, killed, wounded, missing or taken prisoners. 26 cannon, 18 standards, and 130 field-pieces fell into the hands of the French. The French lost about 10,000 men, killed and wounded. In the pursuit which immediately followed, the French took a great quantity of cannon, and baggage and ammunition-wagons, which the allied army, in their haste to escape, abandoned to the enemy, and before the troops had extricated themselves from the mountains, 2,000 additional prisoners were taken by the pursuers.

DREUX, A.D. 1562.—Near Dreux, a town of France, in the year 1562, an engagement took place between a body of Catholic soldiers commanded by the Constable Montmorency, and under him by the Duke of Guise, and the Protestant troops under the Prince of Condé. The field was fought on both sides with great obstinacy, and the action was distinguished by this singular event, that Condé and Montmorency, the commanders of the opposite armies, fell both of them prisoners into the hands of their enemies. The Protestants were finally put to flight, with great slaughter. Montmorency escaped from his enemies, but Condé remained in the hands of the victors.

DROGHEDA.—On the banks of the Boyne, four miles above its embouchure into the Irish sea, stands Drogheda, one of the most famous cities of Ireland. The river divides the town into two unequal portions which are connected by a bridge of three arches. In the time of Oliver Cromwell, the town was called Tredagh, and as it was in the neighborhood of Dublin, its possession was deemed of the utmost importance both by the royalists and by the supporters of the commonwealth. In the year 1649, Cromwell, having entered Dublin in triumph, hastened to Drogheda with his army to lay siege to that town which was in the hands of the royalists. The town was well fortified, and its garrison consisted of 3,000 men under the command of Sir Arthur Aston. Having made a breach, Cromwell ordered a general assault. Twice was he repulsed with loss, but leading on his men in person, he renewed the attack, and at length gained an entrance into the town. The furious valor of his soldiers overthrew all opposition. The tower was taken, sword in hand, and orders being issued to give no quarter, the soldiers of the garrison were cruelly slaughtered. Even the few who were spared by the clemency of the soldiers, were miserably butchered the next day by Cromwell's orders. One person alone of the garrison escaped to be a messenger of this universal havoc and destruction.

DRUMCLOG, A.D. 1697.—The battle of Drumclog was fought on the 1st of June, 1697, at Drumclog, in the parish of Avondale in Scotland, between the royalists under Claverhouse, and the Covenanters. The battle was obstinately contested and resulted in the defeat of the royalists. A thrilling description of this battle, which agrees nearly with the established accounts, can be found in Sir Walter Scott's romance "Old Mortality."

This affair was the only one in which Claverhouse was defeated, or the insurgent Cameronians successful. The royalists lost about thirty or forty men. The commander of the Presbyterian, or rather Covenantry, party, was Mr. Robert Hamilton, of the honorable house of Preston, brother to Sir William Hamilton, to whose titles and estates he afterwards succeeded.

DUNBAR, A.D. 1296.—Dunbar, a seaport town of Scotland, is situated on a slight eminence, on the German ocean, twenty-seven miles north of Edinburg. The town consists of a long and well-built street running east and west, with inferior streets toward the sea, and on the south introducing the road from Edinburg. In former times, on a lofty rock, within sea-mark, stood the celebrated castle of Dunbar, a fortress of great strength, whose date of building is unknown. In the year 1296, Edward I. of England dispatched Earl Warrene with 12,000 men to lay siege to Dunbar, which was defended by the flower of the Scottish nobility. The possession of this place was of the utmost importance to the Scots, for, if taken, it laid their whole country open to the enemy. They therefore advanced their main army, nearly 40,000 strong, under the command of the Earls of Buchan, Lennox, and Marre, in order to relieve it. The British commander, however, was not dismayed at the great superiority of the enemy's number, and marched out to give them battle. He attacked them with great vigor, and, as undisciplined troops, when numerous, are but the more exposed to panic, he soon threw them into confusion, and chased them off the field, with great slaughter. The loss of the Scots it is said amounted to 20,000 men. The next day, the castle of Dunbar, with all its garrison, surrendered to Edward, who arrived after the battle with the main body of the English army.

In the year 1650, Dunbar was the scene of a bloody strife between the army of Oliver Cromwell, 16,000 strong, and the royal forces of Scotland, numbering nearly 30,000 men. The Scots were commanded by General Lesley, who was a good officer, and a prudent commander. Knowing that, though superior in numbers, his army was much inferior in discipline to the English, he kept himself carefully within his intrenched camp which was situated between Edinburg and Leith. He took care to remove from the counties of Merse and the Lothans every thing which could serve to the subsistence of the English army. Cromwell advanced to the Scotch camp, and endeavored by every expedient to bring Lesley to a battle: the prudent Scotchman, however, remained closely within his intrenchments. By skirmishes and slight renconters, he tried to confirm the spirits of his troops; and he was successful in these enterprises. His army daily increased both in numbers and courage. Cromwell found himself in a very bad situation. He had no provisions but what he had received by sea. He had not had the precaution to bring these in sufficient quantities; and his army was reduced to difficulties. He retired to Dunbar. Lesley followed him, and encamped on the heights of Lammermure which overlook that town. There were many difficult passes between Dunbar and Berwick, and of these Lesley had taken possession. Cromwell was reduced to extremities. He even had embraced the resolution of sending by sea all his foot and artillery to England, and breaking through the enemy at all hazards, with his cavalry. The madness of the Scotch ecclesiastics saved him from this loss and dishonor. Night and day the ministers had been "wrestling with God," as they termed it, and they fancied that the victory was awarded to the arms of the Scots. Revelations, they said, were made them that the sectarian and heretical army, together with Agag, meaning Cromwell, was delivered into their hands. Upon the strength of these visions they forced their general, in spite of his remonstrances, to descend into the plain, with a view of attacking the English in their retreat. Cromwell, looking through a glass, saw the enemy's camp in motion; and foretold, without the aid of revelations, that the Lord had delivered them into his hands. He gave orders immediately for an attack. In this battle it was easily observable that nothing in military actions can supply the place of discipline and courage; and that, in the presence of real danger, where men are accustomed to it, the fumes of enthusiasm presently dissipate, and lose their influence. The Scots, though double the number of the English, were soon put to flight, and pursued with great slaughter. The chief, if not the only, resistance, was made by one regiment of Highlanders, that part of the army which was the least infected with fanaticism. No victory could be more complete than this which was obtained by Cromwell. About 3,000 of the enemy were slain, and 9,000 taken prisoners. Cromwell, pursuing his advantage, took possession of Edinburg and Leith; while the remnant of the Scottish army fled to Stirling.

DUNBLANE, A.D. 1715.—This town of Scotland is situated on the Allan, twenty-three miles south-west of Perth. On the 12th of November, 1715, an indecisive battle was fought near this place between the royal forces of England, under the Duke of Argyle, and those of the Pretender, under the Earl of Mar. This battle is also called Sheriffmuir.

DUNDALK, A.D. 1318.—On the 14th of October, 1318, a battle was fought near Dundalk, Ireland, between the troops of Edward II. of England, under John, Lord Birmingham, and the Irish patriots, under Edward Bruce. The battle was obstinate and bloody; the Irish maintained their ground against the enemy until their leader and nearly their entire number were slain, when the survivors fled. The English commander caused the body of Bruce to be quartered, and sent to the four principal towns of Ireland. His head was presented by the victor to Edward, who rewarded him with the title and emoluments of Earl of Louth.

DUNDEE, A.D. 1645.—Dundee, in Scotland, was besieged and sacked by the English under the Duke of Montrose, in the year 1645. Six years afterward (1651), Monk, Cromwell's general, with 8,000 English soldiers, appeared before Dundee, and summoned the garrison to surrender. Lumsden, the Scottish governor, gave him a proud defiance; and Monk made preparations for an assault. Meanwhile, the English general learned that a number of Scottish lords were holding a meeting on a moor in the vicinity. He, thereupon, detached 600 horse, under Colonels Abured and Morgan, who were guided, it is said, by a Scottish traitor, and early in the morning of the 28th of August, fell by surprise on the assemblage, and took 300 prisoners. The besiegers soon made a practicable breach in the walls of Dundee; and advanced to the assault. The place made but a feeble resistance, and in a short time the shouts of the English were resounding through the streets. Lumsden and his troops were immediately massacred; and a general butchery of the inhabitants succeeded. Words can not describe the horrors of that day. Cruelty and lust reigned triumphant. "Mounche commandit all of quhatsummeur sex, to be put to the edge of the sword. Ther wer 800 inhabitants and souldiers killed, and about 200 women and children. The plounder and buttie they gotte in the toune, exceided 2 millions and a halffe," (about $1,000,000!). On account of its strength many of the royalists had deposited their wealth in Dundee, and all this with sixty ships and their cargoes in the harbor, fell into the hands of the victors. The fall of Dundee firmly established the power of the Protector in Scotland.

DUNGAN HILL, A.D. 1647.—On the 10th of July, 1647, a battle was fought at Dungan Hill, in Ireland, between the English army, commanded by Colonel Jones, and the Irish, which resulted in the total defeat of the latter, with a loss of 6,000 men. The British loss was trifling.

DUNKIRK, A.D. 1658.—Dunkirk (the church of the Dunes, or sandbanks), is one of the most northerly seaport towns of France, and is situated on the Straits of Dover.

Cromwell, Protector of England, in spite of disaffection and distraction at home, proceeded in all his foreign measures with the same vigor and enterprise as if secure of the duty and attachment of the three kingdoms. In the year 1658, Spain declared war against him, and he concluded a peace or alliance with France, and united himself in all his counsels with that potent and ambitious kingdom. He maintained his alliance with Sweden, and endeavored to assist that crown in its successful enterprises for reducing all its neighbors to subjection, and rendering itself absolute master of the Baltic. Spain had long courted the friendship of the Protector; but in vain, and at length espoused the cause of the unfortunate Charles II., who formed a league with Philip IV., and removed his small court to Bruges, in Flanders, and raised four regiments of English troops, who were still faithful to him, and employed them in the Spanish service. Cromwell was particularly desirous of conquest and dominion on the continent, and he sent over into Flanders 6,000 men under Reynolds, who joined the French army, commanded by Turenne, and the combined army opened the campaign with the siege of Dunkirk, then in the possession of the Spaniards, who had garrisoned it with about 1,000 men. The Spanish army, under Don Juan, consisting of 6,000 infantry, and 4,000 cavalry, marched to the relief of Dunkirk, and on the 3d of June, 1658, encamped between the village of Zuddcote, and the lines of the besiegers. Turenne resolved to attack the Spaniards at once, and on the morning of the 4th, advanced in battle array against the enemy. The Spanish general hastily placed his men along a ridge of sand-hills which extended from the seacoast to a canal, and gave the command of the right wing to James, Duke of York, afterward James II.; the left wing was under the Prince of Condé, and the center was under the command of Don Juan, in person.

The allied army was drawn up with the French on the right and the English on the left. The English commenced the battle. They were led by Major General Morgan, who found himself opposed to his countryman, the Duke of York. With the greatest ardor the English advanced, receiving the fire of the enemy without flinching, and charging at the point of the pike, drove the enemy from their position. The Duke of York, at the head of the Spanish cavalry charged like a whirlwind upon the English, but a well directed fire of musketry drove him back with great loss; but the fight had been so obstinate that of the English scarcely an officer remained to take the command. Meanwhile, the Prince of Condé was fiercely assailed on the left by the French under Turenne, and was compelled to retreat by the bank of the canal. The center of the Spanish army was never engaged; for the regiment on its extreme left, seeing itself flanked by the French in pursuit of Condé, precipitately abandoned its position, and the whole line soon fled in the greatest disorder. The Duke of York, meanwhile, had rallied his cavalry, and charged the French in flank at the head of his company of horse-guards. The French were thrown into disorder; but they maintained the fight with obstinate valor, employing the butt ends of their muskets against the swords of their adversaries, until several squadrons of French cavalry arrived to their aid. James was surrounded; and in despair of saving himself by flight he boldly assumed the character of a French officer; riding at the head of twenty troops toward the right of their army, and carefully threading his way through the different corps, arrived without exciting suspicion at the bank of the canal, by which he speedily effected his escape to Fermes. The victory on the part of the allies was complete. The Spanish cavalry made no attempt to protect the retreat of their infantry; every regiment of which was successively surrounded by the pursuers, and compelled to surrender. On the 17th of June Dunkirk capitulated, and the King of France with his own hands delivered the keys to the English embassador.

In the year 1793, Dunkirk was besieged by the English under the Duke of York, who was compelled to retire without effecting his purpose.

DURRENSTEIN, A.D. 1805.—In 1805 a battle was fought, near Durrenstein, a town of Lower Austria on the Danube, between the allied armies of Russia and Prussia, and the French, in which the latter were defeated.

DURHAM, (NEVILLE'S CROSS), A.D. 1346.—This ancient and celebrated city of England is situated on a bend of the river Wear, 238 miles north-west of London. The city contains two grand objects of interest, the cathedral and castle. The first of these structures, begun in the reign of William Rufus, but much enlarged and improved in subsequent ages, is a large and majestic pile of Norman architecture. The castle founded by William the Conqueror, and intended partly to bridle that part of his own dominions, and partly as a defense against the irruptions of the Scotch, stands a little to the north of the cathedral in a rocky peninsula, about 80 feet above the river, which nearly encircles both the cathedral and castle.

In the year 1346, when Edward III. of England, made his last invasion upon France, David Bruce, King of Scotland, invaded the frontiers of England with an army of 50,000 men, and carried his ravages and destructions to the gates of Durham. But Philippa, Edward's queen, assembling an army which she intrusted to Lord Percy, approached the enemy at Neville's Cross, near the city of Durham. The English army consisted of 22,000 men, of whom 12,000 were men-at-arms; 3,000 were archers, and 7,000 were other soldiers variously armed. The Scots were posted opposite the English; and both armies were drawn up in order of battle. The English army was drawn up in four battalions. The first was commanded by the Bishop of Durham and Lord Percy; the second by the Archbishop of York and Lord Neville; the third by the Bishop of Lincoln and Lord Mowbray; and the fourth by Lord Baliol (governor of Berwick), the Archbishop of Canterbury, and Lord Roos. Each battalion had its just proportion of men-at-arms and archers. After her men were drawn up in battle array, the queen rode through the ranks of her army, and exhorted every man to do his duty, and take revenge on these barbarous ravagers. Nor could she be persuaded to leave the field until the armies were on the point of engaging. The engagement was commenced by showers of arrows from the archers on either side. At length, however, the combatants wavering in the battle approached each other, and a furious hand-to-hand combat ensued. The struggle commenced about nine o'clock in the morning and lasted till noon. The Scots, armed with sharp and formidable Lochaber-axes, dealt deadly blows upon their enemies; but the English with their heavy swords and bills, cut their way into the midst of the enemy, and after a most bloody battle, at length put the Scots to flight. Fifteen thousand of the Scots were slain; and King David, himself, was taken prisoner; fighting most gallantly and being severely wounded before he was captured. Many of his nobles and knights, and many thousands of his men were taken prisoners. This action is also called the battle of Neville's Cross.

ECKMUHL, A.D. 1809.—This Bavarian village is situated on the great Laber, thirteen miles south of Ratisbon. It is noted only on account of the famous battle fought in the year 1809 in its vicinity, between the grand French army under Napoleon, and the Austrians under the Archduke Charles.

At noon, on the 22d of April, 1809, the French army, 75,000 strong, approache Eckmuhl, where the Archduke Charles with his army was awaiting them. The Austrian army consisted of about 50,000 men. As the French troops arrived on the top of the hills of Lintach, which separate the valley of the Iser from that of the Laber, they beheld the field of battle stretched out before them like a map. From the marshy meadows which bordered the shores of the Laber, rose a succession of hills, one above another, in the form of an amphitheater, with their slopes cultivated and diversified by hamlets, and beautiful forests clothing the higher ground. The villages of Eckmuhl and Laichling, separated by a large copsewood, appeared in view, with the great road to Ratisbon winding up the acclivities behind them. In the interval of the woods, the Austrian artillery was to be seen; standards waved in the village, and long white lines, with glancing helmets and bayonets, showed the columns of the Austrian generals, Rosenberg and Hohenzollern, already in battle array, in very advantageous positions on the opposite side of the valley. The French eagerly descended into the low grounds, while the emperor galloped to the front, and immediately formed his plan of attack. Davoust's column fiercely fell upon the left of the enemy's line, while Lannes, with two divisions of the corps, assailed the village in the center. After a desperate contest, Lannes succeeded in expelling the enemy from the village of Eckmuhl, and in a few moments the shouts of Davoust's column were heard above the din of battle, as they drove the enemy before them. This severe check on his left, caused the archduke to give a general order to fall back. Napoleon now ordered a general attack. To cover his retreat, the archduke placed twelve squadrons of cuirassiers, and a large body of hussars, in front of Eglofsheim, which was garrisoned by six battalions of grenadiers, and supported by several powerful batteries. As the French infantry, in hot pursuit, approached this formidable mass of cavalry, they paused, till the French horse came up in sufficient strength to hazard an engagement; a variety of charges then took place on both sides, with various success; but at length the magnificent Austrian horse bore down with apparently irresistible force upon their pursuers. The French light horse could not withstand the shock, and were quickly dispersed; but soon their own cuirassiers came up, and then two rival bodies, equally heavy-armed, equally brave, equally disciplined, engaged in mortal combat. So vehement was the onset, so nearly matched the strength of the combatants, so tremendous the conflict, that both parties, as if by mutual consent, suspended their fire to await its issue; the roar of the musketry subsided, even the heavy booming of the cannon ceased, and from the mêlée was heard only, as from the battle of the knights of old, the loud clang of the swords ringing on the helmets and cuirasses of the dauntless antagonists. The sun set while the contest was still undecided; the moon rose on the deadly strife, and amid her silvery rays, fire was struck on all sides by the steel upon the armor, and dazzling sparks flew around the combatants, as if a thousand anvils were at once ringing under the blows of the forgers. At length the ringing strokes grew fainter and fainter; the Austrians, unable any longer to make head against the invincible power of the enemy, broke and fled, leaving two thirds of their number on the field. But their heroic stand, however fatal to themselves, proved the salvation of their army. During the engagement, the artillery and infantry withdrew in safety to the rear. Napoleon, with his victorious army, fatigued by fighting, reposed on the bloody field they had won. During the night, the whole Austrian army crossed the Danube, and retired within the walls of Ratisbon. The next day the French army was before the gates of that city. In the battle of Eckmuhl the Austrians lost 5,000 men, killed and wounded, and 7,000 made prisoners, besides twelve standards and sixteen pieces of cannon which fell into the victors' hands. The French loss was about 4,000, killed and wounded.

EDESSA, A.D. 503.—Edessa is the ancient name of a town of Asiatic Turkey, called Oorfa.

The inhabtants of Edessa have, or rather had, a legend that Christ promised their king Abgarus that their city should never be taken. This gave them such confidence, that they on all occasions braved the most formidable enemies. In 503 of the Christian era, Cavadez, king of Persia, approached Edessa at the head of an army. The confidence of the inhabitants was so little shaken by the appearance of this formidable host, that they left their gates wide open during a whole day, and, such is the influence of superstition, the Persians did not make the least attempt to violate the prohibition. It is related that, on this occasion, children even went to the camp of the Persians and insulted them with impunity. Cavadez proposed an accommodation; but without effect. This prince was preparing his batteries, when the inhabitants made so furious an assault upon him, that, without losing a single man, they repulsed his army with great slaughter. Ashamed of his defeat, the great king regained his dominions at quickest speed.

SECOND SIEGE, A.D. 544.—Chosroës, son of the above king, presented himself before Edessa, but without any better success. Upon the point of abandoning his enterprise, he made it known, by a herald, that he meant to sell all the prisoners he had taken at Antioch. The whole city of Edessa, animated by the zealous and active charity which religion inspires, was in a state of eager impatience to redeem these unhappy victims of war. Every one wished to contribute in proportion to, or even beyond, their fortune, to this pious purpose. Each person carried his offering to the great church, which was speedily filled with treasures of various kinds. Courtesans from their vices, honest peasants from their labors, if they had but a goat or a sheep, contributed cheerfully to the liberation of their fellow Christians. This generous emulation produced a sufficient ransom for all the prisoners. But, as is too often the case, this wealth, collected for holy purposes, became so great as to attract the cupidity of Buzes, who commanded the city for the Emperor Justinian: when it was collected, he appropriated the whole to himself, and Chosroës took his prisoners to a better market.

THIRD SIEGE, A.D. 549.—Four years after, this prince again laid siege to Edessa, and attacked it vigorously. But the besieged made a sortie, in which, it is said, an officer named Arget killed, with his own hand, twenty-seven of the enemy, and in which Chosroës was repulsed. He then commenced, out of reach of the city missiles, a platform, with the purpose of carrying it up to the walls. The sight of this terrible work induced the inhabitants to have recourse to prayer. The physician Stephen endeavored to bend the haughty monarch; but his discourse produced very little effect upon Chosroës; he made such hard propositions, that the besieged fell back upon their courage and their resources. They destroyed the point of the terrace, by digging a chamber under it, and filling it with the most combustible wood, steeped in oil of cedar, sulphur, and bitumen; fire was easily set to this, and the following night, columns of fire were seen bursting from different parts of the platform. At the same time, the Romans, the better to deceive the enemy, threw upon it a number of fire-pots and ignited torches. The Persians, not suspecting there was any other cause for the fire, came in crowds from their camp to extinguish it, and were received with showers of missiles from the walls. Chosroës himself came to the scene of action, and was the first one to discover that the conflagration was in the entrails of his platform. He ordered the whole army to throw earth upon the top, to stifle the flames, and water to extinguish them; but all in vain; when vent was stopped at one place, a hundred more passages were opened in others, the water thrown upon the sulphur and bitumen augmenting the violence of the burning. In the midst of the confusion, the garrison made a happy and vigorous sortie, producing great slaughter among the Persians. At length the flames burst from all parts, and the work was abandoned.

Six days after, Chosroës ordered the walls to be scaled, early in the morning; but, after a severe contest, the Persians were repulsed, and obliged to abandon their ladders, which were drawn up over the walls by the besieged, amid triumphant laughter. On the same day at noon, the Persians attacked one of the gates; but the garrison, the peasants who retired to the city, with the inhabitants, made a sortie from the gate attacked, and again repulsed their enemies. At length, the King of Persia, enraged at this noble resistance, resolved upon a general assault. The citizens crowded to defend their walls; every human being in Edessa became a soldier; women, children, and old men, were all eager to share the labors of the combatants, or to furnish them with arms and refreshments. The Persians gave way; Chosroës forced them back to the walls with threats and blows; but, notwithstanding his efforts, they yielded to the brave efforts of the besieged. Foaming with vexation and rage, Chosroës regained his camp, and soon afterward returned to his own states. During this furious attack, an immense elephant, bearing upon his back a lofty tower, filled with archers, advanced toward the wall like a terrible machine, from the top of which poured a continuous shower of darts and arrows. There was a great chance of the wall being escaladed at this spot, when a Roman soldier took it into his head to suspend a pig by a cord, and dangle it before the elephant. This animal appeared amazed at the horrible noise made by the suspended pig; he at first looked at it earnestly, and then, turning his back, retreated in such haste as to place his master's troops in danger.

Fourth Siege, A.D. 1097.—Although the means by which Edessa fell into the hands of one of the Crusaders may not be, correctly speaking, a siege, the circumstances are too interesting to be passed by in silence.

Of all the Crusaders, Baldwin, the brother of Godfrey, was one of the bravest, but at the same time the most intractable. In fact, he had the honesty to confess what many of his comrades really felt, but were ashamed to admit; he came into Asia to make his fortune, and he lost no opportunity for effecting that great purpose.

Seduced by the attractive picture drawn of the provinces upon the banks of the Euphrates by Pancratius, an ambitious, restless, Armenian prince, Baldwin, soon after the siege of Nicea, abandoned the main army of the Crusaders, and may literally be said to have gone to seek his fortune at the head of 1,500 foot and 200 horse, all attracted by the hopes of plunder. He was the more free for this undertaking, from having just lost his wife Gundechilde, who had accompanied him to the Crusade. He witnessed the magnificent obsequies bestowed upon her by his fellow-adventurers, and then departed, unregretted, on his expedition.

The cities of Turbessel and Ravendel were the first places that opened their gates to the fortunate adventurer. These conquests soon produced a division between Baldwin and Pancratius, both being actuated by the same ambitious projects; but this quarrel did not stop the march of the brother of Godfrey a moment. The Crusader opposed open unhesitating force to cunning; he told Pancratius, if he presumed to be his rival, he should at once treat him as an enemy; and thus banished the disappointed Armenian from the theater of his victories. Baldwin stood in need of neither guide nor help in a country whose inhabitants all came out to hail and meet him. His fame preceded his march; and his exploits were canvassed in Edessa long before he drew near to its walls.

This city, the metropolis of Mesopotamia, and so celebrated in the history of the primitive church, having escaped the invasions of the Turks and Persians, became the place of refuge for all the neighboring Christians, who brought their wealth thither for security. A Greek prince, of the name of Theodore, sent by the Emperor of Constantinople, was governor at the time, and maintained his position by paying tribute to the Saracens. The approach and the victories of the Crusaders produced a great sensation in Edessa. The people united with the governor in calling Baldwin to their aid. The bishop and twelve of the principal inhabitants were deputed to meet the European adventurer. They spoke to him of the wealth of Mesopotamia, of the devotion of their fellow-citizens to the cause of Christ, and conjured him to save a Christian city from the domination of the infidels. Baldwin easily yielded to their entreaties, and set forward on his march to cross the Euphrates.

He had the good fortune to escape the Turks, who laid wait for him, and without drawing a sword, arrived safely in the territories of Edessa. Having left garrisons in the places which had surrendered to him, when he came near to this great object of his ambition, he had really with him no more than a body of 100 horsemen. As he approached the city, the whole population came out to meet him, bearing olive branches, and singing triumphant hymns. It was a singular spectacle to behold such a small number of warriors surrounded by an immense multitude, imploring their support and proclaiming them their liberators. They were received with so much enthusiasm, that the prince or governor took umbrage at it, and began to see in them enemies much more dangerous than the Saracens. To attach their leader to himself, and to engage him to support his authority, he offered him vast wealth. But the ambitious Baldwin, whether he expected to obtain more from the affection of the people and the good fortune of his arms, or whether he considered it disgraceful to be in the pay of a petty foreign prince, refused the governor's offers with contempt, he even threatened to leave the city to its fate. The inhabitants, to prevent his departure, assembled in a tumultuous manner, and conjured him with loud cries to remain among them; the governor himself made fresh efforts to detain the Crusaders and interest them in their cause. Baldwin gave them all clearly to understand that he would never be at the trouble of defending states that were not his own; and the Prince of Edessa, who was old and childless, determined to adopt him as his son, and to designate him as his successor. The ceremony of adoption was gone through in the presence of the Crusaders and the inhabitants. According to the custom of the East, the Greek prince caused Baldwin to pass between his shirt and his naked flesh, giving him a kiss, in token of alliance and parentage. The old wife of the governor repeated the same ceremony, and from that time Baldwin, considered as their son and heir, neglected nothing for the defense of a city which was to belong to him.

An Armenian prince coming to the aid of Edessa, Baldwin, seconded by this useful auxiliary, with his own horsemen and Theodore's troops, thought himself in a condition to take the field against the Turks. He was at first successful, but, while his men were engaged in plunder, they were attacked, and obliged to return to Edessa, where their appearance spread consternation.

As a loser is never welcome, Baldwin and Theodore began now to quarrel. But the people were all in favor of the new prince, and after several disgraceful plots and tumults, the Edessans hurled their old governor from the battlements, dragged his bleeding body through the streets, rejoicing over the murder of an old man as if they had gained a victory over the infidels.

Although Baldwin affected to be passive in this horrid business, he did not fail to seize the advantages that accrued to him in consequence of it. He was proclaimed master and liberator of Edessa. Seated on a bloody throne, and dreading the inconstant humor of the people, he soon inspired as much fear among his subjects as among his enemies. But his firmness of character overcame domestic seditions, and his prudence, tact, and valor, speedily extended his dominions. He purchased the city of Samoata with the treasures of his predecessor, and took several other cities by force of arms. As fortune favored him in every thing, the loss even of his wife assisted his projects of aggrandizement. He married the niece of an Armenian prince, and, by this alliance, extended his possessions to Mount Taurus. All Mesopotamia, with the two shores of the Euphrates, acknowledged his authority, and Asia beheld a Frank knight reigning without obstacle over the richest provinces of the ancient kingdom of Assyria.—Robson.

EDGEHILL FIGHT, A.D. 1642.—Edgehill is an elevated ridge of land in Warwick county, England, seven miles north-west of Banbury.

The battle of Edgehill took place on the 23d of October, 1642, and was the first engagement of importance between the royalists and the parliament army, in the civil war. Charles I., with 6,000 men, was on his road toward London, from Nottingham, and the Earl of Essex hastened, with an army of 15,000 men, to Worcester to check the advance of the royal army. In London the news of the approach of the royalists was received with terror; and peremptory orders were dispatched to Essex to hasten with his whole force to the protection of the capital and the parliament. Essex had anticipated this order, and his vanguard entered the village of Keynton on the same evening (October 22) on which the royalists halted on Edgehill, only a few miles in advance. At midnight Charles held a council of war, in which it was resolved to turn upon the pursuers and offer them battle. Early in the morning the royal forces were drawn up in battle order on the summit of a range of hills. Their position was decidedly advantageous in case of attack; but Essex, whose artillery with one fourth of his men, was several miles in the rear, satisfied with having arrested the march of the enemy, quietly posted the different corps, as they arrived, on a rising ground, in the vale of the Red Horse, about half a mile in front of the village. About noon the cavaliers grew weary of inaction; and intreated the king to lead them into battle. Their importunity at last prevailed; and at about two o'clock in the afternoon, the king discharged a cannon with his own hand as the signal of battle. The royalists descended in good order to the foot of the hill, where their hopes were raised by the treachery of Sir Faithful Fortescue, a parliamentary officer, who, firing his pistol into the ground, ranged himself, with two bodies of cavalry, under the banner of the king. Soon afterward, Prince Rupert, who commanded the cavalry on the right of the royal army, charged the parliamentary horse, under Sir James Ramsay; broke them at the very onset; urged the pursuit two miles beyond Keynton, and, finding the baggage of the army in the village, indulged his men for the space of an hour, in the work of plunder. Had it not been for this fatal imprudence, the royalists would probably have gained a decisive victory. During his absence the main bodies of infantry were engaged, under their respective leaders, the Earls of Lindsay and Essex, both of whom dismounting, led their men into action on foot. The cool and determined courage of the roundheads undeceived and disconcerted the cavaliers. The royal horse, on the left, a weak body, under Lord Wilmot, had sought protection behind a regiment of pikemen; and Sir William Balfour, the parliamentary commander, leaving a few squadrons to keep them at bay, wheeled round on the flank of the royal infantry, broke through two divisions, and made himself master of a battery of cannon. In another part of the field the king's guards, with his standard, bore down every corps that opposed them, till Essex ordered two regiments of infantry and a squadron of horse to charge them in front and flank, while Balfour, abandoning the guns which he had taken, burst on them from the rear. They now broke; Sir Edward Varner was slain, and the standard which he bore was taken; the Earl of Lindsay received a mortal wound; and his son, the Lord Willoughby, was made prisoner, in the attempt to rescue his father. Charles, who, attended by his troop of pensioners, watched the fortune of the day, beheld with dismay the slaughter of his guard. The standard was, however, recovered by the daring valor of a Captain Smith, whom the king made a baronet on the spot. The king now ordered the reserve to advance, placing himself at their head; but at that moment Rupert and the cavalry reappeared, and their presence restored the hopes of the royalists and damped the ardor of their opponents. A breathing time succeeded: the firing ceased on both sides, and the adverse armies stood gazing at each other, till the darkness induced them to withdraw—the royalists to their first position, and the parliamentarians to the village of Keynton. From the conflicting statements of the parties, it is impossible to estimate their respective losses. Most writers make the number of the slain 5,000, but the clergyman of the place, who superintended the burial of the dead, reduces it to about 1,200 men. Both parties claimed the honor, neither reaped the benefit, of the victory. Essex, leaving the king to pursue his march, withdrew to Warwick and thence to Coventry: Charles, having compelled the garrison of Banbury to surrender, turned aside to the city of Oxford. Each commander wished for leisure to reorganize his army after the late battle.

ESDRAELON, B.C. 1316.—In the year 1316 B.C. in the plains of Esdraelon, in Palestine, was fought the famous battle between the Israelites under Deborah and Barak, and the Canaanites under Sisera. The Lord, to punish the children of Israel, sold them to Jabin, king of Canaan. The Israelites were sorely oppressed by their cruel taskmasters, and intreated the Lord to rescue them from the chains of slavery. Deborah, the prophetess, sent for Barak, and said to him, "Hath not the Lord God of Israel, commanded, saying, Go, and draw toward Mount Tabor, and take with thee ten thousand men, of the children of Naphtali, and of the children of Zebulun. And I will draw unto thee, to the river Kishon Sisera the captain of Jabin's army, with his chariots and his multitude; and I will deliver him into thy hands?" Barak replied, "If thou wilt go with me, then I will go; but if thou wilt not go with me, then I will not go." "I will surely go with thee," said Deborah, "notwithstanding the journey that thou takest shall not be for thine honor; for the Lord shall sell Sisera into the hands of a woman." Deborah accompanied Barak to Kadesh, and thence, with 10,000 men, they both advanced to Mount Tabor. Sisera, receiving intelligence of this movement of the Israelites, collected his chariots to the number of 900, and all the people that were with him, and marched to the river Kishon, which waters the plain of Esdraelon. The Israelites marched from Mount Tabor, and attacked the Canaanites. The Lord rendered them assistance, and by his aid, Sisera, with all his chariots, and his entire force, were put to rout. Sisera dismounted from his chariot and fled on foot. The Israelites pursued the fugitives with such ardor, that of the whole army of the Canaanites not one escaped. Sisera fled to the tent of Jael, the wife of Heber the Kenite, who was at peace with the Canaanites. She admitted him, but treacherously killed him while he was sleeping, by driving a nail into his temple. The Israelites, after this, prosecuted the war so vigorously that, with the help of the Lord, they destroyed Jabin, the king of Canaan, and regained their freedom.

ENGEN, A.D. 1800.—Engen is situated on the Aach, in Baden, twenty-three miles north-west of Constance.

On the 2d of May, the center of the French army, commanded by Moreau, encountered the main force of the Austrians in the extensive plain which lies before the town of Engen. The Austrians, with Kray at their head, numbered some 40,000 men, besides the cavalry, which consisted of over 9,000, and as they were drawn up, presented a very grand and imposing appearance. The design of Moreau was to attack in front himself, at the head of the reserve and part of the center, while St. Cyr, with his division, was to turn the left of the enemy. But that general, being five leagues in the rear, could not come up until late in the day, and Moreau, fearing if the action was delayed the enemy would retreat, at the head of 32,000 men commenced the action himself. The principal effort of Moreau was to gain possession of the plateau on the right of the imperialists, which would command their line of retreat, and also facilitate his union with St. Cyr; but Kray having taken every advantage of the ground in that quarter, for a long time resisted all the efforts of the republicans to drive them back from the vineyards and wooded hills, which they had surmounted with a numerous artillery. After a time, the French carried the peak of Hohenhowen, the highest point on the field of battle, and the Austrians returned to the village of Ehingen. The Austrians strongly re-enforced this important post, to restore the combat, and Moreau brought up his reserve to drive them from it. The republicans at first succeeded in carrying the village, but Kray charged in person at the head of the Hungarian grenadiers, drove them out with great slaughter, and compelled them to flee in disorder to the plain. Moreau hastened to the scene of action, restored order in a measure, and partly regained the lost ground, but the Hungarians still kept possession of the village, and all the roads leading to it. During this time, the French division of Richepans, which had taken possession of the peak of Hohenhowen, were exposed to a furious attack from the Austrian right. The summit of the mountain seemed like a volcano, throwing out fire in every direction; and as twilight approached, it was easily seen, from the strong light that illuminated the heavens in that quarter, that his position was with great difficulty maintained. At seven in the evening, the vanguard of the corps of St. Cyr arrived, and soon after took a part in the action. The battle was now more equal, and although the artillery on both sides still kept up a furious fire, it was evident that Kray only fought to gain time to withdraw his stores and ammunition. The Austrian general, receiving information of the defeat of the Prince of Lorraine, and the capture of Stockach, which threatened his communications, drew off his forces in the direction of Liptingen and Moeskirch, and formed a junction with the prince, who had retreated in the same quarter. The loss of the Austrians in this battle was nearly 7,000 men; that of the republicans was not so great.

ENGHIEN, A.D. 1692.—The battle of Enghien was fought on the 3d of August, 1692, by the British, under William III., and the French under Marshal Luxemburg. The French, on this occasion, were victorious. Louis XIV. had invaded the Netherlands with an immense army, marshaled by Generals Luxemburg, Condé, and Turenne. William had put himself at the head of the confederated army in the Netherlands, and leagued himself with the Protestant powers upon the continent against the ambition of Louis. Although defeated in the battle of Enghien, he triumphed in the end.

ESPIERIES, A.D. 1794.—This battle was fought on the 22d of May, 1794, by the allied English and Austrians on the one side, and the French on the other. The battle was long and bloody. Each army consisted of nearly 100,000 men. The French were finally defeated, losing 12,000 men, killed and wounded, 500 prisoners, and seven peices of cannon.

EUPATORIA, A.D. 1855.—On the 17th of February, 1855, the town of Eupatoria, in Russia, occupied by the Turks, was attacked on the eastern side by 25,000 Russians, of whom 12,000 were cavalry, with 80 pieces of artillery, under General Osten Sacken. The combat lasted from half past five o'clock until ten o'clock in the morning. The Russians were finally repulsed. The Turks lost nearly 400 men killed and wounded. Among the slain were Selim Pasha, general of the Egyptian division, and Colonel Rustem Bey. The Russians lost about 500 men killed, and a large number wounded. The battle consisted chiefly of a heavy fire of artillery, under cover of which the Russians made two or three attempts to carry the town. On the next day they returned toward Simpheropol. The French steamers at anchor in the roadstead contributed energetically to the defense of the town. Eighteen Frenchmen were killed and wounded on shipboard.

A cavalry action took place on the 29th of September, 1855, between the French under General d'Allonville, seconded by the Turks under Achmet Mushir Pasha, and the Russians, near Eupatoria, in which the latter were defeated with a loss of 50 in killed and wounded. The French lost 35 men. In this action the French captured 6 guns, 12 ammunition-chests, with their teams, 169 prisoners, and 250 horses.

EURYMEDON, B.C. 470.—In the year 473 B.C., the Athenians lost one of their most distinguished citizens, as well as ablest generals, by the banishment of Themistocles. They endeavored to retrieve that loss by bestowing the command of the armies on Cimon, who was not inferior to him in merit. No Grecian general ever gave so great a blow to the pride and haughtiness of a Persian monarch, as Cimon. Not satisfied with driving the Persians out of Greece, he pursued them, without suffering them to take breath, and ravaged and laid waste many portions of their dominion. In the year 470 B.C., he learned that the Persian fleet, consisting of 350 ships of war, was lying near the mouth of the river Eurymedon, in Pamphylia. Notwithstanding the inferiority of his fleet in number (it consisted only of 200 ships), he determined to attack the enemy. The Persian fleet was supported by the land army on the coast. It was soon put to flight; and more than 200 ships were taken, besides those that were sunk. A great number of the Persians had left their ships and leaped into the sea, in order to join their land army, which lay on the shore. The barbarian forces advanced close to the sea, and it appeared to Cimon, an arduous undertaking to make good his landing by dint of sword, with troops who were fatigued with the late action, and to engage those that were quite fresh, and many times their number. But when he saw his men elated with their late victory, and desirous to be led against the enemy, he disembarked his heavy infantry, while yet warm from the action. With loud shouts they rushed forward upon the Persians, who received the charge without breaking. A sharp contest ensued, and many of the bravest and most distinguished Athenians were slain. At length the barbarians, with much difficulty, were put to rout; many were killed, and a great number fell into the hands of the Greeks as prisoners. The main body of the Persian army fled from the field of battle, leaving their pavilions full of all manner of rich spoil behind them. Thus, Cimon, like an excellent champion, won two prizes in one day, and by these two exploits outdid the victory of Salamis at sea, and of Platæa on land.

EUTAW SPRINGS, A.D. 1781.—At the head of this small stream which flows into the Santee river, in South Carolina, was fought on the 8th of September, 1781, a battle between the American patriots and the British, which will be remembered to all time.

After the battle of Hobkirk, General Greene fell back with the American troops upon Gum Swamp, five miles from Hobkirk. The British general, Lord Rawdon, on the 9th of May, 1781, evacuated Camden, and retired toward Charleston, and encamped on the 13th at Nelson's Ferry, on the banks of the Santee river. Shortly afterward, learning that the forts of Granby, Orangeburg, and Motte, had fallen into the hands of the Americans, the British general raised his camp and retired as far back as Eutaw Springs. Greene resolved to take advantage of this movement on the part of the enemy by reducing Ninety-six and Augusta, the only posts that still favored the royal cause. The Americans accordingly laid siege to both these places, General Greene assailing Ninety-six, and Colonel Pickens, Augusta. Pickens was successful at Augusta; but at Ninety-six Greene did not fare so well.

Finding the place too strong to be carried by storm, the American general raised the siege and withdrew beyond the Tiger and Broad rivers. Rawdon entered Ninety-six, shortly afterward, and having examined the place, was of opinion that it could not hold out against a regular attack. He therefore recommenced his march, and advancing toward the lower part of South Carolina, established his head-quarters at Orangeburg. Greene, emboldened by his retreat, approached this place; but perceiving that the position of the British army was most advantageous, he halted, and turned his course toward the high hills of the Santee. Here he occupied himself in strengthening his army, and exercising his troops. His diligence was amply rewarded. The militia flocked to his standard, from the surrounding country, in crowds, and he soon found himself at the head of an army composed of soldiers equal in number and courage to those of the enemy. At the beginning of September, finding his troops anxious to be employed, Greene resolved to endeavor to expel the British from the few towns they still occupied in South Carolina, except the city of Charleston. The American army accordingly advanced by a circuitous route toward the upper Congaree, and passing that river, descended rapidly along its left bank, in order to attack the British, under Colonel Stuart, who were stationed at Macord's Ferry, near the Congaree and Santee rivers.

No sooner did the British perceive the approach of the enemy than they abandoned their position at Macord's Ferry, and fell back on Eutaw Springs, where they commenced to fortify themselves. Greene pursued them thither, and, on the morning of the 8th of September, advanced in battle array against the enemy. The American army consisted of 2,300 men. The vanguard was composed of militia, two battalions of North, and two of South Carolina. The center consisted of the regular troops of the Carolinas, and of Virginia and Maryland. Lieutenant Colonel Lee, with his legion, covered the right flank, and Colonel Henderson, with the State troops, under Colonels Polk, and Wade Hampton, the left. The rear guard was composed of the dragoons of Colonel Washington, and the Delaware militia, under Captain Kirkwood. The artillery consisted of four pieces, two three-pounders and two sixes. The first, under Captain Gaines, advanced with the vanguard; the second, under Captain Brown, with the center. The British army consisted of about 2,500 men. The English commander drew up his troops in two lines; the first line was covered on the right by the little river Eutaw, and on the left by a thick grove. The second, which formed the reserve, was stationed on the height which commands the Charleston road. The right wing of the first line consisted of the Irish Buffs (3d regiment); the center of loyalists, under Lieutenant Colonel Cruger, and the left, of 63d and 64th veteran regiments. The second line was composed of Coffin's cavalry, and a detachment of infantry. The artillery was planted in the front of the line. In the rear of the British line was a cleared field, which was spotted with the tents of the soldiers. Near the Charleston road was a strong brick house, which, with its garden, was fortified with pallisades. Thus, on the morning of the 8th, were posted the two hostile armies. The landscape was basking in loveliness. The woods clothed in green; the verdant fields, the fragrant air, and the rippling stream, all seemed more fitted for peace than war, yet soon was the fair groves to be shattered by cannon-shot, the grassy fields to be marred by the heels of contending men; the air to be racked by the harsh concussion of fiery discharges, and the lucid waters of Eutaw to be polluted by the blood of dying men.

At about eight o'clock, the Americans having arrived within four miles of Eutaw, Colonel Lee fell in with a British foraging party, of about 400 men, under escort of Captain Coffin. Coffin, not aware of the proximity of the main body of the American army, immediately assailed the troops of Armstrong, who led Lee's advance. Armstrong fell back, and the British eagerly pursuing fell fiercely on Lee and Henderson. A sharp skirmish ensued. Lee's cavalry, under Major Eggleston, at length succeeded in gaining Coffin's flank, and attacked him in the rear. The Americans profiting by this movement, attacked the British in turn, with the utmost vigor, and, after a desperate struggle, put them to flight. Many of the British infantry were killed, and 40, with Coffin, were made prisoners. A number of the foraging party were also captured. The Americans, animated by this victory, pressed forward rapidly. When within a mile of the British position, they suddenly encountered another detachment of the enemy, which had been sent forward to succor Coffin and the foragers. The British fell back, and Greene pressed eagerly to a general attack. The British artillery swept the road, and checked the advance of the Americans; but Gaines's artillery was brought forward, at full gallop, and opened upon the British with terrible effect. The enemy's detachments separately fell back to the flanks of the main body of their army.

The Americans extending their lines, steadily advanced, pouring rapid and destructive volleys of artillery and musketry upon the British. The action now became general. Both parties incessantly plied their artillery and musketry, and the carnage was fearful. At length the Carolina militia wavered and fell back. The British division at the left of the first line, leaving its position, eagerly pressed after the retiring Americans. The militia fought furiously as they retired, contesting every inch of soil with obstinate valor. At this moment Gaines's three-pounders were dismounted, and one of the British cannon was disabled. The center of the American army was pierced, but the two wings maintained their ground checking every advance of the enemy. The British line was also opened, the left being in full pursuit of the flying militia in the American center, while the center and right wings were engaged with the two wings of the enemy. Greene observed this opening in the British line, and immediately took advantage of it. Pushing forward his second line, he charged the British left so violently that they in turn wavered, and began to recede in disorder. At the same moment the second line of the British army was brought forward, and furiously assailed the fresh American troops. "Let Williams advance, and sweep the field with bayonets!" was Greene's orders, and like a tempest the brave Virginians under Colonel Campbell, and the equally gallant Marylanders, under Colonel Williams, rushed upon the enemy. When within forty yards of the British, these troops delivered one destructive volley; and then with fixed bayonets charged furiously upon them. The British were thrown into disorder; and Captain Rudolph of Lee's legion, wheeling upon their flank, completed their defeat by a close and well-directed fire of musketry. Meanwhile, a body of Maryland troops, under Howard, were hotly engaged with the Irish Buffs, on the right of the British army. So close were the combatants that their bayonets were crossed; and in that position they maintained an incessant fire upon each other. The Virginians and Marylanders after defeating the British left, fell with the utmost fury upon the British center and right. The shock was terrible; and the British receded. And now a shout of victory arose from the American lines which was heard above the din of battle; and that shout fell upon the ears of a dying hero. Colonel Campbell was mortally wounded in the charge which shattered the British line. "I die content!" said he, and expired. The English in their flight threw themselves into the house and garden before mentioned, where they resolved to make a desperate defense. Others took shelter in a thick and almost impenetrable wood. The Americans at once endeavored to dislodge the enemy. The house was battered by four pieces of cannon; Colonel Washington on the left advanced to penetrate the wood, and Colonel Lee to force the garden. The English defended themselves gallantly, and the Americans endeavored in vain to drive them from their strongholds. Both parties fought with the most determined valor, and the carnage was fearful. Washington's horse was shot under him, and he himself received a severe bayonet wound. His life was in the greatest peril; but a British officer nobly interfered, saving him from the hands of the infuriated soldiery, and making him prisoner. Meanwhile, Stuart, having relieved his right wing pushed forward, by a circuitous movement against the left flank of the Americans. This bold movement convinced Greene that further efforts to dislodge the enemy were useless. Leaving Colonel Hampton with a strong picket, near the British camp, the American general withdrew the remainder of the army seven miles to the rear of the British. He brought off about 500 prisoners, and all his wounded, with the exception of those near the house. He abandoned two pieces of artillery to the enemy. The English did not attempt a pursuit; but were contented to repossess themselves of their camp. The Americans lost in this battle, which continued four hours, 152 men killed, 355 wounded, and 40 missing. The British lost 693 men killed, wounded, and made prisoners. Eighty-five were killed on the plain On the day after the battle, the British commander, retreated for Charleston, leaving 72 of his wounded, and 1,000 stands of arms, behind him. In this battle both parties claimed the victory; in truth it belonged to neither; but the advantage decidedly belonged to the Americans. For his skill, bravery and caution, on this occasion, Greene received the merited reward of a gold medal, struck by order of Congress.

EVESHAM, A.D. 1265.—Evesham is situated on both banks of the river Avon, in England, in a beautiful and fertile valley bearing the same name. Near this place was fought, on the 4th of August, 1265, the battle between Edward, Prince of Wales, afterward Edward I., and the confederated barons under Simon de Montfort, Earl of Leicester. Leicester, with his army, lay at Evesham, in expectation of being every hour joined by his friends from London, when suddenly the forces of Edward appeared in the field before him. Drawing up his army in a compact circle, the earl exhorted his soldiers to fight like men who had all to gain or all to suffer. At the same time, he obliged the old king (Henry III.) to put on armor, and to fight against his own cause in the front of the battle. The battle soon began, but Leicester's army, exhausted by famine on the mountains of Wales, were ill able to sustain the impetuosity of Edward's attack, who bore down upon them with incredible fury. During this terrible day, Leicester behaved with astonishing intrepidity, and kept up the spirit of the action from two o'clock in the afternoon till nine at night. At last, his horse being killed under him, he was obliged to fight on foot, and though he demanded quarter, his enemies refused it, and he fell dead upon the field, covered with wounds. The old king, who had been purposely placed in the front of the battle by the rebels, was soon wounded in the shoulder, and being clad in armor, and thereby unknown to his friends, was on the point of being killed by a soldier, when he cried out, "I am Henry of Winchester, your king!" A knight of the royal army, recognizing his voice, spurred forward, and saved his life. Prince Edward, hearing the voice of his father, sped to the spot where he lay, and had him conducted to a place of safety. The rebels, beaten at all points, fled in every direction. The body of Leicester, being found among the dead, was barbarously mangled by one Roger Mortimer, and then, with an accumulation of inhumanity, sent to his wretched widow, as a testimony of the success of the royalists. This victory proved decisive; and the rebels everywhere submitted, or were pursued with vigor. Their castles were taken and demolished; and scarce any were found that disputed the king's authority.

EYLAU, A.D. 1807.—The village of Eylau, in Prussia, was, on the 8th of February, 1807, the scene of one of the most terrible battles recorded in history. There, within half cannon-shot of each other, were encamped two hostile armies, French and Russian, the former 80,000 strong, the latter 75,000; and their immense masses were disposed in close array, on a space not exceeding a league in breadth. The field of battle was an open expanse of uninclosed ground, rising in swells or small hills, interspersed with many lakes; but as the whole surface was covered with snow, and the lakes so thoroughly frozen as to bear the weight either of cavalry or artillery, the whole surface was accessible to military operations. The Russians were provided with four hundred and sixty pieces of cannon, while the French had not above three hundred and fifty pieces. The French cavalry was nearly 16,000 strong. Thus the two armies were nearly equal—the French superiority in numbers, and especially in cavalry, being counterbalanced by the advantage which the Russians had in that important arm, the artillery. The Russian right, under Tutschakoff, lay on either side of Schloditten, the center, under Sacken, occupied a cluster of little open hills, intercepted by lakes, in front of Kuschnitten; the left, under Osterman Tolstoy, rested on Klein-Saussgarten; the advanced guard, 10,000 strong, with its outposts, extending almost to the houses of Eylau, was under the command of Bargrathion; the reserve, in two divisions, was led by Doctoroff. The whole army in front was drawn up in two lines, with admirable precision; the reserve in two close columns behind the center; the foot artillery, consisting of 400 pieces, was disposed along the front of the lines; the horse artillery carrying sixty guns; cavalry and Cossacks, under Platoff, in reserve behind the center and wings, in order to support any point which might appear to require assistance. The French position, generally speaking, was more elevated than that of the Russians, with the exception of the right, which was commanded by the heights of Klein-Saussgarten. The town of Eylau, however, occupied in force by their troops, was situated in a hollow, so low that the roofs of the houses were below the range of the cannon-shot, and the summit of the church-steeple, which stands on an eminence alone, was exposed to the destructive storm. Davoust was on the right, and received orders from Napoleon to attack the village of Klein-Saussgarten and Serpallen, occupied by the enemy. Soult, in the center, was destined to advance against the Russian main body, and the strong batteries placed opposite to Eylau. Augereau was on the left to support his attack; the Imperial Guard, and cavalry of Murat, in reserve behind the center, ready to support any attack which might appear likely to prove unsuccessful. Lestocq, the Russian general, had lain the preceding night with his division at Husehnen, which was only three leagues distant, and was expected to join the Russian army before the battle was far advanced. Ney, the French marshal, had not yet arrived with his division; but orders were dispatched to him to attack the Russian right, when the action was warmly engaged; and it was hoped that he would come up, at least as soon as Lestocq on the other side, upon whose traces he had long been following. When Napoleon saw that the Russians stood firm, and were resolved to give battle, he determined to turn their left wing by the corps of Davoust, and throw it back on the middle of the army. The better to conceal this object, he commenced the action shortly after daybreak, by a violent attack on their right and center.

The Russian batteries in the center poured incessant, but ill-directed volleys upon the French masses in front of Eylau; while the French guns replied with fatal effect from their elevated position, down upon the enemy, whose lines were exposed from head to foot to the range of their shot. Suddenly the left wing of the French army, led by Marshal Augereau, advanced in massy columns toward Schloditten, while Soult' scorps, preceded by 150 pieces of artillery, marched with an intrepid step against the Russian center, and forty guns of the Imperial Guard, posted on an eminence, near the church of Eylau, opened a heavy fire on the great central Russian battery.

When these troops had advanced about 300 yards, driving the Russian trailleurs before them, the Russian cannon-shot from two hundred pieces, admirably directed, plowed through the mass, and so shattered it, that the whole body inclined to the left to get under the shelter of a detached house which stood in the way. At this moment a snow-storm set in, and darkened the air, so that neither party could see its opponents; but, nevertheless, the deadly storm of bullets continued to tear the massy columns of Augereau, and the fire was so violent as to prevent Soult from rendering him any effectual support. In the midst of this carnage, enveloped by the driving snow, Augereau's division was suddenly assailed on the one side by the right wing of the Russians, and on the other by the Russian reserve, and Doctoroff's powerful cavalry. So thick was the snow-storm that the French did not perceive their assailants, till they had approached within a few yards of them, and the long lances of the Cossacks almost touched their breasts. Before this terrible and unexpected charge of cavalry and infantry, the French columns were dissolved as if by magic.

Overwhelmed, they broke and fled in the wildest disorder, closely pursued by the Russian cavalry and Cossacks, who sabered down the fugitives without mercy. Out of 16,000 men, who composed the French columns of attack, 1,500 only found their ranks again. The others were either taken or destroyed; and Augereau, with his two generals of division, Desgardeus and Heudelet, were severely wounded. Napoleon, stationed in the church-yard of Eylau, was apprized of this disaster by the torrent of fugitives which rushed into the village. The snow-storm suddenly cleared away, and he saw the Russian right and center far advanced. The crash of the Russian balls on the steeple and walls of the church, showed how nearly danger was approaching. A Russian division actually entered the town in close pursuit of the fugitives, and with loud hurrahs charged to the foot of the mound where the emperor was placed with a battery of the Imperial Guard, and his personal escort of 100 men. In spite of his danger, Napoleon retained his usual presence of mind. He ordered his little body-guard to form a line, in order to check the enemy's advance, and dispatched orders to the Old Guard to attack the column on one flank, while a brigade of Murat's horse charged it on the other. At the sight of the grenadiers of Napoleon's guard, the Russians came to a dead stand; and before they could make a regular assault, Murat's men and the Old Guard rushed upon them with the utmost fury, and almost the whole division was cut to pieces on the spot. Napoleon now ordered a grand charge by the whole cavalry and Imperial Guard, supported by the divisions of Soult, who were again formed and led back to the attack upon the center. Napoleon anxiously watched the movements of this enormous mass. Fourteen thousand cavalry, and 25,000 foot soldiers, supported by 200 pieces of cannon, moved over the slope. The snow had again commenced falling. In the midst of a storm of whirling snow, the French troops precipitated themselves upon the Russian center. The shock was irresistible; the front line of the Russians, thrown into disorder, was obliged to give way; their cavalry was crushed by the enormous weight of the 14,000 horsemen who followed the white plume of Murat, and a terrible mêlée ensued in which prodigious losses were sustained on both sides. The Russians disdained to fly, and rallying again and again, maintained the combat with the most dogged determination. At this moment, Benningsen, the Russian commander, ordered up the whole of the infantry of the reserve. These brave men, regardless of the storm of grape and musketry which fell in their advancing ranks, pressed on eagerly to the support of their comrades; and uniting with the first line, charged home with loud cries upon their enemy. In the shock, Essen's Russian division was broken, and the French horse swept through several openings and got as far as the reserve cavalry of Benningsen. But now with loud shouts the Cossacks of the Don advanced. Regardless of danger, they galloped forward to the charge, their long lances in rest, their horses at full speed, and in an instant pierced through and scattered the French cuirassiers. Retreat was impossible through the again closed ranks of the enemy, and 18 only of the whole body regained their own lines by a long circuit. The divisions of Davoust on the French left, in the mean time, were performing prodigies of valor. By repeated and vigorous attacks he possessed himself of the village of Klein-Saussgarten. At Serpallen the action was warmly contested. After a most obstinate conflict the Russians at this point gave way; the cannoneers bravely resisting, were bayoneted at their guns, and their pieces were about being taken by the French, when the Russians were reinforced by two regiments which Benningsen sent to their support, and the French were in their turn charged by cavalry, broken and driven back upward of 300 yards. But the progress of the French at Klein-Saussgarten was so great, that the enemy, alarmed, were obliged to abandon the ground they had regained. Friant debouched in their rear in great strength, and rapidly continuing his advance from left to right of the Russian position, he had soon passed, driving every thing before him, the whole ground occupied by their left wing, and was making dispositions to assault Kuschnitten, which had been the head-quarters of Benningsen the preceding night, and which lay directly behind the Russian center. Never was change more sudden; the victorious Russian center turned and attacked both in flank and rear seemed on the point of being driven off the field of battle; already the shouts of victory were heard from Davoust's division, and vast volumes of black smoke, blown along the whole Russian center and right from the flames of Serpallen, evinced the steady progress of the French on their left.

With loud shouts, the French assaulted and carried Kuschnitten, in spite of the most obstinate resistance on the part of the enemy. At this critical moment, the long-expected corps of Lestocq arrived on the Russian right. He was instantly ordered to defile as quickly as possible in the rear of the Russian right, so as to assist in the recapture of Kuschnitten behind their center, where the French, under St. Hilaire, had established themselves in so threatening a manner. These directions were immediately obeyed. Under cover of a terrible cannonade on its houses, the Russians charged the village in three columns, and carried it with irresistible force; and by the most strenuous exertions, Lestocq also expelled the French under Davoust from the hamlet of Anklappen and the wood adjoining, and was pressing forward toward Saussguarten, when night came on. The battle was over on the center and left, and already the French lines were illuminated by the fires of innumerable bivouacs, when both armies were startled by a sharp fire, succeeded by loud shouts on the extreme right of the Russians, toward Schloditten. It was the fire of Ney's corps, which, following rapidly on the traces of Lestocq, had entered Altof, driving the Russian detachment, which Lestocq had left to occupy that village, before him, and had now carried Schloditten, in order to cut off the Russian communication with Königsberg. Benningsen immediately ordered the Russian division of Kamenskoi, which had suffered least in the preceding action, to assault the village, which was executed at ten o'clock at night. Ney's corps, overwhelmed by numbers, were expelled from the village, and the shouts of the victorious Russians were heard even at Eylau. At eleven o'clock the Russian generals held a council of war, on horseback, and a retreat was decided upon. The desperate valor and the superior numbers of the French troops, discouraged the Russian general, and he immediately gave orders for the retreat, which began at midnight. The army marched through Schloditten, toward Könisberg, unmolested by the enemy. Thus ended the terrible battle of Eylau. The loss on both sides was immense. On the side of the Russians 25,000 had fallen, of whom 7,000 were slain outright. The French lost nearly the same number of men, killed and wounded. Sixteen Russian guns and fourteen standards were taken by the French; while the Russians had to boast of twelve eagles taken from their antagonists. Scarcely any prisoners were made on either side during the action, but 6,000 wounded Russians, most of them in a hopeless state, were left on the field of battle, and fell into the hands of the French.

The battle-field presented on the following morning a most fearful spectacle. In the short space of six miles 50,000 men lay weltering in their gore. 6,000 horses were scattered in huge piles over the plain, some of them dead, and others dying; and the shrill screams of the wounded animals were mingled with the groans and stifled cries of the suffering men, whose forms were crushed beneath the weight of their dying horses. The snow, stained crimson with blood, afforded no coolness to the feverish bodies of the wretched soldiers, who were burning with thirst, and goaded to madness by the pain of their wounds. The plain was filled with woe and pain, and the air was loaded with lamentations, curses, and shrieks of despair. "The spectacle," said Napoleon, after describing the dreadful appearance of the battle-field, in his bulletin home, "is sufficient to inspire princes with the love of peace, and horror of war."

FAIRFIELD, A.D. 1779.—Fairfield in Connecticut, in the year 1779, was entered by Governor Tryon with 2,600 British soldiers, and the town was given up to promiscuous plunder. After subjecting the inhabitants to the most brutal treatment, the troops set fire to the town, and the court-house; two churches, eighty-five dwellings, fifty-five barns, fifteen stores, and fifteen shops, were burned to ashes, producing great distress. 500 barrels of rice, which had been stored in the cellar of the court-house, were destroyed.

FALERII, B.C. 394.—The Romans and the Falerii were at war. Camillus being named dictator, attacked these people and besieged their capital. Before the circumvallation of the place was completed, a schoolmaster came out of the city and placed all his pupils in the hands of the Romans, as the readiest way of inducing the inhabitants to surrender. The indignant dictator ordered the perfidious master to be stripped, had his hands tied behind him, and, arming the boys with rods, commanded them to flog the treacherous pedagogue back to the city. Plutarch says that Camillus was much shocked at this action of the schoolmaster, and said to those around him—"War at best is a savage thing, and wades through a sea of violence and injustice; yet even war itself has its laws, which men of honor will not depart from; nor do they pursue victory so as to avail themselves of acts of villainy and baseness. A great general should rely upon his own virtue, and not upon the treachery of others." It is said that the magistrates of the place were so affected by the magnanimity of the dictator, that they brought him the keys of the city.

FALKIRK, A.D. 1298.—Falkirk, a town of Scotland, stands on an eminence three miles south of the Frith of Forth, at the south-west extremity of the fertile tract of land called "The Carse of Falkirk." Two miles north-east of Falkirk, is the village of Carron, on the river Carron, which falls into the Frith of Forth. In a valley between Falkirk and the Carron, a battle was fought in the year 1298 by the Scotch under Sir William Wallace, and the English commanded by Edward I. The Scotch army, nearly 100,000 strong, was posted at Falkirk, and there determined to abide the assault of the English. The English king, determined to crush the Scotch army by one bold stroke, had collected the whole military force of England, Wales, and Ireland, and marched with an army of 100,000 combatants to the northern frontiers. To Wallace the Scots had given the entire command of their army; but his elevation, though purchased by great merit, was the object of envy to the Scotch nobility, who repined to see a private gentleman raised above them. Wallace was aware of their jealousy, and dreading the ruin of his country from these intestine discords, with a magnanimity only equaled by his courage, resigned his authority, and retained command only over that body of his followers who, being accustomed to victory under his standard, refused to follow any other leader into the field. The chief command of the Scotch army devolved upon the Steward of Scotland, and Cummin of Badenoch, men of high birth, under whom the sensitive chieftains were willing to serve in the defense of their country. Having collected their several forces from every quarter, the two Scottish commanders fixed their station at Falkirk. Wallace accompanied them, at the head of his brave followers. The Scotch army was drawn up in three separate divisions, each forming a complete body of pikemen. The intervals between the three bodies were occupied by archers. The cavalry was placed in the rear; and, dreading the great superiority of the English horse, they endeavored to secure their front by pallisades tied together by ropes. Thus disposed they awaited the approach of the enemy. When the English army arrived within sight of the Scots, Edward divided his troops into three bodies and led them to the attack. As he advanced at the head of his men, the Scots set up such a shout, that his horse took fright, and dislodged him from his saddle, and afterward kicked him on the ribs as he lay on the ground; but the intrepid monarch, though sorely bruised by his fall, quickly remounted his horse, and ordered his troops to begin the attack. The English archers first assaulted the Scottish bowmen, who, after a sharp struggle, were driven from the field. The Welsh troops next assaulted the enemy; but the Scots, who fought with determined valor, fiercely drove them back. On this the English archers poured shower after shower of arrows among the pikemen who were cooped up within the intrenchments, which threw them into disorder. Then the English pikemen and cavalry advanced to the attack, with Edward at their head. Pulling up the pallisades, they charged the enemy with so much impetuosity that they were no longer able to resist. In this distress Wallace did all that lay in the power of man to sustain and avert the shock; but the division under Cummin, quitting the field, the divisions of the Lord Steward and Wallace were alone exposed to the united charge of the English pikemen and cavalry, and the incessant showers of arrows from the English archers, who at that time began to excel those of all other nations. The followers of Wallace, for a long time, maintained this unequal contest; but, finding himself in danger of being surrounded, he at last was obliged to give way, and slowly retired with the poor remnant of his troops behind the river Carron. The Scottish army, at all points, was broken and driven off the field. Edward's victory was complete. Twelve thousand Scots—some historians say 50,000—were left dead upon the field of battle. The English lost 100 men killed. In the general rout of the Scottish army, Wallace's military skill, and presence of mind, enabled him to keep his troops together, and, retiring behind the Carron, he marched leisurely along the banks of that river, which protected him from the enemy. Notwithstanding this great victory, the subjection of Scotland by the English was not completed. The English army, after reducing the southern provinces, was obliged to retire for want of provisions, and left the northern counties in the hands of the natives.

On a moor, within half a mile of the town of Falkirk, Charles Stuart the Pretender, in 1746, gained a victory over the army of the royalists, under General Hawley.

FALKOPING, A.D. 1388.—In the year 1388, a battle was fought near Falköping, a small town in Sweden, near Mariestad, between the Swedes, under King Albert, and the army of Margaret, Queen of Denmark. After a bloody struggle, the king was defeated and was himself made prisoner.

FEHRBELLEN, A.D. 1675.—A battle was fought A.D. 1675, near Fehrbellen, in Prussia, between the Swedes, and the troops of the Elector of Brandenburg, in which the former were defeated.

FERE CHAMPENOISE, A.D. 1814.—Near this village, in France, on the 28th of February, 1814, the French, after an obstinate conflict, were totally defeated by the allies.

FISHGUARD, A.D. 1797.—In 1797, a detachment of French guards landed at Fishguard, or Aberzwain, a seaport town, in South Wales, and were captured after a slight resistance, to a man, by the inhabitants, under Lord Cawdor.

FLODDEN, A.D. 1513.—This village is memorable as the scene of one of the most destructive conflicts recorded in British history. War having been declared between the English and the Scots, James IV., King of Scotland, crossed the Tweed with an army of 50,000 men, and ravaged those parts of Northumberland which lay along the banks of that river. But as his forces were numerous, and the country barren, he soon began to want provisions; so that many of his men deserted, and returned to their native country. Meanwhile, the Earl of Surrey, having collected a force of 26,000 English soldiers, marched to the defense of the country, and approached the Scots, who lay on some high grounds near the hills of Cheviot. The river Till ran between the armies, and prevented an engagement; Surrey, therefore, sent a herald to the Scottish camp, challenging the enemy to descend into the plain of Milfield, toward the south; and there, appointing a day for the combat, to try their valor on equal ground. As he received no satisfactory reply, he made a feint of marching toward Berwick, as if he intended to enter Scotland, to lay waste the borders, and cut off the provisions of the enemy. The Scottish army in order to prevent this purpose, put themselves in motion; and having set fire to the huts in which they had quartered, they descended from the hills. Surrey, taking advantage of the smoke which was blown toward him, and which concealed his movements, passed the Till with his artillery and a vanguard at the bridge of Twisel, and sent the rest of his army to seek a ford higher up the river. An engagement now became inevitable and both sides prepared for it with tranquillity and order. The English divided their army into two lines: Lord Howard led the main body of the first line, Sir Edward Howard the right wing, Sir Marmaduke Constable the left. The Earl of Surrey himself commanded the main body of the second line, Lord Dacres the right wing, Sir Edward Stanley the left. The front of the Scots presented three divisions to the enemy; the middle was led by the king himself; the right by the Earl of Huntley, assisted by Lord Hume; the left by the Earls of Lennox and Argyle. A fourth division under the Earl of Bothwell, made a body of reserve. Huntley began the battle, and, after a sharp conflict, put to flight the left wing of the English, and chased them off the field; but on returning from the pursuit, he found the whole Scottish army in great disorder. The division under Lennox and Argyle elated with the success of the other wing had broken their ranks, and rushed headlong upon the enemy. Sir Edward Howard, at the head of his division, received them with great valor, and Dacres, who commanded the second line, wheeling about during the action, fell upon their rear, and put them to the sword without resistance. The division under James, and that under Bothwell, animated by the valor of their leaders, still made head against the English, and throwing themselves into a circle, protracted the action till night separated the combatants. The victory seemed yet undecided, and the numbers that fell on each side were nearly equal, amounting to above 5,000 men; but the morning discovered where the advantage lay. The English had lost only persons of small note; but the flower of the Scottish nobility had fallen in battle, and the king himself, after the most diligent inquiry, could nowhere be found. In searching the field the English found a dead body which resembled him, and was arrayed in a similar habit; and they put it in a leaden coffin, and sent it to London. The Scotch did not renew the fight. Their loss was extremely great. Besides the king, no fewer than twelve earls, thirteen lords, and five eldest sons of peers, with a vast number of gentlemen of distinction, and about 5,000 common soldiers, were left on the field. The loss on the part of the English was not so severely felt. Sir Walter Scott gives a vivid, and generally just account of this great battle, in his Marmion. This battle was fought on the 19th of September, 1513.

FLUSHING, A.D. 1809.—Flushing, a seaport town of the Netherlands, was ineffectually bombarded by the British in August, 1809.

FONTAINEBLEAU. See Montereau.

FONTERABIA, A.D. 1837.—Fonterabia, in Spain, was in 1837 the theater of several hostile engagements between the troops of General Evans, and the Carlists. After a series of bloody conflicts, the Carlists were defeated and Evans took possession of the town.

FONTENAY, A.D. 841.—Fontenay, in Burgundy, was in 841, the scene of a terrible conflict between the sons of Louis le Debonnaire, the result of which was the division in 843 of the Frankish empire, founded by Charlemagne the great.

FONTENOY, A.D. 1745.—The battle of Fontenoy was fought on the 30th of April, 1745, between the French army, under Count Saxe, and the allied armies of England, Hanover, Holland, and Austria, under the Duke of Cumberland. Fontenoy is in Belgium, in the province of Hainaut, five miles south-east of Tournay. The French had resolved upon a most strenuous effort to defeat the plans of the allies in the Netherlands. They had assembled an army of 120,000 men, the chief command of which was given to Count Saxe, natural son to the late King of Poland, and who had long been a soldier of fortune. Count Saxe was a brave and experienced general; his long service had taught him to regard danger as a secondary matter; and he listened to the whistling of bullets with the same composure that he would have evinced in the drawing-room or dancing saloon. To this great general, his opponent, the Duke of Cumberland, offered a strong contrast. He neither possessed courage nor talents for war; nor was he able to bring such a formidable body of men into the field. The French, therefore, swept every thing before them. They laid siege to Fribourg, and, early in the campaign of 1745, invested the strong city of Tournay. The allies, notwithstanding the inferiority of their numbers, and although commanded by the Duke of Cumberland, yet they resolved to save Tournay by hazarding a battle. The allies, therefore, marched against the enemy; and stationed themselves within sight of the French, who were encamped on an eminence, with the village of St. Antoine on their right, a forest on their left, and the town of Fontenoy before them. The allies began the attack at two o'clock in the morning. Through the darkness of night the stout English troops pressed forward up the steep acclivity, and attacked the French with an ardor which, for a time, bore down all opposition. The French fought with the utmost gallantry; Count Saxe, who was at that time sick of the disorder of which he afterward died, was carried about to all the posts in a litter, and with the utmost coolness and intrepidity directed the movements of his troops, praising the brave, and encouraging the faint-hearted, by assuring them that, notwithstanding the unfavorable aspect of affairs, the day was his own. The battle raged furiously. A column of the English, without any commander, but by mere mechanical courage, advanced upon the enemy's lines, which opening formed an avenue on each side to receive them. They had no sooner entered than the French artillery, on three sides, began to play upon them with terrible effect. The action now became general. Prodigies of valor were performed on each side, and the ground was literally covered with the dead and dying. At length the English, on whom the brunt of the battle fell, were obliged to retreat, at about three o'clock in the afternoon. This was one of the most bloody battles that had been fought in this age: the allies left on the field of battle 12,000 men; and the French lost nearly an equal number. This blow, by which Tournay was taken by the French, gave them such a manifest superiority, during all the rest of the campaign, that they kept the fruits of their victory during the continuance of the war. In connection with this battle we can not forbear giving the following anecdote, taken from a French work, entitled le Histoire des Chiens celèbres, which, however remarkable, is said to be well attested:

"Mustapha, a strong and active greyhound, belonging to a captain of artillery, raised from his birth in the midst of camps, always accompanied his master, and exhibited no alarm in the midst of battle. In the hottest engagement he remained near the cannon to which his master was attached, and carried the match in his mouth. At the memorable battle of Fontenoy, the master of Mustapha received a mortal wound. At the moment when about to fire upon the enemy, he and several of his corps were struck to the earth by a discharge of artillery. Seeing his master extended lifeless and bleeding upon the ground, the dog became desperate and howled piteously. Just at that moment a body of French soldiers were advancing to gain possession of the piece, which was still aimed at them, from the top of a small rising ground. As if with a view to revenge his master's death, Mustapha seized the lighted match with his paws, and applied it to the cannon loaded with case-shot! Seventy men fell on the spot, and the remainder took to flight! After this bold stroke the dog lay down sadly near the dead body of his master and remained there twenty-two hours, without food. He was at length, with difficulty removed, by the comrades of the deceased. This gallant greyhound was afterward presented to George II. who had him taken care of as a brave and faithful public servant."

FORLI, A.D. 1797.—This city in Italy was taken by the French, in 1797.

FORMIGNY, A.D. 1450.—A desperate battle was fought, in the year 1450, near Formigny, a town of France, between the French and English. The battle was hotly contested; and the British were finally defeated, and in consequence were obliged to withdraw from Normandy.

FORNOVO, A.D. 1495.—In 1495, a bloody engagement took place at Fornovo, a town of northern Italy, between the French army, under Charles VIII., and the Milanese and their allies, in which the latter, after an obstinate struggle, were defeated with great loss.

FORT BOYER, A.D. 1814.—On the 15th of September, 1814, four British ships, carrying 90 guns, and a land force of about 700 men, under Colonel Nicholls, commenced a cannonade, within musket-shot, upon Fort Boyer, a small redoubt, garrisoned by 120 Americans, under Major Lawrence, which commanded the entrance from the Gulf of Mexico to Mobile. The British were repulsed with a loss of 232 killed and wounded. The Americans lost 8 men, killed and wounded. The British ship Hermes stranded, and the guns of the fort were opened upon her with terrible effect, and in a few moments she blew up. Nearly the whole of her crew perished in the explosion. Nicholls effected his retreat to Pensacola, where he was received by the Spanish governor of that place with open arms. See Pensacola.

FORT CAROLINA, A.D. 1565.—This fort was erected by the French Huguenots, in the year 1565, on the banks of the river May, in Florida. On the 21st of September, 1565, the French garrison was attacked by a superior force of Spaniards, under Melendez, who had settled at St. Augustine. The French made an obstinate resistance, but the Spaniards finally were masters of the fort. No sooner had they gained possession of the fortress than they commenced an indiscriminate slaughter of the garrison. Neither men, women, nor children were spared. About two hundred persons were slain. A few only escaped to the woods, where many of them died from starvation. Some who returned to the fortress and gave themselves up to the Spaniards, were immediately slaughtered. The survivors, after incredible hardships, reached the seacoast, where they fortunately espied two French vessels, which received them on board.

FORT DADE, A.D. 1835.—In the month of December, 1835, Major Dade, with 112 men, was attacked near Fort Dade, in Benton county, Florida, by an overwhelming body of Indians. The gallant major and his men made a heroic resistance; but after piling the ground with the corpses of their enemies, they were overpowered by the very weight of the savages, and all were killed with the exception of one man, who escaped to bear the fearful tidings to the nearest white settlement.

FORT ERIE, A.D. 1814.—On the western bank of the Niagara river, directly opposite the city of Buffalo, stand the ruins of Fort Erie, the scene of one of the most sanguinary conflicts of the second war between England and the United States. Early in the month of July, 1814, Brown, the American general, crossed the Niagara into Canada, and invested Fort Erie, which was surrendered without opposition, and the prisoners, 137 in number, were sent to Buffalo. The American army then advanced to Chippewa, where they encountered and overcame the British, who retired to Fort George, while the Americans took post at Queenston. Slight skirmishes only took place between detachments of the two armies, until the 25th of July, when the battle of Lundy's Lane, near the cataract of Niagara, occurred. After a most sanguinary conflict, the British were defeated. The American generals, Brown and Scott, both being severely wounded, the command of the army devolved upon General Ripley, who took post at Fort Erie. General Gaines soon after arrived, and took the command. Immediately on his arrival at Fort Erie, Gaines set about strengthening the works until it was in a good state of defense. The garrison was composed of about 2,500 men. Drummond, the British leader, immediately laid siege to the fort, with about 3,500 men, and by the 4th of August, had formally invested the place. Having completed his trenches, and erected his batteries within four hundred yards of the fort, on the 13th he opened his fire. During that day and the following, the cannonade was incessant, and the enemy's fire was steadily returned by the garrison. On the night of the 24th, Drummond deemed the defenses so much injured that he determined to hazard an assault early on the morning of the 15th. The assailants were divided into three columns, each column numbering about 1,000 men. The storming parties were to move simultaneously against three points; the first against Towson's battery, occupying the extreme north-east angle of the fortifications; the second against the right, and the third full on the fort itself.

"At about two o'clock in the morning, the muffled tread of the advancing columns was distinctly heard in the darkness. The one directed against Towson's batteries near the water, came first within range, when a tremendous fire opened upon it. In an instant the whole scenery was lit up by the blaze of the guns, which threw also a red and baleful light over the serried ranks, pressing with fixed bayonets to the assault. Although Towson kept his batteries in fierce play, and sheets of flame went rolling on the doomed column, it kept resolutely on till it approached within ten feet of the infantry. But its strength was exhausted; it could stagger on no further; and first wavering, it then halted, and finally recoiled. Rallied to a second attack, it advanced with loud shouts, only to be smitten with the same overwhelming fire. Encouraged to a third effort, it swerved from the direct assault, and endeavored to wade around an abattis of loose brushwood, that stretched from the batteries to the shore. Pressing forward, up to their arm-pits in the water, some few reached the inclosure within, but only to perish, and the remainder retreated. The column advancing against the right battery, commanded by Douglass, was allowed to approach within fifty yards, when such a rapid and wasting fire was poured upon it, that it recoiled in confusion. The central column, led on by Lieutenant Colonel Drummond, pressed firmly and rapidly through the fire of Hindman's guns, applied their ladders to the walls, and began to mount, and after a desperate resistance, succeeded in effecting a lodgment in the fort which they maintained courageously until daylight, when some powder in a stone building near by, catching fire by accident, exploded with such a tremendous concussion that the besiegers, thinking a mine had been sprung, were seized with a sudden panic, and fled in disorder from their advantageous position.

Drummond, however, did not abandon the siege, but sat down before the fort with a stronger determination than ever to reduce it. The British lost in the assault, 157 men killed, 308 wounded, and 186 made prisoners. The Americans lost eighty-four. On the second of September, General Brown had so far recovered from his wound as to be able to resume his command. The main body of the British army was incamped in an open field, surrounded by a forest, two miles distant from their intrenchments, in order to be out of reach of the American cannon, while one third of their force protected the artillerists in completing their batteries, and the workmen in digging trenches and erecting block-houses. They had completed two batteries, and a third was nearly finished, when General Brown determined to make a sortie with nearly the whole of his disposable force, and with one bold stroke to overwhelm the batteries of the enemy and destroy their works. For four days previous, Brown tried the effect of his artillery upon the enemy's works. The assault was to be made on the 17th of September, at noon, an hour when such an attempt would be least expected. The assailants were to be divided into two columns. "The left, composed of Porter's volunteers, Gibson's riflemen, a portion of the 1st and 23d regiment of regulars, and some Indians, was directed to march along a road which had been cut through the woods, while General Miller, with the 1st brigade, was to move swiftly along a deep ravine that run between the 1st and 2d batteries of the enemy, and the moment they heard the crack of Porter's rifles, mount the ravine, and storm the batteries. About ten o'clock, every thing being ready, Brown opened with his artillery, and for two hours it was an incessant blaze and roar along the line of the intrenchments. Its cessation was the signal for the two columns to advance. General Ripley commanded the reserve, while Jessup, with 150 men, held the fort itself.

"Porter, with his column, surprised and overthrew the enemy's pickets, and began to pour in rapid volleys on his flank. Miller no sooner heard the welcome sound than he gave the order to charge. In an instant the brigade was on the top of the bank, and without giving the enemy time to recover from their surprise, the troops dashed forward on the intrenchments in front of them. Though assailed so unexpectedly and suddenly, the enemy fought gallantly to save the works which had cost them so much labor. The contest was fierce, but short. Carrying battery after battery at the point of the bayonet, the victorious Americans pressed fiercely on, till all the batteries, and the labor of nearly fifty days, were completely in their possession. Ripley then hastened up with the reserve to form a line for the protection of the troops while the work of destruction went on; while executing this movement he was wounded in the neck and carried back to the fort.

"In the mean time, Drummond, aroused by the first volleys, had hurried off reinforcements on a run. Pressing forward through the rain, urged to their utmost speed by the officers pointing forward with their swords to the scene of action, they, nevertheless, arrived too late to prevent the disaster."*

Having completely demolished the enemy's works, the Americans, perceiving strong reinforcements coming up, retired in good order within the fort. The Americans lost 300, killed and wounded. The British lost 400, killed and wounded, and 300 taken prisoners. The result of the sortie completely discouraged the British general, who, on the night of the 21st, raised the siege, which had continued forty-nine days, and retired to his intrenchments behind Chippewa. On the 5th of November the Americans, having laid Fort Erie in ruins, recrossed the Niagara, and withdrew with all their force into the American territory.

FORT GEORGE, A.D. 1813.—Fort George in Canada, at the western extremity of Lake Ontario, was taken by the American army under General Dearborn, on the 27th of May, 1813. The fort was occupied by a British garrison, and a British army under General Vincent was incamped near its walls. The Americans, under Colonels Winfield Scott and Porter, attacked the troops of Vincent, and after a brief but bloody conflict, the British line was rent asunder, and the troops fled in disorder over the plain. Fort George was abandoned, and the garrison streamed after the defeated army. They had set fire to the train of the magazines before they left, and one of the magazines exploded with fearful violence, but no injury was done to life or limb. The Americans then took possession of the fort, and the British effected their retreat in safety. In this affair the Americans lost seventy-two, in killed and wounded; the British 250, killed and wounded, and 100 made prisoners.

FORT GRISWOLD.—See New London.

FORT MEIGS, A.D. 1813.—Fort Meigs stood upon the east bank of the Maumee, in the State of Ohio, a short distance above where that river empties into Lake Erie.

After Winchester's defeat at Frenchtown, the American army, under General Harrison, retreated to Fort Meigs. Here the troops remained inactive, acting only as a barrier between the Ohio settlements and the Indians until the latter part of April, 1813. Meanwhile the savage chieftain had returned with reeking hands from the massacre at Fort Mimms, and had joined the British camp in Canada, and with General Proctor, had organized a large force for the reduction of Fort Meigs. The fort at this time was garrisoned with about 1,000 men, and was bountifully supplied with every thing necessary for a long and obstinate defense. Twelve hundred Kentuckians, under General Clay, were also marching to the relief of the garrison. On the 23d of April, Proctor, with a strong British force, and a horde of Indian allies, under Tecumseh, entered the mouth of the Maumee in boats, and besieged the fort in due form. Heavy batteries were erected on the west bank of the river, and the light troops and Indians stationed on the opposite side. The besieged opened a well-directed cannonade from the fort upon the enemy, which compelled them to perform the most of their work by night. Having completed his batteries, Proctor, on the 1st of May, opened his fire. The garrison had suffered but little, except from the want of water. The well in the fort was dry, and they were obliged to bring water from the river. But many of the men were slain by the Indians, while on this service, and the savages, emboldened by their success, gradually drew closer to the fort, and climbing into tall trees poured showers of bullets into the interior of the American works. Before opening his batteries, Proctor sent the garrison a summons to surrender, which Harrison scornfully declined, and opened a brisk cannonade upon the enemy. For four days both parties maintained their fire, when Harrison received the joyful intelligence that Clay, with his Kentuckians, was near at hand. The American commander now resolved to compel the enemy to raise the siege. He sent a messenger to Clay, directing him to land 800 men on the west bank of the river, and attack the enemy's batteries, and spike the guns; while the remaining 400 advanced along the east bank toward the batteries against which the garrison should make a sortie. The 800 Kentuckians were placed under the command of Colonel Dudley, and crossing the river in good order fiercely attacked the British batteries. In the face of the fiery tempest which burst forth from the grim line before them, they carried the batteries, and neglecting to spike the guns rushed on in furious pursuit of the flying English, or turned aside to fight the savages, with whom the wood was alive. Proctor, meanwhile, aroused by the sound of the conflict, hastened from his camp, a mile and a half below, with reinforcements. Arriving at the scene of action, he rallied the fugitives and joined at this moment by Tecumseh, with a strong body of Indians, he fell with the utmost fury upon the Kentuckians, who in their eager pursuit had thrown themselves into disorder. The Americans fought with the utmost gallantry; but they fell rapidly before the furious strokes and withering fire of the enemy, whose number was greatly superior. Only 150 of these gallant men reached the eastern bank of the river in safety. Colonel Dudley was mortally wounded. Meanwhile, Colonel Miller, with the Americans on the east bank, attacked the British batteries on that side of the river and carried them at the point of the bayonet, and spiking the guns, returned to the fort with 42 prisoners. On the 8th of May, Proctor raised the siege, and under a galling fire from the fort, made a hasty and disorderly retreat down the river. The Indians had abandoned their allies the day before. In this siege the Americans lost nearly 800 men in killed, wounded, and prisoners. The British lost about 100 in killed, wounded, and prisoners.

FORT MIMMS, A.D. 1813.—During the second war between the United States and England, twenty-four families had congregated at Fort Mimms, a mere block-house, situated on the Alabama river, near the junction of the Tombigbee, in the State of Mississippi, where they had fled for shelter from the anticipated ravages of Tecumseh and his savage warriors, who had formed an alliance with England against the Americans. Fort Mimms was garrisoned by 150 men, under Major Beasely, and, with proper precaution, could have resisted the attack of the savages; but they were so careless that suddenly, in broad daylight, they permitted nearly 700 Indians to advance within thirty feet of the fort, without being discovered. The gate was open, and the savages, with one wild yell, rushed through, into the outer inclosure, driving the terrified soldiers into the houses within. The Indians mounted these buildings and fired them, and shot down every man who attempted to escape. The soldiers, perceiving their doom, fought with the desperation of despair. They rushed from the houses and furiously attacked the foe, laying 60 of them dead at their feet, before they were themselves overpowered. At length the last of the brave defenders was slain; and the Indians commenced a work of blood, at which the soul sickens. Women and children were ruthlessly butchered, and their mangled corpses tossed upon the gory pile, formed of the bodies of their husbands, fathers, brothers, and lovers. Of all the 300 that had inhabited Fort Mimms not one escaped.

FORT NIAGARA, A.D. 1759.—Fort Niagara stands on the east side of the Niagara river, at its entrance into Lake Ontario, in the State of New York.

In 1679, a French officer, named De Salle, erected a small fort at the mouth of Niagara river, and in 1725 a stronger fortification was erected here. In 1759, it was captured by the British, under Sir William Johnson. The force sent against the fort was under the command of General Prideaux, who sailed from Oswego, and appeared before the French works on the 7th of July. The British immediately opened their batteries on the fort. An unfortunate accident deprived them of their commander: Prideaux was killed, on the 15th of July, by the bursting of a gun. Johnson then assumed the command, and the siege was carried forward with vigor. An army of French regulars, which were collected from Detroit and Erie, La Bœuf, and Venango, and numbered about 1,200 men, were marched to the rescue of the garrison of Fort Niagara. On the morning of the 24th the French made their appearance. Sir William Johnson attacked these troops and, although his own force was considerably weaker in numbers, put them to rout with fearful slaughter, at the first charge. The English pursued the fugitives through the woods, slaying until fatigue put an end to the bloody work. The dead were scattered along the forests and were not counted. On the next day the garrison surrendered, and 600 prisoners fell into the hands of the victors. This victory put the English into the possession of all the French posts, as far as Erie.

Fort Niagara, during the American revolution, says De Veaux, "was the head-quarters of all that was barbarous, unrelenting and cruel. There were congregated the leaders and chiefs of those bands of murderers and miscreants who carried death and destruction into the remote American settlements. There civilized Europe reveled with savage America, and ladies of education and refinement mingled in the society of those whose only distinction was to wield the bloody tomahawk and the scalping-knife. There the squaws of the forest were raised to eminence, and the most unholy unions between them and officers of the highest rank, smiled upon and countenanced. There, in their strong-hold, like a vast vulture, securely, for seven years, they sallied forth and preyed upon the distant settlements of the Mohawk and Susquehanna valley. Is was the dépôt of their plunder: there they planned their forays, and there they returned to feast, until the time of action came again."

During the war of 1812, Fort Niagara was garrisoned by the Americans with about 350 men, under Captain Leonard. On the night of the 19th of December, 1813, a party of British and Indians, nearly 1,200 strong, crossed the river and took the fort by surprise. The commandant was absent, having left during the evening; the pickets were taken by surprise, the main gate was opened and guarded, and the enemy rushed in without hinderance, slaying about 60 of the garrison, before giving them an opportunity to surrender. The remainder fell into the hands of the victors, as prisoners of war.

FORT NINETY-SIX, A.D. 1781.—The pleasant village of Cambridge, in Abbeville district, South Carolina, is situated near the site of old Fort Ninety-six. This fort was occupied by about 550 royalists, under Colonel John Cruger, in the month of May, 1781, when it was besieged by General Greene, with about 1,000 American troops. The Americans, under the direction of Colonel Kosciusko, broke ground on the evening of the 22d of May; the siege continued until the 18th of June, when Greene, hearing that Rawdon was marching to the assistance of the besieged, and unwilling to encounter that general's superior force, raised the siege and retreated toward the Ennoree. In this siege the Americans lost about 150 men, in killed, wounded and missing. The precise loss of the besieged is unknown.

FORT SCHUYLER, A.D. 1777.—The site of old Fort Schuyler, also called Fort Stanwix, is occupied by the village of Rome, in Oneida county, New York. In the spring of 1777, the celebrated Indian chief, Brant, invaded New York, from Canada, with over 500 warriors. General Herkimer, who commanded a small party of American troops, held a conference with Brant in an open field near Unadilla, and endeavored to treat with the savages. His attempt was unsuccessful, and after a stormy council, during which the Indians were very insulting, the two forces separated, and Brant joined the British army, which, under the command of Sir John Johnson, and Colonel John Butler, was organizing at Oswego, preparatory to an expedition against the defenseles settlements of the Schoharie and Mohawk valleys.

It is a stain upon the British character that, in both the revolutionary war and the contest of 1812, the royal government hired savage butchers to follow their armies into the field. On this occasion the Indians were invited to a grand war-feast by the royal officers, and then they enlisted as enemies to the patriotic cause.

The fort of Oswego was crowded with the grim sons of the wilderness. They were furnished with gay dresses, new arms, and "fire-water" in abundance, and before the council concluded, the great tribes of the Six Nations, numbering at the time several thousand warriors, entered into a firm alliance with the British, and they agreed to fight until King George had subdued his rebellious subjects. Each Indian was presented with a gun, tomahawk, scalping-knife, ammunition, a brass kettle, a piece of gold, and a suit of scarlet clothes.

Rumors of the British preparations reached the patriot settlements in Tryon county, and Colonel Gansevoort, who commanded a small half-finished fortification, known as Fort Schuyler, implored the aid of Congress and of the State of New York. But at that period the American army had enough to do with the forces of England in the field, and Congress could not afford much assistance. On the 1st of August, 1777, General St. Leger, Colonel Butler, and Brant, with over 1,700 British and Indians, commenced their invasion, and soon appeared before Fort Schuyler. Colonel Gansevoort's force numbered 750 men, with a few small cannon. They had no flag! But this latter article was soon supplied; shirts were cut up for white stripes and sewed upon the red lining of a cloak belonging to one of the officers, and it was thrown proudly out to the forest wind.

The siege instantly commenced. Bombs were thrown into the fort, while the savages, with their rifles, watched every opportunity for a shot at the besieged. Every night they filled the air with horrible yells and endeavored to set the works on fire. The Americans, however, were not intimidated. They refused to listen to St. Leger's summons to surrender, and maintained a vigorous defense.

In the mean time General Herkimer, a brave old soldier, rallied the militia of the surrounding country, and was soon on his way to relieve the garrison with a force of 800 men. But younger men endeavored to supersede him in command. They reproached him with being too cautious, and finally charged the gallant officer with being a coward and a Tory. Colonels Cox and Paris were loud in their taunts. But General Herkimer answered calmly, that he was placed in command as a guardian and a father, and that the troops should not be led into unnecessary danger. Accordingly he advanced with great caution, at the same time telling those who were so anxious to force the enemy, that he feared they would be the first to retreat.

Battle of Oriskany.—On the morning of the 6th of August, the patriots arrived near Oriskany, about eight miles east of Fort Schuyler. Herkimer found means to warn Gansevoort of his approach, and requested, when he should hear the sound of guns, to make a sortie on the British camp. St. Leger sent forward a strong force to meet Herkimer, and formed an ambuscade for his troops in a narrow deep ravine. It was about nine o'clock in the morning, dark and sultry, when the relieving army entered the valley. In one of the general's instructions, the van-guards were careless, or the ambuscade would have been discovered. One regiment of the force had entered the ravine, when Brant gave the signal, and his warriors, sounding the war-whoop, poured in a galling fire from their rifles, and rushed forward tomahawk in hand. A portion of the militia, as Herkimer predicted, instantly broke and fled to the rear, but the general's division boldly and firmly held their ground. Herkimer was instantly wounded, and Colonel Cox and Captain Van Slyke killed at the first fire. Herkimer was carried beneath a beech-tree, where, seated upon a saddle, he calmly directed his men and cheered them on. The militia fought with desperation, receiving and giving no quarter. The balls flew like hail, and the war-whoop rang shrilly through the forest. The patriots soon discovered that the Indians were watching until a man discharged his gun, then they would rush forward with tomahawk and knife. To prevent this, two militia-men stood behind a tree together, and fired alternately.

While the fight was going on, volleys of musketry were heard in the rear. It was a sortie from the fort. No sooner did Colonel Gansevoort hear the roar of battle in the forest, than he ordered Colonel Willet, with 300 men, to fall upon the British camp. Colonel Willet executed his commission in a splendid manner. Like a thunderbolt his little force burst upon St. Leger's encampment, and the mongrel force of Tories and Indians, and the few regulars present, were scattered like chaff. The savages fled into the forest, while St. Leger and Johnson barely escaped —the latter without his coat. Twenty-one wagon-loads of spoils—arms, ammunition, clothing, provisions, blankets, camp-equipage, money, valuable documents and papers—were hauled into the fort, together with five British standards! Willet did not lose a man, and he was received in the fort with loud cheers. The British colors were all hoisted upon the staff, under the rough American flag!

Herkimer's men, greatly encouraged, attacked the enemy with renewed vigor, and the Indians, having lost nearly 100 warriors, and several chiefs, raised the cry, "Oohph! Oohph!" (the signal to retreat), and fled deep into the forest. The British soon followed, and, after a terrible battle of six hours, the Americans were left masters of the field. The patriots lost 160 men killed, and about the same number wounded, besides some prisoners. The enemy's loss was much greater, though never exactly ascertained. The Indians were disappointed. General Herkimer died of his wounds a few days after the fight. His army having no head, and being unable to reach the fort, retreated.

Smarting at their severe loss, and mortified at the sacking of their camp, St. Leger's army attacked Fort Schuyler with renewed vigor. Lying messages, to the effect that strong reinforcements were at hand, were sent by the royal commander to the fort, coupled with threats of massacre unless it surrendered. But Colonel Gansevoort scorned alike threat and overture, continuing his defense in the bravest manner. Day after day the siege continued. St. Leger began to approach in regular parallels, and employed the sap and mining system. With great danger, Colonel Willet and Lieutenant Stockwell succeeded in passing the British lines, and hastening to General Schuyler, implored aid for the besieged garrison. In fact, the fort was becoming much straitened, when suddenly the enemy broke up camp and fled toward Canada. This sudden flight was caused by the arrival of scouts, with the intelligence that a strong force was at hand to relieve the fort. This rumor was false, but the Indians believed it, and, having become wearied with the siege, they at once started off. The panic was communicated to the rest of the army, and they all began such a hurried retreat as to leave all their baggage, artillery, and spare arms. The savages fell upon and scalped many of their allies in the route. Thus was Fort Schuyler relieved.

FORT ST. DAVID, A.D. 1758.—This fortress in Hindoostan, was taken from the British by the French under M. Sally, after a short siege, in 1758.

FORT STEPHENSON, A.D. 1813.—Fort Stephenson stood upon the ground formerly occupied by Lower Sandusdy, now Fremont. On the 2d of August, 1813, this place was heroically defended against 500 British regulars and 500 Indians, under General Proctor, by Major Croghan, a youth of twenty-one years, with only 160 men.

This affair, though of comparatively small importance, is in itself one of the most brilliant that occurred during the war of 1812. The British, in the month of August, were making threatening movements upon all the various forts which had been established by the Americans on the rivers that empty into Lake Erie. The volunteers from Ohio and Kentucky had not yet arrived, and could not be expected before September; and the British being considerably reinforced by regular troops, and an unusual number of Indians, under their famous leader Tecumseh, saw that it was all-important to reduce those forts before the appearance of the volunteers. Major Croghan, having received intelligence that the British were about to invest the fort of Lower Sandusky, marched from Upper Sandusky, where he had commanded with a small body of men to the former place, and had placed it in the best possible posture of defense. He had only 160 men, consisting of regulars and detachments of the Pittsburg and Petersburg volunteers. The fort was provided with but one gun, a six-pounder; and the commander had had only sufficient time to make a ditch of six feet deep, and nine feet wide, outside the stockade of pickets with which these hastily-constructed forts were inclosed. General Harrison thought that it was impossible to defend the place successfully, and ordered young Croghan to retire at the approach of the enemy, after destroying the works; but the gallant officer assumed the responsibility of disobeying this command. On the 1st of August, General Proctor, having left a large body of Indians, under Tecumseh, before Fort Meigs, arrived at Sandusky, with about 500 regulars, 700 Indians, and some gun-boats. After he had disposed his troops in such a manner as to cut off the retreat of the garrison, the British general sent a flag by Colonel Elliot and Major Chambers, demanding a surrender, accompanied with the threat of butchery if the garrison should hold out. Croghan sent a spirited answer; and his troops, nearly all striplings like himself, vowed to support their gallant officer to the last. When the flag returned, the British opened a brisk fire from the gun-boats and a howitzer. The fire was maintained during the night. In the morning, three six-pounders, which had been planted under cover of the night, were opened upon the fort, within two hundred and fifty yards of the pickets, but without much effect. At four o'clock in the afternoon, the Americans discovered that the enemy was concentrating his fire upon the north-west angle of the fort, with the intention of making a breach. This part was immediately strengthened by the opposition of bags of flour and sand, so that the pickets suffered but little injury. During this time, the American six-pounder was carefully concealed in the bastion which covered the point to be assailed, and it was loaded with slugs and grape. The British columns were now ready for the assault. About 500 men in close order advanced toward the part of the picket where it was supposed to be most injured, at the same time making several feints to draw the attention of the besieged to other parts of the fort; their force being thus divided, a column of 350 men, which were so enveloped in smoke as not to be seen until they approached within twenty paces of the lines, advanced rapidly to the assault. Their progress was checked by a fire of musketry from the fort; but they were soon rallied by Colonel Short, who, springing over the outer works into the ditch, commanded the rest to follow, crying out, "Give the damned Yankees no quarter!" But no sooner had he reached the ditch, accompanied by the greater part of his followers, than the American six-pounder was unmasked, and thundered forth its terrible contents into the midst of the assailants, killing and maiming the greater portion of them. Colonel Short was slain, but the officer on whom the command now devolved, re-formed his broken column, and again rushed to the ditch. But again were they hurled back by the deadly fire of that solitary six-pounder. The Americans, meanwhile, plied their muskets vigorously; the British force was thrown into complete disorder, and in spite of the efforts of their officers, fled terror-stricken into the woods, whence they were soon followed by their savage allies. They made no further attempt to storm a fort so nobly defended by its heroic garrison. "If this gallant defense deserves the applause of the brave," says Mr. Breckenbridge, in his history of the last war, "the subsequent conduct of the besieged deserves the praise of every friend of humanity. The scene which now ensued deserves to be denominated sublime. The little band, forgetting in a moment that they had been assailed by merciless foes, who sought to massacre them without regarding the laws of honorable war, now felt only the desire of relieving wounded men, and of administering comfort to the wretched. Had they been friends—had they been brothers—they could not have experienced a more tender solicitude. The whole night was occupied in endeavoring to assuage their sufferings; provisions and buckets of water were handed over the pickets, and an opening was made by which many of the sufferers were taken in, who were immediately supplied with surgical aid; and this although a firing was kept up by the enemy until some time in the night. The loss of the garrison amounted to one killed and seven wounded; that of the enemy was supposed to be at least two hundred. Upward of fifty were found in and about the ditch. It was discovered next morning that the enemy had hastily retreated, leaving a boat, and a considerable quantity of military stores. Upward of seventy stands of arms were taken, besides a quantity of ammunition. This exploit called forth the admiration of every party in the United States. Croghan, together with his companions, Captain Hunter and Lieutenants Johnson, Baylor, Meeks, and Anthony, and Ensigns Ship and Duncan, together with other officers and volunteers, were highly complimented by General Harrison. They afterward received the thanks of Congress. Croghan was promoted to the rank of Lieutenant Colonel, and was presented with an elegant sword by the ladies of Chillicothe."

FORT WASHINGTON, A.D. 1776.—The site of Fort Washington stands on the east bank of the Hudson river, on the highest eminence of Manhattan island, nearly opposite Fort Lee, in New Jersey, about nine miles north of the city of New York. The remains only of the fort are now visible. It was a strong earth-work, covering with its detached works, several acres of ground. In the interior was a sort of citadel within which were the magazines. It was provided with about 20 cannon, and several howitzers and mortars.

On the 28th of October, 1776, (the day of the battle of White Plains), Knyphausen at the head of six German battalions, marched from New Rochelle, and took possession of the works at Kingsbridge, from which the Americans had retreated to Fort Washington. At this place Knyphausen on the 2d of November, crossed the Hudson river into Manhattan island, and proceeded to invest Fort Washington, on the north. The Americans in Fort Independence and redoubts in the vicinity, fled on the approach of the enemy to Fort Washington; and the whole of the country beyond the Hudson, between Dobb's Ferry and Morrisania, west of the Bronx, was in the possession of the British army. On the 4th of November, Howe with his army abandoned White Plains, and descending the Hudson river encamped upon the heights of Fordham, extending his left wing almost to Kingsbridge. On the 7th, three British ships sailed up the Hudson, and a large number of flat-boats went up the river, and were moored near Kingsbridge. Fort Washington was completely surrounded by hostile forces. Howe now prepared to attack the work. The American garrison consisted of about 3,000 men, under the command of Colonel Magaw, an experienced and valiant officer. On the 15th of November, Howe, being apprized of the real strength of the garrison, by a deserter, sent a messenger for the commander to surrender; and threatening a massacre of his troops in case he should refuse. Magaw in a brief and manly note declined to comply; and sent a copy of his answer to Washington, who was at Hackensack, N. J. Early on the morning of the 16th, the British opened a brisk cannonade on the American works, and under cover of their guns, the beseigers crossed the Harlem, and advanced to the assault in four columns.

Magaw disposed his forces to meet the attack. In a redoubt (Fort George) upon a line north of Fort Washington, Colonel Rawlings's riflemen, were posted, and some troops were stationed at the outpost called Cork-Hill Fort. Colonel Baxter's militia were placed on the wooded hills east of the fort, along the Harlem river, and the troops of Colonel Cadwallader of Pennsylvania, were stationed along the lines in the direction of New York. The plan of attack was admirably arranged. General Knyphausen with 500 Hessians and Waldeckers was to advance to the attack on the north, simultaneously with a division of English and Hessian troops commanded by Lord Percy, who were to assault the works on the south. General Matthews, with the light infantry, the guards, and two battalions of grenadiers, supported by Cornwallis, was to cross the Harlem, and attack the intrenchments, which extended from Fort Washington toward the East river, and Colonel Stirling was to pass the river further up, and make a feigned attack, which if circumstances warranted should become real, on the south. On crossing the river, Knyphausen divided his forces into two divisions. The first under Knyphausen, penetrated the woods near Tubby Hook, and attacked the troops of Colonel Rawlings. The Americans made a gallant defense, and the Germans sustained a heavy loss. The Marylanders from behind their works, poured forth unceasing volleys; and their unerring rifles committed fearful havoc among their assailants. At length the Hessians, redoubling their efforts, gained a steep ascent, whence they came down upon the enemy with irresistible impetuosity; and Colonel Rawlings was forced to yield and retreat under cover of the guns of the fort. The second division under Colonel Rall* drove the Americans out of Cork-Hill Fort, and Lord Percy, meanwhile, having crossed the river, swept over the plain, and attacked Cadwallader. Percy's division consisted of 800 men; Cadwallader's force numbered only 150. Yet with that small force, and one 18 pounder, he maintained the conflict with such ardor, that Percy was forced to move to the left behind a wood, and for the time being the conflict ceased. Meanwhile, the troops of Matthews and Stirling landed. Matthews pushed up the wooded heights, and firmly attacked the troops of Baxter, driving them from the hills. Stirling immediately after landing, forced his way to the summit of a hill within the American lines, and assailed a redoubt on the summit. The Americans made a gallant resistance; but were finally obliged to abandon the redoubt, leaving 200 prisoners in the hands of the victors. Colonel Cadwallader being informed of this disaster, and perceiving the peril of being placed between two fires, cut his way through the enemy, taking about 30 prisoners as he went, and reached the fort with the loss of only a few men. The Americans at all points outside the fort, were gradually driven back, and at noon all were gathered within the walls of Fort Washington. General Howe now again summoned the garrison to surrender. The Americans had consumed nearly all their ammunition; and Magaw, perceiving further resistance to be vain, decided to capitulate. At half-past one o'clock the British flag waved triumphantly over the walls of Fort Washington. The garrison, numbering about 2,500 men, were made prisoners of war; they were sent to New York, and were confined in the noisome cells of the city jails. The Americans lost in this conflict in killed and wounded about 100 men; the British lost nearly 1,000 mostly Hessians. The loss of Fort Washington was a sad blow to the patriot cause—not only did the English secure the entire possession of the island of New York, but they crossed the Hudson river and took possession of Fort Lee in New Jersey, without molestation. The garrison effected its escape; but the artillery, and military stores, their baggage and tents, all fell into the hands of the victors. The British could now penetrate into the very heart of New Jersey. Washington, from Fort Lee, had seen the fall of Fort Washington; and with tearful eyes beheld the scarlet flag of England flaming above its ramparts. He now turned his attention toward the defense of Philadelphia; and had abandoned Fort Lee before the British approached it.

FOUGIERS, A.D. 1793.—A bloody battle took place near Fougiers, in France, between the republicans and the Vendeans, on the 15th November, 1793.

FREDERIKSHALD, A.D. 1718.—Charles XII. being desirous, for the second time, of making the conquest of Norway, laid siege to

* Rall was killed at Trenton, seventy days afterward.

Frederikshald, an important place, situated at the mouth of the river Tistendall, near the Channel of Denmark. It was in the month of December, 1718. The winter was severe, and the cold killed a number of soldiers. The works, nevertheless, advanced quickly, and the city was soon pressed very closely.

"On the 11th of December," says Voltaire, "the king went, at nine o'clock in the evening, to visit the trenches, and not finding the parallels advanced to his mind, he appeared much dissatisfied. M. Mégrel, a French engineer, who conducted the siege, assured him that the place would be taken in eight days. 'We shall see,' said the king, and continued his examination of the works, in company with the engineer. He stopped at a place where the boyau made an angle with the parallel. He knelt down upon the interior talus, and, resting his elbows upon the parapet, he remained for some time watching the laborers, who were continuing the trenches by star-light."

Almost half the person of the king was exposed to a battery of cannon pointed at the right angle, where he was, and which was firing cartridges. At this moment his officers saw him fall upon the parapet, breathing a heavy sigh. They rushed toward him, but Charles XII. was no more. A ball, weighing half a pound, had struck him on the temple, and had made a hole in which three fingers could be introduced. When dying, he had the strength to place, as by a natural movement, his hand upon the guard of his sword. Mégrel, an indifferent and singular man, was content with saying, as he surveyed the lifeless monarch: "We may retire, the piece is played out." To keep the knowledge of this misfortune from the troops, until the prince of Hesse, Charles's brother-in-law should be informed of it, his body was enveloped in a grey mantle, with a wig and hat upon his head. In this disguise, the corpse of the king was conveyed away, under the name of Captain Carlesberg.

It is now generally supposed that a pistol, fired by some mean and traitorous hand, closed the carcer of this celebrated monarch, who was too aptly styled the "Madman of the North."

FRENCHTOWN, A.D. 1813.—This small town, on the river Raisin, in Canada, was, in the year 1813, the scene of one of the bloodiest affrays which occurred during the second war between the United States and England. The surrender of General Hull at Detroit exposed the north-western frontier to incursions from the British and Indians; and the people of the western States were naturally anxious to recover the posts lost by the cowardice of that general. During the autumn of 1812, General Harrison, who had command of the army in that quarter, was occupied in collecting and organizing his forces in that quarter. General Winchester, who, with some 150 men, was incamped six miles from Fort Defiance, was, on the 8th of January, 1813, sent forward in advance of the army. He was to proceed to the rapids of the Maumee, and then take in his supplies of ordnance and provisions, and thence to march at once to West Malden, which town was occupied by the British and Indians. Three days after General Winchester had arrived at the rapids, he received an urgent request from the inhabitants of Frenchtown, a small settlement nearly forty miles distant, on the river Raisin, to come to their protection against the British and Indians assembled at Malden. A detachment of 500 men, under Colonel Lewis, was at once sent forward to Presque Isle, there to await the arrival of the main column. But Lewis, learning that an advance party of the enemy were already in possession of Frenchtown, hurried forward, and in the afternoon of the 21st of January, arrived on the banks of the stream opposite to the village. The river being frozen, he immediately ordered the charge to be sounded. The column advanced steadily across the ice, and entering the village under a heavy fire of the British, forced them from their position, and soon drove them to the woods. Darkness closed the combat. On the 23d of January, General Winchester arrived with a reinforcement of 250 men. He had sent a dispatch to General Harrison, then on the lower Sandusky, announcing his movements, and asking for reinforcements. The latter sent forward a detachment of 300, and followed himself the same day with 350 men, in hope of affording relief to General Winchester. General Proctor, at Malden, only eighteen miles distant, hearing of Colonel Lewis's advance on Frenchtown, hurried down with 600 British and Canadian troops, and 1,000 Indians under command of their chiefs, Splitlog and Roundhead, and six pieces of artillery, to attack him. The 500 Americans under Colonel Lewis were stationed behind pickets, in the form of a semicircle; but the 250 under General Winchester, were placed outside, 400 yards distant, and wholly uncovered. . On the morning of the 23d, Proctor's army arrived at the town, and immediately advanced to the assault. Lewis's men received them with such a fierce and deadly fire that they wheeled and fled in confusion. But while the attack in front was repulsed, that on the exposed left wing was completely successful. The Americans made but a momentary resistance, and then, borne back by numbers, turned and fled in all directions. But their retreat was entirely cut off by the Indians, who, with fearful yells, fell upon the fugitives, tomahawking them without mercy. Winchester and Lewis, with 100 men, rushed forward to their rescue, but they were soon surrounded by the savages; their men were cut down and tomahawked, and they themselves made prisoners, and carried to Proctor. In the mean time, the right wing maintained the unequal contest with undaunted courage and resolution. The British troops, unable to make any impression on the gallant band, paused; and it is doubtful whether Proctor would have ventured to make a second attack. Proctor, however, represented to Winchester that he could easily set the town on fire, and reduce the garrison, but that should they prolong their resistance, he could not guaranty the persons of the soldiers or the inhabitants from the barbarity of the Indians. Winchester, fully believing that the 500 men, who still maintained an undaunted front, must be sacrificed, agreed upon a capitulation, and an officer was sent to Major Madison, who now commanded that gallant little band, informing him of the unconditional surrender of his troops by his superior officer. The brave major, who did not at all consider himself and gallant band as vanquished men, informed the officer "that he would not surrender at all, unless the side-arms of the officers should be restored to them at Amherstberg, the wounded promptly and securely transported to that post, and a guard sufficient for their safety assigned them." If the British commander refused to grant these terms, he and his men would fight to the last, and, if necessary, die with their arms in their hands. Proctor, at first, rejected this proposition, but at length yielded, only because no other terms would be listened to. But no sooner did the garrison surrender, than, in direct violation of the conditions, he gave unbridled license to the soldiers and Indians. The latter were allowed to scalp and mutilate the dead and wounded. Proctor, fearing the approach of Harrison, hastily departed for Amherstberg with the prisoners, leaving the dead at Frenchtown, unburied, and sixty of the wounded, who were too feeble to march, unprotected. The next day, a large body of the Indians fell upon the wounded, tomahawed and scalped them, and setting fire to the houses, consumed the dead and dying together, responding to the shrieks of the suffering victims with whoops and yells, and hellish laughter. Two hundred dead bodies were left unburied, and for days after, hogs and dogs feasted on the mutilated corpses. Fired by these barbarities, the Americans from all quarters flocked to the standard of their country, and on the battle-field of the Thames, effectually avenged their murdered fellow-citizens.

FRETEVAL, A.D. 1194.—Near Freteval, a town of France, on the Loire, was fought, A.D. 1194, a battle between the troops of Philip Augustus and the English army, in which the former was signally defeated.

FRIEDBERG, A.D. 1745.—On the 4th of June, 1745, a battle was fought at Friedberg, a town of Prussian Silesia, between the Austrians and Saxons, and the army of Frederic II., of Prussia, the greatest monarch of the eighteenth century. After an obstinate engagement, Frederic obtained a signal victory.

FRIEDLAND, A.D. 1807.—This Prussian town, which has acquired immortal celebrity by the famous battle of which it was the theater, in 1807, is situated on the west bank of the river Alle, which flows in a northerly direction toward the Baltic Sea. It is situated between the river and a large artificial lake, or fish-pond, which lies to the north, and has been formed by damming up a rivulet, called the Millstream, which flows from the high grounds to the westward, near Posthenen, on the Alle, and falls into it at right angles. The windings of the Alle serve as a natural wet ditch round Friedland, on the south and east; the fish-pond protects it on the north; in a military point of view, therefore, it is only accessible on the western side, where it is approached by the road from Eylau, from which side also set out the roads to Königsberg to the north, and Wehlau and Tilsit, on the north-west. In that direction there is a large open space dotted with villages, and cultivated ground, neither hill nor plain, but an undulated surface, intersected only along its whole extent by the Millstream, which is very deep, with rugged sides, and in many places, from the refluent waters, scarcely fordable. At the distance of two miles from Friedland, as a center, the cultivated plain to the westward is bounded by a semicircle of woods, which fringe the higher grounds and form the horizon when looking in that direction from the town. The banks of the Alle on the eastward are very steep; and though there are three bridges over that river, in other quarters it can be passed only at a few fords.

On the 11th of June, 1807, the Russian army, retreating before the victorious army of the Emperor Napoleon, evacuated Heilsberg, and marching all night, established themselves at Bartenstein. Napoleon, observing this movement, detached Murat's dragoons to follow upon the traces of the enemy, and moving forward from his position before Heilsberg, himself with his whole army encamped on the blood-stained plain of Eylau, where he established his head-quarters. During the night of the 12th, the Russians resumed their march through Schiffenheil, toward Königsberg, and on the following morning had reached the banks of the Alle. Napoleon, however, had anticipated them in their march upon that city. Murat and Victor were in full advance from Eylau to Königsberg. Soult was marching on Creutzburg; Napoleon himself, at the head of the corps of Lannes, Ney, and Mortier, was approaching Friedland, by Domnau, ten miles from that town, where the Imperial Guard were already arrived. By three different movements the bulk of the French army interposed between Benningsen, the Russian general, and Königsberg, where all his magazines were placed, and Napoleon was in a situation, by a rapid advance upon Wehlau, to threaten his line of retreat to the Russian frontier. Benningsen saw that no time was to be lost; he gave orders to continue the march, and by great exertions the army reached Friedland, where head-quarters were established. On the evening of the 13th, Benningsen received intelligence that the corps of Lannes was lying at Posthenen, a village about three miles from Friedland, on the road to Königsberg. The exposed position of that corps, which formed the vanguard of the French army, inspired the Russian general with the hope that by a sudden attack, it might be destroyed before the main body of Napoleon's forces could advance to its relief. According to his orders, at two o'clock on the morning of the 14th, the Russian vanguard commenced defiling over the bridge of Friedland, and advanced along the road to the attack of Lannes's corps. No sooner did the videttes of Lannes's corps descry the advanced posts of the Russians than a sharp fire of musketry began, which was soon increased to a heavy cannonade, as the dark masses of infantry and cavalry swiftly advanced. The French trailleurs fell back, skirmishing, however, sharply, as they retreated; the alarm was speedily conveyed to the rear, and the whole corps stood to arms. In the mean time, the French troops were constantly reinforced in the rear, by the arrival of detached portions of the main body, which were steadily advancing toward Friedland. Benningsen had at first dispatched a single division across the river; but the increasing resistance of the enemy, caused him to pass over another to its support. Three pontoon bridges were constructed to facilitate the passage, and by degrees as the increasing masses of the French showed that other corps had arrived to the assistance of Lannes, the entire army was brought across. Thus was the Russian general, who at first, contemplated only a partial operation, insensibly drawn into a general action. Mortier's corps arrived to the support of Lannes in a short time after the firing commenced. Both corps then withdrew to the heights stretching from Posthenen to Heinrichsdorf, about three miles to the westward of the river Alle.

Benningsen deeming these the only forces he had to contend with, drew up his whole forces, as they successively arrived on the field from the bridges in the narrow plain, backed by Friedland and the Alle, facing toward the westward, about half a mile in front of that town. The Millstream flowing in a perpendicular direction to his line, nearly cut it in two equal parts: the right wing extended from the rivulet to the Alle, through the wood of Domeraner; the left, which was less considerable in length, stretched in a southerly direction also to the Alle, across the wood of Sortlack, and barring the roads of Eylau, Bartenstern, and Schippenheil, nearly at the point where they intersected each other. The whole army was drawn up in two lines, facing to the west: the first and third battalions of each regiment in battle array, composing the first line; the second in close columns, behind the intervals between them, forming the second line. In their rear was the river Alle, across which in case of a retreat they would be obliged to retreat over three bridges. The whole Russian army consisted of 55,000 men, of whom 10,000 were cavalry. The right wing of the Russian army was commanded by Gortchakoff, the left by Bagrathion. The cavalry on the right was under Nuaroff and Gallitzen, that on the left was commanded by Kollagriboff.

As the successive divisions of the Russian army took up their position on the west bank of the river, Lannes gradually fell back, covering his movements with a cloud of light troops, whose incessant fire concealed the real strength of his force. A body of thirty French squadrons endeavored to turn the Russian right in front of Heinrichsdorff. They attacked the enemy at that point with such vigor, that they were upon the point of accomplishing their purpose, when the advance of some fresh regiments compelled them to give ground. Shortly after, 3,000 men in a column advanced straight toward Friedland. The Russians permitted them to approach close to their batteries unmolested, when suddenly they opened a terrible fire of grape, which, crashing through the assailants, struck down 1,000 men; the column was routed and an eagle was taken. The Russians now advanced their left wing, which, attacking the French right, drove it back with such vigor that they seemed about retiring altogether toward Eylau; but shortly afterward the French received fresh reinforcements, and the Russians were in turn repulsed with great loss. A tremendous cannonade was now opened along the whole line, and announced the approach of a general battle. Napoleon, at Domnau, heard the sound of the cannon, and mounting his horse rode rapidly to the front. The increasing cannonade, and the sharp rattle of musketry, warned him that a serious conflict was already raging. He dispatched orders for the corps in the rear to hasten their march, and, having arrived at the heights behind Heinrichsdorf, which overlook the battle-field, he immediately sent out the officers of his staff in different directions to observe the movements of the enemy. Savery soon returned with the information that the march of troops over the bridge of Friedland was incessant; that none were retracing their steps, and that the masses in front were continually increasing and extending themselves. "'Tis well," replied the emperor, "I am already prepared: I have gained an hour upon them, and, since they wish it, I will give them another: this is the anniversary of Marengo: the battle could not be fought on a more propitious day." It was the 14th of June. By three o'clock in the afternoon the bulk of the French army had arrived, and Napoleon at once dispatched orders for all the troops to prepare for action in an hour. In the mean time the soldiers were ordered to sit down and rest themselves, while the most minute inspection took place in the ranks to see that the muskets were in good condition, and the cartridge-boxes amply supplied. Napoleon's order of battle was as follows: the right of the army, directly in front of Friedland, was occupied by the corps of Ney; next stood that of Mortier, on the extreme right of the corps of Lannes. In the second line immediately behind Ney, were stationed the corps of Victor, the Imperial Guard, with a numerous brigade of fusileers, under Savery; and the cavalry, under Grouchy, Latour Marbourg, and Nansouty, behind the center and right. The whole army was directed to advance in echelon, with the right in front, and the left slightly thrown back. Thus Ney would be first engaged. The artillery was directed to redouble their fire along the whole line as soon as the heads of their columns were seen emerging from the woods. The French army consisted of 70,000 infantry, and 10,000 horse. At five o'clock, at a signal given by the discharge of twenty pieces of cannon from the French center, the whole army stood to arms, and immediately the heads of Ney's columns were seen emerging from the woods behind Posthenen, and rapidly advancing upon Friedland. On all sides the Russians saw the enemy's forces. From the steeples of Friedland, through the interstices of the trees, or the openings of the forest, they were descried in masses of enormous power and depth. Like an immense mass of steel, Ney's column advanced, driving before it the Russian chasseurs of the guard and several regiments of cavalry and Cossacks who were placed in advance, and had endeavored to check its progress. At the same time Victor's corps advanced from the second line to the ground originally occupied by Ney; forty pieces of artillery, under the command of General Lenarmont, belonging to Victor's corps, were pushed on 400 paces further, on to a rising ground, and thence poured incessant and deadly volleys over the whole Russian line, effectually preventing any succors being sent to the left, which was threatened by Ney.

Ney's column assailed that portion of the enemy's army with such vigor that it was shaken everywhere; the loud shouts of his soldiers were heard along the whole line; their advanced guards were close to Friedland, and they were upon the point of storming the town, and completing the ruin of the enemy by gaining possession of the bridges in his rear. At this critical moment, the Russian Imperial Guard, which was placed in reserve behind the artificial lake, to the north of Friedland, was ordered to advance. Eagerly rushing forward with fixed bayonets, the Russians charged down upon Ney's column, in front and flank, with such vigor that it was penetrated, and, after a most furious hand-to-hand conflict, in which both sides sustained prodigious loss, driven back. Still fighting fiercely, Ney's men retired, eagerly followed by the Russians, until they reached the reserve under Victor. The ground which the combatants had traversed was strewn with the dead and dying, and the soil was deluged with blood. But supported by Victor's corps, Ney's soldiers made a stand, and the Russians, borne back by the united bodies, re-trod the ground which they had so gallantly won, and fresh victims encumbered the soil so fiercely contested. Dumont's division pressed on in hot pursuit, and Lenarmont's terrific battery advanced, playing without intermission on the crowded ranks of the retiring Russians, who were thrown into such confusion as they entered Friedland, that the leading French divisions determined to hazard an assault. The French soldiers poured into the town, and a bloody battle raged in the streets. Soon the Russians were expelled; the principal buildings were set on fire, and some of the fugitives, after crossing the river, applied the torch to the bridges. In a few moments they were enveloped in flames, and clouds of smoke shrouded the whole field of battle like a funeral pall. Meanwhile, the Russians on the center and right, kept their ground under a terrible cannonade, which told with fatal effect on the dense masses, which, from the limited extent of the ground, were there accumulated between the front and the river. At the retreat of the left wing and the guards, however, their flank was uncovered, and the left of Oudinot's grenadiers assailed them on that point with great vigor; but at that moment the Russian cavalry galloped forward at full speed, and charged the French with such fury, that they were trampled down and destroyed. The Russian infantry now advanced in the center, and poured in a destructive flanking fire upon the enemy, which effectually covered the retreat of their cavalry, who had so gallantly repulsed the French grenadiers. But now the flames of Friedland and the bridges were seen to arise, and the vast volumes of smoke which filled the atmosphere told that their retreat was cut off, and success hopeless. Despair filled their ranks. But with courage unshaken, they united the fronts of their battalions, and closed the ranks of the soldiers, and presented an unbroken front to the enemy. The French artillery, approaching to half cannon-shot distance, plowed through this dense array, while their infantry threw in incessant and destructive fires of musketry. Slowly and in solid order the Russians retired, unbroken and unshaken, in spite of the fearful storm of grape and bullets which swept through their ranks. From their rear they kept up an incessant fire upon the pursuing enemy, and vigorously repelled the repeated charges of the French grenadiers. At length, amid incessant discharges of grape and musketry, the Russians reached the bank of the river at a fordable point, and commenced the passage. The death-dealing missiles of the French continued to shower among the fugitives wading through water, breast high, toward the opposite shore, which they finally gained with the greater part of their artillery.

The slaughter, during this terrible passage, was immense. Two Russian divisions, impatient of the slow progress at the ford, and unable longer to endure the incessant showers of musketry and grape, threw themselves, sword in hand, into Friedland, and endeavored to open a passage, with fixed bayonets, to the bridge. A bloody conflict ensued; but with the desperation of despair, the Russians forced their way through the burning houses, to the water's edge. There, however, they found the bridge destroyed. Turning, these brave men fought their way back through the French masses, and with sadly diminished numbers, reached the ford, and during the darkness of night plunged into the stream. Many, missing the fords, were drowned; others were slain by the balls of the enemy, and only a bleeding remnant reached their companions on the opposite shore. The French army, wearied with the strife, reposed on the bloody field which they had won. Such was the battle of Friedland, which, at one blow, destroyed the powerful league of Prussia and Russia against the Emperor of France. It was speedily followed by the peace of Tilsit, by which Russia lost no territory, but Prussia was obliged to surrender nearly half her dominions. The losses of the Russians were great. Eighteen thousand men had fallen, either killed or wounded, and five hundred were made prisoners. Five thousand of the wounded, and eighty pieces of cannon, fell into the hands of the victors. The French lost 8,000, killed and wounded.

FRONTIERRA, A.D. 1663.—In the year 1663, a conflict took place near Frontierra, in Portugal, between the Spaniards and Portuguese. The former were defeated with great loss.

FUENTES DE ONORE, A.D. 1811.—This small town, sixteen miles west of Ciudad Rodrigo, in Spain, was the witness of several bloody conflicts, in 1811, between the French and English troops.

GAZA, B.C. 312.—The city of Gaza stands about two miles from the Mediterranean Sea, in Palestine, about 48 miles from Jerusalem.

In the year 312 B.C., a battle was fought on the plains of Gaza, between the forces of Ptolemy, one of Alexander's generals, who had declared himself King of Egypt, and the army of Demetrius. After an obstinate battle the troops of Demetrius were at length compelled to fly. He lost 5,000 men killed, 8,000 made prisoners, and all his tents, treasures and equipage.

Gaza is one of the strongholds of Egypt, and was besieged by Alexander the Great, in the year 332 B.C., for two months. Upon his arrival before the city, Alexander found it strongly garrisoned, and under the command of Betis, one of the eunuchs of Darius. Betis was a brave man and loyal to his sovereign, and defended the city against Alexander, with great vigor; and although he employed every art of war, and notwithstanding his soldiers fought with the utmost intrepidity, he was forced, however, to remain two months before it. Alexander, during the siege, received two wounds, and exasperated at the obstinate resistance of the garrison, he resolved to treat the governor, the inhabitants and the soldiers with a barbarity wholly inexcusable. He caused 10,000 men to be cut to pieces, and sold all the rest, with their women and children, into slavery. Betis, the governor of Gaza, was taken in one of the last assaults. Alexander was either angry or jealous at the courage with which he had seen him face death, and ordered him to appear before his throne: "Wretch!" cried he, "thou shalt not die sword in hand, as thou didst hope; expect to suffer all the torments vengeance can contrive." To imitate Achilles, who dragged the body of Hector three times round the walls of Troy behind his chariot, he ordered the unfortunate Betis to be pierced through the heels and to be fastened to a chariot, which he drove round the walls of Gaza; thus depriving the brave governor of the little life left by his wounds.

Second Siege, A.D. 633.—Amrou, commander of the Saracens, presented himself before Gaza, in the year 633 of the Christian era. The governor of the place haughtily asked him, in an interview, what brought him into Syria? "The order of God and of my master," replied Amrou. They soon proceeded to action: the troops of Gaza were cut to pieces; Amrou took the governor prisoner, and Gaza opened its gates to him.

Third Siege, A.D. 1799.—The French, under Bonaparte, besieged and took Gaza, in the Egyptian expedition; but as there is no striking circumstance to give interest to the siege, save that it was prosecuted by Bonaparte, the "modern Alexander," we shall content ourselves with recording the fact.

GEMBLOUX, A.D. 1794.—In 1794, a battle took place near Gembloux, a village of Belgium, between the French and the Austrians, in which the latter were signally defeated.

GERMANTOWN, A.D. 1777.—This place was formerly one of the suburbs of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, but it is now included within the chartered limits of the city.

After its defeat, on the banks of the Brandywine, the American army, numbering about 10,000 men, under Washington, retreated toward Philadelphia, and encamped at Germantown. The British army (consisting of 12,500 men), the next day after the battle, marched toward Chester, on the Delaware, as if with the intention of surprising Philadelphia. Washington, as soon as his soldiers were rested, crossed the Schuylkill, and advanced to oppose Howe. On the 16th of September, Howe arrived at Goshen, and there received intelligence that the Americans were approaching to give him battle, and were already within five miles of Goshen. Both armies immediately prepared for action; but a violent storm of rain suddenly arose and prevented an engagement. Washington again crossed the Schuylkill at Parker's Ford, and encamped on the banks of Skippack creek, near its entrance into Perkiomy creek, about twenty-three miles north-west from Philadelphia. But as this movement left the troops of Smallwood, who had been ordered to hang on the flank and rear of the British army, too much exposed to be surrounded by the enemy, Washington detached General Wayne, with his division, to the rear of the British army, with orders to form a junction with Smallwood; and to seize every occasion to annoy the enemy. The British army, owing to the severity of the weather, did not pursue the enemy, but halted at Tryduffin. The British spies informed Howe that General Wayne, with 1,500 men, was lying in the wood in the rear, at no great distance from the left wing of his army.

The British general determined to dislodge Wayne at once. Accordingly on the night of the 13th, he detached general Gray with about 2,000 men, foot and horse, to surprise the enemy. Gray performed his duty with prudence and activity. Conducting his men silently through the woods, he arrived unobserved by the enemy, at about one o'clock in the morning, before Wayne's incampment. The American pickets were captured without alarming the camp, and the British troops rushed in upon the sleeping soldiers. The camp was thrown into a state of the utmost confusion and terror. In the darkness of the night, suddenly awakened by the furious onslaught of the enemy, chilled by cold, and overcome by fatigue, the Americans were capable of making but little resistance. The slaughter was terrible; and the whole corps must have been cut off, if Wayne had not preserved his coolness. He rallied a few of his troops, and received the charge of the enemy, with vigorous discharges of musketry, keeping the British at bay, until his terrified soldiers had made their escape. He then in good order withdrew his little band from the field. Three hundred Americans were slain, and all their baggage, stores and arms fell into the hands of the victors. The British loss was trifling. Having thus secured his rear, Howe determined to force the enemy to a general battle, or to push them at such a distance from Philadelphia, as would allow him to cross the Schuylkill, and take possession of that city. Washington to prevent this retired with his army and encamped at Pottsgrove (now Pottstown) 20 miles above Morristown. Howe receiving intelligence of this movement on the part of the Americans, wheeled his army, and marching down the Schuylkill, crossed that river at Flatland and Gordon's Fords. The British army reached the left bank of the river on the night of the 23d of September, and was thus placed between the city of Philadelphia and the American army. Washington now abandoned all hope of saving Philadelphia from the enemy; and on the 26th of September a detachment of the British army entered that city. The main body of the army encamped in Germantown. The Americans, in order to prevent the British fleet from communicating with the troops in the city, erected works and batteries, on Mud Island, in the Delaware, near the junction of the Schuylkill, and also constructed a fort on the opposite shore of New Jersey, at Red Bank. In the channel of the river between these batteries, they sunk several machines for the purpose of obstructing the passage of the fleet. They also were constructing extensive works, at Billingsford on the Jersey shore. The British were well aware of the importance of a free communication with the sea, by means of the Delaware; and two regiments were sent to put an end to the operations of the Americans at Billingsport, and other points on the Delaware. The expedition was so successful that the Americans were obliged to abandon their works at Billingsport; and the British succeeded in removing the obstructions from the river so that a narrow passage was opened for their fleet. The two regiments returned, after their expedition to Chester, where they joined another which had been sent from Germantown, that they might all together form a sufficient escort for a large convoy of prisoners to the camp. Advised of the weakened state of Howe's army in consequence of the detachment of these divisions, Washington, who had not left his position at Skippack creek, resolved to attack the main body of the army at Germantown. In the mean time his army had been augmented by the junction of the troops from Peekskill on the Hudson, and a body of Maryland militia. The village of Germantown consisted of buildings standing on either side of a single street, extending a distance of two miles.

The British line of incampment crossed the village at right angles, at about the center, the left wing extending to the west to the Schuylkill. The left wing was covered in front by the German chasseurs, mounted and dismounted, and the right wing by a battalion of light infantry and the Queen's rangers, also in front. The center was posted in the town and was guarded by the 40th regiment, and a battalion of light infantry stationed about three fourths of a mile in advance. Washington called a council of officers, and it was decided that Sullivan and Wayne's divisions, flanked by Conway's brigade, should enter the town by the way of Chestnut Hill, to attack the English center, while the Pennsylvania militia, under General Armstrong, should get upon the enemy's left flank and rear, by falling down the Manatawny road. The divisions of Greene and Stephens flanked by MacDougal's brigade were to make a circuit toward the east by the Limekiln road, and enter the town at the market-house to attack the left flank of the right wing. The Maryland and Jersey militia, under Smallwood and Forman, were to advance along the old York road, and attack the rear of the right, and the brigades of March and Maxwell, were to be held in reserve. Having made these dispositions, Washington on the 3d of October, left his camp at Skippack creek, and advanced toward the enemy. It was about seven o'clock in the evening. Parties of cavalry were sent on with orders to scour the country silently, and arrest every individual who might give notice to the enemy of the threatened danger. Washington accompanied the column of Sullivan and Wayne, in person. The march was performed in the utmost silence. At about three o'clock in the morning the British pickets at Chestnut Hill, discovered the approach of the Americans; the alarm was given; the troops were called to arms, and each man took his post with the haste of surprise. The Americans came up at about sunrise. At seven o'clock General Conway attacked the British pickets, and drove them back to the main body of their army. Conway closely followed, and fell upon the 40th regiment and the battalion of light infantry. A sharp conflict ensued; but the British were soon overpowered and driven back in disorder into the village. The victors pursued eagerly, and furiously assailed the British center, under Colonel Musgrave. Musgrave finding his troops unable to cope with the enemy, threw themselves with five companies of the 40th regiment into a large and strong stone house (Judge Chew's, situated near the head of the village), whence he poured upon the Americans such a terrible fire of musketry that they were checked. The Americans repeatedly endeavored to storm this unsuspected covert of the enemy; but they met with such a determined resistance from its defenders that their efforts were fruitless. The fire of the small arms was ineffectual. At length cannons were brought to bear upon the house by the artillery regiment of Maxwell's brigade; but such was the courage of the English, the violence of their fire, and the strength of the house, that they were unable to dislodge them. Meanwhile, General Greene had approached the British right wing, and after a slight engagement routed the Queen's rangers and the light infantry. Then turning a little to his right, he attacked the left flank of the enemy's right wing, and endeavored to enter the village, feeling assured that the Pennsylvania militia, under Armstrong, on the right, and the militia of Jersey and Maryland, commanded by Smallwood on the left, would have executed Washington's orders by attacking and turning the first the left, and the second the right flank of the British army, but neither of these detachments did their duty. The former arrived within sight of the German chasseurs, but did not attack them, the latter did not appear on the field until it was too late. General Gray, finding his left flank secure, marched with nearly the whole left wing of the British army, to the assistance of the center, which was upon the very point of defeat, notwithstanding the unexpected resistance of Colonel Musgrave. The battle in Germantown now raged furiously; and the issue for a time was doubtful. The British general, Agnew, was killed while gallantly charging at the head of the 1st brigade. A detachment of Greene's column, under Colonel Matthews, advanced to the eastward of the house occupied by Musgrave, and assailed a party of English, with such fury that they were driven into the village, leaving over 100 prisoners in the hands of the Americans. Matthews was about entering the town, but bewildered by a fog which began to form at daylight, and which was so thick that the contending parties could not see each other, he was unable to resist the extremity of the right wing of the enemy, which finding they had nothing to apprehend from the Maryland and New Jersey militia, surrounded him and his men, and attacked him so fiercely that the prisoners were rescued. A terrible conflict ensued amid the gloom.

The Americans received the attacks of their foes with desperate courage, and it was not until the most of his officers and men were killed, that Matthews found himself obliged to surrender, with his bleeding remnant of about 100 men. This circumstance enabled the two regiments of the British right wing to throw themselves into Germantown, and to march to the relief of Musgrave in the center. They attacked and defeated a body of Americans who had at that moment entered Germantown. The patriots then hastily retired from the village, taking their artillery with them; but leaving the ground behind them strewn with the corses of their countrymen. General Gray, now being absolute master of the town, flew to the succor of his left wing, which was engaged with the left of Greene's column. Sullivan's division, with Armstrong's division of North Carolinians, and part of Conway's brigade, having driven the enemy before them into the center of Germantown, found themselves alone, and surrounded by foes. Their ammunition was expended, and through the fog they could see the forces of the enemy gradually drawing around them. The troops suddenly became panic-stricken, and fled hastily. The divisions of Greene and Sullivan were the last to quit the field, and their retreat was gallantly covered by Count Pulaski and his legions. Thus the Americans abandoned to the English the prize of victory when another moment might have placed it within their grasp. The battle of Germantown lasted two hours and forty minutes, and was one of the bloodiest and most obstinate conflicts of the American revolutionary war. The Americans lost 152 killed, 521 wounded, and 400 made prisoners. Among the prisoners were fifty-four officers. The British lost 100 killed, and 400 wounded. Among the slain were Brigadier General Agnew, an officer of rare merit, and Lieutenant Colonel Bird. The American army saved all its artillery, and the same day retreated to their former camp on Skippack creek. Although defeated when victory appeared on the point of declaring in their favor, the American generals were not blamed by their countrymen. On the contrary, Congress passed a vote of thanks to Washington for his wise and well-concerted attack upon the enemy's army near Germantown, and to "the officers and soldiers of the army for their brave exertions on that occasion."

GHUZNEE, A.D. 1839.—On the 23d of July, 1839, Ghuznee, a fortified city of Affghanistan, was stormed and taken by the British under Lord Keane. In 1842, it was besieged by the Affghans, and the English garrison surrendered, but in the same year it was retaken by the English under General Nott.

GIBRALTAR, A.D. 1799.—This famous fortress, belonging to Great Britain, stands on the west side of a mountainous promontory, or rock, in the south part of Spain, adjoining the narrowest part of the strait of Gibraltar, connecting the Atlantic and Mediterranean. The rock is from a quarter to three quarters of a mile in breadth. Its north side fronting the long, narrow isthmus, which connects it with the main land, is perpendicular, and wholly inaccessible; the east and south sides are steep and rugged, and extremely difficult of access, so as to render any attack on them, even if they were not fortified, next to impossible; so that it is only on the west side, fronting the bay, where the rock declines to the sea, and the town of Gibraltar is built, that it can be attacked with the slighest prospect of success. Here, however, the strength of the fortification is such, that the fortress seems impregnable, even though attacked by an enemy having command of the sea. The fortifications are of extraordinary extent and strength. The principal batteries are all casemated, and traverses are constructed to prevent the mischief that might ensue from the explosion of shells. Vast galleries have been excavated in the solid rock and mounted with heavy cannon; and communications have been established between the different batteries, by passages cut in the rock, to protect the troops from the enemy's fire. In fact, the whole rock is lined with the most formidable batteries, from the water to the summit, and from Land Gate to Europa Point, by which name the southern extremity of the rock is designated; so that if properly victualed and garrisoned, Gibraltar may be said to be impregnable. Gibraltar, the Caepe of the Greeks, formed with Abyla, on the African coast, "the pillars of Hercules." Its name was changed to Gibel Tarif, or mountain of Tarif, in the beginning of the eighth century, when Tarif Eben Zarca landed with a large army to conquer Spain, and erected a strong fortress on the mountain side. During the Moorish occupation of Spain, it increased in importance, but was at length taken by Ferdinand, King of Castile, in the fourteenth century. It was soon recaptured, and did not become an appendage to Spain till 1462. Its further history, till its conquest by the English in 1704, is unimportant. During the war of the Spanish succession, the English and Dutch fleets, under Sir George Rooke and the Prince of Hesse-Darmstadt, attacked the fortress, which surrendered, after some hours' resistance. The Spaniards, during the nine following years, vainly endeavored to regain it; and in 1713 its possession was secured to the English by the peace of Utrecht. In 1727 the Spaniards blockaded it for several months without success. The most memorable, however, of the sieges of Gibraltar, is the last, begun in 1779, and terminated in 1783. The British garrison was commanded by Sir William Elliot, afterward Lord Heathfield. A powerful combined French and Spanish fleet was collected, to co-operate in the attack, which excited an extraordinary interest throughout all Europe.

On the 21st of June, 1779, all communication was cut off between Gibraltar and the surrounding country, and the fort was blockaded by the middle of the following month. Fortunately, in the early part of the year, General Elliot, who had recently been appointed governor, had arrived in the fort, and brought to the crisis the aid of his superior military science and talents. A supply of provisions had also been recently received. The firing commenced on the 21st of September, when a cannonade was opened from the fort which did much damage to the besiegers' works, yet the blockade daily became closer; supplies could no longer be stealthily introduced; provisions were extremely dear; disease spread rapidly. The besiegers commenced firing on the 12th of January, 1780. By the end of March, the garrison was cheered by the arrival of a supply of provisions, brought in by Admiral Rodney, who had made his way bravely, in spite of the efforts of the enemy to prevent him. After this, the garrison and town's people were repeatedly reduced to great extremities before provisions arrived. In the spring of 1781, the besiegers completely destroyed the town by the fire of their batteries. On the 27th of April, however, a most gallant exploit was performed by a party from the garrison, who succeeded in reducing to ashes all the erections of the enemy. These, however, being repaired, the firing recommenced, and for more than a year was maintained incessantly. But the grand effort was to be made by the besiegers in the year 1782. In spite of the formidable batteries on the rock, the bold, if not extravagant project, was entertained of attempting to silence them by the fire of ten enormous floating batteries, ingeniously constructed by the Chevalier d'Arcon. If the besiegers were active, the besieged were no less so. In the course of the same year, on the suggestion of General Boyd, the enemy's fire was returned from the rocks with red-hot balls, a device which was found to produce the most striking effect. The enemy, however, now prepared for their grand effort. On the 12th of September the combined fleets of France and Spain arrived in the bay; next morning they were drawn up around the south and west sides of the promontory, a most formidable armament, consisting of forty-seven sail of the line, seven of which were three-deckers, together with ten battering ships, the strongest that had ever been built, and many frigates and smaller vessels. On land there lay an army of 40,000, with batteries on which were mounted 200 pieces of heavy ordnance. On the other side, the garrison now consisted of about 7,000 effective men. The ships were permitted to take their stations without molestation, but about a quarter before ten o'clock, as soon as the first of them dropped anchor, the citadel began to pour upon them its hitherto reserved artillery. Now commenced a scene of terrible sublimity. 400 pieces of the heaviest ordnance thundered without intermission, and filled the air with smoke and flame. For several hours the attack and defense were so well supported as scarcely to admit any appearance of superiority in the cannonade on either side. The wonderful construction of the ships seemed to bid defiance to the powers of the heaviest ordnance. In the afternoon, however, the face of things began to change considerably. The smoke, which had been observed to issue from the upper part of the flag-ship, appeared to prevail, notwithstanding the constant application of water; and the admiral's second was observed to be in the same condition. Confusion was now apparent on board several of the vessels; and, by the evening, their cannonade was considerably abated. About seven or eight o'clock it almost entirely ceased, excepting from one or two ships to the northward, which, from their distance, had suffered very little injury.

In the end, the attack concluded in the complete annihilation of the assailing squadron. All the larger ships were beaten to pieces or burned. As night approached, groans and signals of distress from those on board the shattered navy supplied the place of the now slackened fire. Many of the wretched men were struggling for life in the waters; and the victors themselves at last put out to their assistance, and picked numbers of them up. The loss of the enemy was supposed to amount to about 2,000, including prisoners. Of the English, there were only sixteen killed and sixty-eight wounded. The rock was a much better defense than those strong-built men of war. The assailants had 300 pieces of ordnance in play; the garrison only eighty cannon, seven mortars, and nine howitzers. Captain Drinkwater in his interesting history of the siege, states that upwards of 8,300 rounds, more than half of which were hot shot, and 716 barrels of powder, were expended by the English artillery.

GISORS, A.D. 1198.—Gisors is a town of France, and is situated on the Epte, in the department of Eure, thirty-three miles north-east of Evreux. Here, in the year 1198, a battle was fought between the armies of England and France. Philip, King of France, had marched from Nantes with three hundred knights, their esquires, and a large body of cavalry, for the purpose of raising the siege of Courcelles; but Courcelles had already surrendered, and he was met by the English army, under Richard I., on the road to Gisors. After a sharp engagement, the French fled to that fortress; the bridge broke under the weight of the fugitives, and the king, with twenty knights all in armor, was precipitated into the river Epte. All, save the king, perished. Philip was extricated with difficulty, and owed his safety to the devotion of his followers, who gallantly turned on the pursuers, and renewed the battle, till all were either taken or slain. Forty barons, one hundred knights, and a hundred and forty chargers, covered with armor, were the reward of the victors. Richard, in a circular letter, communicated the news to his friends in England, and boasted with scornful complacency, that he had made the King of France drink of the waters of the Epte. The parole of Richard for the day was "Dieu et mon droit" (God and my right), and from this time it was made the motto to the royal arms of England.

GLADSMUIR, A.D. 1745.—The battle of Gladsmuir, known, also, as that of Prestonpans, took place in the year 1745, near Prestonpans, in Haddington county, Scotland, between the royalist army and that of the Pretender. The battle was fought partly in Gladmuir, a parish four miles west of Haddington, whence the name.

GLENLIVIT, A.D. 1594.—Glenlivit, a village of Scotland, in 1594 was the scene of a bloody conflict between the adherents of the Earls of Huntley and of Argyle. The battle was characterized by all that brutality and vengeful hatred which only civil warfare can arouse. Both parties fought with equal ardor, but at length the army of Argyle was defeated with great loss.

GOREY, A.D. 1798.—The battle of Gorey was fought on the 4th of June, 1798, between the forces of the King of England and the Irish rebels. The royalists were defeated with considerable loss. The king's forces, after losing several pieces of cannon, retreated to Gorey, and afterward to Arklow, abandoning both towns, the insurgents being nearly 20,000 strong.

GRAMPIAN HILLS, A.D. 79.—The battle of the Grampian Hills was fought in the year 79, between the Scottish army, under Galgacus, and the Picts, under Agricola. The battle was fought on a single hill, the Mons Grampius of Tacitus, whence these hills derive their name.

GRANADA, A.D. 1491.—Ferdinand V., King of Arragon, besieged Boabdil, the last king of the Moors of Granada, in his capital, with an army of 50,000 men. Granada, surrounded by a double wall, fortified by 1030 towers, had two citadels, one of which served as a palace for the king. An army of 30,000 Moors was within the walls; it had an immense and warlike population, and magnificent stores of munitions and provisions seemed to render it impregnable. Ferdinand did not attack Granada according to the usual system of sieges; he employed neither lines, nor trenches, nor artillery; he surrounded his own camp with walls and works. His sole aim was to starve the enemy, and make himself master of all the passages; he rooted up the trees, he burned the houses, and in a moment changed a delightful territory into a dry and arid desert. The garrison endeavored to make sorties, but it was overwhelmed by numbers, and always proved unfortunate. The Saracens flattered themselves that the rigors of the winter would oblige the Christians to depart; but their hopes were disappointed. Ferdinand's camp became a fortified city, furnished with solid fire-proof houses. The Moors saw with grief that nothing could discourage the Castilians. The rigors of famine began to be felt, and cold augmented both public and private misery. In this extremity it was determined to treat with Ferdinand, and they consented to surrender if not relieved within sixty days. Scarcely had the Moorish king signed the treaty, than he repented of it; the thoughts of descending from his throne plunged him into the deepest grief, and yet he did not dare to retract, so great were the evils that surrounded him. His army could not endure the idea of submitting to the Christians, and the inhabitants incessantly implored the assistance of God and Mahomet. Suddenly an Alfaique excited the people to revolt; at his voice 20,000 men took arms. Boabdil required all his eloquence to restore order; he pointed out to them, with tears in his eyes, that if they preferred life to a certain death, they were bound by the stern necessity of observing the capitulation. The sedition was appeased, but the public despair was so great that the king of the Moors, dreading to see it renewed, hastened to surrender all his forts, and to repair to the camp of the conqueror. Thus, after a duration of 762 years, terminated the domination of the Moors in Spain.—Robson.

Washington Irving, in his history of the Conquest of Granada, has given a detailed account of this siege. We can not too highly recommend the perusal of this work to our readers.

GRANICUS, B.C. 334.—The Granicus is a narrow, deep, and rapid stream in northern Asia, originating in the northern slope of the range of Ida, and running a north-east course of forty geographical miles to the Propontis, now called the sea of Marmora. Its modern name is the Oostrala. Its western banks are reported by travelers to be high, steep, and rugged.

In the year 334, B.C., Alexander arrived on the banks of the Granicus. His army consisted of a little more than 30,000 foot, and four or five thousand horse. They were all brave men, well disciplined, and inured to fatigue. On the opposite side of the river was stationed the Persian army, which Darius, upon hearing that Alexander was about to invade his country, had sent thither to intercept his progress. The Persian army numbered 100,000 foot, and upward of 10,000 horse. The cavalry was posted along the shore in a line, forming an extended front to oppose the Macedonians should they attempt to pass the river. The two armies remained in sight of each other a long time, as if dreading the event. At length, Alexander, impatient at the delay, took the command of the right wing of his army, and placing the left under the command of Parmenio, plunged into the stream. The trumpets sounded, and setting up a shout which seemed to rend the very air, his troops leaped into the river after him. Surrounded by the flower of his army, thirteen troops of horse, Alexander madly buffeted the rushing current, and made rapid progress toward the enemy. The Persians hurled down multitudes of arrows upon the Macedonians, but they heeded them not. They gained the opposite bank, and forcing their way up its slippery sides, they engaged the Persians hand to hand. The Macedonians, as they landed, were somewhat disordered, for the Persian cavalry attacked them as fast as they landed, making good use of their spears, and when those were broken, of their swords. Alexander himself was sorely pressed. The white waving plume which ornamented the crest of his helmet, and his brilliant buckler, rendered him most conspicuous. A javelin was thrust through his cuirass at the joint, but he escaped uninjured. Immediately afterward he was attacked at once by two distinguished Persian officers, Rhoesaces and Spithridates. With great address he avoided Rhoesaces, and received Spithridates with such a blow upon his breast-plate that it broke in pieces. He now drew his sword to dispatch him; but at this very moment Rhoesaces rushed upon him, and raising himself up on his horse, uplifted his battle-axe, and with all his strength, dealt a blow at Alexander, which cut off his plume and crest, and penetrated through the helmet even to the hair. He was upon the point of repeating the blow, when Clitus, with one stroke of his sword, cut of Rhoesaces's hand, and thus preserved the life of his monarch. The Macedonians, excited to madness at the sight of the imminent danger of their leader, pushed against the Persians with redoubled vigor. At length the center of the Persian cavalry began to give ground, and immediately the two wings were broken and put to flight. Alexander did not pursue them far, but turned about to attack the Persian foot, which was engaged with his infantry. The Persians who had received the first attack of the Macedonians with firmness, upon the arrival of Alexander and his cavalry, instantly turned and fled. The Grecian infantry in Darius's service alone remained. This body of men made a stand upon an eminence, and demanded from Alexander a promise to let them march away unmolested. But in his rage, Alexander would not listen to reason, and instantly rushed with his troops into the mass of the Greeks, crying out to his men to spare none of the enemy.

The Greeks made a vigorous resistance. Alexander's horse (not Bucephalus), was killed with the thrust of a sword. The battle raged so hot around him that more Macedonians were killed in this struggle than in all the rest of the battle. The Greeks were well disciplined soldiers, and had been thoroughly inured to war. Their desperate condition caused them to fight with an energy almost superhuman; but crushed by the superior numbers of their enemies, they were all cut to pieces except 2,000, who were taken prisoners. A great number of the Persian commanders lay dead on the field. 20,000 foot, and 2,500 horse were killed in this engagement, on the Persian side, while the Macedonians lost only 22 of the royal horse which were killed at the first attack; 60 of the other cavalry, and about 30 foot, who the next day were all laid in one grave. To do honor to the memory of the 25 horsemen who were slain while fighting near his person, Alexander afterward caused a statue of each in brass to be erected in a city of Macedon, called Dium. He also sent to the Greeks presents out of the spoils, that they might have their share of the glory of the day. To the Athenians in particular he sent 300 bucklers. Upon the rest of the spoils he caused the following glorious inscription to be inscribed: "Alexander, the son of Philip, with the Greeks (the Lacedæmonians excepted) won these spoils from the Barbarians who inhabit Asia." See battles of Issus and Arbela.

GROCHOW, A.D. 1831.—Grochow is a village of Poland, three miles south-east of Warsaw. A battle occurred at this place on the 19th of February, 1831, between the Russian army, under Diebitch, and the Poles under Rodziwill. The forces on either side were nearly equal; but the Russians had a great superiority in artillery. The Poles fought with the most heroic resolution, and although toward evening they lost a few hundred yards of ground, yet when the firing ceased their ranks were unbroken, their courage unsubdued, and they had lost neither prisoners, cannon, nor standard in the fight. They lost in killed and wounded about 4,000 men; the Russians lost 5,000. The battle of Praga soon followed. See Warsaw.

GUAMANGA, A.D. 1824.—The battle of Guamanga, in Peru, was fought in 1824 between the troops of Sucie and the Spaniards. The Spaniards were defeated, and with their defeat, Spanish rule in South America was terminated.

GUILFORD COURT-HOUSE, A.D. 1781.—This place is situated in Guilford co., N. C., and on the 15th of March, 1781, was the scene of one of the most sanguinary and bloody conflicts of the American revolutionary war.

The southern States were the field of the most important operations in the revolutionary war, during the campaign of 1781. On the 30th of October, 1780, General Greene was appointed commander-in-chief of the southern army, in place of General Gates. He took command on the 2d of December, and with the main body of the American army, took post at Cheraw, east of the Pedee. General Morgan was sent with about 1,000 men, to occupy the country adjacent to the junction of the Pacolet river. The British army was stationed between the two divisions of the army of the enemy. Cornwallis, the English commander, detached Tarleton to attack Morgan. The battle of Cowpens followed, in which the British were defeated. Learning of the defeat of Tarleton, Cornwallis, having destroyed his heavy baggage, marched with the main body of his army, to intercept Morgan, who was pushing forward with his prisoners toward Catawba, with the intention of entering Virginia. Morgan, however, succeeded in crossing the Catawba, and arrived on the banks of the Yadkin, where he was joined by General Greene with his escort. On the 3d of February, 1781, Cornwallis arrived on the western bank of the Yadkin, almost at the moment when the Americans had gained the opposite shore. A sudden rise of the river prevented the British general from crossing; and the Americans continued their retreat. Had the river been in a passable condition, the troops of Morgan would have fallen an easy prey to their more numerous enemies. The British finally crossed the river and pressed on in pursuit. Greene arrived at Guilford Court-House where he was joined by the main body of his army from Cheraw; and the united army continued its flight. The British army pursued the retreating enemy as far as the Dan, when, upon finding that the waters of this river were so much swollen by the late rains that they were unable to cross, Cornwallis abandoned the chase, and moving southward, established his camp at Hillsbourough, in North Carolina. After allowing his troops a sufficient length of time for repose, Greene, on the 23d of February, recrossed the Dan in order to prevent Cornwallis from embodying the loyalists of the country under his banners. Colonel Lee with his cavalry scoured the country and effectually foiled the efforts of Tarleton, who was recruiting in the vicinity of the Haw and Deep rivers. Greene's army at this time consisted of about 5,000 men; and feeling strong enough to cope with Cornwallis, he resolved to give him battle. On the 12th of March he crossed the Haw and Reedy Fork, and incamped in battle array near Guilford Court-House.

Cornwallis, meanwhile, had advanced from Deep Reep river, toward the American army. The reconnoitering parties of both armies went out in all directions. These parties frequently met, and sharp skirmishes ensued with various success. The legions of Lee and Tarleton fell in with each other in one of these excursions, and a fierce and bloody conflict ensued. Lee had the advantage at first; but on Tarleton's receiving reinforcements he was obliged to retire. These skirmishes were merely the prelude of the battle which was soon to follow. The British army consisted of about 3,000 men, English and Hessians; all tried soldiers, well armed and eager to avenge the defeat of Cowpens. The ground from Guilford Court-House, southward, falls abruptly to a broken vale, which is intersected by a small stream. At the time of the battle, there were many clearings around the court-house; and the great Salisbury road, which leads to the court-house, was lined on either side by a forest of oaks. In this forest, and near the court-house, on the 15th of March, was stationed the American army, awaiting the approach of the enemy. General Greene's order of battle consisted in three divisions; the first, composed of the North Carolina militia, under Generals Butler and Eaton, was posted near the foot of the hill, upon the fore-edge of the forest, behind a fence. The second division was composed of the Virginia militia, under the command of Generals Stevens and Lawson; the right flank of Stevens, and the left flank of Lawson resting on the road. This line was formed in the woods, parallel to the first, and about 800 yards behind it. The third division comprised the regular troops, under General Huger and Colonel Williams. They were stationed in the plain which extended from the forest to the court-house. Two six-pounders, under the direction of Captain Singleton, were planted in the road a little in advance of the first line; and two other pieces of artillery were placed on an eminence, near the court-house. Colonel Washington, with his dragoons, Kirkwood's Delaware corps, and Lynch's riflemen, flanked the right wing, and Colonel Lee, with some light infantry and Campbell's dragoons, the left. At about twelve o'clock, the British army, under General Cornwallis, approached the court-house. As the troops defiled from Salisbury road into the open plains, they presented a magnificent spectacle. The sun shone clear and unclouded upon their scarlet uniforms and glistening accoutrements, and the music of their martial band was wafted across the fields to the ears of the Americans. Like a huge piece of mechanism they obeyed the orders of their officers, and formed for the approaching battle. The right wing of the first line was composed of an English regiment and Bose's Hessian regiment, under General Leslie; the left of two English regiments under Colonel Webster. A battalion of Guards acted as a reserve to the right wing; and General O'Hara's corps to the left. The royal artillery under McLeod, and the grenadiers, advanced in close order along the road in the center. Tarleton was posted on the road with his legion; but he had received orders not to move until the infantry, after having carried the forest, should have penetrated to the plains behind it, where cavalry could operate to advantage. As the British advanced, the Americans opened a brisk cannonade upon them, which they returned with equal vigor. The cannonade continued about half an hour, when Singleton fell back with his guns to the first line. Upon this the British, leaving their artillery behind, rushed forward toward the North Carolinans, who were lying behind the fence at the verge of the wood. The Carolinians allowed them to approach within a proper distance, and then began to fire. The British replied with one volley, and gallantly rushed forward to the charge. The North Carolinians displayed the deepest cowardice. They turned and fled in the direst confusion, although not a man had been injured by the enemy's fire. Their officers vainly endeavored to rally them; but like frightened sheep they darted through the woods, nor ceased their shameful flight until beyond the reach of danger. The dastardly conduct of the troops of the first line, was a death-blow to the fortune of the Americans on that day; but the remainder of the army did their duty well. General Stevens, with his gallant Virginians, made a noble stand. Opening his ranks to allow the fugitives to pass, he reclosed them, and received the charge of the British without flinching. A furious conflict ensued; but the Virginians were at length obliged to give way, and fell back upon the regular troops. The British left, under Lieutenant Colonel Webster, now advanced and assailed the American left. The Virginians under Stevens and Lawson supported on the right by Colonel Washington and his dragoons, maintained a bloody struggle with Webster's troops. Washington having sent Lynch's riflemen to attack Webster in flank, O'Hara, with the British grenadiers and the 2d battalion of Guards, advanced to Webster's support. The 33d regiment, by Webster's orders, wheeled upon Lynch; and O'Hara's troops appearing at the same moment, a combined bayonet charge was made against the whole Virginian line, breaking it and forcing it back. Webster pressed forward and fell fiercely upon the regular troops near the court-house. The Marylanders, supported by the Virginians under Howe, and Kirkwood's men of Delaware, maintained their ground valiantly. The struggle was fearful. At length the British troops recoiled before the furious assaults of the enemy, and Webster fell back across a ravine, where he awaited the arrival of the remainder of his line. In a few moments Lieutenant Colonel Stuart, with the first battalion of Guards, and two other corps, advanced and attacked the second Maryland regiment, under Colonel Ford. The Marylanders were supported by Captain Finley with two six-pounders. The second Maryland regiment, far from emulating the valor of the first, fell back at the very first charge of the enemy, leaving the two pieces of artillery in the hands of the British. Stuart pressed forward in pursuit of Ford's men, when Colonel Gunby, with his Continentals, turned upon him with the utmost fury. A bloody strife ensued. Lieutenant Colonel Washington at this moment came up with his cavalry and, impetuously charging the royalists, put them to flight, cutting most of them down, and recapturing the two pieces of cannon. Washington's charge was a bloody one. Like an avalanche that compact body of horse cut its way through the midst of the British, strewing the ground on every side with dead and dying. Deeds of personal valor and prowess were performed on that occasion, which are without parallel in history. One of Washington's troopers, Francisco, a gallant Virginian, cut down eleven men in succession with his broadsword.

One of the British Guards, with a bayonet thrust, transfixed Francisco's leg to his horse. The Virginian at first did not strike, but assisted the assailant in drawing forth the weapon; no sooner, however, was his limb released, than with lightning speed he brought down his terrible blade, and split the soldier's head in twain. And every man in that gallant band emulated the daring bravery of the Virginian. Stuart himself was slain by Captain Smith, of the first Maryland regiment; and the whole of his corps would have shared his fate, had not Cornwallis advanced from his post, on the Salisbury road, and covered their retreat by a brisk fire of artillery. The cannon-ball plowed through friends and foes, for the fire was directly in the face of the fugitives as well as of the pursuers; but it produced the desired effect. Washington's pursuit was checked, and with Howard he withdrew to the line of the continentals. Webster now recrossed the ravine and attacked the troops of Howe and Kirkwood. Another English regiment fell upon their left at the same time, and Colonel O'Hara, who, though seriously wounded, kept his saddle, succeeded in rallying the remnant of the Guards, and cemented the center between the left and right wings. All these movements were made so opportunely that Stuart's disaster was promptly repaired. The American regulars had to sustain, unsupported, the whole weight of the action, and Greene, convinced that there was no hope of success, and not wishing to risk the annihilation of his army, determined on a retreat before it was too late. Mean while the conflict on the British right, between the Hessians, under Bose, and the militia in the left wing of the American army, was maintained with various success; but at length Tarleton advanced to the support of the Hessians, and by one vigorous charge succeeded in breaking and dispersing the militia, who sought shelter in the wood. The main body of the American army retreated in good order. The 71st and 23d British regiments, with Tarleton's cavalry, commenced a pursuit; but they were soon recalled. Thus terminated the battle of Guilford Court-House. The battle lasted nearly two hours. The Americans lost, in killed, wounded, and missing, about 1,300. The British lost 600 killed and wounded. Four pieces of cannon fell into the hands of the royalists.

GUNDAMUCK, A.D. 1842.—Gundamuck, in Affghanistan, was, in the year 1842, the scene of a terrible massacre. The last survivors of the British army retiring from Cabool, were attacked and butchered by the Affghans. Only one man escaped. Ninety-nine soldiers and 300 camp-followers were slain in cold blood.

HAARLEM, A.D. 1572.—Haarlem, a city of the Netherlands, was besieged by the Spaniards, under Toledo, a son of the Duke of Alva, in the year 1572. The besieged made a most spirited resistance, and after holding out for seven months, were upon the point of making a desperate sortie, as a forlorn hope, when Alva offered them terms of capitulation. The Dutch accepted; but no sooner had the Spaniards entered the town than, regardless of the terms of capitulation, they commenced an indiscriminate slaughter of the inhabitants. Over 2,000 persons, including the Protestant ministers, the garrison, and many of the ministers, were either put to the sword or tied in couples, neck and heels, and thrown into the lake of Haarlem. Alva was probably instigated to these barbarities by the obstinate resistance with which his troops had met from the inhabitants. The Dutch had fought with such stubborn valor that, before the Spaniards gained by dishonor that which they could not win by force, they had lost over 10,000 men.

HALLE, A.D. 1806.—Halle, a town of Prussian Saxony, situated on the river Saale, 18 miles north-west of Leipsic, was, on the 17th of October, 1806, the scene of an obstinate battle between a body of the Prussians, 14,000 strong, commanded by the Duke of Wirtemberg, and the French troops, under Marshal Bernadotte. The battle resulted in the total defeat of the Prussians, who sustained a heavy loss in killed and wounded. Four thousand prisoners and thirty pieces of cannon fell into the hands of the victors, whose loss did not exceed 1,200 men.

HALLIDON HILL, A.D. 1333.—At Hallidon Hill, near Berwick, in Scotland, was fought, in the year 1333, a bloody battle by the Scots and English. The English army, under Edward III., had laid siege to the city of Berwick, which was defended by a strong garrison under Sir William Keith. Douglass, the regent of Scotland, had assembled a large army on the frontiers ready to penetrate into England; but being informed that the garrison at Berwick was reduced to such extremities, that it was about to capitulate, unless speedily succored, he hastily advanced with his army to the relief of that important fortress. He attacked the English at Hallidon Hill, a little north of Berwick; and though his heavy-armed cavalry dismounted in order to render the action more steady and desperate, they were received with such valor, by Edward, and were so galled by the English archers, that they were soon thrown into disorder. At the death of Douglass, their general, they were completely routed. The whole army fled in confusion; and the English gave little quarter in the pursuit. All the Scottish nobles were either slain or made prisoners; near 30,000 Scots fell in the action; while the loss of the English amounted only to 15 men, of whom there was 1 knight, 1 esquire, and 13 private soldiers; an inequality almost incredible.

HALYS, B.C. 585.—The Scythians, for the space of 28 years after expelling the Medes from the country, were masters of upper Asia. The Medes, determined to regain their lost possessions, invented a deadly scheme to destroy the Scythians. Under pretense of strengthening and cultivating the alliance they had made together, they invited the greater part of the Scythians to a general feast, which was made in every family. Each master of the feast made his guests drunk, and while in that condition they were massacred. The Medes then repossessed themselves of the provinces they had lost, and once more extended their empire to the banks of the river Halys. The remaining Scythians, who were not at the feast, fled into Lydia, to King Halyattes, who humanely received them. This occasioned a war between that prince and Cyaxares, King of the Medes. Many battles were fought, during the space of five years, with almost equal advantage on both sides. The battle which closed the war was fought in the sixth year, on the banks of the Halys, and was highly remarkable on account of an extraordinary event which happened during the struggle. While the battle was at its height, the combatants on both sides were terrified by a sudden eclipse of the sun, changing the brightness of day into the darkness of night, in one moment. Both parties considered this phenomenon a sign of the anger of the gods, and immediately dispersed and fled from the field. Shortly afterward peace was declared between the two nations.

HAMPTON, A.D. 1813.—On the 25th of May, 1813, 2,500 British troops, under Admiral Cockburn and General Beckwith, made a descent on Hampton, a small fishing town by Hampton Roads, in Virginia. The American riflemen and militia stationed there, made a brave resistance, but were finally obliged to retreat before superior numbers. The little town was then literally sacked. The houses of private citizens were rifled; churches were despoiled, and women violated in open day. England may well blush for the excesses and brutalities of her soldiers on this occasion.

HAMPTON'S DEFEAT, A.D. 1813.—Early on the 21st of October, 1813, General Hampton, with the American troops under his command, entered Canada at the junction of the Chateaugay and Outard rivers; but although he had 4,000 effective infantry, 2,000 militia, and 10 guns, he was so vigorously and gallantly resisted by the frontier light infantry of the Canadians, not 600 in number, under Colonel De Salabery, who fought with the steadiness of veteran soldiers in their woods, that after three days' desultory fighting, he was driven with disgrace back into the American territory, pursued and harassed by the Canadian militia.—Alison.

HANAU, A.D. 1813.—Hanau is situated on the river Kinzig, in Germany, near its junction with the Maine, eleven miles east of Frankfort. At this town, on the 30th of October, 1813, Napoleon, on his retreat from Leipsic, gained a decisive victory over a very superior force of Bavarians, and other allied troops under Wrede.

On the 15th of October, the Bavarian army, under Marshal Wrede, which was stationed at Braunau, opposite to the Austrian corps under the Prince of Reuss, joined itself to the latter force, and both united, set out in the direction of Frankfort on the Maine, for the purpose of impeding Napoleon's progress toward France. The whole allied army consisted of three divisions of Bavarian infantry, and two brigades of cavalry, of that state; and two divisions of Austrian infantry, and one of cavalry, in all numbering nearly 60,000 men. Wrede marched with such expedition that on the 27th he arrived at Aschaffenburg, where he established his head-quarters. Having detached 10,000 men to Frankfort, on the 29th he took post in the forest of Hanau, stationing his troops across the great road, and blocking up entirely the retreat of the French army to Mayence, where the army of the French emperor, on the road from Erfurth, was gradually approaching the Maine. It numbered in all about 80,000 combatants; but of these nearly 40,000 were stragglers of so far in the rear as to be of no value in the coming shock. Napoleon's artillery numbered only 200 pieces; but they were, for the most part, the artillery of the Guard, second to none in Europe for vigor and efficiency. The French soldiers were animated to a man with the utmost courage and resolution, for they panted with the desire to reach France, and they knew that they would be compelled to win every foot of soil at the sword's point. Wrede, stretching his line across the high-road, leading from Hanau to Frankfort and Mayence, completely stopped the way, and soon came into communication with the Cossacks of Chernicheff and Orloff Denizoff, who hovered around the outskirts of the French army. Having formed this junction, the Bavarian general arranged his troops in order of battle in front of the town. The right wing of his army rested on the Kinzig, and the left in echelon, on the road from Erfurth to Frankfort. Sixty pieces of cannon were planted in the center, between the bridge of Gelnhausen over the Kinzig, and the great road, to play on the advancing columns of the enemy, when they attempted to debouch from the forest of Lambroi. That great tract of wood extends for about six miles in breadth toward Erfurth, and is composed of old oaks of enormous size, whose aged stems sometimes rise out of close thickets of underwood, at others overshadow with their spreading boughs beautiful vistas of green sward, where numerous herds of swine feed on the acorns. The vanguard of the allied army was posted at Ruckingen, with orders to retire from that post, as soon as it was seriously attacked, and fall back to the main body of the army, which was drawn up across the great road in the plain which lies between the town of Hanau and the forest of Lamboi. The battle began on the forenoon of the 30th. The French columns, preceded by a cloud of tiralleurs, advanced in dense masses—the artillery following the great road, the light troops spread out in the thicket and green sward on either side—and soon a warm fire began in the forest. The dark recesses of the wood were illuminated by the frequent flashes of the musketry; the verdant alleys were hastily traversed by files of armed men, and the action began like a magnificent hunting party in the forest of Fontainebleau. Victor and Macdonald's corps, now reduced to 5,000 combatants, headed the advance, and with some difficulty made their way through the wood to the plain beyond it; but when they came there, and endeavored to deploy on its south-western skirts, they were crushed by the concentric fire of 70 pieces of cannon, which stood before the allied line, and for four hours the French army was unable to clear its way through the narrow plain which lay between the forest and the banks of the Kinzig. During this period, however, the guards and the main body of the French army had time to come up; and Napoleon immediately ordered a general attack on the enemy. General Curial, with two battalions of the Old Guard, dispersed as tiralleurs, were brought forward to the front, and began to engage the Bavarian sharp-shooters; the hardy veterans soon gained ground and won not only the issues of the forest, but part of the little plain, scattered with vales, which lay beyond; and to the space thus won the artillery of the Guard, under Drouot, was immediately brought forward. This admirable officer commenced his fire with 15 guns; but they were gradually augmented to 50, and soon acquired a decided superiority over the batteries of the enemy, whose artillery, though more numerous, returned the fire feebly. Under cover of Drouot's terrible fire, Nansoty and Sebastiani, debouched with the cavalry of the Guard, and by a vigorous charge overthrew every thing that was opposed to them. Wrede, seeing his danger, collected his cavalry, and the Bavarian horse and squares endeavored to rally behind Chernicheff's Cossacks; but the Russian dragoons were unable to withstand the thundering charges of the French cuirassiers, and the point-blank discharges of the Guard, and the whole left wing of the allies gave way and fled toward the river and the wood, and the road to Frankfort, open to the enemy. As a last resource the Bavarian general made an effort on his right; but Napoleon quickly pushed forward two battalions of the Old Guard, who arrested his advance; and Wrede despairing of success, withdrew the shattered remains of his army behind the Kinzig under the protection of the cannon at Hanau. During this vehement conflict Napoleon himself was exposed to imminent peril. He was walking backward and forward on the highway, near a bend which the road makes in the depths of the forest, conversing with Caulaincourt, when suddenly a bomb fell near them in a ditch bordering the highway. Caulaincourt instantly stepped between the emperor and the dangerous missile, and they continued their conversation as if nothing had happened. The attendants of the emperor hardly dared to breathe; but the bomb had sunk so deep in the ditch, that it was prevented from bursting.

Meanwhile fresh troops were continually coming up from the rear, and the recesses of the wood swarmed with soldiers, carriages, and cannon. On all sides the forest resounded with the echoes of the artillery; cannon-balls crashed through the gnarled branches of the oaks, and, when Wrede made his last desperate effort, the combatants appeared so near that their cries were distinctly heard, and the bullets whistled through the branches of the trees, agitating their tops as in a hurricane. The repulse of that attack opened the road to Frankfort. During the night after the battle, the French army defiled without intermission on the great road by Wilhelmstadt, whence it was moved by Hochstadt on Frankfort. Marmont, with a part of the army, was left before Hanau, in order to protect the march of the rear guard under Mortier, which was still on the other side of the forest. At two o'clock in the morning of the 31st, Marmont began to bombard the town of Hanau, and with such effect that it was speedily evacuated by the Austrian garrison, and immediately taken possession of by the French forces. Having secured this point d'appui, Marmont attacked the right wing of the allies posted behind the road to Aschaffenberg, with such vigor, that it was forced to give way, and thrown back in disorder on the Maine, where it must have inevitably been destroyed, if the Guards and cuirassiers of the French army had been at hand to support the advantage. They had, however, in the mean time, passed on toward Frankfort. Marmont, consequently, fell back toward Hanau. Wrede, stung to the quick by his recent disaster, followed Marmont hastily, and at the head of his troops assaulted the town. In the conflict which ensued Wrede was severely wounded, and his troops were driven back with great loss. The command of the allied army now fell upon General Tresnel, who, relinquishing all hope of inflicting further injury on the French army, withdrew his troops toward the Kinzig. Marmont then took up his march toward Frankfort, where he was joined the same night by Mortier with the rear guard. At the battle of Hanau, the allies lost 10,000 men, of whom 4,000 were prisoners. The French lost 4,000 men in killed and wounded. This victory completely opened the route of the French army to France.

HANGING-ROCK, A.D. 1780.—This battle derives its name from a peculiarly shaped rock in Kershaw District, South Carolina, near which it took place. It was fought on the 7th of August, 1780, between the British troops, under Colonel Brown, and the American militia under Sumter, and resulted in the defeat of the British. The Americans lost twelve killed and forty-one wounded. The British loss was considerably greater.

HARLEM PLAINS, A.D. 1776.—On the 16th of September, 1776, a British force came in collision with a body of Americans, at the mouth of a deep rocky gorge which extends from the southern extremity of Harlem Heights a little to the north of the city of New York. The conflict was brief but severe. The British were driven back across the plain; but Washington, fearing an ambush, ordered a retreat, and the Americans returned to their camp on Harlem Heights. The British lost in this affair eighteen killed and ninety wounded. The American loss was trifling. See battle of White Plains.

HASTINGS, A.D. 1066.—Hastings, celebrated in history as the spot near which was fought the decisive battle between the Normans and English, is a town of England in Sussex county, and is pleasantly situated in a vale, surrounded on every side, except toward the sea, by romantic hills and cliffs. On one of these hills are banks and trenches supposed to have been constructed by William the Norman, during his contest with Harold II.

On the 29th day of September, 1066, William, Duke of Normandy, arrived at Hastings with an army of disciplined veterans, and laid claim to the English crown. His forces consisted of 60,000 men, all equipped in the most warlike and splendid manner. No sooner had he landed in England than he sent back his fleet to Normandy, in order to leave no retreat for cowardice. Soon after his arrival at Hastings, he published a manifesto declaring the motives that induced him to undertake this enterprise. But Harold was resolved to defend his right to the crown, and to retain that sovereignty which he had received from the people, who only had a right to bestow it. His army was composed of active and valiant troops in high spirits, strongly attached to their king, and eager for battle. William's troops on the other hand, consisted of all the flower of the continent, and had been long inured to danger. The men of Bretagne, Boulogne, Flanders, Poictou, Maine, Orleans, France and Normandy, were all voluntarily united under his command. England never before saw two such armies drawn up to dispute its crown.

The day before the battle, William sent an offer to Harold to decide the quarrel between them by single combat, and thus to spare the blood of thousands; but Harold refused, and said he would leave it to the God of armies to determine. Both armies, therefore, that night, pitched their camps in sight of each other, expecting the dawning of the next day with impatience. The English spent the night in riot, jollity, and disorder, the Normans in devotion and prayer. The next morning, at seven o'clock, the duke called together the most considerable of his commanders, and made them a speech suitable to the occasion. He represented to them that the event which they and he had long wished for was approaching: the whole fortune of war depended on their swords, and would be decided in a single action; that never army had greater motives for exerting a vigorous courage, whether they considered the prize which would attend their victory, or the inevitable destruction which must ensue upon their discomfiture. William next divided his army into three lines: the first, led by Montgomery, consisted of archers and light-armed infantry; the second, commanded by Martel, was composed of his bravest battalions, heavy-armed, and ranged in close order; his cavalry, at whose head he placed himself, formed the third line, and were so disposed that they stretched beyond the infantry, and flanked each wing of the army. He ordered the signal of battle to be given; and the whole army moving at once, and singing the song of Roland, one of Charlemagne's bravest knights, the Normans advanced rapidly and orderly toward the enemy.

Harold had taken advantage of a rising ground, and, having likewise drawn some trenches to secure his flanks, he resolved to stand upon the defensive, and to avoid all action with the cavalry, in which he was inferior. The men of Kent were placed in the van; a post which they always claimed as their due: the Londoners guarded the standard; and the king himself, accompanied by his two valiant brothers, Gurth and Leofwin, dismounting, placed himself at the head of his infantry, and expressed his resolution to conquer or to perish in the action. The Normans began the fight with their cross-bows, which, at first, galled and surprised the English, upon whose close ranks the arrows did great execution. But soon they came to close fight, and the English, with their bills, hewed down their adversaries with great slaughter. Confusion was spreading among the Norman ranks, when William, who found himself on the brink of destruction, hastened with a chosen band to the relief of his forces. His presence restored the suspense of battle: he was seen in every place, endeavoring to pierce the ranks of the enemy, and had three horses slain under him. At length, perceiving that the English line continued impenetrable, he pretended to give ground; which, as he expected, drew the enemy from their ranks, and he was instantly ready to take advantage of their disorder. Upon a signal given, the Normans at once returned to the charge, with greater fury than before; they broke the English troops, and pursued them to a rising ground. Now Harold flew from rank to rank, exhorting, entreating, and threatening his troops, and although he had toiled all day, till near night-fall, in the front of his Kentish men, yet he still seemed unabated in force or courage, keeping his men to the post of honor. Once more, therefore, the victory seemed to turn against the Normans; and they fell in great numbers; so that the fierceness of this memorable battle was often renewed by the courage of the leaders, whenever that of the soldiers began to slacken. Fortune at length determined a victory that valor was unable to decide. Harold, while making a furious onset at the head of his troops, against the Norman heavy-armed men, was shot in the brain by an arrow; and his two valiant brothers, fighting by his side, shared the same fate. He fell with his sword in his hand, amid heaps of the slain, and, after the battle, the royal corpse could hardly be distinguished among the dead. From the moment of his death all courage seemed to forsake the English; they gave ground on every side, and were pursued with great slaughter by the victorious Normans. Thus, after a battle which was fought from early morning till sunset, the invaders proved successful, and the English crown became the conqueror's reward. Fifteen thousand Normans were slain in this battle. The English loss was somewhat greater, beside the death of the king and his two brothers. The day after the battle, the dead body of Harold was brought to William and generously restored, without ransom, to his mother. The Norman army left not the field of battle without giving thanks to heaven, in the most solemn manner, for their victory: William, having refreshed his troops, prepared to push to the utmost his advantage against the divided, dismayed, and discomfited English. The battle of Hastings was fought on the 14th day of October, 1066, and ended the Saxon monarchy in England, which had continued for more than 600 years. England, by this defeat of Harold, became subject to the Norman yoke; and after his victory, a list was taken of William's chiefs, amounting to 629, and called the "Battel Roll;" and among these chiefs the lands and distinctions of the followers of the defeated Harold were distributed.

HAW, A.D. 1781.—This battle was fought between the American patriots, under Colonel Lee, and the royalists, under Colonel Pyle, on the 25th of February, 1781, near the river Haw, in North Carolina, two miles east of the Allamance, in Orange county, and resulted in the total defeat of the loyalists. The battle was of brief duration. Ninety loyalists were slain, and their commander severely wounded. The Americans did not lose a single man.

HEIDELBERG, A.D. 1622.—Heidelberg, a city of west Germany, has suffered severely from hostile assaults. In 1622, it was bombarded for a month, by the troops of the monster Tilly, who took it finally by storm, and gave his ferocious soldiers a three-days' license to pillage and destroy. The most abominable atrocities were committed. In 1688, the city was besieged by the French, under General Melac, acting under orders of Louis XIV.; they took the town and burned it, and, with a ferocity equal to that of Tilly, Melac allowed his soldiers to perform deeds of the utmost cruelty and brutality upon the persons and property of the inhabitants. In 1693, it was again taken by the French, and the cruelties practiced upon the unfortunate inhabitants exceeded, if possible, all former atrocities. Our space limits us to a mere mention of these circumstances.

HEILSBERG, A.D. 1807.—Heilsberg is situated on the Alle, in east Prussia, forty-one miles south-east of Königsberg.

On the 9th of June, 1807, the Russian army, after crossing the river Alle, and destroying the bridges, safely intrenched themselves at Heilsberg, under cover of the most formidable fieldworks. Napoleon debated a long time before deciding upon the course of attack to pursue in regard to this large force of Russians. At length it was concluded to attack them in front, and on the 10th of June preparations were made to that effect. A division was to make a front assault upon the camp, while Davoust and Mortier moved forward on the French left, to turn the right flank of the enemy, and threaten their communication with Königsberg, where the latter had their ammunition. The cavalry of Murat led the advance against the Russian intrenchments, which were about ten miles from them; bridges were hastily thrown over the river Alle, at various points; the corps of Soult, Lannes, Ney, and the infantry of the Guard, followed immediately after, on both sides of the river, to Heilsberg. The situation of Heilsberg was one of too much importance to be relinquished by Napoleon without a struggle. It was situated on a cluster of heights on both banks of the river Alle, of which the town covered a part; it commanded the roads of Wormditt, Mohlsack, and Landsberg, which intersected each other within the camp, and thus blocked up the access to Eylau and Königsberg. The Russian line might be considered unassailable as long as they held this position, and kept the course of the lower passage toward Braunsberg. But as soon as they were driven from the latter ground, their advantage was at end, as they were cut off from their dépôts of ammunition and supplies. Their weakest point was the side on the left bank of the Alle, which was connected with the redoubt by four bridges. Here were assembled nearly 80,000 men, under cover of more than 500 pieces of cannon, in nine divisions, of which seven, under the Grand Duke Constantine, occupied the left bank of the river, and two, under Prince Gortchakoff, the right bank; while Kamenskoi was stationed in the redoubts which covered the front of the position. Napoleon on his left pushed General Dulaulay forward with forty pieces of cannon, and by the strength of his fire the enemy were weakened in some degree. The divisions of St. Cyr and Legrand, part of Soult's corps, with Murat's cavalry, advanced, about seven in the evening, by the villages of Sandem, Langwiesse, and Benermeken, to the attack of the enemy's redoubts on the right bank of the river. These gallant men, as soon as they left the shelter of the ravine which had afforded them protection from the fire of the enemy, rushed forward with such fury that, in the first attack, the principal redoubt of the Russians was carried, with all the guns which it contained; while St. Hilaire, with his division, penetrated between that intrenchment and the neighboring works. The moment was one of importance, and the slightest wavering would have exposed the Russians to total ruin; but the men under Benningsen were equal to any emergency. The right wing of Prince Gortchakoff were ordered to charge instantly; and, with fixed bayonets, they rushed upon the two regiments which had taken possession of the redoubt, nearly destroyed them, and captured their eagles.

Following up their success, the Russians burst out upon the plain between the woods and redoubts, and forced the division of Soult to give ground. With the steadiness of discipline, however, they retired in hollow square by echelon, which threw an incessant rolling fire upon their pursurers; the approach of night gave the moving citadels the appearance of being surrounded by flame, while the intrenchments seemed a line of volcanoes in tremendous eruption. The retreat of St. Cyr and Legrand obliged St. Hilaire, who had penetrated to the foot of the redoubt, also to retire. Savary, with two regiments of the Guard, and twelve guns, came up to cover his retreat, and was also surrounded. The French retired to the cover of the woods, and narrowly escaped being made prisoners by the allied army, and the Russians were again withdrawn into their intrenchments.

The incessant cannonade now ceased, and the cries of the wounded in the plain at the foot of the intrenchments, could be heard above the declining roar of the musketry. Information was received from a French deserter, at eleven o'clock at night, that preparations were making for a fresh attack. The Russians had hardly completed their arrangements, when, by the faint light of the evening, dark masses of the enemy were discerned, issuing from the woods, and advancing rapidly across the plain which divided them from the redoubt. Instantaneously the batteries opened upon them; they staggered under the discharge, but pressed on, without firing a shot; but when they came within reach of the musketry, the fire was so vehement that the heads of the columns were entirely cut off, and the remainder driven back with terrible loss. At length, at midnight, after fighting for twelve hours, the firing stopped, and in the narrow plain which divided the two armies, nothing could be heard but the groans of the wounded, who, hearing the battle would be renewed on the next day, were begging to be removed, or imploring death to put an end to their sufferings. A rain storm, in the early part of the night, diminished the suffering of hosts of wounded of both parties, who lay mingled together on the plain. The Russians expected the attack would be renewed with the first approach of day, and accordingly stood to their arms; but the morning passed without any movement on the part of the French. As the light broke, the French were seen on the skirts of the wood in order of battle, but not on their well-appointed battalions and squadrons did the eye rest. A frightful spectacle lay between the two armies; the space, about a quarter of a mile broad, and a mile in length, presented a sheet of naked human bodies, most of them dead, though the motions of a few showed that life was not yet extinct. 6,000 bodies were lying as close as they had stood in the ranks; during the night they had been stripped of every article of clothing by the camp followers of both parties, and were ghastly pale, or purple with the blood which still flowed from their wounds. By common consent, the interval of hostilities was employed in removing the wounded and burying the dead.

Napoleon was disconcerted by this result of the action. The Russians still held their intrenchments; twelve thousand French had fallen around the redoubts, without having gained one of them; the ditches were filled with dead bodies, but none had been crossed. The Russians had lost 8,000 killed and wounded, and their loss was greater than the French, in proportion to the relative strength of their army. Napoleon knew too well the strength of the enemy's position to venture to renew the attack; he therefore resolved to compel them to evacuate it by assailing their flank. Taking advantage of the arrival of Marshal Davoust's corps, he pushed it forward at noon, on the Landsberg road, toward Eylau and Königsberg. This alarmed Benningsen, yet he was not afraid of being forced in his intrenched position, but feared being cut off from his supplies at Königsberg, for on them the army depended for daily sustenance. During this time, an order of Napoleon to Victor was intercepted, commanding him to attack Lestocq and the right wing of the allies at all points, and push to Königsberg. Benningsen, seeing the intentions of the French general clearly, gave orders to retreat. At nightfall the intrenched position was evacuated, and after marching all the night of the 11th, they established themselves at daybreak in a position in front of Bartenstein, and the head-quarters were transferred to that place. Though a great part of their operations were performed in sight of the enemy, such was the awe inspired by the battle of Heilsberg, that the French troops did not oppose their retreat.

HELIOPOLIS, A.D. 1800.—Matarecyeh, an insignificant village of Lower Egypt, now occupies the site of the ancient city of Heliopolis, the city of the sun.

Kleber, who, in the year 1800, was commander of the European forces left in Egypt by Napoleon, had collected the scattered troops in one body, numbering some 12,000. On the night of the 19th of March, he drew up his army by moonlight, in four squares, in a plain in front of the ruins of Heliopolis. In front were stationed the four squares, with artillery at the angles, and the cavalry at the intervals. The corners were doubled by companies of grenadiers, who were ready to be employed either in resisting an attack, or offensive movement. Every thing was conducted in the most quiet manner; the solemnity of the occasion had subdued the usual enthusiasm of the French army; they seemed to feel that they must conquer or die. The Turks were encamped in the usual manner in confused masses, in the vicinity of El-Hanku. Six thousand janizaries lay in the village of Matarecyeh, where they had thrown up some rude fortifications; their troops of horse, with the mamelukes of Abrahim Bey, extended on the right of that advanced guard as far as the banks of the Nile. Their whole force amounted to nearly 50,000 men; but upon more than half of them no reliance could be placed, and the situation of the regular corps in the village of Matarecyeh gave rise to a hope that they might be cut off before the remainder of the army could come to their support. Accordingly, General Friant advanced before daylight directly toward that village, while Regnier, with his divisions, moved forward in front of Heliopolis, to cut off communications between the detached forces and the main army of the Turks. As soon as the janizaries found that the enemy were approaching, they made a sally with their cimeters in their hands, and commenced a furious attack on the French squares. But their valor could not effect much against the steadiness and discipline of the European army. They were received in front with a terrible fire, and at the same time charged in flank, while disordered by their rush forward. In a few minutes they were mown down, the ditches filled by the wounded, and the French grenadiers pressed forward over the mass of dead and dying, and scaled the works. The camp of the janizaries was immediately carried; all their ammunition, cannon, and tents fell into the hands of the victorious party; and the few who fled toward the main army were cut down by the charges of the French cavalry. The grand vizier, as soon as he found that his advanced guard was cut off in such a manner, moved forward with his whole army, determined to avenge their loss. The French were resting from the fatigues of their first battle, when they discovered a cloud of dust in the east. It was the Ottoman army, still 40,000 strong, approaching to trample under the feet of their horses the small band which had the presumption to await their charge. In a moment the French formed in order of battle; the troops were again drawn up in squares, Friant on the left, Regnier on the right; the cannon filled the intervals between the masses; the cavalry was immediately in the rear, to break through the first favorable opportunity. The cannonade was soon extremely warm on both sides, but the balls of the Ottomans, owing to their ill direction, passed over the heads of the republicans, while the fire of the latter was fast dismounting their artillery, and even the staff of the grand vizier was nearly cut off by the furious tempest of bombs. Cut to pieces by the hail of bullets, the Turks prepared for a general charge. The concentration of standards along the whole line gave warning to the French; the sky was filled with dust; the earth shook as if by an earthquake, and 20,000 horsemen, at full gallop, rushed upon them. But nothing could break the firm array of the republicans. The enemy were received with a terrible discharge of grape-shot; their front rank nearly all fell under the fatal fire; the rear turned around and fled, and in a few moments the splendid array had disappeared, without even the firing of a single musket by the French infantry. The vizier rallied his troops, and again brought them up to the assault, but they could not break through the flaming citadels and terrible fires of the French. Every ball took effect, and in a short time the carnage became intolerable, and the Ottomans fled in terrible confusion toward the desert. Kleber, following them, advanced rapidly to El-Hanku; the Turks fled the moment the French came in sight; the whole army pressed forward, and before night, were in entire possession of the Ottoman camp, reposing in their tents amid all the luxury and magnificence of the East.

HEMMINGSTED, A.D. 1500.—In the year 1500 a battle was fought near Hemmingsted, a village of Denmark, between the inhabitants of the Ditmarshes and the army of the King of Denmark and the Duke of Holstein. The royal army consisted of 30,000 men, while that of the opponents was a mere handful of men; yet this little band, raw and undisciplined, attacked the army of the duke, which seemed able to crush them by its very weight, with such impetuous valor, that the royal army was thrown into confusion and forced to fly, with great loss. This victory secured to the gallant conquerors their ancient liberties for fifty years afterward.

HEXHAM, A.D. 1464.—Near the town of Hexham, in Northumberland, England, a decisive battle was fought on the 14th of May, 1464, by the Lancasterians and the Yorkists, in which the latter were defeated and put to flight. The Duke of Somerset, Lords Ross and Hungerford, were taken in the pursuit, and immediately beheaded by martial law, at Hexham. Other noblemen were in like manner executed at Newcastle. All those who were spared in the field, suffered on the scaffold.

HOBKIRK'S HILL, A.D. 1781.—Hobkirk's Hill, is a high ridge overlooking the plains of Camden, about a mile from the city of Camden, in Kershaw District, S. C.

In the early part of the month of April, 1781, the British army, under Lord Rawdon, was in occupation of Camden; and General Greene, with the American army, was marching from the scene of his recent defeat at Guilford Court-House, toward Camden. On the 19th of April, Greene descended the slopes of Hobkirk's Hill, and encamped at Logtown, within a half a mile of the city. The British army consisted of about 900 men; that of the Americans numbered 1,500. The British, however, had fortified their position so strongly, that they did not fear an attack on the place. Greene perceiving that with his small force it would be folly to endeavor to dislodge the enemy, withdrew his army from Logtown, and incamped at Hobkirk's Hill. The American position was strong. Their front between the height and Camden was covered by a thick wood, and their left and rear by an impracticable marsh. Confident in the strength of their position, the Americans took but little care to guard against a surprise; and Lord Rawdon, who caused them to be watched attentively, and learning that they had removed their artillery to some distance in their rear, resolved to attack them. Urgent circumstances compelled him to make this bold movement. His provisions were nearly exhausted, and he knew that the Americans were suspending their attack until such reinforcements should arrive, as would insure success. Having armed the musicians, drummers, and every man in his army that was able to bear a musket, on the 25th of April he marched out of the city, and advanced toward Hobkirk's Hill. Unable to force his way through the wood, or marsh, he inclined his march to the right, toward Pine-tree creek, a small stream which rises near Hobkirk's Hill, and by making a large circuit, turned the swamp, and came down suddenly upon the left flank of the American line. The patriots were taken by surprise. Ignorant of the approaching danger, they were employed in the various avocations of camp life; some washing their clothes, and others cooking their morning meal. General Greene and his officers were leisurely taking breakfast. The horses of Colonel Washington's cavalry were unsaddled, and many of the troops were reclining under the shade of the trees. It was a clear, warm morning, and the American camp presented a scene of tranquillity and ease. Suddenly the camp was aroused by the firing of their pickets, which were posted at about a quarter of a mile from the camp. They had discovered the approach of the British, and gallantly received and returned the fire of the British van, and held them in check while Greene formed his men for battle. The artillery corps, fortunately for the Americans, had returned to the camp with their pieces, that morning. Greene's plan of attack was soon formed. Observing that the British marched in very close order, he resolved to fall upon their two flanks. The right wing of the American line consisted of the Virginia brigade, under Brigadier Huger, and Lieutenant Colonels Campbell and Hawes; the left of the Maryland brigade, under Colonels Williams, Gunby, Ford, and Howard. The center was occupied by the artillery under Colonel Harrison. Washington's cavalry, and a corps of 250 North Carolina militia, under Colonel Reade, acted as a reserve.

The British steadily advanced in close order, driving the American pickets before them. As they slowly moved up the slope, Ford was ordered to attack their left flank, Colonel Campbell to assail their right, and Gunby, with the first Maryland regiment, to make an assault in front. Colonel Washington was ordered to turn the right flank of the enemy and attack them in the rear. The battle soon commenced. Rawdon extended his front, and received the assaults of the enemy with firmness. At length the British troops began to waver before the impetuous charges of the Americans. Their confusion was increased by a violent fire of grape-shot from the American artillery; and for a time victory seemed to have decided in favor of the Americans; but at this critical moment, Rawdon pushed forward his reserve which consisted of a battalion of Irish volunteers and some other troops. The battle now raged furiously. The two Virginian regiments, led by General Greene in person, fought with the utmost gallantry. The action became exceedingly warm, and victory seemed hung in a balance. Like two contending seas the two armies swayed back and forth, the British now driving the patriots before them, and now in turn receding before the impetuous valor of the Americans. At length the second Maryland regiment was charged so furiously by the enemy that it broke and fell into disorder. Gunby, their commander, was slain; and in spite of the efforts of their officers, the Marylanders fled in wild confusion. In his endeavor to rally his troops Colonel Ford fell mortally wounded. The British followed up this success vigorously, and the Americans, disheartened by the defeat of the Maryland regiment, retreated in one mass. Greene conducted the retreat skillfully; the British pursued fiercely. Meanwhile Washington, with his gallant troopers, had nobly performed his work. Having gained the rear of the enemy, he dashed with his men into the enemy, cutting them down on all sides and capturing a number of prisoners. But when he saw that Greene was in full retreat, he thought proper to follow him. A part of the prisoners escaped; but he retained fifty, and pushed forward to rejoin the main body of the army. The action was not fairly over till about four o'clock in the afternoon; the Americans had then retreated four or five miles closely pursued by parties of the enemy. Washington at this moment fiercely turned upon the pursuers, and by one vigorous charge dispersed them with a loss of nine men killed.

This ended the battle. The British re-entered Camden; and Greene encamped on the north side of Sander's creek, about five miles from Hobkirk, where he remained several days to collect the fugitives and reorganize the army. The Americans lost in killed, wounded, and missing, 266; the British 258; Greene's loss in killed was but eighteen; and of Rawdon's troops only thirty-eight were slain. This small number is remarkable when we consider the number of troops engaged, and the warmth of the action.

HOCHKIRCHEN, A.D. 1758.—The battle of Hochkirchen was fought on the 14th of October, 1758, by the Prussian army, commanded by Frederic II., and the Austrians, under Count Daun. The Prussian army was surprised in its camp, and totally defeated by the Austrians. Hochkirchen is in Saxony.

HOCHSTADT, A.D. 1704.—The battle of Blenheim, fought in the vicinity of Hochstadt, in Bavaria, is called by the Germans and French, the battle of Hochstadt.

HOHENLINDEN, A.D. 1800.—This village, famous on account of the great conflict which took place in its vicinity on the 3d of December, 1800, is situated twenty miles east of the city of Munich, in Upper Bavaria. The battle was fought by the Austrians under the Archduke John, and the French under General Moreau. Between the rivers Iser and Inn lies a space of ground about fifteen leagues in breadth. The center of this space is occupied by the forest of Hohenlinden. This forest, composed almost entirely of pine trees growing close and thick, is seven leagues long, and one league and a half broad. Two great roads only traverse these thick and gloomy woods, that from Munich to Wasserbourg; and that from Munich to Muhldorf. The village of Hohenlinden stands at the entrance of the road to Wasserbourg, on the Munich side of the forest; and that of Matenpot is at the mouth of the other road leading to Muhldorf. Between these two roads the irregular and broken surface of the forest is traversed only by country paths, almost impracticable during the storms of winter, even to foot travelers.

With his staff, Moreau had carefully reconnoitered this ground; and as soon as it became evident that the Austrian army was to advance through its dangerous defiles, he prepared, with the art of a skillful general, to turn it to the best account. He rapidly concentrated his forces in the plain at the entrance of the defiles, on the Munich side of the forest, and at the same time sent a division under Richepanse, through the forest, with orders to fall perpendicularly on the line of the great road from Hohenlinden to Muhldorf. This movement, he thought, would bring him on the flank of the Austrian center, when entangled in the defile with its long train of artillery and chariots; and that, if the French force at the entrance of that road, could only maintain its ground till this side attack took place, the ruin of the whole column, or at least the capture of all its cannon would be inevitable. To effect this object, he concentrated all the forces he could command at the mouth of the road of Hohenlinden. Early in the morning the Austrian army, on the opposite side of the woods, plunged in three columns into the forest to approach the enemy. The center, 40,000 strong, advanced by the great road from Muhldorf to Munich.

This was the only road that was practicable, in the dreadful state of the weather, for artillery; and the movement of the column was encumbered by above 100 pieces of cannon and 500 chariots. The infantry marched first; then came the long train of artillery and baggage-wagons, and the cavalry closed the procession. The right wing under the command of General Latour, consisting of 25,000 men, marched along the inferior road leading from Wasserbourg to Munich; Keinmayer moved on the flank of that column, with his light troop through the forest; while the left wing, under Riesch crossed the forest, by a small path leading by Albichen, to St. Christophe. The ground was covered with snow, and the soldiers trod its yet unstained surface, with light hearts, anticipating an easy victory over an enemy whom they deemed in full retreat before them. As they advanced, snow commenced falling with such rapidity that it was impossible to see twenty yards before the heads of the columns, while the dreary expanse of the forest presented under the trees a uniform white surface, on which it was impossible to distinguish the track. The central column, which advanced along the only good road, outstripped the other, and its head had traversed the forest, and approached Hohenlinden about nine o'clock in the morning. Here it was met by the division of Grouchy, and a furious conflict immediately commenced; the Austrians endeavoring to debouch from the defile and extend themselves along the front of the wood, the French to baffle their movements and drive them back into the forest. Both parties fought with determined valor, the snow falling thick and fast, obscured the atmosphere so that neither of the hostile lines could see each other; but aiming at the flashes which appeared through the gloom, they fired incessant volleys, and then with blind fury rushed forward to the dreadful charge of the bayonet. The Austrians, after an obstinate struggle, were gradually driven back into the forest; their ranks were broken by the trees, but posting themselves behind the trunks, they kept up a murderous fire on the enemy. The French eagerly charging upon the retiring enemy, were also broken by the trees, and the contending armies fought man to man, with obstinate fury. In the mean time the head of the Austrian column on the right appeared at the entrance of the forest on the other road. Ney's division instantly advanced to this point, and by a vigorous charge on the flank of the enemy's column, which was in the act of deploying, not only drove it back into the forest, but captured a thousand prisoners, and eight pieces of cannon. These vigorous attacks on the heads of the Austrian columns, soon threw the long train in their center into disorder. The combat in front compelled it to halt, and the crowd in its rear pressed it forward, until it was soon in a state of complete confusion. The soldiers jammed up between long files of cannon and wagons pushed forward by those in the rear, and pressed back by those in front, swayed backward and forward without power either to advance or retire. They were in this state, when the division of Richepanse, who had struggled on with invincible resolution through dreadful roads across the forest, arrived on the Muhldorf side of the wood, directly in rear of the Austrian center. But as Richepanse approached the decisive point, and was slowly advancing in open column through the forest, his division was pierced through the center, near St. Christophe, by the Austrian left wing, under Riesch, which moving up by the valley of Albichen to gain the road of Wasserbourg, by which it was destined to pierce through the forest, fell perpendicularly on its line of march. Richepanse thus with half of his division found himself irretrievably separated from the remainder; the maneuver which he was destined to have performed on the center of the Austrians, was turned against himself, and with a single brigade he was placed between that immense body and their left wing. But undaunted by the alarming circumstance, Richepanse, pushed bravely on with his troops, to fall on the rear of the grand column of the enemy. Having dispatched orders to his separated brigade to maintain itself to the last extremity, at St. Christophe, he bravely advanced toward Matenpot, and the line of march of the grand Austrian column. As the troops approached the great road they came upon the Austrian cuirassiers under Lichtenstein, who formed part of the central column. They had dismounted and were reposing leisurely under the trees until the great park of artillery, and the reserves of Kollowrath, had passed the defile. Their astonishment at beholding this new enemy was unbounded; they had deemed themselves perfectly secure on that side, as they knew that their left wing, under Riesch, had passed through that part of the forest. The French attacked them at once; and soon drove them off the road. After this success, Richepanse, leaving his cavalry, to keep off the Austrian cuirassiers, advanced with the two remaining regiments of infantry to attack the rear of the Austrian center in the forest of Hohenlinden. The sudden appearance of this force, amounting to nearly 3,000 men, behind them, excited the utmost alarm in the Austrian column. A brigade of the Bavarian reserve was speedily directed to the menaced point, but it was overwhelmed in its advance, by the crowds of fugitives, and thrown into such disorder by the overturned cannon and caissons which blocked up the road that it never reached the enemy. The Hungarian regiments were next brought up; but they were attacked by the French with such impetuosity that they were soon broken and put to flight. Consternation and disorder prevailed throughout the entire length of the column.

The sound of cannon in the direction of Matenpot, and the appearance of hesitation and confusion in the enemy's column, announced to Moreau, who was still maintaining an obstinate conflict at the entrance of the defile, in front of Hohenlinden, that Richepanse had made a decisive attack on the rear of the Austrian center. He instantly ordered Grouchy and Ney to make a combined charge in front on the enemy. The French battalions now commenced a furious onset; and the Austrian center, shaken by the alarm in its rear, was violently assailed in front. Ney, at the head of his grenadiers, pressed forward upon the enemy, scattering them in every direction before him, until the shouts of the troops announced that they had joined the victorious Richepanse, who was advancing along the same road to meet him, as fast as its innumerable incumbrances would permit. The Austrian column was thrown into the utmost confusion. The artillery drivers cut their traces and galloped in all directions into the forest; the infantry disbanded and fled; the cavalry in tumultuous masses rushed to the rear, trampling under foot whatever opposed their passage; the wagons were abandoned to fate, and amid the general wreck, 97 pieces of cannon, 300 caissons, and 7,000 prisoners, fell into the hands of the French. Meanwhile the Austrian right, under Latour, and Keinmayer, who had succeeded in debouching from the forest and uniting in the plain, violently assailed the French left, where Grenier, with inferior forces, defended the other road to Munich. An obstinate conflict ensued, and the French were gradually losing ground, when the intelligence of the defeat of the center reached the enemy, and compelled them to retire precipitately into the forest. Grenier instantly ordered a general charge of all his forces. Animated by the success of their center and right, the French troops rushed impetuously to the charge. The Austrians, struggling in the defile, were overwhelmed and put to flight, leaving six pieces of cannon and 1,500 prisoners in the possession of the enemy. At the same time General Decaen, with a fresh brigade, disengaged the half of Richepanse's division, cut off during his absence, which was hard pressed between General Riesch's corps and the retiring columns of the Austrian center. Before dark, the French at all points had crossed the forest. Four of their divisions were assembled at Matenpot, and the head-quarters were advanced to Haag; while the Austrians took advantage of the night to withdraw their shattered forces across the Inn.

Thus ended this great battle, which Mr. Campbell has immortalized in his noble Ode to Hohenlinden.* The Austrians lost 10,000 men, in killed and wounded, and nearly the same number taken prisoners, together with 100 pieces of cannon, and 500 wagons loaded with ammunition and provisions. The French loss amounted to 5,000 in killed and wounded.

HORATII AND CURIATII, The Combat of the—B.C. 669.—Eighty-two years after the building of Rome, Tullus Hostilius was elected to the Roman throne. Tullus was even more warlike in his disposition than the great Romulus himself. Therefore no sooner had he arisen to the throne, than he sought on all sides for an opportunity of stirring up a war. It happened that some Roman and Alban peasants had committed mutual depredations on each other's lands. This incident Tullus seized upon as a favorable pretext, and shortly afterward war was declared between the two parties. It might almost be called a civil war, as it was to be waged, in a manner, between parents and children, for both parties derived their origin from Troy. Lavinium owed its existence to Troy; from Lavinium sprung Alba, and the Romans were descendants of the race of the Alban kings. The Albans, with a large army, invaded the Roman territories, and threw up intrenchments within five miles of the city. The Romans, impatient for action, marched past the Alban camp in the night time, into the enemies' territories. This procedure caused the Alban leader, Mettius, to abandon his intrenched camp, and to march toward the Roman army by the shortest route. When he had arrived within sight of the enemy, he sent a message to Tullus, requesting a personal interview before the battle; which request was granted. Both armies were now drawn up in order of battle, and the two generals, attended by their principal officers, advanced to the open space between the two lines. At this interview it was decided that, as their mutual enemies, the Etrurians, possessed formidable power, in the neighborhood of both Rome and Alba, and that they would enjoy the sight of the two armies engaged in a battle as they would a show, and would undoubtedly attack both the victors and the vanquished together when they should see them thinned and fatigued by the battle, some measure should be devised whereby the difference of the two nations might be decided without great loss or much bloodshed on either side. Now it happened that in each army there were three twin brothers, equally matched in point of age, strength, and valor. Their names were Horatius and Curiatius. The Horatii, according to most authors, were Romans, and the Curiatii, Albans. Upon this point, however, there remains a doubt. To these three brothers, on each side, the kings proposed that they should support by their arms, the honor of their respective nations, informing them that the sovereignty was to be enjoyed by that country whose champions should prove victorious. They eagerly accepted the proposal, and the time and place were appointed.

A league was then made between the Romans and Albans, on these conditions: that whichever of the two nations should, by its champions, obtain a victory in the combat, that nation should, without further dispute, possess sovereign dominion over the other. Upon the conclusion of the league, the three brothers on each side took arms. Their friends exhorted them to conduct themselves valorously in the coming contest, and naturally bold and courageous, and animated to the highest pitch by the words of their countrymen, they advanced into the midst between the two armies. Both armies sat down before their respective camps, deeply anxious as to the result of the combat. The signal for combat was given and the three youths, who had been drawn up on both sides as in battle array, rushed forward to the fight, their breasts animated with the bravery and magnanimity of whole armies. Utterly thoughtless of their own personal danger, they were intent only on mutual slaughter. They knew that on the issue of the contest depended the future fate and fortune of their respective countries. They met, and the spectators shuddered when would lead one to suppose that the Iser was in sight, or at least near the field, whereas it is twenty miles distant. The city of Munich stands on the banks of the river Iser.

* The beautiful verses of Campbell:

"And dark as winter was the flow Of Iser rolling rapidly,"

they saw their glittering swords and heard the clash of their arms. In the deepest anxiety the two armies awaited the result in breathless silence. Both were filled alike with hope and fear. The combatants fought with desperate courage. At length two of the Romans fell lifeless to the ground. The three Albans were severely wounded, while the remaining Roman was unhurt. On the fall of the two Roman brothers, the Alban army set up a shout of joy which sent a thrill of despair to the hearts of the Romans. The Roman champion was now surrounded by his three enemies. Although he was by no means able to cope with them collectively, yet he was confident of success, against each taken single. And now a groan escaped from the Roman legions; their champion was flying. The Alban brothers pursued him, and by so doing separated one from another, for their wounds caused them to run at different degrees of speed. The Roman quickly perceived this, and turning back, furiously attacked the foremost of his enemies, and, while the Alban army called out to the others to succor their brother, he slew him, and then rushed on against his second adversary. Before the third could come up to the relief of his brother the Roman dispatched him, and now, amid the triumphant shouts of his army, he fiercely fell upon his only remaining antagonist. "Two of you," cried he, "I have slain to appease the manes of my dead brothers; yourself I will offer to the cause for which we fight." The Alban, almost disabled by his wounds, and fatigued with running, as well as dispirited by the fall of his two brothers, could scarcely sustain the weight of his armor, and met the attack of his victorious enemy with but little resistance. The Roman champion plunged his sword downward into the throat of his foe, who fell dead to the earth. The victor now dispoiled his vanquished adversaries of their armor, and returned into the Roman camp, where he was received with triumphant congratulations. This victory of the Roman champion united Alba to Rome.

HUAMANTLA, A.D. 1847.—On the 9th of October, 1847, a battle was fought between a detachment of the American army, and the Mexicans, under Santa Anna, near Huamantla, in Mexico, in which the latter were defeated. The Americans lost thirteen killed and eleven wounded. Among the slain was Captain Walker.

HUBBARDTON, A.D. 1777.—Hubbardton, in Rutland county, Vermont, was, on the 7th of July, 1777, the scene of a sanguinary conflict between the British, under General Frazer, and the American army, under Warner, Francis, and Hall. The American army consisted of about 1,300 men; that of the British, at the commencement of the action, numbered about 800. The battle began at seven o'clock in the morning, and was continued for a long time without either party gaining an advantage. It was at length decided in favor of the British by the desertion of Colonel Hill, who, with his regiment abandoned Colonels Warner and Francis, and fled toward Castleton; and by the arrival of Riedesel with his Hessians, the Americans, panic-stricken at sight of the newly arrived troops, wavered, and the British by one vigorous charge broke their ranks and then threw them into complete disorder. The Americans supposing that the Germans were coming in full force upon them, fled, some toward Rutland and others toward Castleton. The Americans lost 324 in killed, wounded, and prisoners. Among the dead was the gallant Colonel Francis, who was slain while fighting at the head of his men. The British lost 183 in killed and wounded. About 200 stand of arms fell into the hands of the victors.

HYDASPES, B.C. 326.—Hydaspes is the ancient appellation of the River Jhylum in Cashmere, a province of northern Hindoostan. It rises in the south extremity of Cashmere, and after a course of about 450 miles, at first north-west or west, and afterward south-west, joins the Chenab. During most part of its course it is not fordable, its average depth being about fourteen feet. Its breadth is more than 1,800 yards. Its banks are interesting as the scenes of several of the exploits of Alexander; but their precise localities are unknown.

Peace to the Macedonian soldiers was irksome, and therefore Alexander, to put an end to their murmurs, commenced his march for India. Having entered the country, he marched toward the interior without encountering any opposition until he had arrived on the banks of the river Hydaspes. Here, on the opposite side of the river, was incamped the army of Porus, the most powerful of all the kings of India, who had marched hither in order to dispute the passage of the Macedonian king. Porus had posted at the head of his army eighty-five enormous elephants. Behind them he had planted 300 chariots, which were supported by 30,000 foot, and about 7,000 horse. Porus himself was mounted on an elephant much larger than any of the rest.

The Indian king was a man of great stature, and clothed in armor, glistening with gold and silver, his mien was at the same time terrible and majestic. The Macedonians, however, were not terrified by the magnificent array of the Indian army. Their most potent enemy was the river, whose deep and rapid current presented an obstacle which they knew not how to overcome. For it would have been certain annihilation to attempt to cross the river in the face of the enemy. The river was full of little islands, to which the Indians and Macedonians used to swim, with their arms over their heads, and slight skirmishes took place between them daily in the sight of the two kings. On one occasion two young Macedonian officers, Nicanor and Egesimachus, selected a troop of the bravest youth of the army, and with them swam to an island, on which several of the enemy had landed. The Macedonians were armed only with javelins, and although their enemies were more numerous, yet after a desperate struggle, they killed them almost to a man. Not content with this victory, they waved their weapons in defiance, to a still more numerous body of Indians who were swimming to the assistance of their companions. The Indians landed, and surrounding the little band of Macedonians, discharged their darts from a distance at them, until all were slain. Porus witnessed this action, and his courage rose to its highest pitch. Alexander, perceiving that he could not cross the river by force of arms, resorted, therefore, to stratagem. He caused his cavalry to proceed along the bank of the river to a point some distance from his camp, and to set up a shout as if they really intended to cross the stream. Porus hearing the shouts, immediately hastened thither with his elephants; but Alexander still maintained his position on the bank. This stratagem was repeated several times, until, Porus finding it merely a pretense, took no further notice of these motions, and only sent scouts to every part of the shore. Having thus quieted the apprehensions of the enemy, Alexander, having left a great part of his army in his camp, secretly marched in the night-time, until he had arrived opposite to an island in the river. This island was nearer to the shore occupied by Porus, than to the other. In order to deceive the enemy, Alexander had ordered Craterus, whom he left in the camp, to cause the soldiers to make a great noise at a certain time, in order to alarm the Indians and make them believe that they were about to cross the river at that point; but that the army should not cross the river until such time as Porus should have raised his camp, either to withdraw, or to march against such of his troops as should succeed in gaining the opposite shore. In that case he should cross the river with the whole army, with all possible haste. The stratagem was eminently successful. Porus supposing that the enemy was in reality about to cross, drew up his elephants directly opposite Alexander's camp to oppose the landing of the Macedonians. In the mean time, Alexander with his troops had succeeded in crossing the river in small boats to the island. A furious storm now arose, and served greatly to facilitate the enterprise. Notwithstanding the roughness of the water, Alexander immediately embarked his troops from the island, and landed on the main shore without opposition, Porus being wholly occupied in watching Craterus. The moment Alexander was landed, he drew up his little army, consisting of 6,000 foot and 5,000 horse, in order of battle. He took the command of the cavalry himself, and advanced toward the enemy's camp. Porus was soon informed by his scouts that some Macedonian troops had crossed the river, and immediately sent against him a detachment of 2,000 horse and 120 chariots, under the command of one of his sons. These troops soon encountered the Macedonians, who charged them so furiously, that they were entirely routed and put to flight. The king's son, and 400 of the cavalry were killed on the spot, and all the chariots were taken. Porus receiving intelligence of the death of his son, and the defeat of his detachment, immediately advanced toward Alexander with his whole army, except a few elephants, whom he left on the bank to oppose the landing of the rest of the Macedonians. Having arrived at a spot, where the soil was firm and sandy, and in which his horses and chariots could wheel about with ease, he halted and drew up his troops in battle array. His army consisted of 30,000 foot, 4,000 horse, 200 elephants, and 300 chariots. Each of these chariots carried six men, two were armed with bucklers; two were bowmen, sitting on each side, and two guided the chariot. The latter, however, also fought when the battle grew warm, being provided with a great number of darts, which they discharged at the enemy.

When the Indian king had drawn up his troops in battle array, what a magnificent spectacle his army must have presented. In the front, the 200 elephants, standing at regular distances from one another, formed a line which extended 2,000 feet, serving as a bulwark to the 30,000 infantry, who stood behind them, and whose arms glistened between the intervals of the elephants, like bright walls of steel. On the two wings of the elephants were also posted some infantry, who in turn were covered in flank by the cavalry, in front of which the chariots were planted. Alexander's army had marched in battle array, and shortly after he came within sight of the enemy, he gave the signal of battle. He did not deem it expedient to commence the battle by attacking the main body of the enemy, for he saw from the position which the elephants occupied, that such a beginning would be dangerous. He, therefore, opened the battle by attacking the left wing with his cavalry. Seleucus, Antigonus, and Tauron, who commanded the foot, were ordered not to stir from their posts, until the cavalry had put the horse and foot of the enemy's left wing into disorder.

Obeying Alexander's commands, Crœnus and Demetrius, with their respective troops of cavalry, made a circuit around the left wing of the Indians, and fiercely fell upon them in the rear. At the same moment, 1,000 Macedonian mounted bowmen rapidly advanced, and discharged a shower of arrows upon them, in front, upon which Alexander, with his cavalry, furiously charged them in flank. The Indians, thus assaulted on all sides, and not able to make head against the enemy, were soon thrown into the utmost confusion, and at length retired behind the elephants as to an impregnable rampart. The elephant drivers now compelled these huge beasts to advance toward the Macedonian cavalry. But in an instant the Macedonian phalanx rushed forward, and surrounding the elephants, charged them with pikes. The elephants shrilly trumpeting with pain and rage, rushed upon the battalion with indescribable fury, trampling down whole ranks of men, and throwing the whole phalanx into complete disorder and confusion. The Indian cavalry of both wings, seeing the Macedonian foot stopped by the elephants, united and charged upon Alexander's cavalry, but they were received with so much warmth that they were again compelled to retire behind the elephants. The Macedonian horse now united in one body, and wherever they attacked they spread terror and confusion. The elephants, covered with wounds, and many of them without drivers, no longer maintained their usual order. Furious with pain, they rushed about the field, distinguishing neither friend nor foe, and overthrowing every thing that came in their way. Alexander, having surrounded the enemy with his horse, called up his foot in order to make the final effort. And now, at the same time, the whole Macedonian army, horse and foot, charged upon the enemy from all sides. The slaughter which followed was fearful; the Indian cavalry, after a desperate resistance, was fairly cut to pieces. The infantry met with no better fortune. Finding themselves charged at all points, the soldiers turned and fled, leaving the field strewn with their dead. Craterus, who had remained in the camp with the rest of the army, seeing Alexander engaged with Porus, crossed the river, and charging the routed Indians with his troops, who were fresh and vigorous, killed as many of the enemy in the retreat as had been slain in the battle. On this occasion, the Indians lost 20,000 foot and 3,000 horse. Their chariots were broken to pieces, and their elephants were all either killed or captured. The Macedonians lost only about 300 men. Porus, who, during the battle, had fought with extraordinary courage, surrendered himself a prisoner to the conqueror. Upon being conducted to Alexander, the latter asked him how he desired to be treated. "Like a king," he responded. "Do you ask nothing more?" inquired Alexander. "No," was the reply, "the word king comprehends all things." Alexander, struck with this greatness of soul, not only restored to Porus his kingdom, but annexed other provinces to it, and treated him with the highest testimonies of honor, friendship, and esteem. Porus was faithful to him till his death.

HYMERA, B.C. 480.—In the year 484, B.C., the Carthaginians made a treaty with Xerxes, King of Persia, whereby the former were to invade, with all their forces, those Greeks who were settled in Sicily and Italy, while Xerxes should march in person against Greece itself. After a preparation of three years, the Carthaginian land army amounted to 300,000 men. The fleet consisted of 2,000 ships of war, and nearly 3,000 small vessels of burden. This powerful army was intrusted to the care of Hamilcar, the most experienced captain of his age, who, in the year 480, B.C., set sail from Carthage for Palermo. After arriving at this city, he allowed his troops sufficient time to recover from their fatigue, and the effects of their confinement on ship-board, and then marched against Hymera, a city near Palermo, and laid siege to it. Theron, commander of the Greek forces within the city, immediately sent off Gelon, who had recently possessed himself of Syracuse, asking aid. The latter general instantly flew to his relief, with 50,000 foot, and 5,000 horse. His arrival infused the besieged with new ardor, and they, from that time, made a most vigorous defense. Gelon was a most able warrior; above all things, excelling in stratagems. The Carthaginian general had, in the mean time, sent to Selinuntum, a city in Sicily, for reinforcements; but the courier dispatched from Selinuntum with the letter informing Hamilcar of the day when he might expect the arrival of the troop of cavalry, was intercepted by some of the Greek troops, who immediately carried him to Gelon. Gelon made his preparations accordingly. He immediately selected from his army a number of men equal to the amount mentioned in the letter, and upon the day agreed on, he sent them from the city. They were immediately admitted into the enemy's camp, as the expected reinforcement; but no sooner had they gained entrance, than they rushed upon Hamilcar, and having killed him, they set fire to his ships. Now, Gelon, with his whole army, attacked the Carthaginians. The latter fought with the ferocity of tigers; but when they heard that their gallant officer was slain, and saw the flames consuming their noble fleet, their hearts sank within them, and they fled. The Greeks pursued them, slaughtering the fugitives as they fled, until the ground was heaped with the dead. One hundred and fifty thousand Carthaginians were slain, and nearly the same number were made prisoners. This battle was fought on the very same day of the famous action of Thermopylæ, in which 300 Spartans, with the sacrifice of their lives, disputed Xerxes's entrance into Greece. Afterward, in the year 412, B.C., Hymera was taken by storm by the Carthaginians, under Hannibal, the grandson of Hamilcar. He razed the entire city to its very foundation. He forced 3,000 prisoners to undergo all kinds of ignominy and punishments, and at last murdered them all on the very spot where his grandfather had been killed by Gelon's cavalry, to appease and satisfy his manes by the blood of these unhappy victims.

And thus a city which had been in existence two hundred and forty years, was extinguished.

INGOUR, A.D. 1855.—The river Ingour rising in the snowy Caucasus, winds through the densely wooded country which extends from the base of the mountains to the Black Sea, and debouches into that body of water, at Anaklia. The battle of the Ingour was fought on the 6th of November, 1855, between the Russians and the Anglo-Turkish army under Omar Pacha. The strength of the Russians was estimated at about 10,000, of which one half were regular troops, the remainder Mingrelian militia. The battle commenced at one o'clock, and after a desperate struggle the Russians were defeated with great loss. The allies lost about 400 men killed and wounded. Captain Dymock, aid-de-camp to Colonel Simmonds, was killed while gallantly charging at the head of his battalion. Five guns and ammunition wagons, and fifty prisoners fell into the hands of the victors.

INKERMAN, A.D. 1854.—This place, a village of south Russia, in the Crimea, 35 miles south-west of Simferpol, will ever be memorable for the battle fought in its vicinity on the 5th of November, 1854, between the English and French forces on the one side and the Russians on the other. The allied forces consisted of about 15,000 men, that of the Russians amounted to over 40,000. The Russians commenced the attack early in the morning, and an obstinate and bloody battle ensued, and was maintained for several hours, when the Russians were finally driven back with great loss. The English lost 462 killed, and 2,143 wounded; the French lost 389 killed and 1,337 wounded; and the Russians lost 3,011 killed and 3,609 wounded. A further account of this battle will be found in the article on the Siege of Sebastopol in another part of this volume.

INSTED, A.D. 1850.—The battle of Insted took place in 1850 between the Danes and Slcheswick-Holsteiners, at Insted, a village of Denmark, five miles north of Slcheswick.

IPSUS, B.C. 431.—The army of Antigonus and Demetrius marched into Phrygia in Asia Minor. They arrived there about the same time as the troops of the confederate army, commanded by Seleucus and Lysimachus.

Antigonus and Demetrius immediately resolved on giving the enemy battle. Their forces consisted of 60,000 foot, 10,000 horse, and 75 elephants, while those of the confederate army consisted of 64,000 men, 10,500 horses, 400 elephants, and 120 chariots armed with scythes. The battle was fought near Ipsus, a city of Phrygia.

At a given signal, Demetrius swiftly advanced at the head of his cavalry against Antiochus who commanded the infantry of the confederate army. So impetuous was his charge, that it was irresistible, the enemy's ranks were broken, and the men, throwing away their weapons, fled from the field. Demetrius pursued them, and in his eagerness to capture as many of them as possible, committed the inexcusable fault of leaving his own infantry uncovered, and exposed to the attacks of the enemy.

Meantime Seleucus had moved forward his elephants in order to interpose between Demetrius and his infantry, and thereby render it impossible for him to give them any assistance. He did not immediately attack him in force, but made several feints, for the purpose of intimidating them; and also with the expectation, that by this maneuvering, the greater part would in a short time surrender at discretion. Nor was he mistaken in his calculations, for when they saw the hopelessness of their situation, they almost all delivered themselves up to the mercy of Seleucus. Those who still maintained their position were speedily put to the sword.

When Seleucus had thus accomplished the destruction of the infantry, he detached a large portion of his army to move against Antigonus, whose men fought well, and defended themselves with the energy of despair; but the forces to which they were opposed, were overwhelming, and they were obliged to succumb. Antigonus fell, pierced with darts, after having defended himself with great courage and bravery during the onset.

When Demetrius discovered that his father had been slain, and the battle irretrievably lost, he rallied his forces, and retired to Ephesus, with 5,000 foot and 4,000 horse, the scattered remains of the noble array of 70,000 men, which he and his father had commanded in the morning.

ISMAIL, A.D. 1790.—The position of Ismaïl, situated upon the Danube, in Bessarabia, tempted the court of St. Petersburg, then at war with the Turks, to endeavor to make the conquest of it. This was one of the most important cities of the Turkish empire in the European provinces. It had a numerous population, and a garrison of 43,000 men, commanded by Auduslu Pacha, one of the best of the Ottoman generals. Provisions and munitions were abundant, and its artillery powerful. Its walls, having a circuit of a mile from one bank of the Danube to the other, were from three to four toises high; at their feet was a fossee from seven to eight toises deep; they were crowned by pieces of large caliber. Between the polygons of Bender and Brock, there was a fausse-braie, near a cavalier, capable of containing many thousand soldiers. The water side was strongly defended by batteries making a horizontal fire. At the beginning of November, 1790, General Sodowitsch, with several bodies of troops, made the approaches upon Ismaïl, while Admiral Ribas blockaded it with a flotilla of 100 row-boats. They obtained some advantages at sea, but the rigors of the winter obliged Sodowitsch to raise the siege. When informed of this, the court of St. Petersburg, accustomed to find no difficulty insurmountable, ordered Field-marshal Potemkin to return immediately before Ismaïl and take possession of it. The marshal felt all the difficulties of the undertaking, but he obeyed. Arrived upon the Pruth, he detached Lieutenant-General Potemkin with orders to bury himself under the ruins of Ismaïl; but his efforts were not more successful than those of Sodowitsch. Suwarrow then came up with a regiment of infantry, 1,000 Arnauts, and 200 Cossacks. The land army consisted of 28,000 men, of whom near one half were Cossacks. The first care was to exercise these irregular troops in the maneuvers of an assault. Many days were employed in reconnaissances, in order that the general officers might be well acquainted with the posts they were to attack. When all the observations necessary had been made, batteries were raised, to lead the Turks to believe that they were preparing to make a regular siege, and not to carry Ismaïl by assault. On the 9th of December, Suwarrow sent the seraskier a letter from Prince Potemkin, to persuade him to surrender. The seraskier replied that he advised the Russians to retire, if they were unwilling to experience absolute want in an advanced season, and perish with famine and misery before a place amply provided with every thing. Suwarrow the next day, sent another note to the seraskier, in which he announced to him, that if he did not hoist the white flag that very day, the place should be taken by assault and the whole garrison be put to the sword. Many Turks were inclined to surrender; but the seraskier was resolved to risk every thing, and made no reply.

Suwarrow immediately assembled a council of war, and spoke as follows to his troops: "Brave warriors, remember to-day all your victories, and continue to prove that nothing can resist the arms of Russians. The affair in hand is not one that can be deferred, but it concerns an important place, the possession of which will decide the glory of the campaign, and which the proud Ottomans consider impregnable. Twice already has the Russian army laid siege to Ismaïl, and twice has it retreated from it. There only remains for us, at the third attempt, to conquer or to die with glory." This speech inflamed the ardor of his soldiers, and an assault was decided upon. Suwarrow received a courier from Prince Potemkin, recommending him not to risk an assault if he was not sure of succeeding. Suwarrow replied in these few lines: "My plan is settled. The Russian army has already been twice at the gates of Ismaïl; it would be disgraceful for it to retire a third time." Some Cossacks deserted in the evening, and informed the Ottomans of the approaching attack. The principal part of the garrison remained all night upon the ramparts. To make the Turks believe they were short of powder, the Russians fired but little during the night which preceded the assault. All measures being taken, by four o'clock in the morning the columns were formed: there were six on the land side and three upon the Danube. The Cossacks destined to mount to the assault were all on foot, and their lances had almost all been reduced to five feet in length, to render them more useful in the mêlée. The first column by water, commanded by General Islenief, consisted of two battalions of grenadiers, one battalion of chasseurs, and 2,500 Cossacks. They had on board their shallops 130 pieces of cannon. The second column had the same number of boats and cannon. In the third, and in the reserve, were 237 pieces of cannon, divided among a great number of barks, flat-bottomed boats, and floating-batteries. Among the troops embarked were the Prince de Ligni, the Colonel Duke de Richelieu, and the Count de Langeron.

The weather, which had been fine and serene during the night, grew cloudy toward daybreak, and a thick fog enveloped the horizon till nine o'clock. All the columns marched in silence. At the aspect of the walls, the whole army halted in consternation. Suwarrow exclaimed to those who were near him: "You see those walls; they are very high; but the empress commands us to take possession of them." He then suddenly fell upon his knees, arose, and marched to the assault, followed by all his army. The Turks did not fire a shot till the Russians were within three or four hundred paces of them, but then saluted them with a shower of mitrailles, which did them great injury. They, however, approached the fosse, in which there was in several places water up to the shoulders, threw in their fascines, planted their ladders against the ramparts, many parts of which were so high that they were obliged to tie two together, although every one was five toises long. As in some places the besiegers did not find this expedient quick enough, they assisted each other with as much vivacity as address, and climbed up the ramparts with the aid of their bayonets. The arquebusiers fired from the edge of the fosse upon the Turks who defended the ramparts, to prevent them from beating back the assailants. The second column, commanded by the Marshal de Lasci, arrived first, but was not assisted with sufficient energy by the first and third. The first had had to overcome a great difficulty: it had met with a chain of strong pallisades, which extended to the banks of the Danube. The grenadiers, who were at the extremity of the pallisades, rushed against them, one after the other, to turn them; and those most distant from that spot jumped over them. Another fosse was yet to be got over before they reached the ramparts. The Russian grenadiers took possession of the first bastion, and attacked without order the cavalier which was between that work and the second; but in doing so, they lost many men. Kutusow, who had taken the two left polygons on the side of the left bank of the Danube, would have arrived upon the rampart at the same time as the second column, if he had not been obliged to send assistance to the fourth and fifth columns, which had met with a vigorous resistance. The fosse was full of water at the place where these columns were obliged to cross; the men being up to their middles, soaked their long Cossack clothes, and had great trouble in disengaging themselves from them. They mounted the ladders, but when they came to the ramparts they could not maintain themselves there; the two columns were thrown back at the same time. They were separated by the gate of Bender; 8,000 or 10,000 Turks made a sortie from that gate, uttering frightful warcries. Among these were a great number of women armed with poniards. The besieged charged all at once, in all parts; the infantry of the reserve came to the rescue, and made way with their bayonets; the Cossacks, finding themselves supported, repulsed the Turks. Such as could not gain the bridge to re-enter Ismaïl, were cut in pieces or smothered in the fosse. The Russians then made a fresh effort, surmounted all resistance, and established themselves upon the rampart of the bastion, which was assigned to them. Kutusow, however, remarked that the two battalions of reserve, although masters of the rampart, could not yet hold out against the enemy; he in consequence sent them a battalion of chasseurs, who enabled them to keep their position. Every bastion having a powder-magazine under the rampart, the conquerors immediately established a strong guard there, in order that the enemy might not be able to set fire to it and blow up the troops. There consequently followed slight actions between the besiegers and the besieged, who still continued to endeavor to introduce themselves there, but they could not succeed; so that no accident happened. Day began to appear, and every one could ascertain his position, which, till that time, had only been indicated by the different warcries of the two nations. While the Turkish infantry was fighting in the fosses near the Bender gate, a numerous body of cavalry fell upon the camp of the besiegers, where the Cossacks received them with so much vigor, that scarcely any of them returned, and the Bender gate fell into the hands of the Russians.

While the land columns were marching against Ismaïl, other columns were formed upon the Danube. The first, composed of 100 boats, manned by troops, prepared to make a descent, advanced in two lines, keeping up a continual fire; the second line, consisting of brigantines, floating-batteries, shallops, and lançons, followed it. The fire became still more warm as these two lines approached each other. The Turks had on the water side a work of small height, but great strength, furnished with eighty-three cannon of large caliber, fifteen mortars, and a howitzer of 600 pounds of balls. The fire of the mortars of the second line covered the cannonade of the first; when they had arrived at some hundreds of paces from the shore, the second line divided, and placed itself on the two wings of the first; in this fashion it formed a half-circle. Both sides kept up a warm fire of mitrailles, and the combat lasted an hour. But as it was still night, some Russian battalions only suffered, without any vessel being sunk. About seven in the morning the total descent was effected. The Turks had abandoned the few vessels they had left. The resistance was brave and persistent, particularly on this side, which was defended by more than 10,000 Turks. The greater part of these were put to the sword, the rest saved themselves in the chanas, or houses solidly built with stone.

At eight o'clock the Russians were masters of the rampart on the water side, as well as on that of the land. A terrible conflict then commenced in the interior of the city, in the streets and public places, to which the inhabitants came from all parts. There were skirmishes beyond number, both sides fighting with equal inveteracy. The Turks defended themselves with desperation, maintaining an incessant fire from the windows, particularly in the narrow streets. The Russians swept the larger ones with the fire of twenty field-pieces, to which the Turks, having no cannon but in their chanas, could not respond. There were 2,000 Turks in the first chana that was attacked: they made great havoc among the Russians with their artillery. Suwarrow ordered it to be taken, and it was escaladed, in spite of a determined resistance, and, for the first time, during the day, some hundreds of prisoners were made; the unfortunate Auduslu Pacha had taken refuge in a still more considerable chana. The combat there lasted more than two hours; cannon were required to batter in the gate. Two thousand of the best janizaries defended themselves in this place with all the rage of despair; but the Russian grenadiers rushed in the moment there was an opening, with advanced bayonets, and all were cut to pieces, with the exception of a very few hundred prisoners: the pacha was of this number. He came out into the open place; a chasseur perceiving a rich poniard in his girdle, thought it his duty to take it from him. As several Turks still had arms, a janizary, who was near the seraskier, endeavoring to repulse the chasseur with his saber, wounded a captain of chasseurs in the face. The Russians instantly charged their bayonets upon all that remained: they massacred the greater part, the brave seraskier being of the number: scarcely 100 men of his immediate train escaped. Petty conflicts still continued in every place capable of the slightest defense; every post was carried at a heavy expense of blood. The terrible resistance made by the Turks was more like frantic rage than the opposition of trained soldiers; the women even fearlessly encountered the Russians, armed with poniards and other weapons. All the Russian commanders faced danger with heroic courage, and their soldiers as bravely seconded them; the mêlée lasted ten entire hours, without the Russians in the least heeding the superiority of the Turks in number. The city was given up to pillage; 33,000 Ottomans there perished in one day! and 10,000 were made prisoners! A single man had saved himself in a fortified house; he was slightly wounded, but contrived to drop from a window into the Danube, where he was fortunate enough to meet with a plank, by means of which he gained the opposite shore. This man carried the vizier the news of the loss of Ismaïl; there were no less than six sultans among the dead. The Russians lost 15,000 men.

A year after, Ismaïl, which had cost so much blood, was restored to the Turks as a guaranty of the peace between the two powers—and 48,000 human beings had been slaughtered, and countless women and children had perished, or been rendered miserable, to secure the conquest of it!—Robson.

ISPAHAN, A.D. 1387.—The famous city of Ispahan, formerly the glory of Persia, was, in the year 1387, a scene of horror and bloodshed rarely paralleled in the history of warfare. In that year, Timour invaded Persia, and laid siege to the city of Ispahan; the city at length fell into the hands of his troops, and the remorseless conqueror caused an indiscriminate massacre of the inhabitants. 70,000 were slain, and their heads, piled on the walls of the city, long remained a revolting memorial of the merciless severity of the victors. The city, under the government of the Sefis, gradually revived, but it did not regain its former grandeur until it became the residence of Shah Abbas the Great, who made it the metropolis of Persia. In 1722 Persia was invaded by the Affghans, and Ispahan, after enduring a siege of eight months, during which the adjacent country was laid waste by the barbarous policy of the enemy, was reduced to its present condition. The walls were so demolished that no traces of them are now visible; the palaces and public buildings were destroyed, and the inhabitants massacred without mercy. In 1727 it was retaken by Nadir Shah; but he took no steps to restore it to its ancient glory.

ISSUS, B.C. 333.—Darius, King of Persia, at the head of an immense army, marched toward the Euphrates, full of confidence that he could crush the invader, Alexander, as he would an obnoxious insect. The magnificent army of the Persians resembled more a triumphal procession than the march of an army.

The following was the order observed by Darius during his march:

Priests, bearing silver altars, on which fires, called by the Persians eternal and sacred, were burning.

Magi, singing hymns of praise, accompanied by 365 youths clothed in purple robes.

A car consecrated to the Persian god, drawn by white horses.

The horse of the sun, a magnificent courser, elegantly caparisoned, on either side of which were equerries, dressed in white, and holding golden rods in their hands.

Ten chariots, adorned with sculptures in gold and silver.

A body of cavalry, composed of twelve nations whose manners and customs were various, and all armed in a different manner.

The Immortals, 10,000 Persians, clothed in robes of gold tissue, with sleeved surtouts adorned with precious stones, and wearing golden collars around their necks.

Dignitaries of the king, 1,500 in number, clothed in habits much resembling those of women, and more remarkable for the gorgeousness of their dress than the glitter of arms.

The Doryphory, a body of the king's guards, bearing the cloak of Darius.

Darius, seated in a chair profusely ornamented with gold and silver images of the gods. From the middle of the yoke, which was covered with jewels, rose two statues, a cubit in height, the one representing War, the other Peace, having between them a golden eagle with extended wings. The king was clothed in a vest of purple, striped with silver. Over this he wore a long robe, blazing with gold and precious stones, and embroidered with a representation of two falcons rushing from the clouds and pecking at one another. Around his waist he wore a golden girdle whence his cimeter hung, the scabbard flaming with gems. On his head was placed a tiara, or miter, round which was a fillet of blue mixed with white.

Two hundred of the king's nearest relatives, marching on either side of the king's chariot.

Ten thousand pikemen, whose pikes were adorned with silver and tipped with gold.

Thirty thousand infantry, which composed the rear guard.

The king's horses, 400 in number, led by their grooms.

An interval of 120 paces.

Chariot, containing Darius's mother. The chariot of the king's consort, with female attendants, on horseback, on both sides fifteen large chariots, containing the king's children and their teachers, with eunuchs marching on either side.

The king's concubines, 360 in number.

Six hundred mules, and 300 camels, bearing the king's treasures, guarded by archers on both sides.

Wives of the crown officers, sutlers, and servants of the army, in chariots.

Body of light armed troops.

With this immense army Darius continued his march across the plains of Assyria. In the mean time, Alexander advanced into the country as far as Taurus, and having detached Parmenio, with part of the army, to seize the pass of Cilicia, in order to secure a passage for his army into Syria, he proceeded to Anchiala. The cities of Taurus and Anchiala, it is said, were both built in one day by Sardanapulus. Alexander next advanced to Soti, whence he returned to Taurus. He now heard that Darius, with his whole army, was encamped at Sochos, in Assyria, two days' journey from Cilicia. He immediately held a council of war; and all his generals and officers intreated him to lead them against the enemy. Accordingly he set out the next day to meet the enemy. Parmenio had taken Issus, a little city of Cilicia, and after possessing himself of the pass, he left a body of forces in the city to secure it. Alexander, having arrived at Issus, left his sick in that city, and marching his whole army through the pass, encamped near Myriandros, a Syrian city. Darius, having sent his treasure, with his most precious effects, to Damascus, a city of Syria, under a small convoy, marched the main body of his army toward Cilicia, and entered it through the pass of Amanus, so called from that mountain, which lies some distance northward of the pass of Cilicia. After marching in a westerly direction a short distance into Cilicia, he turned toward Issus, where he arrived, not knowing that Alexander was behind him, for he had been assured that this prince had fled before him.

On learning that Alexander had passed into Syria, he barbarously put to death all the sick that were in the city, except a few soldiers, whom he dismissed, after making them view every part of his camp, in order that they might inform Alexander of the prodigious multitude of his forces. These soldiers made their way to Alexander's camp, and gave him the first information of the movements of the enemy. He was surprised at the news, and could scarcely believe the report of the magnitude of the king's army. He immediately made preparations to march to meet the Persians. At daybreak, the following morning, the army arrived at the place where Alexander had determined to engage the enemy. This was an extensive plain lying near the city of Issus. It was bounded on one side by mountains, and on the other by the Mediterranean sea. The mountains formed a hollow like a gulf, the extremity of which, in a curve line, bounded part of the plain. The plain was divided nearly into two equal parts, by the river Pinarus, which ran from the mountains, through the plain into the sea. Alexander immediately drew up his army in battle array. On the right wing he posted first the Argyraspides, a body of infantry, highly distinguished for their bravery. They were commanded by Nicanor, and as they all carried silver shields, they were very conspicuous. Next to them he placed the phalanx of Crœnus and the troops of Perdiccas, which terminated in the center of the main army. On the extremity of the left wing he planted the phalanx of Amyntas, then that of Ptolemy, and lastly, that of Meleager. The cavalry were posted on the two wings; the Macedonians and Thessalians on the right, and the Peloponnesians and other allies on the left. The extremity of the right wing was some distance from the mountains, while the left extended nearly to the sea. The whole army consisted of about 30,000 foot, and 4,000 or 5,000 horse. Parmenio commanded the entire left wing, assisted by Crateus, who, acting under his direction, commanded the foot. Alexander reserved to himself the command of the right wing. He covered his horse in the right wing with the light horse troops of Protomachus and the Pæonians, and his foot with the bowmen of Antiochus. He reserved the Agrians, commanded by Attalus, and some forces that were newly arrived from Greece, to oppose the troops which Darius had posted on the mountains. Having heard that Alexander was marching toward him in battle array, Darius advanced with his army to meet him. He commanded 30,000 horse and 20,000 bowmen to cross the river Pinarus, that he might have an opportunity to draw up his army in a commodious manner on the hither side. In the center he posted the 30,000 Greeks in his service, who were, doubtless, the flower and chief strength of his army, and were not at all inferior to the Macedonian phalanx. On the right wing he posted 20,000 Cardacians, and as many more on the left. These were all heavily armed. The rest of the infantry, distinguished by their several nations, were ranged behind the first line. The depth of these lines must have been enormous, for the pass, when we consider the amazing multitude of the Persian forces, was comparatively narrow. On the mountains, at the right of the Macedonian army, Darius posted 20,000 men, who were so arrayed by the curvatures of the mountain, that some of them were behind Alexander's army, and others before it. Darius, having set his army in battle array, made his cavalry cross the river again, and dispatched the greater part of them toward the sea, against Parmenio, because they could fight on that spot with greater advantage. The rest of his cavalry he sent to the left toward the mountains. However, finding that these would be of no service on that side, as the spot was too narrow, he caused a large part of them to wheel about to the right. As for himself, he took his post in the center of his army, according to the custom of the Persian monarchs. Alexander, observing that most of the enemy's horse was to oppose his left wing, which consisted only of those of Peloponnesus, and of some other allies, detached immediately to it the Thessalian cavalry, which he caused to wheel round behind his battalions, to prevent their being seen by the enemy. He also posted on his left, before the infantry, the Cretan bowmen, and the Thracians of Sitalces (a king of Thrace), who were covered by the horse. The foreigners in his service were behind all the rest. Perceiving that his right wing did not extend so far as the left of the Persians, which might surround and attack it in flank, he drew from the center of his army two regiments of foot, which he detached thither, with orders for them to march behind, to prevent their being seen by the enemy. He also reinforced that wing with the forces which he had offered to the barbarians on the mountains; for, seeing they did not come down, he made the Agrians and some other bowmen attack them, and drive them toward the summit of it; so that he left only 300 horse to keep them in check, and sent the rest, as before observed, to reinforce his right wing, which, by this means, extended further than that of the Persians. The two armies being thus drawn up in order of battle on the opposite banks of the river, Alexander rode through his ranks, and entreated his troops to behave themselves valiantly during the approaching contest. At the conclusion of his exhortations, the whole army set up a shout, and eagerly demanded to be led against the enemy. Alexander first advanced very slowly, to prevent the ranks from breaking, and halted by intervals; but when he had arrived within bow-shot, he commanded all his right wing to plunge impetuously into the river purposely, that they might surprise the barbarians, come sooner to a close engagement, and be less exposed to the enemy's arrows, in all of which he was eminently successful. Both sides fought with the utmost bravery and resolution, and being now forced to fight close, they charged on both sides, sword in hand. A dreadful slaughter followed. They engaged man to man, each one aiming his sword at the face of his opponent. Alexander performed the duty both of a commander and a private soldier, wishing nothing so ardently as the glory of killing with his own hand, Darius, who, being seated on a high chariot, was conspicuous to the whole army, and was by that means a powerful object both to encourage his own soldiers to defend him, and the enemy to attack him.

And now the battle grew more furious and bloody than before. Many of the Persian nobility were killed. Each side fought with incredible bravery. Oxathres, brother to Darius, observing that Alexander was going to charge that monarch, rushed before his chariot with the horse under his command, and distinguished himself above all the rest. The horses that drew Darius's chariot, being quite covered with wounds, began to prance about, and shook the yoke so violently that they were on the point of overturning the king, who, afraid of falling alive into the hands of the enemy, leaped down, and mounted another chariot. The rest of the Persians observing this, fled as fast as possible, and throwing down their arms made the best of their way. Alexander had received a slight wound in the thigh; but happily it was not attended with ill consequences. While part of the Macedonian infantry (posted to the right) were pursuing the advantage they had gained against the Persians, the remainder of them, who engaged the Greeks, met with greater resistance. These, observing that the body of infantry in question was no longer covered by the right wing of Alexander's army, which was pursuing the enemy, came and attacked it in flank. The engagement was very bloody, and victory a long time doubtful. The Greeks endeavored to push the Macedonians into the river, and to recover the disorder into which the left wing had been thrown. The Macedonians also signalized themselves with the utmost bravery, in order to preserve the advantage which Alexander had just before gained, and support the honor of their phalanx, which had always been considered invincible. The Macedonians lost 121 of their best officers, among whom was Ptolemy, the son of Seleucus, who had all behaved with the utmost gallantry. In the mean time the right wing which was victorious, under Alexander, after defeating all who opposed it, wheeled to the left against those Greeks who were fighting against the rest of the Macedonian phalanx charged them vigorously, and, attacking them in flank, entirely routed them. At the very beginning of the engagement, the Persian cavalry, which was in the right wing (without waiting for their being attacked by the Macedonians) had crossed the river, and rushed upon the Thessalian horse, several of whose squadrons were broken by it. Upon this the remainder of the latter, in order to avoid the impetuosity of the first charge, and induce the Persians to break their ranks, made a feint of retiring as if terrified by the prodigious numbers of the enemy. The Persians seeing this were filled with boldness and confidence, and thereupon the greatest part of them advancing without order or precaution, as to a certain victory, had no thoughts but of pursuing the enemy. Upon this the Thessalians, seeing them in such confusion, suddenly faced about and renewed the fight with fresh ardor. The Persians made a brave defense till they saw Darius put to flight, and the Greeks cut to pieces by the Macedonian phalanx. The routing of the Persian cavalry completed the defeat of the army. The Persians lost in this battle 100,000 men, while the historian relates that Alexander lost only 150 horse and 300 foot. But the Macedonian loss must have been much greater. The Persian horses suffered very much in the retreat from the great weight of the riders' arms; not to mention that as they retired in disorder, and crowded in great numbers through the defiles, they bruised and unhorsed one another, and were more annoyed by their own soldiers than by the enemy. Beside this the Thessalian cavalry pursued them with so much fury that they were as much shattered as the infantry and lost as many men. With regard to Darius, as was before observed, the instant he saw his left wing break, he was one of the first who fled, in his chariot, but getting afterward into craggy, rugged places, he mounted on horseback, and throwing down his bow, shield, and royal mantle, made good his escape. About 8,000 Greeks that were in Darius's service, retired over the mountains, toward Tripoli, in Syria. As for the barbarians, having exerted themselves at first with enough bravery, they afterward gave way in a most shameful manner, and being intent upon nothing but saving themselves, they dispersed in every direction; some struck into the high road which led directly to Persia, others ran into the woods and lonely mountains, and a small number returned to their camp, which the victorious army had already taken and plundered. Sysigambis, Darius's mother, and that monarch's queen, who was also his sister, had remained in it, and fell into Alexander's hands, with two of the king's daughters, a son of his (a child), and some Persian ladies. The other women had been carried to Damascus, with the greater part of Darius's treasure. No more than 3,000 talents ($2,200,000) were found in his camp; but the rest of the treasure afterward fell into the hands of the Macedonians, under Parmenio, at his taking the city of Damascus.

JAFFA, A.D. 1799.—On the 13th of March, 1799, the army of Napoleon Bonaparte appeared before Jaffa, the ancient Joppa, in Palestine. The place was surrounded by a strong wall flanked by towers, and was occupied by a garrison of 4,000 men. Bonaparte immediately opened his batteries on the place, and a breach was soon made in the walls. He then summoned the Turkish commandant to surrender; but the latter answered only by cutting off the head of the messenger. The French general now ordered an assault, and the soldiers, incensed at the murder of their comrade, rushed furiously to the assault, and carried the place with the utmost gallantry. Jaffa was given up for 30 hours to pillage and massacre, and words can not depict the horrors of that fearful day. The French found here a considerable quantity of artillery and ammunition of all kinds, and nearly 2,000 Turks were made prisoners. "Unable to send these men into Egypt," says Thiers, "for he had no suitable means for escorting them, and he would not increase the numbers of his enemies by sending them back, Bonaparte resolved on a terrible expedient, the only act of cruelty he ever committed. He ordered the execution of all the prisoners. The army obeyed the cruel mandate, but with reluctance and horror." "The body of prisoners," says Scott, "were marched out of Jaffa, in the center of a large square battalion. The Turks foresaw their fate, but used neither entreaties nor complaints to avert it. They marched on silent and composed. They were escorted to the sandhills to the south-east of Jaffa, divided into three small bodies, and put to death by musketry. The execution lasted a considerable time, and the wounded were dispatched by the bayonet. The bodies were heaped together, and formed a pyramid, which is still visible, consisting now of human bones, as originally of bloody corpses." French historians endeavor to excuse this cruel act in the manner following: "As to the charge of shooting three or four thousand Turks, some days after the taking of Jaffa, Napoleon said there were not so many; they did not amount to more that 1,000 or 1,200. The reason was, that among the garrison of Jaffa, a number of Turkish troops were discovered, taken a short time before, who had been sent out on their parole not to serve again; but instead of keeping their word, had thrown themselves into Jaffa. However, before Bonaparte attacked Jaffa, he sent an officer, bearing a flag of truce, whose head immediately afterward they saw elevated on a pole over the wall. Now, if spared again, he inferred the same Turks would have gone to St. Jean d'Acre, and played the same part over again; therefore, in justice to the lives of his soldiers, he could not act otherwise than he did: he therefore, availed himself of the rights of war." Speaking of this massacre, Napoleon himself said: "I would do the same thing again to-morrow, and so would Wellington, or any general commanding an army under similar circumstances."

JAMESTOWN, A.D. 1781.—Jamestown, in James county, Va., is the name of a former village of which now nothing but ruins remain. The first English settlement in the United States was founded here in 1608. It occupied a point of land projecting into James river 32 miles from its mouth. Jamestown was set in flames, and consumed to ashes, in the year 1676, by the American patriot, Bacon and his companions.

In the spring of 1781, Cornwallis, with the British army, marched from Wilmington, N. C., and entered Virginia to join the invading forces of Phillips and Arnold, at Petersburg. But learning that the forces of Lafayette, Steuben, and Wayne, were rapidly augmenting, Cornwallis abandoned his attempts to capture stores in the heart of Virginia, and returned toward the sea-shore. He retreated to Richmond, and thence to Williamsburg. In his retreat he was closely pursued by Lafayette and Wayne, with an army of about 4,000 men, of whom 2,100 were regular troops; the balance being American militia. On the 4th of July, 1781, Cornwallis, having received orders from Sir Henry Clinton to return to New York, broke up his incampment and marched for Jamestown Island. He made his dispositions so as to cover the ford; and on the same evening the Queen's Rangers passed over to the island. The baggage of the army was conveyed to the island during the two succeeding days. Lafayette and Wayne kept a vigilant eye upon the movements of the British general, and upon learning that Cornwallis had left Williamsburg, the patriot army advanced and incamped within nine miles of Jamestown. Lafayette resolved to fall upon the rear of the enemy, as soon as the main body of the British army should have passed over to Jamestown Island.

Cornwallis, however, anticipating his design, incamped with the greater portion of his army on the main land, and strengthened his position by casting up fortifications on the right bank of the Powhattan creek, near the Williamsburg road. He kept his troops closely concealed in a wood, and displayed the Queen's Rangers on the island to the best advantage, and endeavored to convince Lafayette that the main body of the army had in reality passed on to the island, while only the rear guard remained on the main land.

The French general was deceived by these maneuvers of Cornwallis, and he resolved to make an attack at once on the rear guard. At three o'clock in the afternoon of the 6th of July, Lafayette advanced from Green Spring plantation, and marched toward the enemy. General Wayne, with about 800 men, was sent forward to make the attack. Lafayette, with 900 men, followed slowly behind, in readiness to support Wayne, if necessary, while Steuben, with the main body of the militia, remained at Green Spring plantation to act as a reserve. The vanguard of Wayne's troops advanced rapidly, driving the enemy's pickets in before them. The Americans, confident of victory, were about to plunge into the woods to engage the enemy hand-to-hand, when about 2,000 British troops, under Lieutenant-Colonel York on the right, and Lieutenant-Colonel Dundas on the left, suddenly sprang into view, and with loud shouts advanced toward the astonished Americans. The vanguard stood for ten minutes against this overwhelming array, fighting with a courage which seemed almost superhuman. But, borne back by the sweeping tide of the enemy, they retreated in confusion to Wayne's line. General Wayne at once divined the stratagem which Cornwallis had prepared for him, and in an instant he resolved upon a bold and perilous movement. The trumpeters were ordered to sound the charge, and when the shrill blast struck the ears of the Americans, a shout arose along their whole line, and, like madmen, they dashed through a tempest of bullets, and fell upon the British with a ferocity which drove them back in fear and astonishment. Then, as quick as lightning, a retreat was sounded, and the Americans, wheeling about, fell back to Lafayette's line. Bewildered by these sudden movements on the part of the enemy, the British commander, fearing an ambuscade, neglected to pursue, but during the evening called in his detachments, and crossed over to Jamestown Island three days afterward, and thence, by easy marches, proceeded to Portsmouth, opposite Norfolk. In this action, according to Lafayette, the Americans lost 118 men, in killed, wounded, and missing. The British lost eighty, killed and wounded. Two pieces of cannon, which the Americans were compelled to abandon on the field, the most of their horses having been slain, fell into the hands of the British. The Americans remained in the vicinity of Williamsburg for nearly two months, when, on the arrival of the combined armies, they proceeded to besiege Cornwallis at Yorktown.

JARNAC, A.D. 1569.—Jarnac is situated on the right bank of the Charente, in France. On the 14th of March, 1569, was fought the famous battle near Jarnac, between the army of the Huguenots under the celebrated Prince of Condé, and the army of the Duke of Anjou. Both parties were nearly of equal strength, each army consisting of about 20,000 men. The Huguenots were defeated with a loss of 400 men. The Prince of Condé, with his arm in a sling, from a wound which he had already received, at the head of 300 mounted gentlemen was advancing to the fight, when his leg was shattered by the kick of the horse of an officer of his retinue. "Nobles of France!" exclaimed the heroic Condé, exhibiting his wounded limb, and drawing his sword, "see in what state Louis of Bourbon will charge for Christ and his country." But his little band was soon overwhelmed, and the prince, being unhorsed, surrendered to the Lord of Argency, with whose person he was acquainted, and was led aside from the field and seated under a tree; but his capture had been perceived by the retinue of the Duke of Anjou, and Montesquieu, a Gascon captain of the royal Swiss guards, rode up, and leveling at the prince's back shot him dead on the spot. The Duke of Anjou testified the most indecent joy at the death of his enemy. He expressed a wish to see the corpse of the prince, which was conveyed to him rudely thrown across the back of an ass; and, having treated it with indignity, and jested upon it with ferocious levity, he notified his design of founding a chapel to mark the spot upon which the heretic breathed his last. The intention was abandoned upon a suggestion that such an act would strengthen belief in a rumor already widely spread, that the cold-blooded murder of the prince, even if not perpetrated by his express order, had at least received his approbation.

JEMAPPES, A.D. 1792.—Near the village of Jemappes, in the vicinity of the city of Mons, in Flanders, was fought, on the 6th of November, 1792, a battle between the French republican forces, under Dumourier, and the Austrian army, commanded by the Archduke Albert. The French army consisted of 40,000 men; while that of the Austrians did not exceed 20,000. The artillery of both armies was nearly equal, each being provided with about 100 pieces of cannon. After a bloody conflict, victory declared in favor of the French. The Austrians were driven from the field at all points; and retired within the city of Mons. Their resistance, however, had been so obstinate, that the loss on both sides was nearly balanced. The Austrians lost 6,000 men, in killed, wounded, and prisoners, and 15 pieces of cannon. The French loss amounted to 5,000 men, killed and wounded. In this battle, the Duke de Chartres, afterward Louis Philippe, king of the French, behaved in a most valorous manner.

JENA, A.D. 1806.—Jena, ever memorable as the scene of one of Napoleon's most brilliant victories, is a town of central Germany, duchy of Saxe Weimar, on the Saale, twelve miles east of Weimar. Early in the month of October, 1806, was commenced that terrible struggle between the north and south of Europe, which ended only in the disastrous expedition of Napoleon into Russia. On the 8th of October the French army was concentrated around Baumberg, and at three o'clock on the morning of the 9th, Napoleon put himself in motion, and his columns marched toward Saxony on three great roads. The Prussians, meanwhile, were advancing toward the left wing of the French, and the advanced posts of the two armies were in presence of each other. The Prussian army marched in echelon; the right in front was pushed on to Eisenach; next followed the center, commanded by Frederic William, King of Prussia, in person, which, united with the corps of Hohenlohe and Ruchel, was to advance on Saalfeld and Jena. Each wing was covered by a detached corps of observation, the right by Blucher, on the confines of Hesse, the left by Tauenzein, on the side of Bayreuth. The object of the Duke of Brunswick was to approach the French army upon the Maine, which was the base of Napoleon's operations, and while occupying the attention of their wings by detached corps, penetrate their center, and cut off their communication with France. But when intelligence of the advance of the French on the left and center of the Prussians reached the Duke of Brunswick's head-quarters, he renounced his intentions, and orders were instantly dispatched to countermand the advance, and direct the concentration of the army in the neighborhood of Weimar. But before the Prussian forces could be concentrated, the army of Napoleon was already upon them, and the detached bodies of the Prussians were exposed to the attacks of the French. Schleitz, on the 9th of October, was occupied by General Tauenzein, with 6,000 Prussians and 3,000 Saxons. Here they were attacked by the troops of Bernadotte, with such vigor that they were put to rout, with a loss of nearly 1,000 men. On the 10th, Murat advanced on Gera, and fell in with and captured a convoy of 500 carriages and a pontoon train, and the French left, under Lannes and Augereau, was no less successful. On the 10th, near Saalfeld, a division of the former general's corps, under General Suchet, fell in with the Prussian advanced guard, under Prince Hohenlohe, commanded by Prince Frederic Christian Louis of Prussia, charged with defending this post and the bridge over the Saal. A cannonade commenced, and was continued nearly two hours. The Prussian horse were charged by the French cavalry, and overthrown, and their infantry was assailed by the French with such impetuosity that it was put to rout, and the prince himself, while combating bravely with the rear guard, and striving to restore order among the fugitives, was slain by a saber-stroke from a French officer of hussars, who, not knowing the rank of his adversary, laid him dead at his feet. In this struggle the Prussians lost 1,200 prisoners, besides 800 killed and wounded, and thirty pieces of cannon; "but this," says Alison, "was the least part of their misfortunes. The heroic Prince Louis was no more; he had fallen, it is true, while bravely combating on the field of honor, but his body remained the trophy of the victors, and the continued advance of the enemy indicated that defeat had attended the first serious exploit of the Prussian arms." When Lannes was informed of the death of the prince, he showed the body all the honors due to such an illustrious character. It was interred with all the honors of war in the cemetry of the Princes of Coburg, at Saalfeld; and Berthier wrote on the 12th to the chief of the Prussian staff, announcing that Napoleon had ordered the body to be restored if it was desired that it should rest in the tomb of his ancestors. The disasters which immediately ensued rendered it impossible for the royal family at that time to accept the offer.

Meanwhile, both sides prepared for a decisive battle. The Prussians at length concentrated their forces in two great masses, under the king in the neighborhood of Weimar, and under Hohenlohe at Jena. The French made a sweep which brought them completely round the Prussian army. In the evening of the 12th, the army of Hohenlohe was incamped behind the heights of Jena, their masses extending beyond Weimar, as far as the eye could reach, and on the same night, the King of Prussia advanced with his forces, under the immediate command of the Duke of Brunswick, toward Auerstadt, where he incamped on the evening of the next day. The army of the King of Prussia, at Auerstadt, consisted of 65,000 men; that of Hohenlohe, at Jena, numbered nearly 50,000. The united artillery of the two armies numbered 300 pieces; and their cavalry was admirably mounted. Napoleon, not suspecting this division of the enemy's forces, was endeavoring with his wonted energy to overcome the all but insurmountable difficulties of the passage of Landgrafenberg, by which access was to be afforded to his columns for the attack of the Prussian position. The valley of the Saal at Jena begins to widen. From the right bank, which is low, extends a series of marshy meadows; while the left, rising abruptly, presents lofty heights which overshadow the town of Jena. The Landgrafenberg is the loftiest of these heights, and has since been called, in honor of Napoleon's achievements, Napoleonsberg. The French light troops having dislodged the Prussian patrols from the heights of Landgrafenberg, Napoleon repaired to them in person, and, being able to see the formidable position of the Prussians on the opposite ridge, and believing that he had their whole army on his hands, he pressed, without intermission, the march of his columns, and soon arranged the forces of Lannes, who first arrived with his infantry, above by the steep and rugged ascent to its summit in such formidable masses around its declivities, that the Prussians, who were now sensible of their error in abandoning so important a point, and were making preparations to retake it, were obliged to desist from the attempt.

This valuable height, therefore, from which the whole of the Prussian position and all the movements of their troops were distinctly visible, remained in the hands of the French; and its elevation not only gave them the advantage, but entirely concealed from their view, the rapid concentration of the troops on the Jena side of the mountain, which would have at once revealed the intention of a decisive attack on the following day. The difficulty of the ascent however, was not yet entirely surmounted; for wagons and artillery it was totally impossible. Nothing, however, could long withstand the vigor of Napoleon and his followers. He stood on the spot till the most rugged parts of the ascent were widened by blasting the rock, or smoothed by pioneers, and when the men were exhausted, revived their spirits by himself working with their tools, and exhibited his old experience as a gunner in surmounting the difficulty of dragging the cannon up the pass. Before eight o'clock in the evening, the ascent was passable for cavalry and artillery, and at midnight the whole corps of Lannes, with all its guns and equipage, reposed in crowded array on the ridges and flanks of the mountain; the Imperial Guard under Lefebvre bivouacked on its summit; Augereau on its left; Soult and Ney received orders to march all night on the right in order to turn the enemy after the combat was engaged by his left; Murat was in reserve at Jena; while Davoust and Bernadotte were directed, the first to fall back to Naumburg, in order to threaten the enemy's rear, the second to advance to Dornberg and cut off his retreat to the Prussian territories. The two armies now reposed within cannon-shot; the light of the Prussian fires dispersed over a space of six leagues, threw a prodigious glow over the whole heavens to the north-west; those of the French, concentrated in a small space, illuminated the heights in the middle of their position.

Napoleon was on horseback at four in the morning of the 14th, and surrounded by his generals rode along the front of the line of Suchet and Gazan's divisions, which were first to be engaged, and were already under arms. The morning was dark and foggy, and Napoleon and his party, escorted by torch-bearers, presented a picturesque appearance as they moved along the line. The emperor delivered a spirited harangue to the soldiers, who received his words with loud acclamations which testified their eagerness to be led into battle. The Prussian outposts, ignorant of the intentions of the enemy, reposed in fancied security on the opposite heights. Suddenly they were aroused to a sense of their danger by the appearance of the French battalions moving through the mist toward them, in beautiful order. The alarm was given, and the Prussians springing to arms, made a gallant resistance, but they were driven back with great slaughter and the loss of 20 pieces of cannon. Meanwhile the whole Prussian army, alarmed by the sharp and incessant fire of musketry in their front, stood to their arms; and reinforcements were sent to the points in advance which were menaced; but in spite of their efforts the French gained ground; the villages of Closwitz and Kospoda, at the foot of the eminence on which the lines of Hohenlohe were posted, were successively carried, and all the low grounds in front of his position were filled with troops. Lannes, having made himself master of the village at the foot of the Prussian position, prepared to ascend the slope of the height on which they stood; Ney was on the immediate right of Lannes, with his troops drawn up in line or column on the open ground, and Augereau on the left was pressed forward to turn the Prussian flank. The Imperial Guard and Murat's cavalry, occupied the slope of the Langrafenberg as a reserve, and the whole French army, nearly 90,000 strong, was ready to fall upon the Prussians with overwhelming force. Hohenlohe saw the extent of his danger; but his position was strong, and he hoped to maintain it until succor should arrive. Instructions were dispatched to Ruchel, who with 20,000 men was posted a short distance on the right, to hasten to the scene of action, and the Prussians prepared to make a vigorous stand. The Prussians gradually retired toward their chosen ground as the French columns advanced. But the French in rapid succession carried the strongholds of the enemy. Ney, with an intrepid step, ascended the hill, and after a sharp conflict carried the village of Vierzehn-Heiligen in the center of the Prussian position; and next assailed the right of the Prussian line toward Isserstadt, which Augereau with the French left had already carried. The Prussians opened a fire along their whole right wing, which for a time arrested the progress of the enemy; but the French advanced into the sheet of flame, and the allies of the Prussians in that quarter were compelled to give ground.

On the left of Vierzehn-Heiligen, however, the Prussians had gained some advantage; their numerous and magnificent cavalry had made several successful charges on the French infantry, when advancing on the open ground beyond its inclosures; several cannon had been taken, and Hohenlohe for a short time flattered himself with the hope of obtaining decisive success.

Ruchel at this moment arrived near the field of battle, and Hohenlohe requested him to direct the bulk of his forces to the village of Vierzehn-Heiligen, already the theater of such desperate strife; but the French were too quick for him. Soult, by a well-directed fire, had driven the Prussian cavalry on their left, from the field, while Lannes and Augereau, pressing them at once in front and flank on their right, had forced back their infantry over half a mile. The French forces advanced with loud shouts, driving the Prussians before them, and throwing into them such destructive volleys of musketry that the ground over which they retreated was strewn with their slain. Napoleon, from his station on the summit of Landgrafenberg, saw that the decisive moment had arrived, and sent orders to Murat to charge with his cavalry, and complete the victory. With lightning speed that terrible mass of 12,000 horsemen, in the finest array, and with shouts of triumph, dashed upon the flying Prussians. The line of their charge was marked with gore; the Prussians were thrown into the direst disorder; their infantry, artillery, and cavalry, were thrown together in the wildest confusion. The artillerists fleeing before the bloody sabers of Murat, abandoned their pieces to the enemy, and the whole Prussian army thought of nothing but to escape.

In the midst of this appalling scene the columns of Ruchel, still in battle array, emerged through the cloud of fugitives to stem the torrent; but they, too, were mingled with the fugitives by the tremendous charges of Murat's horse and the French infantry. The ground was strewn with fresh Prussian corpses; Ruchel himself was severely wounded, and his little army was almost totally annihilated. It was no longer a battle, but a massacre. In frightful disorder the whole army rushed from the field; but Soult with a rapid movement, cut off the left wing and made the Prussians in that quarter prisoners almost to a man. Nearly the whole of the artillery of the allies fell into the hands of the French, and the victors entered Weimar, pell-mell with the fugitives, at the distance of twelve miles from the field of battle. Behind Weimar, Hohenlohe at six o'clock, collected twenty squadrons, whose firm countenance, until nightfall, gave some respite to the wearied foot-soldiers, who were dispersed through the fields in every direction. But the Prussian army was annihilated. The battles of Jena and Auerstadt had opened the road to Berlin to Napoleon, and thither he hastened, making thousands of prisoners on his way, and entered the Prussian capital in triumph. See Battle of Auerstadt.

JERBA, A.D. 1558.—In the year 1558, a bloody conflict took place between the Turks and the Spanish troops, under the command of Medinaceli and Andre, at Jerba, an island of north Africa, in the gulf of Cabeo. A pyramid nearly thirty feet in height, was erected, composed entirely of the skulls of the Spanish soldiers, who were slain in this engagement.

JERICHO, B.C. 1451.—Shortly after the arrival of the Israelites in the promised land, Joshua encountered an extraordinary personage clothed in armor from head to foot, and armed with a sword. The Hebrew general questioned him whether he was friend or foe, and the answer assured him that he was conversing with a messenger from heaven. This angel gave Joshua very explicit orders respecting the manner of conducting the siege of Jericho, and these orders were implicitly obeyed. The whole army marched around the city once each day for six successive days, with seven priests having trumpets, formed of rams' horns, in their hands. The armed men marched before the priests, while the rest of the people followed the priestly procession. On the seventh day, the march was commenced at early dawn, and the circuit was accomplished seven times. At the completion of the last, Joshua commanded all the people to shout, proclaiming that God had given them the immediate possession of the city. He was obeyed, and the walls instantly fell flat to the ground, and the conquerors entered the city, sword in hand, slaying every thing that had life; sparing neither man nor woman, child nor beast. The city was then set on fire, and every thing was consumed, with the exception of the silver and gold, and vessels of iron and brass, which were reserved for the treasury of the house of the Lord.

JERUSALEM, B.C. 1048.—The modern city of Jerusalem, built about 300 years ago, stands on a hill between two small valleys, in one of which the brook Gibon runs with a south-easterly course, to join the brook Kedron, in the narrow valley of Jehoshaphat, east of Jerusalem.

No city in the world has enjoyed so much veneration as well as attention as Jerusalem, and yet no city has been subjected to more violence. Almost held in as much reverence by the Mohammedans as the Christians, the possession of the Holy City was equally a devotional object as a territorial one, with the followers of both creeds. Jerusalem has been besieged more than twelve times, and, as in such contests, religion only seems to embiter enmities and enhance cruelties, the state of this otherwise favored city can have been no object of envy.

FIRST SIEGE, B.C. 1048.—After the death of Joshua, the tribes of Judah and Simeon, having united their forces, marched upon this already important place, with a formidable army. They took the lower city, and, faithful to the orders of Moses, slaughtered all who presented themselves to their fury. The upper city, called Sion, checked their victorious progress. The efforts of the Hebrews, during nearly four centuries, failed while directed against this citadel. The glory of carrying it was reserved for David. This hero, proclaimed king by all the tribes, wished to signalize his accession to the throne by the capture of Jerusalem; but the Jebusites, who inhabited it, feeling convinced that their city was impregnable, only opposed his army with the blind, the lame, and the crippled. Enraged by this insult, David made them pay dearly for their rude pride. He ordered a general assault; and Joab, mounting the breach at the head of a chosen troop, overthrew the infidels, pursued them to the fortress, entered with them, and opened the gates to the king. David drove out the inhabitants, repaired the walls, strengthened the fortifications, and established his abode in the city, which, from that time, became the capital of the kingdom of the Jews.

SECOND SIEGE, B.C. 976.—In the reign of Rehoboam, the grandson of David, Shishak, King of Egypt, laid siege to Jerusalem, threatening to raze it with the ground if any opposition were offered to his arms. The indignant people were eager to attack the enemy of their religion and their country, but Rehoboam, as cowardly as a warrior as he was imperious as a monarch, opened the gates of his capital to the haughty Egyptian, and quietly witnessed the pillage of it.

THIRD SIEGE, B.C. 715.—In the first year of the reign of Ahaz, King of Judah, Rezin, King of Syria, and Pekah, King of Israel, presented themselves in warlike array before Jerusalem. Their design was to dethrone Ahaz and put an end to the dynasty of David. But their ambitious project was checked by the sight of the fortifications, and, after a few vain attempts, they retreated with disgrace.

Some time after, the Holy City was attacked by a much more redoubtable enemy. Sennacherib, King of Assyria, claimed of Hezekiah, the tribute which his weak father, Ahaz, had consented to pay; and after having overrun Ethiopia, besieged him in his capital. The fate of Jerusalem seemed pronounced, and the kingdom was about to fall into the power of a haughty and irritated conqueror; but the hand of Providence intervened; a miraculous slaughter of the Assyrians took place in one night, and the army of Sennacherib retreated precipitately.

FOURTH SIEGE, B.C. 587.—Nebuchadnezzar, King of Babylon, took Jerusalem by force, and gave it up to pillage. He placed King Joachim in chains, and afterward released him upon his promising to pay tribute; but that prince soon violated his engagement. Nebuchadnezzar reappeared, Jerusalem was again taken, and Joachim expiated his perfidy and revolt by his death.

The impious Zedekiah, one of his successors, proud of an alliance contracted with the Egyptians, against the opinion of the prophet Jeremiah, ventured, as Joachim had done, to endeavor to avoid the yoke of the Chaldeans. Nebuchadnezzar, upon learning this, marched against him, ravaged Judea, made himself master of the strongest places, and besieged Jerusalem for the third time. The King of Egypt flew to the assistance of his ally; but Nebuchadnezzar met him in open fight, defeated him, and compelled him to seek shelter in the center of his states. Jerusalem, which had given itself up to a violent, transitory joy, became a prey to new terrors. The King of Babylon renewed the siege, and Zedekiah determined to behave like a man who has every thing to gain and nothing to lose. The city was blockaded, the enemy stopped all supplies, and laid waste the country round. An immense population was shut up in the capital, which the circumvallation soon reduced to a frightful state of famine. A single grain of wheat became of incredible value, and water, which an extraordinary drought had rendered scarce, was sold for its weight in gold. A pestilence likewise, no less formidable than the famine, made terrible ravages. The streets were blocked up by dead bodies left without sepulture, whose fetid odor became fatal to the living. Desolation and despair stifled all the feelings of nature; mothers were seen slaughtering their infants, to release them from such calamities, and afterward expiring upon their bleeding bodies.

The enemy in the mean time pushed on the siege most warmly: the rams never ceased to batter the walls; and vast wooden towers were erected, from the summits of which enormous stones were launched upon the heads of those whom famine and pestilence had spared. But even in this extremity the Jews persisted in their defense; Zedekiah concealing his alarm under a firm countenance, reassuring them by his words, and animating them by his example. The more impetuous the enemy, the more furious became the citizens. They opposed force by force, and art quickly destroyed whatever art devised. Eighteen months passed in this way, without any attention being paid to the voice of Jeremiah, who continued to press the inhabitants to throw open their gates, and by concession disarm the wrath of a power that must in the end overcome them. At length the enemy effected a great breach, and it became necessary to yield. Zedekiah marched out at a secret gate, at the head of the soldiery, but he was overtaken, loaded with chains, and led away into captivity, after witnessing the massacre of his children, and after being deprived of the light of day, which had too long shone upon his sacrileges. The conqueror made his triumphal entrance into Jerusalem; he bore away all the riches of the temple, immolated the greater part of the inhabitants, and led the rest into slavery, after reducing the temple and the principal quarters of the city to ashes. Such was the first destruction of Jerusalem, richly merited by the impiety and vices of its inhabitants, 1,468 years after its foundation by Melchisedeck, and nearly five hundred years after David wrested it from the power of the Jebusites.

Many years after, Zerubbabel rebuilt it by permission of Cyrus, King of Persia; Nehemiah reinstated the fortifications. It submitted to Alexander the Great; and after death had carried off that conqueror, withstood several sieges for a time; but these were of trifling importance, though they generally terminated in the plunder of the Temple. This was the state of the Holy City up to the time of the great Pompey.

Fifth Siege, b.c. 63.—The Jews having refused a passage to the Roman army which was marching against Aristobulus, Pompey, highly irritated, sat himself down before their capital. The sight of this place, which nature and art appeared to have rendered impregnable, made him, for the first time, doubtful of the good fortune which had so often crowned his exploits. He was in this state of incertitude when the Jews of the city, with that want of true policy which distinguished them in all ages, divided themselves into two factions. The one favorable to the Romans proving to be the stronger, opened the gates to Pompey, while the other, consisting of the partisans of Aristobulus, retired to the Temple, to which the Roman general quickly laid siege. He raised vast terraces, upon which he placed balistæ and other machines of war, the continual play of which drove away the defenders of the walls. But the Jews, whom nothing seemed to astonish, rendered the efforts of the Romans useless by their valor and perseverance. They defended themselves with so much art and intrepidity, that in the course of three months the Romans were only able to take one tower. But at length the vigorous obstinacy of the legions was crowned with its usual success; the Temple was taken by assault, Cornelius Faustus, son of the dictator Sylla, at the head of a brave troop, being the first to enter the breach. All who ventured to show themselves were massacred. Several sacrificers were immolated in the performance of their ministry. All who could escape the fury of the enemy either precipitated themselves from the nearest rocks, or, gathering together their wealth, after setting fire to it, cast themselves into the flames. Twelve thousand perished in this unfortunate instance. Pompey respected the treasures of the Temple, and crowned his victory by forbearance and generosity.

Sixth Siege, b.c. 37.—Herod the Great had been declared king of the Jews by the Romans; but Jerusalem refused to acknowledge him. This prince, aided by Sosius, whom Antony had sent to him with several legions, marched against that city, at the head of a numerous army. He laid siege to it, raised three platforms, which dominated over the towers, poured from their summits a continuous shower of darts, arrows, and stones upon the besieged, and unceasingly battered the ramparts with rams and other machines he had brought with him from Tyre. But the Jews, still intrepid, despised death, and only sought to inflict it upon their assailants. If a wall was destroyed, another arose as if by magic. If a ditch was dug, it was rendered useless by a countermine, and they constantly appeared in the midst of the besiegers when least expected. Thus, without being depressed, either by frequent assaults or by the famine which now made itself cruelly felt, they resisted during five months the united efforts of the Romans and the Jewish partisans of Aristobulus. At length, both the city and the Temple were carried by assault. Then death assumed one of his most awful characters. The Romans bathed themselves in the blood of an obstinate enemy; and the Jews of the king's party, rejecting every feeling of humanity, immolated to their fury every one of their own nation whom they met in the streets and houses, or even found in the temple. Herod, however, by means of prayers, promises, and menaces, at length obtained a cessation of this horrible butchery, and to prevent the pillaging of the city and the Temple, he generously offered to purchase them of the Romans with his own wealth. This capture of Jerusalem occurred thirty-seven years before Christ, on the very day on which Pompey had carried it by assault twenty-seven years before.

Seventh Siege, A.D. 66.—Toward the end of the reign of Nero, in the sixty-sixth year of the Christian era, under the pontificate of Mathias, the son of Theophilus, began the famous war of the Jews against the Romans. The tyranny, the vexations, the sacrileges of the governors were the causes of it. Tired of groaning so long under a foreign yoke, the Jewish nation believed they had no resource left but in despair. Fortune at first appeared favorable to them; the Romans were beaten several times; but Vespasian, whom the Roman emperor had charged with this war, was soon able, by the exercise of skill, prudence, and valor, to attract fortune to his standards, and to keep her there. After having subdued the whole of Palestine, he was preparing to commence the blockade of Jerusalem, when his army recompensed his virtues with the empire. The new emperor assigned to his son Titus the commission of subduing the rebels and laying siege to the capital.

Jerusalem, built upon two very steep mountains, was divided into three parts—the Upper City, the Lower City, and the Temple, each having its separate fortifications. The Temple was, so to say, the citadel of the two cities. Several thick and very lofty walls rendered access to it impracticable; by the side of it stood a fortress which defended it, called Antonia. A triple wall, which occupied the space of 300 stadia, surrounded the entire city: the first of these walls was flanked by ninety very lofty and strong towers; that of the middle had only fourteen, and the ancient one sixty. The noblest of these towers were called Hippicos, Phazael, and Mariamne, and could only possibly be taken by famine. At the northern extremity was, still further, the palace of Herod, which might pass for a strong citadel. It thus became necessary for Titus, to make himself master of Jerusalem, to form several successive sieges; and whatever part the assailants carried, they seemed to leave the strongest untouched. Such was the place which Titus came to attack with soldiers accustomed to war and victory; and, in spite of their valor, it is more than probable he would have failed, if cruel intestine divisions had not marred all the noble efforts of the unfortunate city.

A troop of brigands, headed by Eleazer, of the sacerdotal tribe, whom impunity had allowed to gather together, threw themselves into Jerusalem. These lawless men, who assumed the well-sounding name of the Zealots, profaned the Temple with the greatest crimes, and subjected the citizens to most of the misfortunes of a city taken by assault by a cruel enemy. This faction, as might be expected, however, soon became divided, and turned its arms against itself. A wretch named John of Giscala, supplanted Eleazer, and made himself sole chief of the Zealots. The latter, jealous of the authority of his rival, separated himself from him, and, having recovered an interest with a considerable number of partisans, took possession of the interior of the Temple, and thence made attacks upon the troops of John. On another side, Simon, the son of Gioras, whom the people in their despair had called in to their succor, seized upon the supreme authority, and held almost the whole city under his power. These three factions carried on a continual strife with each other, of which the people were always the victims: there was no security in their dwellings, and it was impossible to leave the city, of which the factions held all the means of egress. All who dared to complain or to speak of surrendering to the Romans, were immediately killed; fear stifled speech, and constraint kept even their groans within their own hearts. When Titus had reconnoitered the place, brought up his army, and commenced operations, these tyrants, seeing the danger which threatened them equally, suspended their divisions and united their forces with the hope of averting the storm. They made, in rapid succession, several furious sorties, which broke through the ranks of the Romans, and astonished those warlike veterans; but such trifling advantages were not likely to affect such a man as Titus: he made another tour of the city to ascertain upon what point it could be best assailed, and, after his foresight had taken all necessary precautions to insure success, he set his machines to work, ordered the rams to maintain an incessant battery, and commanded a simultaneous attack upon three different sides. With great exertions, and after a contest of fifteen days, he carried the first wall, in spite of the spirited resistance of the besieged.

Animated by this success, he ordered the second to be attacked; he directed his rams against a tower which supported it, obliged those who defended it to abandon it, and brought it down in ruins. This fall made him master of the second rampart five days after he had taken the first; but scarcely had he time to congratulate himself upon this advantage, when the besieged fell upon him, penetrated his ranks, caused the veterans to waver, and retook the wall. It became necessary to recommence the attack upon it: it was contested during four days upon many points at once, and the Jews were at length compelled to yield. Titus by no means wished for the destruction of Jerusalem, and with a view of leading the inhabitants back to their duty by intimidation, he made a review of his troops. There has seldom been a spectacle more capable of inspiring terror—the mind can not contemplate these conquerors of the world passing in review before such a man as Titus, without something like awe. But the seditious Jews, for they seldom deserve a better name, would not listen to any proposals for peace. Being convinced of this, the Roman general divided his army, for the purpose of making two assaults upon the fortress Antonia; he nevertheless, before proceeding to this extremity, made one more effort to bring the rebels to reason. He sent to them the historian Josephus, as more likely than any other person to persuade them, he being a Jew, and having held a considerable rank in his nation. This worthy envoy made them a long and pathetic discourse to induce them to have pity on themselves, the sacred temple, the people and their country; he pointed out to them all the evils that would fall upon them if they did not listen to his prudent advice; he recalled to their minds the misfortunes which had overwhelmed their fathers when they had ceased to be faithful to their God, and the miracles which had been worked in their favor when they had observed his commands: he bore witness to the truthfulness of his own feeling by ending his harangue with a flood of tears. The factions, however, only laughed at him and his eloquence; and yet many of his hearers were convinced, and, endeavoring to save themselves, sold all they had for small pieces of gold, which they swallowed for fear the tyrants should rob them of them, and made their way to the Roman ranks. Titus received them with kindness, and permitted them to go whither they wished. As these continued to escape daily, some of the Roman soldiers learned the secret of the concealed gold, and a report prevailed in the camp that the bodies of these fugitives were filled with treasures. They seized some of them, ripped them open, and searched among their entrails for the means of satisfying their abominable cupidity. 2,000 of these miserable wretches perished in this manner. Titus conceived such a horror at this, that he would have punished the perpetrators with death, if their numbers had not exceeded those of their victims. He continued to press the siege closely: after having caused fresh terraces to be erected, to replace those the enemy had destroyed, he held a council with his principal officers: most of them proposed to give a general assault; but Titus, who was not less sparing of the blood of his soldiers than he was prodigal of his own, was of a contrary opinion. The besieged, he said, were destroying one another; what occasion could there be to expose so many brave warriors to the fury of these desperate ruffians? He formed the project of surrounding the place with a wall, which would not allow the Jews to make any more sorties. The work was distributed among all the legions, and was completed in three days. It was then that the miserable factions began for the first time to despair of their safety.

If the troubles without the walls were great, those which consumed the unhappy city were still more terrible. Who can paint, exclaims Josephus, the fearful effects of the famine which devoured these unfortunates? It increased every day; and the fury of the seditious, more redoubtable than this scourge itself, increased with it. They held no property sacred; every thing was torn from the unhappy citizens. A closed door denoted provisions within: they forced it open, and snatched the morsels from the mouths of those about to swallow them, with brutal violence. They struck down old men; they dragged women by the hair, without regard to either age, sex, or beauty; they spared not lisping innocence. Such as still had any portion of food, shut themselves up in the most secret places of their dwellings, swallowed the grain without crushing it, or glutted themselves with raw flesh, for fear the odor of cooking it should attract the inhuman inquisitors. Fleshless men, or rather phantoms, with dried-up visages and hollow eyes, dragged themselves along to corners, where famine speedily relieved them by death. So great was the number of the dead, that the living had neither strength or courage to bury them! There were no more tears—the general calamities had dried up the source of them! No more sighs were heard; hunger had stifled all the feelings of the soul! A famished multitude ran hither and thither, and seized eagerly upon that which would have been rejected by the most unclean animals. At length, a woman, noble and rich, after being despoiled of every thing by her own want and the greedy fury of the mob, weary of preparing food for these insatiable brigands, and left herself without a morsel of nourishment, consumed by a devouring hunger, proceeded, in her fury, to the most unheard-of crimes. Stifling in her heart the cry of nature, she tore from her bosom the infant she was supporting with her milk, and, casting upon the innocent babe fierce and terrible glances, "Unhappy little wretch!" exclaimed she, "why wast thou born amidst war, famine, and seditious tumult? Why dost thou still live? What fate awaits thee —servitude? No; famine prevents it; and the implacable tyrants who oppress us are still more to be dreaded than either the one or the other. Die then! and be food for thy famished mother!" At these words, the maddened parent slaughtered her child, cooked it, ate part of it, and carefully concealed the rest. The mob, attracted by the odor of this abhorrent feast, rushed in from all parts, and threatened to kill the woman if she did not instantly show them the food she had prepared. "I have saved you a good portion of it," said she, pointing to the mangled remains of her child. At this spectacle, even they recoiled; human for the first time, they remained silent and motionless; they could not believe their eyes. "It is my boy!" cried she; "I killed him: surely you can eat after me. Are you more delicate than a woman, or more tender than a mother? If ferocity has not stifled every scruple within you—if you do hold such food in horror, I will devour the rest myself." Base and degraded as they were, terrified at such a crime, they slunk away from the house, cursing so detestable an action. The report soon spread throughout the city; and every one was as horror-struck as if he himself had perpetrated the frightful deed. All wished for death, and envied those whom famine had carried off without witnessing such a catastrophe. The news reached the Roman camp; and Titus determined to put an end to such crimes by a general assault.

An escalade of the Temple was undertaken, but the besieged repulsed the Romans. The latter set fire to the porticos, and the flames gained the galleries without the Jews making the least attempt to extinguish them. At length the besieged determined to make one last effort, and deliver themselves, if possible, from an enemy who pressed them so closely, or perish with swords in their hands, selling the little life they had left, dearly. They made an impetuous sortie from a gate of the Temple, fell upon the Romans, broke through their ranks, and would have driven them to their camp, if Titus, who beheld the combat from the summit of the fortress Antonia, had not flown promptly to the succor of the vanquished. Fresh troops changed the fortune of the day; the Jews were overwhelmed by numbers, and constrained to shut themselves up in the Temple: the prince commanded an assault for the next day. But, at that moment, a soldier, without having received orders for the attempt, and as if moved by a supernatural impulse, prevailed upon a companion in arms to lift him up, and threw a blazing brand into one of the windows of that vast and superb edifice. The fire immediately caught some combustible matter; the Jews perceived it, and uttering loud cries, made strong but useless efforts to stop the conflagration. Titus himself, with his army, hastened to assist in extinguishing it. The excited soldier only thought of completing his work, and, with another brand, defeated the wishes and endeavors of his general: the flames consumed every thing, and this famous temple was reduced to ashes in the second year of the reign of Vespasian. The Romans made a great carnage; but the revolters, by a fresh attack, retarded their destruction for a short time, and took up cantonments in the city, and in the three towers, Hippicos, Phazael, and Mariamne. The conquerors prepared to besiege them, but, at the sight of the machines, the revolters became intimidated, and sought for safety in precipitate flight, leaving the Romans masters of every thing: they plundered the city, killed tens of thousands of the inhabitants, and spread flame and destruction in all quarters. Titus was declared imperator, an august title which he richly merited by his valor and generalship: he entered Jerusalem in triumph, and admired the beauty and solidity of the fortifications, but, with the exception of the three towers, he caused them all to be destroyed. The accounts given by some historians of the numbers of the slain and the prisoners, appear to us incredible; one statement avers that there were 1,100,000 of the former, and 97,000 of the latter. John was found concealed in one of the city sewers, and was condemned to perpetual imprisonment by the Romans. Simon was forced to surrender, after a valiant defense; he formed part of the triumph of the victor, and was afterward publicly executed at Rome. Eleazer, who retired to an untenable fortress, destroyed himself. Jerusalem, which yielded in magnificence to no city of Asia—which Jeremiah styles the admirable city, and David esteems the most glorious and most illustrious city of the East, was thus, in the seventieth year of the Christian era, razed to the ground, and presented nothing but a heap of stones. The Emperor Adrian afterward destroyed even its ruins, and caused another city to be built, with the name of Ælia, from his own, so that there should be nothing left of the ancient Jerusalem. Christians and Jews were equally banished from it; paganism exalted its idols, and Jupiter and Venus had altars upon the tomb of Christ. Amid such reverses, the city of David was nearly forgotten, when Constantine restored its name, recalled the faithful, and made it a Christian colony. The length and importance of this siege may be accounted for by the strength of the fortifications. Its founders, says Tacitus, having foreseen that the opposition of their manners to those of other nations would be a source of war, had given great attention to its defenses, and, in the early days of the Roman empire, it was one of the strongest places in Asia.

The admirable account given by Josephus of the Roman armies may serve as a lesson to all peoples until the arrival of that happy millennium, when the lion shall lie down with the lamb, and war shall be no more; that is, when man has completely changed his nature, and has ceased to be governed by his passions.

He says: "Now here we can not but admire the precaution of the Romans, in providing themselves with such household servants, as might not only serve at other times for the common offices of life, but might also be of advantage to them in their wars. And, indeed, if any one does but attend to their military discipline, he will be forced to confess that their obtaining so large a dominion hath been the acquisition of their valor, and not the bare gift of fortune, for they do not begin to use their weapons first in time of war, nor do they then put their hands first into motion, while they avoided so to do in time of peace; but, as if their weapons did always cling to them, they have never any truce from warlike exercises; nor do they stay till times of war admonish them to use them, for their military exercises differ not at all from the real use of their arms; but every soldier is every day exercised, and that with great diligence, as if it were in time of war, which is the reason why they bear the fatigue of battle so easily; for neither can any disorder remove them from their usual regularity, nor can fear affright them out of it, nor can labor tire them; which firmness of conduct makes them always to overcome those that have not the same firmness; nor would he be mistaken that should call those their exercises unbloody battles, and their battles bloody exercises. Nor can their enemies easily surprise them with the suddenness of their incursions; for, as soon as they have marched into an enemy's land, they do not begin to fight till they have walled their camp about; nor is the defense they can raise rashly made, or uneven; nor do they all abide in it, nor do those that are in it take their places at random; but if it happens that the ground is uneven, it is first leveled. Their camp is four-square by measure, and carpenters are ready in great numbers with their tools, to erect their buildings for them."

Such was the system of the great "nation of the sword," differing, perhaps, but little, except in the scale upon which it operated, from that of Sparta. The machines employed by the Romans were the artificial tower, with its drawbridges, catapultæ, balistæ, and rams: the weapons—javelins, darts, arrows, pikes, stones, swords, and daggers, with the shield or buckler.

Eighth Siege, A.D. 613.—In the reign of Heraclius, a countless host of Persians—fire-worshipers — under the leadership of Sabar, poured like a torrent upon Palestine, and carried their ravages to the gates of Jerusalem, of which they took possession. Nearly 100,000 Christians perished on this occasion: the great eastern inundations of hordes of barbarous conquerors, being always effected by numbers, necessaily produce an amount of carnage in the vanquished which is sometimes staggering to our belief. But the loss most felt by the Christians was that of the holy cross, which the conqueror carried away with him, in a case sealed with the seal of Zachariah, then Patriarch of Jerusalem. The Holy Sepulchre and the churches were given up to the flames.

Ninth Siege, A.D. 635.—The Roman emperor soon regained possession of the city; but scarcely was it beginning to recover the shock sustained from the fire-worshipers, when it became the prey of a much more powerful race of fanatics. In 635, the Saracens, under the command of Khaled, the most redoubtable general of Arabia, laid siege to it. The first attack lasted ten days, and the Christians defended themselves with heroic courage. During four months, every day brought its sanguinary conflict; but at length, the unfortunate citizens, being without hope of succor, yielded to the perseverance of the Mussulmans, and by the means of the patriarch Sophronius, capitulated with the Caliph Omar in person. The following are the conditions of this treaty, which afterward served as a model to the Mohammedans: "In the name of the All-Merciful God, Omar Ebn-Alkhetlab, to the inhabitants of Ælia (the name given to it by its restorer, Ælius Adrianus). They shall be protected; they shall preserve their lives and their property. Their churches shall not be destroyed, but they shall erect no new ones, either in the city or its territories; they alone shall enjoy the use of them. They shall not prevent Mussulmans from entering them, by day or night; the doors of them shall be open to passers-by and to travelers. If any Mussulman who may be traveling, should pass through their city, he shall be entertained gratis during three days. They shall not teach the Koran to their children; they shall not speak publicly of their own religion, and shall make no efforts to induce others to embrace it. They shall not prevent their kindred from becoming Mussulmans, if they should be so disposed; they shall show respect to Mussulmans, and shall rise up when they wish to be seated. They shall not be clothed like Mussulmans; they shall not wear the same caps, shoes, or turbans. They shall not part their hair as the Mussulmans do; they shall not speak the same language, or be called by the same names. On horseback they shall use no saddles; they shall carry no sort of arms, and shall not employ the Arabian language in the inscriptions upon their seals. They shall not sell wine; they shall be distinguished by the same description of clothes, wherever they go, and shall always wear girdles. They shall erect no crosses upon their churches, and they shall not exhibit their crosses or their books publicly in the streets of the Mussulmans. They shall not ring their bells, but shall content themselves with tolling them. They shall never take a domestic who has served a Mussulman." They were obliged to ratify this act of servitude, and to open the gates to the Saracens, who took possession of their conquest.

Tenth Siege, A.D. 1099.—We now come to one of the most remarkable sieges of this extraordinary city. In the eleventh century, after a lapse of 400 years, during which it had passed from the hands of the Saracens to those of the Seldjouc Turks, Jerusalem, a Mohammedan city, was beleaguered by the great band of Christian adventurers who had left Europe for the express purpose of delivering it.

With the earliest dawn, on the 10th of June, 1099, the Crusaders ascended the heights of Emmaus. All at once, the Holy City lay before them. "Jerusalem! Jerusalem!" was shouted from every lip, but was soon repeated with bated breath and bended knee, when all that belonged to that city recurred to the minds of the brave adventurers. The rear ranks rushed through those that preceded them, to behold the long-desired object, and their war-cry, "God wills it! God wills it!" re-echoed from the Hill of Sion to the Mount of Olives. The horsemen alighted humbly from their steeds, and walked barefoot. Some cast themselves upon their knees, while others kissed the earth rendered sacred by the presence of the Saviour. In their transports, they passed from joy to sorrow, from sorrow to joy. At one moment they congratulated each other at approaching the great end of their labors; in the next, they wept over their sins, over the death of Christ, and over his profaned tomb; but all united in repeating the oath they had so many times made, of delivering the city from the sacrilegious yoke of the Mussulmans.

At the time of the Crusades, Jerusalem formed, as it does now, a square, rather longer than broad, of a league in circumference. It extended over four hills; on the east, the Moriah, upon which the mosque of Omar had been built, in the place of the Temple of Solomon; on the south and west, the Acra, which occupied the whole width of the city; on the north, the Bezetha, or the new city; and on the north-west, the Golgotha, or Calvary, which the Greeks considered the center of the world, and upon which the Church of the Resurrection was built. In the state in which Jerusalem then was, it had lost much of its strength and extent. Mount Sion no longer rose within its precincts, and dominated over the walls between the south and the west. The three valleys which surrounded its ramparts had been in many places filled up by Adrian, and access to the place was much more difficult, particularly from the north. Jerusalem, however, had had to sustain several sieges while under the domination of the Saracens, and its fortifications had not been neglected.

While the Crusaders had been so slowly advancing toward the city, the caliph's lieutenant, Istekhar-Eddaulah, ravaged the neighboring plains, burned the villages, filled up or poisoned the cisterns, and made a desert of the spot upon which the Christians were doomed to be given up to all sorts of miseries. He brought in provisions for a long siege, and called upon all Mussulmans to repair to the defense of Jerusalem. Numberless workmen were employed, day and night, in constructing machines of war, raising the fallen walls, and repairing the towers. The garrison of the city amounted to 40,000 men, and 20,000 inhabitants took up arms.

On the approach of the Christians, some detachments left the city, to observe the march and plans of the enemy. They were repulsed by Baldwin du Bourg and Tancred, the latter hastening from Bethlehem, of which he had just taken possession. After pursuing the fugitives to the gates of the Holy City, he left his companions, and strayed alone to the Mount of Olives, whence he contemplated at leisure the city promised to the arms and devotion of the pilgrims. He was disturbed in his pious contemplations by five Mussulmans, who left the city for the purpose of attacking him. Tancred did not seek to avoid the combat; three Saracens fell beneath his powerful arm, and the other two fled back to Jerusalem. Without hastening or retarding his steps, Tancred rejoined the army, which, in its enthusiasm, was advancing without order, and descended the heights of Emmaus, singing the words of Isaiah—"Jerusalem, lift up thine eyes, and behold the liberator who cometh to break thy chains!"

On the day after their arrival, the Crusaders formed the siege of the place. The Duke of Normandy, the Count of Flanders, and Tancred, incamped upon the north, from the gate of Herod to the gate of Sedar, or St. Stephen. Next to these Flemings, Normans, and Italians, were placed the English, commanded by Edgar Atheling; and the Bretons, led by their duke, Alain Fergent, the Sire de Château Giron, and the Viscount de Dinar. Godfrey, Eustache, and Baldwin du Bourg, established their quarters between the west and the north, around the extent of Calvary,from the gate of Damascus to the gate of Jaffa. The Count of Toulouse planted his camp to the right of Godfrey, between the south and the west; he had next him Raimbard of Orange, William de Montpellier, and Gaston de Béarn: his troops extended at first along the declivity of Sion, but a few days after, he erected his tents upon the top of the mountain, at the very spot where Christ celebrated the Passover with his disciples. By these dispositions the Crusaders left free the sides of the city which were defended, on the south by the valley of Gihon, or Siloë, and toward the east of the valley of Jehoshaphat.

Every step around Jerusalem recalled to the pilgrims some remembrance dear to their religion. This territory, so revered by the Christians, had neither valley nor rock which had not a name in sacred history. Every thing they saw awakened or warmed their imagination. But that which most inflamed the zeal of the Crusaders for the deliverance of the city, was the arrival among them of a great number of Christians, who, deprived of their property and driven from their houses, came to seek succor and an asylum amid their brethren of the West. These Christians described the persecutions which the worshipers of Christ had undergone at the hands of the Mussulmans. The women, children, and old men were detained as hostages; all who were able to bear arms were condemned to laboy exceeding their strength. The head of the principal hospital for pilgrims, together with a great number of Christians, had been thrown into prison. The treasures of the churches had been plundered to support the Mussulman soldiery. The patriarch Simon had gone to Cyprus, to implore the charity of the faithful to save his flock from threatened destruction, if he did not pay the enormous tribute imposed by the oppressors of the Holy City. Every day the Christians of Jerusalem were loaded with fresh outrages; and several times the infidels had formed the project of giving them up to the flames, and completely destroying the Holy Sepulchre, with the Church of the Resurrection. The Christian fugitives, while making these doleful recitals to the warlike pilgrims, earnestly exhorted them to attack Jerusalem. In the early days of the siege, an anchorite, who had fixed his retreat upon the Mount of Olives, came to join his entreaties to those of the banished Christians, to persuade the Crusaders to proceed to an immediate assault; he urged his suit in the name of Christ, of whom he declared himself the interpreter. The Crusaders, who had neither ladders nor machines of war, gave themselves up to the councils of the pious hermit, and believed that their courage and their good swords would suffice to overthrow the ramparts of the Saracens. The leaders, who had seen such prodigies enacted by the valor and enthusiasm of the Christian soldiers, and who had not forgotten the prolonged miseries of the siege of Antioch, yielded without difficulty to the impatience of the army; in addition to which, the sight of Jerusalem had exalted the spirits of the Crusaders, and rendered the least credulous hopeful that God would second their bravery by miracles.

At the first signal, the Christian army advanced in good order toward the ramparts. Never, say historians, was so much ardor witnessed in the soldiers of the Cross; some, serried in close battalions, covered themselves with their bucklers, which formed an impenetrable vault over their heads, and gave their utmost efforts to shake the walls with pikes and hammers; whilst others, ranged in long files, remained at some distance, employing slings and cross-bows to drive away the enemies from the ramparts. Boiling oil and pitch, immense stones and enormous timbers, fell upon the first ranks of the Christians, without stopping their labors. The outward wall had already crumbled beneath their blows, but the interior wall presented an invincible object. Escalade was the only means left. This bold method was attempted, although they could only find one ladder long enough to reach the top of the walls. The bravest mounted it, and fought hand to hand with the Saracens, who were astonished at such audacity. The Crusaders would most probably have entered Jerusalem that very day, if they had had the necessary war instruments and machines; but the small number who were able to attain the top of the walls could not maintain themselves there. Bravery was useless; Heaven did not accord the miracles promised by the hermit, and the Saracens at length forced the assailants to retreat.

The Christians returned to their camp, deploring their imprudence and their credulity. This first reverse taught them that they could not reckon upon prodigies, and that they must, before they could expect to succeed, construct some machines of war. But it was difficult to procure the necessary wood in a country which presented nothing but barren sand and arid rocks. Several detachments were sent to search for wood in the neighboring plains. Chance led them to the discovery of some immense beams in the depths of a cavern, and Tancred had them transported to the camp. They demolished all the houses and churches that had escaped the flames; and every stick of wood that the Saracens had not destroyed, was employed in the construction of the machines. Notwithstanding the discoveries, the work did not keep pace with the impatience of the Crusaders, or prevent the evils which threatened the Christian army. The great summer heats commenced at the very time the pilgrims arrived before Jerusalem. A blazing sun, and southern winds laden with the sands of the desert, heated the atmosphere to an intolerable degree. Plants and animals perished; the torrent of Cedron was dried up; all the cisterns around were either choked or poisoned. Beneath a sky of fire, in a burning and arid country, the Christian army soon found itself a prey to all the horrors of thirst.

The fountain of Siloë, which only flowed at intervals, could not suffice for the multitude of pilgrims. A skin of fetid water, fetched three leagues, was worth two silver deniers. Overcome by thirst and heat, the soldiers were seen digging the soil with their swords, thrusting their hands into the freshly-turned earth, and eagerly carrying the humid particles to their parched lips. During the day, they anxiously looked for night; and during the night panted for dawn, in the ever-disappointed hope that the return of the one or the other would bring some degree of freshness or some drops of rain. Every morning they were to be seen gluing their burning lips to the marbles which were covered with dew. During the heat of the day the most robust languished under their tents, without having even strength to implore Heaven for relief.

The knights and barons were in no respect exempt from the scourge under which the army suffered; and many of them daily exchanged for water the treasures obtained from the infidels. "The grief of this extreme thirst," says the old translator of William of Tyre, "was not so great for the foot soldiers as for the horsemen; the foot soldier could content himself with a little, but the horsemen could only satisfy their horses with copious draughts. As to the beasts of burden, there was no more account taken of them than of so many dead creatures; they were allowed to wander away at will, and died of thirst."

In this state of general misery, the women and children dragged themselves about the country in search of a spring, or cooling shades which had no existence. Many of these, wandering too far from the army, fell into the ambuscades of the Saracens, and lost either their lives or their liberty. When a pilgrim discovered a spring or a cistern in a secluded spot, he concealed it from his companions, or forbade their approaching it. Violent quarrels arose in consequence, and it was not uncommon to see the soldiers of the Cross contending, sword in hand, for a little muddy water. The want of water was so insupportable, that famine was scarcely perceived or thought of: the heats of thirst and of the climate made them careless of food.

If the besieged had then made a spirited sortie, they would have easily triumphed over the Crusaders; but the latter were defended by the remembrance of their exploits, and, however great their distress, their name alone still inspired terror among the Saracens. The Mussulmans might, likewise, well believe that their enemies could not long resist the double scourge of hunger and thirst.

The leaders were fully aware there was no other remedy for the ills they labored under but the capture of Jerusalem; but the labors of the siege went on slowly; they had not yet enough wood for the construction of machines; they wanted laborers and the necessary implements.

The wisest and the bravest, in such a critical situation, were beginning to despair of the success of the holy enterprise, when they were cheered by a succor as welcome as it was unexpected. They learned that a Genoese fleet had entered the port of Joppa, laden with provisions and munitions of all kinds. This news spread joy through the Christian army; a body of 300 men left the camp to go and meet the convoy, which Heaven appeared to have sent to the Crusaders in their misery. The detachment, after having beaten the Saracens they met with on their passage, entered the city of Joppa, which had been abandoned by its inhabitants, and was occupied by the Genoese. The Crusaders learned that the Genoese fleet had been surprised and burned by that of the Saracens, but that they had had time to secure the provisions, and a great number of implements and tools. All that was saved was safely conveyed to the camp; and it afforded the Crusaders additional joy to find that the welcome supply was attended by a great number of Genoese engineers and carpenters.

As wood was still short for the construction of the machines, a Syrian conducted the Duke of Normandy, and the Count of Flanders, to a mountain situated 30 miles from Jerusalem. It was here the Christians found the forest, of which Tasso speaks in the "Jerusalem Delivered." The trees of this forest were not forbidden to the axe of the Crusaders, either by the enchantment of Ismen, or the arms of the Saracens: cars drawn by oxen transported it in triumph to the walls of Jerusalem.

All the leaders, except Raymond of Toulouse, were in want of money to pay for the labors they had commanded. The zeal and charity of the pilgrims came to their relief; many offered all they had left of the booty conquered from the enemy; knights and barons themselves, became laborious workmen; all at length were employed—every thing in the army was in movement: women, children, and even the sick, shared the labors of the soldiers. While the most robust were occupied in the construction of rams, catapultas, and covered galleries, others fetched in skins the water they drew from the fountain of Elperus, on the road to Damascus, or from the rivulet which flowed on the other side of Bethlehem, toward the desert of St. John; some prepared the skins which were to be stretched over the machines to make them proof against fire; while others traversed the neighboring plains and mountains, to collect branches of the olive and fig-trees to make hurdles and fascines.

Although the Christians had still much to suffer from thirst and the heat of the climate, the hope of soon seeing an end to their labors, gave them strength to support them. The preparations for the assault were pressed on with incredible activity; every day some new formidable machine threatened the ramparts of the Saracens. Their construction was directed by Gaston, of Béarn, of whose bravery and skill historians speak loudly. Among these machines were three enormous towers of a new form, each having three stages: the first destined for the workmen who directed the movements of it, and the second and third, for the warriors who were to make the assault. These rolling fortresses rose to a greater height than the walls of the besieged city; on the top was a species of drawbridge, which could be lowered on to the ramparts, and form a road into the place.

But these powerful means of attack were not the only ones which were to second the efforts of the Crusaders. The religious enthusiasm which had already performed such prodigies, again lent its influence to augment their ardor and confidence in victory. The clergy, spreading themselves through the quarters, exhorted the pilgrims to penitence and concord. The solitary from the Mount of Olives, added his exhortations to those of the clergy; and advised the Crusaders to make the tour of Jerusalem, invoking the mercy and protection of Heaven.

The pilgrims, persuaded that the gates of the city were not less likely to open to devotion than bravery, listened with docility to the exhortations of the hermit, whose counsel they conceived to be the language of God himself. After a rigorous fast of three days, the left their quarters, in arms, and marched barefooted, with heads uncovered, around the walls of the holy city. They were preceded by their priests clothed in white, bearing the images of saints, and singing psalms and spiritual songs; the ensigns were unfurled, and the drums and trumpets called the echoes from the hills and valleys.

The Crusaders set out from the valley of Rephraim, which is opposite Calvary; they advanced toward the north, and on entering the valley of Jehoshaphat, saluted the tombs of Mary, St. Stephen, and the first elect of God. While continuing their march toward the Mount of Olives, they contemplated with respect the grotto in which Christ shed the sweat of blood, and the spot where the Saviour of the world wept over Jerusalem. When they arrived at the summit of the mountain, the most imposing spectacle presented itself to their eyes: on the east they beheld the plains of Jericho, the shores of the Dead Sea, and the banks of the Jordan; on the west, the holy city lay at their feet, with its territory strewn with sacred ruins: assembled on the very spot whence Christ ascended into Heaven, and where they anxiously looked for the vestiges of his steps, they listened to the exhortations of their priests and bishops. Arnoul de Rohés, chaplain to the Duke of Normandy, addressed them in a pathetic discourse, conjuring them to redouble their zeal and perseverance. In terminating his address, he turned toward Jerusalem: "You behold," said he, "the heritage of Christ defiled by the impious: here is at length the worthy reward of all your labors: these are the places in which God will pardon you all your sins, and bless your victories." At the voice of the orator, who pointed to the Church of the Resurrection, and the rocks of Cavalry, ready to receive them, the defenders of the Cross humbled themselves before God, and fixed their looks intensely upon Jerusalem.

As Arnoul pressed them in the name of Christ to pardon injuries and love one another, Tancred and Raymond, who had long had differences, embraced in the presence of the whole army; the soldiers and other leaders followed their example. The rich promised to assist with their alms the poor and the orphans who bore the cross. All forgot their fatal discords, and swore to remain faithful to the precepts of evangelic charity.

Whilst the Crusaders were thus giving themselves up to transports of devotion and piety, the Saracens assembled upon the ramparts raised high in the air crosses, which they loaded with outrages; they insulted the ceremonies of the Christians by their gestures and clamors. "You hear," exclaimed Peter the hermit, "you hear the menaces and blasphemies of the enemies of the true God; swear to defend Christ, a prisoner and crucified a second time by the infidels. You behold him expiring a second time on Calvary for the redemption of your sins." At these words, the conubite was interrupted by the cries and groans of indignation which arose on all parts around him. "Yes, I swear by your piety," continued the orator, "I swear by your arms, the reign of the impious draws near to its end. The army of the Lord has only to appear, and all that vain mass of Mussulmans will fade away like a shadow. To-day full of pride and insolence, to-morrow they will be frozen with terror, and will fall motionless before you, as did the guardians of the sepulchre, who felt their weapons escape from their hand, and sunk dead with fear when an earthquake announced the presence of a God upon Calvary, where you are about to mount to the breach. Yet a few moments, and those towers, the last bulwarks of the infidel, will be the asylum of Christians; those mosques, which rise upon Christian ruins, will serve as a temple to the true God, and Jerusalem will once again listen to nothing but the praises of the Lord."

At these last words of Peter, the most lively transports burst from the Crusaders, they embraced again and again, with tears pouring down their embrowned cheeks, exhorting each other to support the evils and fatigues of which they were about to receive the glorious reward. The Christians then came down from the Mount of Olives to return to their camp, and, taking their route toward the south, saluted on their right the tomb of David, and passed close to the Pool Siloë, where Christ restored sight to the blind; they perceived at a distance the ruins of the palace of Judah, and marched along the declivity of Mount Sion, where other remembrances added to their enthusiasm. Toward evening, the Christian army regained their quarters, repeating the words of the prophet: "They of the West shall fear the Lord, and they of the East shall behold His glory." When they had re-entered the camp, most of the pilgrims passed the night in prayer; the leaders and the soldiers confessed their sins at the feet of their priests, and received their God, whose promises filled them with confidence and hope.

While matters were going on thus in the camp, the most profound silence reigned around the walls of Jerusalem, only broken by the voices issuing from hour to hour from the minarets of the mosques, to call the faithful to prayer. The infidels flocked in crowds to their temples to implore the protection of their prophet, and swore by the mysterious stone of Jacob to defend a city which they called the house of God. The besieged and the besiegers were stimulated by the same ardor to fight and shed their blood: the former to preserve Jerusalem, the latter to make the conquest of it. The hatred which animated them was so violent, that, during the whole of the siege, no deputed Mussulman came to the camp of the Christians, and the Christians never once deigned to summon the garrison to surrender. Between such enemies, the shock must be terrible and the victory implacable.

It was resolved, in a council of the leaders, to take advantage of the enthusiasm while it was at its height, and execute the assault. As the Saracens displayed a great number of machines on the side of the city which appeared to be most threatened by the Christians, it was determined to change the dispositions of the siege, and that the principal attack should be directed toward the points where the enemy had made no preparations for defense.

During the night Godfrey removed his quarters to the eastward, toward the gate of Cedar, not far from the valley in which Titus incamped when his soldiers penetrated into the galleries of the temple. The rolling tower, and the other machines of war which the Duke of Lorraine had caused to be built, were transported, with incredible efforts, in front of the walls he wished to attack. Tancred and the two Roberts drew up their machines between the gate of Damascus and the angular tower, which was afteward called Tancred's Tower.

At break of day the Saracens, on beholding these new dispositions, were seized with astonishment and terror. The Crusaders might have taken advantage of the confusion inspired in this change; but upon a steep ground it was difficult to bring their machines close to the walls. Raymond, in particular, who was charged with the attack on the south, found himself separated from the ramparts by a ravine, which it was necessary for him to fill up. He caused it to be proclaimed by a herald that he would pay a denier to every person who would cast three stones into it. A crowd of people instantly flocked to the aid of the soldiers—a shower of darts and arrows from the ramparts producing no effect upon the ardor and zeal of the laborers. At length, by the end of the third day, all was completed, and the leaders gave the signal for a general assault.

On Thursday, the 14th of July, 1099, as soon as day appeared, the clarions resounded in the camp of the Christians; all the Crusaders flew to arms; all the machines were put in motion at once; pedereros and mangonnels vomited a shower of stones against the enemy; while, protected by the tortoises and covered galleries, the rams were brought up close to the walls. The archers and crossbowmen kept up a continuous discharge at the ramparts, while the bravest, covered with their bucklers, planted ladders in places where the walls appeared most assailable. On the south, the east, and the north of the city, the three rolling towers advanced toward the ramparts, amid tumultuous noise, and the shouts of the workmen and soldiers. Godfrey appeared upon the highest platform of his wooden fortress, accompanied by his brother Eustache, and Baldwin du Bourg. He animated his men by his example; every javelin he hurled, says the historians of the times, carried death to a Saracen. Raymond, Tancred, the Duke of Normandy, and the Count of Flanders, fought among their soldiers; the knights and men-at-arms were animated by the same ardor as the principal leaders, and eagerly sought every point where danger threatened most.

Nothing could equal the fury of the first charge of the Christians, but it everywhere met with an obstinate resistance. Arrows, javelins, boiling oil, the Greek fire, and fourteen machines, which the besieged had had time to oppose to those of their enemies, repelled on all sides the attacks and the efforts of the assailants. The infidels, issuing by a breach made in their rampart, attempted to burn the machines of the besiegers, and spread disorder throughout the Christian army. Toward the end of the day the towers of Godfrey and Tancred could not be made to move; Raymond's had sunk into ruins. The combat had lasted twelve hours without victory being at all inclined to favor the Crusaders;—night separated the combatants. The Christians returned to their camp, trembling with rage and grief; the leaders, particularly the two Roberts, could not console themselves, from the idea that God had not yet thought them worthy to enter the Holy City, and worship the tomb of his Son.

The night was passed on both sides in a state of anxious inquietude, each deploring their losses, and trembling at the prospect of fresh ones. The Saracens expected a surprise; the Christians feared that the Saracens would burn the machines they had left at the foot of the ramparts. The besieged were employed in repairing the breaches made in their walls; the besiegers in attempting to put their machines in a state for another attack. The following day brought the same combats and the same dangers as the preceding one. The leaders endeavored to revive the courage of the Crusaders by their speeches. The priests and bishops went among the tents of the soldiers, announcing the certain succor of Heaven. The Christian army, filled with new confidence in victory, appeared under arms, and advanced in silence toward the points of attack, while the clergy walked in procession round the city.

The first shock was impetuous and terrible. The Christians, indignant at the resistance they had met with the day before, fought with fury. The besieged, who had learned the arrival of an Egyptian army, were animated by the hopes of victory; formidable machines covered their ramparts. Javelins were heard hissing on all sides; stones and large timbers, launched by the Christians and infidels, met in the air with a fearful crash, and fell upon the assailants. From the height of their towers the Mussulmans incessantly hurled blazing torches and fire-pots. The wooden fortresses of the Christians approached the walls amid a conflagration which seemed spreading in all directions. The infidels directed most of their efforts against the tower of Godfrey, upon which glittered a cross of gold, the sight of which provoked their fury and their insults. The Duke of Lorraine had seen one of his esquires and several of his soldiers fall by his side, himself a mark for all the arrows and darts of the enemy, he fought on amid the dead and the wounded, never ceasing to shout encouragement to his companions in arms. The Count of Toulouse, who attacked the city on the south side, opposed all his machines to those of the Mussulmans; he had to contend with the Emir of Jerusalem, who animated his troops by his words, and showed himself upon the walls, surrounded by the elite of the Egyptian soldiery. Toward the north, Tancred and the two Roberts appeared at the head of their battalions. Motionless upon their rolling fortress, they looked impatient to be wielding lance and sword. Already their rams had, upon several points, shaken the wall, behind which the Saracens closed their ranks, and presented themselves as a last rampart to the attack of the Crusaders.

In the midst of the combat, say the historians, two female magicians appeared upon the ramparts of the city, appealing to the elements and the powers of hell. They were not able to avoid the death they invoked upon the Christians, and fell beneath a shower of arrows and stones. Two Egyptian emissaries, who had come from Ascalon to exhort the besieged to defend themselves, were surprised by the Crusaders as they were seeking to obtain entrance into the city. One of them fell, covered with wounds; the other, after having revealed the secret of his mission, was launched, by means of a machine, on to the ramparts where the Saracens were fighting.

The combat had lasted half the day, without the Crusaders being able to entertain any hope of penetrating into the place. All their machines were on fire; they wanted water, but more particularly vinegar, which alone had the power to extinguish the kind of fire launched at them by the besieged. In vain the bravest exposed themselves to the greatest dangers, to prevent the destruction of all the wooden machines and the rams; they fell, buried under the ruins, and the raging flames devoured even their bucklers and their vestments. Many of the most intrepid warriors had found death at the foot of the ramparts; a great number of those mounted on the towers had been placed hors de combat; others, covered with sweat and dust, smothered with heat, and staggering under the weight of their armor, began to lose courage. The Saracens, who perceived this, uttered loud cries of joy. In their blasphemies, they reproached the Christians with adoring a God who was not able to help them. The assailants deplored their lot, and believing themselves abandoned by Christ, remained motionless on the field of battle.

But the combat was about to change its character. All at once the Crusaders beheld, on the Mount of Olives, a horseman, waving his buckler, and giving the Christian army the signal to enter the city. Godfrey and Raymond, who perceived him first, and at the same moment, cried out that St. George was come to the succor of the Christians. The tumult of the fight allowed of neither reflection nor examination, and the sight of the celestial horseman fired the besiegers with fresh ardor. They returned to the charge; even the women, the children, and the sick crowded into the mêlée, bringing water, food, and arms, and uniting their efforts with those of the soldiers to get the rolling towers, the dread of the enemy, nearer to the walls. That of Godfrey advanced, amid a terrible discharge of stones, arrows, and Greek fire, and let fall its drawbridge upon the wall. Fiery darts flew at one and the same time against the machines of the besiegers, and against the sacks of straw and hay, and the bales of wool which covered the inner walls of the city. The wind kindled the fires, and drove the flames full upon the Saracens, who, enveloped in fire and smoke, recoiled at the aspect of the lances and swords of the Christians. Godfrey, preceded by the two brothers, Lethalde and Engelbert of Tournay, and followed by Baldwin du Bourg, Eustache, Raimbaud, Créton, Guicher, Bernard de St. Vallier, and Amenjeu d' Albret, broke through the enemy, pursued them, and rushed with them into Jerusalem. The brave men who had fought upon the platform of the tower with their intrepid leader, followed them into the streets, and massacred all they met with on their passage.

At the same time, a report was spread in the Christian army, that the holy pontiff Adhémar, and several Crusaders who had died during the siege, had appeared at the head of the assailants, and unfurled the banners of the Cross upon the towers of Jerusalem.

Tancred and the two Roberts, animated by this account, made fresh efforts, and threw themselves into the place, accompanied by Hugh de St. Paul, Gerard de Roussillon, Louis de Mousson, Conon and Lambert de Montargis, and Gaston de Bearn. A crowd of heroes follow them closely; some enter by a half-open breach, others scale the walls with ladders, many spring from the wooden towers. The Mussulmans fly on all sides, and Jerusalem resounds with the victory-cry of the Crusaders, God wills it! God wills it! The companions of Godfrey and Tancred hew down the gate of St. Stephen with axes, and the city lies open to the crowd of Crusaders, who press upon each other, and dispute the honor of inflicting the last blow upon the infidels.

Raymond alone met with some resistance. Made aware of the victory of the Christians by the cries of the Mussulmans, the clash of arms, and the tumult from the interior of the city, he roused the courage of his soldiers. These brave men, impatient to join their companions, abandoned their tower and their machines, which they could no longer move. They planted their ladders, and sticking their swords into the walls as steps, they mounted to the ramparts; they were preceded by the Count de Toulouse, Raymond Pelet, the Bishop of Bira, the Count de Die, and William de Sabran. Nothing could now stop them; they dispersed the Saracens, who, with their emir, flew for refuge to the fortress of David; and soon all the Crusaders in Jerusalem met together, embraced, wept with joy, and gave all their attention to securing their victory.

In the mean time, despair had for a moment rallied the bravest of the Saracens; they fell with impetuosity upon the Christians, who were advancing in disorder, bent upon pillage. The latter were beginning to give way before the enemy they had conquered, when Evrard de Preysaie, whose bravery Ralph of Caën has celebrated, revived the courage of his companions, placed himself at their head, and once more carried terror among the infidels. From that mo-

History has remarked that the Christians entered Jerusalem on a Friday, at three o'clock in the afternoon, which was the day and the hour at which Christ expired for the salvation of mankind. This memorable epoch ought to have recalled to their hearts a feeling of mercy; but, irritated by the menaces and long insults of the Saracens, exasperated by the various ills they had undergone during the siege, and the resistance they had met with, even in the city, they filled the Jerusalem they came to deliver, and which they considered as their future country, with blood and mourning. The carnage was soon general, such as escaped the swords of the soldiers of Godfrey and Tancred, becoming the victims of the Provençals, equally thirsty for blood. The Saracens were indiscriminately massacred in the streets and in their houses; Jerusalem had no asylum for the vanquished; some tried to escape death by precipitating themselves from the ramparts, while others ran in crowds to seek refuge in the palaces, the towers, and particularly in the mosques, but nowhere could they escape the murderous pursuit of the Christians.

The Crusaders, masters of the Mosque of Omar, in which the Saracens had defended themselves for a short time, repeated the scenes of carnage which had followed and sullied the conquest of Titus. Foot and horse entered the sacred structure pêle-mêle with the vanquished. Amid the most horrible tumult the place re-echoed with cries and groans of death; the conquerors trampled upon heaps of slain in pursuit of such as endeavored to escape. Raymond d'Agiles, an eye-witness, says that beneath the portico and in the front court of the Temple the blood ascended to the knees and the bridles of the horses. To paint this terrible spectacle, which war presented twice in the same place, it will suffice to say, in the words of Josephus, that the number of the slain exceeded by far that of the soldiers who immolated them to their vengeance, and that the echoes of the mountains neighboring the Jordan repeated the groans and cries that issued from the Temple.

The imagination turns with disgust at these horrible pictures, and can scarcely, amid the carnage, contemplate the Christians of Jerusalem whose chains the Crusaders had broken. They crowded from all parts to meet the conquerors; they shared with them the provisions they had been able to keep from the Saracens; and all together were thankful to God who had crowned the arms of the Christians with such a triumph. The hermit Peter, who, five years before, had promised to arm the West for the deliverance of the Christians of Jerusalem, must have experienced inexpressible delight in witnessing their gratitude and joy. They appeared to consider no one among the Crusaders but him; they recalled his words and his promises; it was to him they addressed their songs of praise; it was him they proclaimed their liberator; they related to him all they had suffered during his absence; they could scarcely believe that he stood before them; and, in their enthusiasm, they expressed astonishment that God should have employed one man alone to rouse so many nations and effect such prodigies.

The sight of the brethren they had delivered, no doubt, reminded the pilgrims that they had come for the purpose of worshiping the tomb of Jesus Christ. The pious Godfrey, who had abstained from slaughter as soon as the victory was certain, quitted his companions, and, followed by two of his attendants, repaired, without arms, and barefoot, to the Church of the Holy Sepulchre. The news of this purpose of devotion soon spread through the Christian army, and immediately all fury, all vengeance, were appeased; the Crusaders, stripping off their blood-stained vestments, made Jerusalem resound with their sobs and groans, and, led by the clergy, they marched in a body, barefoot and with uncovered heads, toward the Church of the Resurrection.

When the Christian army was thus assembled upon Calvary, night began to fall; silence reigned in the public places and upon the ramparts; nothing was to be heard in the Holy City but canticles of penitence, and the words of Isaiah, "You who love Jerusalem, rejoice you with her!" The Crusaders evinced so much devotion that, according to the remark of a modern historian, it might be thought that these men who had just taken a city by assault, and committed a horrible carnage, really came from a long retreat and a profound meditation upon religious mysteries. These inexplicable contrasts are often remarked in the history of the Crusaders. Some writers have fancied they found in them a pretext for an accusation against the Christian religion; others, not less blind or less prejudiced, attempt to excuse the deplorable excesses of fanaticism: the impartial historian is satisfied with relating them, and sighs in silence over the weakness of human nature.

Besides, this pious fervor was soon burnt out, and only suspended the scenes of carnage for awhile; policy and cupidity soon led to fresh horrors, and fanaticism most ably seconded them. All whom humanity or lassitude of carnage had spared, or even some who had been saved in the hopes of a rich ransom, were slaughtered. The Saracens were forced to precipitate themselves from the tops of their houses, they perished by thousands in the flames; they were dragged into the public places, and immolated upon the heaps of slain which already encumbered them. Neither the tears of women, the cries of infants, nor the aspect of the Holy Places, where Christ had pardoned his executioners, had power to soften the irritated conquerors. The carnage was so great, that heaps of bodies were not only seen in the palaces, the temples, and the streets, but were found in the most secluded and solitary places. Such was the delirium of vengeance, cupidity, and fanaticism, that the scenes did not disgust beholders who might be supposed to be impartial: cotemporary historians describe them without offering a word of excuse, and throughout their recitals of revolting events, a single expression of horror or pity does not escape them. We, however, can not pursue the frightful details further. The carnage lasted for a full week, and the Oriental and Latin historians agree in stating that the numbers of Mussulmans slain in Jerusalem amounted to more than 70,000! The Jews experienced no more mercy than the Saracens: they took refuge in their synagogue; the Crusaders set fire to the building, and all perished in the flames.

Eleventh Siege, A.D. 1187.—The siege we have last described gave birth to one of the shortest-lived, and most troublous monarchies that is to be found in the pages of history. One or two good monarchs are met with in its short annals of 88 years, the rest were either wicked or imbecile, and only hastened the fall which naturally attended its peculiar construction and existence. The state of Jerusalem when the errors of its rulers brought upon it the vengeance of Saladin—perhaps the greatest man that ever figured in the East—was disgraceful beyond description.

To repeat the causes which had exasperated this powerful prince would trench too much upon the province of general history; suffice it to say, that the conduct of the Christians was a tissue of weakness, perfidy, and occasional insane rashness; they were under no strong-handed or prudent government, they showed themselves subject to no moral restraints.

Politic, brave, cool, but severe when provoked, Saladin was the last man the Christians should have made an enemy of. Irritated by their total want of good faith, and their perpetual invasion of his territory when they thought he was distant or engaged with other objects, he at length determined to subdue them, and that effectually, by taking their capital city.

After gaining the sanguinary battle of Tiberias, and taking every city in Palestine before which he thought it worth his while to sit down, the victorious sultan advanced toward Jerusalem. The moment appeared to be come at which this religiously important city must fall again into the power of the Mussulmans, and they implored Mohammed to grant this crowning triumph to the arms of Saladin. After having taken Gaza, and several fortresses in the neighborhood, the sultan collected his whole army and surrounded the holy city. A queen in tears, the children of the warriors killed at the battle of Tiberias, a few fugitive soldiers, and some pilgrims recently arrived from the West, were the only guardians of the Holy Sepulchre. A great number of Christian families who had left the devastated provinces of Palestine filled the city; but far from bringing it any assistance, they only served to augment the trouble and consternation.

When close to the walls, Saladin summoned before him the principal inhabitants, and said to them: "I know, as well as you do, that Jerusalem is the house of God, and I do not wish to profane its sanctity by the effusion of blood: abandon its walls, and I will give up to you a part of my treasures; I will give you as much land as you can cultivate." "We can not," they replied, "cede willingly a city in which our God died; still less can we yield it to you." Saladin, irritated by their refusal, swore upon the Koran to level the towers and ramparts of Jerusalem, and to avenge the death of the Mussulmans slaughtered by the companions and the soldiers of Godfrey de Bouillon.

At the moment Saladin was speaking to the deputies, an eclipse of the sun all at once left the heavens in darkness, and appeared to be a sinister presage for the Christians. Nevertheless, the inhabitants, encouraged by the clergy, prepared to defend the city. They had chosen as leader Baleau d'Ibelin, who had been present at the battle of Tiberias. This old warrior, whose experience and virtue inspired confidence and respect, immediately set about repairing the fortifications and disciplining the new defenders of Jerusalem. As he wanted officers, he created fifty knights from among the citizens; all the Christians in a condition to fight took up arms, and swore to shed their blood in the cause of Christ. There was no money to defray the expenses of the war, but all means of obtaining it appeared legitimate amidst the danger which threatened the city of God. The churches were spoiled, and the people, terrified at the approach of Saladin, beheld without scandal the precious metal which covered the chapel of the Holy Sepulchre converted into coin.

The standards of Saladin were speedily seen floating over the heights of Emmäus; the Mussulman army pitched its camp on the same places as were occupied by the tents of Godfrey, Tancred, and the two Roberts, when they besieged the Holy City. The Christians at first opposed a warm resistance, and made frequent sorties, in which they held in one hand the lance or the sword, and in the other a shovel, with which they threw dust in the eyes of the Saracens. A great number of citizens received the palm of martyrdom, and ascended, say the historians, into the celestial Jerusalem. Many Mussulmans fell under the swords of their adversaries, and went to inhabit the banks of the river which waters Paradise.

Saladin, after being incamped some days on the west of the city, directed his attacks on the north, and mined the ramparts which extend from the gate of Josaphat to that of St. Stephen. The bravest of the citizens made a sortie, and endeavored to destroy the machines and works of the besiegers, encouraging each other by repeating the words of Scripture—"A single one of us will put ten infidels to flight; and ten will scatter ten thousand." They performed prodigies of valor, but they could not retard the progress of the siege; repulsed by the Saracens, they slowly retired to the city, whither their return brought discouragement and terror. The towers and ramparts seemed ready to fall at the first assault. Despair then seized upon the inhabitants, who saw before them no defense but tears and prayers. Instead of flying to arms, the soldiers ran to the churches; the promise of a hundred pieces of gold could not detain them one night on the threatened ramparts. The clergy made processions through the streets, to invoke the assistance of Heaven; some beat their breasts with stones, others lacerated their bodies with scourges, crying, Mercy! mercy! Nothing was heard in Jerusalem but groans; "but our Sir Jesus Christ," says an old chronicle, "would not listen to them; for the luxurity and impurity which were in the city did not allow orisons or prayers to mount up before God." The despair of the inhabitants inspired them with a thousand contrary projects at once: sometimes they formed the resolution of leaving the city, and seeking a glorious death in the ranks of the infidels: at others, they placed all their hopes in the clemency of Saladin.

Among the general trouble and agitation, the Greek and Syrian Christians, and the Melchite Christians, endured with much pain the authority of the Latins, and laid to their charge all the misfortunes of the war. A plot was discovered, in which they had resolved to deliver Jerusalem to the Mussulmans: this discovery increased the general alarm, and determined the principal men of the city to ask a capitulation of Saladin. Accompanied by Baleau d'Ibelin, they went to propose to the sultan to give up the place upon the conditions he had offered before the siege. But Saladin remembered that he had sworn to take the city by assault, and to put all the inhabitants to the sword. He sent back the deputies without giving them any hope; Baleau d'Ibelin returned to him several times, renewed his supplications and prayers, but found Saladin still inflexible. One day, when the Christian deputies were conjuring him warmly to accept their capitulation, he turned toward the place, and, pointing to the standards which floated over the walls—"How can you ask me," said he, "to grant conditions to a captured city?" Notwithstanding this, the Saracens were repulsed; and Baleau, animated by the advantage obtained by the Christians, replied to the sultan—"You see Jerusalem does not want for defenses; if we can not obtain any mercy from you, we will adopt a terrible resolution, and the excess of our despair shall fill you with fright. Those temples and palaces you are so anxious to conquer shall be destroyed, and all our wealth, which excites the ambition and cupidity of the Saracens, shall be given up to the flames. We will lay level the mosque of Omar, and the mysterious stone of Jacob, the object of your worship, shall be broken and ground into dust. Jerusalem contains 5,000 Mussulman prisoners: they shall perish by the sword. We will, with our own hands, slaughter our women and our children, and thus spare them the disgrace of becoming your slaves. When the Holy City shall be nothing but a mass of ruins—one vast tomb, we will leave it, followed by the angry manes of our friends and neighbors; we will leave it, fire and sword in hand; not one of us will gain paradise, without having sent to hell ten Mussulmans. We shall thus obtain a glorious death, and shall yield our last breath in calling down upon you the maledictions of the God of Jerusalem."

This speech produced a great effect upon Saladin, and he invited the deputies to return next day. He consulted the doctors of the law, and they decided that he might accept the proposed capitulation without violating his oath. The conditions were signed on the morrow, in the tent of the sultan; thus Jerusalem again fell under the domination of the infidels, after having been eighty-four years in the hands of the Christians. The Latin historians had remarked that the Crusaders had entered Jerusalem on a Friday, at the same hour that Christ had suffered death to expiate the crimes of the human race. The Saracens retook the city on a Friday, the anniversary of the day on which, according to their belief, Mohammed ascended from Jerusalem to heaven. This circumstance, which might have induced Saladin to sign the capitulation proposed to him, did not fail to add new splendor to his triumph with the Mussulmans, and caused him to be looked upon as the favorite of the prophet.

All the warriors in Jerusalem obtained permission to retire to Tyre or to Tripoli. The conqueror granted their lives to the inhabitants, and permitted them to purchase their liberty. All Christians, with the exception of Greeks and Syrians, received an order to quit Jerusalem within four days. The ransom was fixed at ten pieces of gold for men, five for women, and two for children. Those who had not the means to purchase their freedom remained slaves.

These conditions had at first been received with joy by the Christians, but when the time arrived for their leaving Jerusalem, their grief at quitting the Holy Places became intense; they watered the tomb of Christ with their tears, and reproached themselves with not having died to defend it; they ran, unconsciously, from Calvary to the various churches they were never to see again, shedding torrents of tears; they embraced each other, weeping, in the streets, and deploring their fatal divisions. Such as could not pay their ransom, and could only leave Jerusalem as the slaves of the Saracens, gave themselves up to the wildest despair. But so great, in these deplorable moments, appeared their attachment to a religion whose precepts in happier times they had completely neglected, that the outrages offered to their worship afflicted them more then their own proper misery. A cross of gold having been torn from the dome of the church of the Templars, and dragged through the streets by the Saracens, all the Christians burst into cries of grief and indignation, and, although disarmed, Jerusalem was on the point of rising against its conquerors.

At last the fatal day arrived on which the Christians were to leave Jerusalem. All the gates of the city were closed, except that of David, through which the Christians were to go out. Saladin, seated upon a lofty throne, saw all the people pass before him. The patriarch, followed by the clergy, appeared the first, bearing the sacred vases, the ornaments of the Church of the Holy Sepulchre, and treasures of which, says an Arabian author, God alone knows the value. The Queen of Jerusalem, accompanied by the barons and knights, came next. Saladin respected her grief, and addressed some kind words to her. The queen was followed by a great number of women, bearing their children in their arms, and uttering the most pitiable cries. Several of them drew near to the throne of Saladin. "You see at your feet," said they, "the wives, the mothers, and the daughters of the warriors you detain prisoners; we are leaving for ever our country which they have defended with glory; they assisted us in supporting life; losing them we have lost our last hope; if you would deign to restore them to us, they would soften the miseries of our exile, and we should be no longer without a support upon earth." Saladin was touched by their prayers, and promised to mitigate the misfortunes of so many unhappy families. He restored the sons to mothers, and the husbands to wives, who were found among the captives. Many Christians had abandoned their valuable goods and property, in order to bear away upon their shoulders some of their parents weakened by age, and others their friends, the infirm, and the sick. Saladin was affected by this spectacle, and rewarded the virtue and piety of his enemies with gifts and alms; he took pity upon all the unfortunates, and permitted the Hospitalers to remain in the city to tend to the sick, as well as such as serious maladies prevented from moving.

When the Saracens commenced the siege, the Holy City contained more than 100,000 Christians. The greater part of them purchased their freedom: Balcau d'Ibelin, the depository of the treasures destined to defray the expenses of the siege, employed all that was left in the liberation of the citizens. Malec-Adel, the brother of the sultan, paid the ransom of 2,000 captives. Saladin followed his example, by setting free great numbers of poor and orphans. There only remained in slavery about 14,000 Christians, among whom were 4,000 or 5,000 children, too young to be aware of the extent of their misfortune, but whose fate the faithful deplored the more, especially as they knew that those innocent victims of war, would be brought up in the idolatry of Mohammed. From this period Jerusalem has remained in the hands of the Mohammedans.—Robson.

KAIBAR, A.D. 682.—Remarkable characters give consequence to insignificant places; Richard Cœur de Lion, who had filled two continents with his fame, was killed at the siege of a paltry castle, and the name of Chaluze is preserved in history. But Kaibar, a city of Arabia, is associated with, and saved from oblivion by, the name of even a greater man than Richard.

The Jews spread throughout Arabia attempted to cross the ambitious projects of Mohammed. They took up arms, and shut themselves up in the strongly fortified city of Kaibar. Although he had beaten them several times, Mohammed knew that he must not lose his prestige, and at once marched to attack them. Kaibar was carried, but the conquest proved fatal to the conqueror. He lodged at the house of one of the principal inhabitants, whose daughter, named Zainab, gave him for supper a poisoned shoulder of mutton. Mohammed vomited the meat; but such was the activity of the poison that from that moment he became a valetudinarian: he died from the effects of the poison three years after. When questioned as to what could lead her to the commission of such a crime, Zainab cooly replied, "I wished to know if Mohammed were really a prophet." Notwithstanding such a death would discredit the holiness of his mission, the followers of Mohammed do not deny this poisoning.—Robson.

KALAFAT, A.D. 1854.—On the 11th of March, 1854, a battle was fought between the Turks and Russians, near Kalafat, in European Turkey on the Danube: the Russians were defeated. On the 15th of March the Russians, under Prince Gortchakoff, renewed their attack upon Kalafat, but were defeated with a loss of 2,000 men.

KALISK, A.D. 1706.—Near Kalisk, a city of Poland, the Swedish army was totally defeated by the Poles, in the year 1706. In the year 1835 a grand military muster took place at Kalisk which was attended by the sovereigns of Russia, Austria, and Prussia, and other potentates.

KANTH, A.D. 1813.—A bloody battle took place in 1813 between the French and Prussians, near Kanth in Prussia.

KARS, A.D. 1855.—Kars is a city of Asiatic Turkey, 105 miles north-east of Erzroom.

The battle of Kars was fought on the 19th of August, 1855, between the Russians and Turks. The Turks lost 6,000 men, and sixteen pieces of cannon. The Russians lost 5,000 men slain, but remained in possession of the field of battle.

On the 29th of September, 1855, the Russians under General Mouravieff, the commander-in-chief of the Russian forces in Asia Minor, having invested Kars, made preparations to carry it by assault. Kars was occupied by about 16,000 English and Turks, under General Williams. The garrison made a strong resistance, and repeatedly drove back the besiegers; but were finally obliged by famine to capitulate. The conduct of the Russians on this occasion is worthy of all praise. The pale and emaciated appearance of their late foes moved their compassion to such a degree that they broke from their ranks and, rushing forward, offered them refreshments from their own knapsacks. Sixteen thousand prisoners, twelve standards, 130 cannon, and 30,000 muskets fell into the hands of the Russians on this occasion.

KATZBACH, A.D. 1813.—On the 26th of August, 1813, an obstinately contested battle was fought on the banks of the Katzbach, a river in Prussian Silesia, between the French army under Marshal Macdonald, and the Prussians, under Blucher, in which the French were defeated.

KERTCH, A.D. 1855.—On the 16th of December, 1855, a battle was fought between two sotnias of Cossacks, and a strong body of Anglo-Turkish cavalry, under General Vivian, near Kertch, in the Crimea. The allies were defeated, and General Vivian was made prisoner.

KET AND WARWICK, A.D. 1549.—Ket, the Tanner, was the leader of the insurgents in the risings of the people in England in 1549, during the reign of Edward VI. He planted his standard on the summit of Mousehold Hill, near Norwich, erected for himself a throne under a spreading oak, which he called the Oak of Reformation, and established courts of chancery, king's bench, and common pleas, in imitation of the courts in Westminster Hall. In his proclamations he complained that the commons were ground to the dust by the oppression of the rich; and that a new church service had been forced on the people in opposition to the conviction of their consciences; and declared that, if he and his associates had taken up arms, it was for the sole purpose of placing trusty and noble counselors round the king during his minority, and of removing those who confounded things sacred and profane, and regarded nothing but the enriching of themselves with the public treasure, that they might riot in it during the public calamity. Obeyed by 20,000 men, he treated the offer of a pardon with contempt; and when the Marquess of Northampton had entered Norwich with 1,000 English horse, and a body of Italians, under Malatesta, he attacked the city, set one part of it on fire, and killed the Lord Sheffield and 100 men, and compelled the marquess and his followers to retire out of the county. The government was greatly embarrassed; troops were re-called from the army in Scotland; the gentlemen of the neighboring counties were ordered by proclamation to join the royal forces; and the command was given first to Hertford, the Protector, and afterward to the Earl of Warwick. That nobleman, with 8,000 men, of whom 2,000 were German horse, forced his way into Norwich. Yet so incessant were the insurgents in their attacks, so lavish were they of life, that they often drove the gunners from the batteries, burst open the gates, and fought with the royalists in the streets. The earl commanded his followers to swear on their swords that they would never abandon the place; and by his perseverance was at length able to attain his object, of removing the enemy from their advantageous position. Compelled by want of provisions, Ket descended from the hills: in Dussingdale he was overtaken, by the royal army, his followers were broken by the charge of a large body of regular cavalry, and about 2,000 men perished in the action and the pursuit. The remainder, however, surrounded themselves with a rampart of wagons and a trench, fortified with stakes, and to an offer of pardon, replied that they knew the fate which awaited them, and that it was better to perish by the sword than by the halter. The earl, still apprehensive of the result, spoke to them himself: at his solicitation they accepted a general pardon; and the severity of the law was confined to the execution of Ket, on Norwich Castle; of his brother, on the steeple of Windham, and of nine others on the nine branches of the Oak of Reformation.

KHURD-KABOOL, A.D. 1841.—The British troops on their retreating from Cabool to Jelalabad, in 1841, entered Khurd-Kabool (Little Cabool), a village of Afghanistan, 16 miles south-east from Cabool, and were there attacked, overpowered, and massacred without mercy, by the Afghans.

KILLIECRANKIE, A.D. 1689.—This famous pass in the Grampian Mountains, in Scotland, is in Perth county, 15 miles north-west of Dunkeld. Here the river Garry flows, for nearly two miles through a narrow, rocky, and densely wooded ravine, of great depth, along the side of which the road has been cut, overhanging a terrific precipice. The battle of Killiecrankie, was fought at the north-western extremity of the pass. The most important military post in Athol, was Blair Castle. The house which now bears that name is not distinguished by any striking peculiarity from other country seats of the aristocracy. The old building was a lofty tower of rude architecture, which commanded a narrow valley, watered by the river Garry.

The walls would have offered very little resistance to a battering train; but were quite sufficient to keep in awe the roving herdsmen of the Grampian hills.

About five miles south of this stronghold, the valley of the Garry contracts itself into the celebrated glen of Killiecrankie. At present a highway as smooth as any road near London, ascends gently from the low country to the summit of the defile. White villas peep from the birch forest; and on a fine summer day, at frequent turns of the pass, may be seen some angler, casting his fly on the foam of the river—some artist sketching the pinnacle of a rock, or some party of pleasure banqueting upon its green margins, in the fret-work of shade and sunshine. The country just above this pass, was now the theater of war, such as the Highlanders had seldom witnessed. Men wearing the same tartan, and attached to the same lord, were arrayed against each other. Dundee, of Claverhouse, commanded the Highland clans, while Mackay, an officer of tried courage and caution, commanded the English troops, which had been hastily gathered. Both commanders made a push to seize and occupy this important stronghold.

Early on the morning of the 27th of July, 1689, Dundee arrived at Blair Castle. There he learned that Mackay's troops were already in the ravine of Killiecrankie. It was necessary to come to a prompt decision. A council of war was held. The Saxon officers were generally opposed to hazarding a battle. The Celtic chiefs were of a different opinion. Glengarry and Lochiel, were now both of one mind. "Fight, my lord," said Lochiel, with his usual energy; "fight immediately: fight if you have only one to three. Our men are in heart. Their only fear is that the enemy will escape. Give them their way, and be assured they will either perish or gain a complete victory. But if you restrain them, if you force them to remain on the defensive, I answer for nothing. If we do not fight, we had better break up and retire to our mountains."

Here the countenance of Dundee brightened. "You hear, gentlemen," said he to his Lowland officers—"you hear the opinion of one who understands Highland war better than any of us." But no voice was raised on the other side. A fight was concurred upon, and the confederated clans, in high spirits, set forward to encounter the enemy.

In the mean time, Mackay's troops had made their way up the pass. The ascent had been long and tiresome; for even the foot soldiers had to climb by twos and threes, and the baggage horses, 1200 in number, could mount only one at a time.

Previous to this battle, no wheeled carriage had ever tugged up this rugged and lofty path. The head of the column had emerged, and was on the table-land, while the rear guard was still in the plain below. At length the passage was effected, and the troops found themselves in a valley of no great extent. Their right was flanked by a rising ground, their left by the Garry. Wearied with the morning's work, they threw themselves on the ground to take some rest and refreshment.

Early in the afternoon, they were aroused by an alarm that the Highlanders were approaching. Regiment after regiment started up and got in order. In a little time, the summit of an ascent, about a musket-shot before them, was covered with bonnets and plaids. Dundee rode forward for the purpose of surveying the foes with whom he had to contend, and drew up his own men with as much skill as the peculiar character of their habits allowed. It was desirable to keep the clans distinct. Each tribe, large or small, formed a column, separated from the next column by a wide interval. One of these battalions might contain 700 men, while another consisted of only 120. Lochiel had represented that it was impossible to mix men of different tribes, without destroying all that constituted the peculiar strength of a Highland army.

Soon a fire of musketry was opened and kept up on both sides, but more skillfully and more steadily by the regular soldiers than by the mountaineers. The space between the two armies was one cloud of smoke. Numbers of the Highlanders dropped, and the clans became impatient. The sun, however, was low in the west, before Dundee gave the order to prepare for action. His men raised a great shout. The enemy, probably exhausted by the toils of the day, returned a feeble and wavering cheer. "We shall do it now, that is not the cry of men who are going to win," said Lochiel. He had walked through all his ranks, had addressed a few words to every Cameron, and had taken from every Cameron a promise to conquer or die.

It was now past seven o'clock. Dundee gave the word. The Highlanders dropped their plaids. The few who were so rich as to wear rude socks of untanned cowhide, threw them aside. It was long remembered in Lochabar that Lochiel did the same, and charged barefooted at the head of his men. The whole advanced firing. The enemy returned the fire, and did much execution. When only a small space was left between the two armies, the Highlanders suddenly flung away their firelocks, drew their swords, and rushed forward with a fearful yell. The Lowlanders prepared to receive the shock; but this was a long and awkward process, and the soldiers were still fumbling with the muzzles of their muskets and the handles of their bayonets, when the whole flood of the Macleans, Macdonalds and Camerons came down. In two minutes the battle was lost and won. The ranks of Balfour's regiment broke. He was cloven down while struggling in the press. Ramsay's men turned their backs and dropped their arms. Mackay's own foot troops were swept away by the furious onset of the Camerons. His brother and nephew exerted themselves in vain to rally the men. The former was laid dead on the ground by a stroke from a claymore, the latter, with eight wounds on his body, made his way through the tumult and carnage to his uncle's side. Even in that extremity, Mackay retained all his self-possession. He had still one hope. A charge by the horse might recover the day—for of the horse the bravest Highlanders were supposed to stand in awe. But he called to the horse in vain. Belhaven behaved indeed like a gallant gentleman; but his troopers, appalled by the rout of the infantry, galloped off in disorder. Annandale's men followed; all was over, and the mingled torrent of red coats and tartans went raving down the valley to the gorge of Killiecrankie.—Macaulay.

KINBURN, A.D. 1787.—A battle was fought in 1787 near Kinburn, a fortress of Russia, on a tongue of land at the mouth of the Dnieper, between the Turks and the Russians, under Suwarrow, in which the latter gained a signal victory.

BATTLE OF THE KINGS, B.C. 1918.—About the year 1918, B.C., a war broke out between the potentates of the countries adjacent to and in the neighborhood of Sodom and Gomorrah. Five kings contended against four, because the kings of Sodom and Gomorrah refused any longer to pay tribute to the King of Elam. The rebellious parties were vanquished by the King of Elam and his allies. Lot, who had received from his uncle Abraham the fertile and well-watered plains of Sodom and Gomorrah as a residence for himself, his children, and his servants, was taken prisoner by the conquering kings, and his property was despoiled. Abraham being informed of this disaster, applied to his friends and confederates, and his brothers Eshcol and Aner, and adding to their assistance 318 trained and tried servants of his own household, pursued the conquerors, and overtook them when they were on the left of Damascus. He at once attacked them, and the enemy, taken by surprise, fled after a feeble resistance, and Lot and the other captives were rescued.

KING'S MOUNTAIN, A.D. 1780.—King's Mountain is situated in the vicinity of a village bearing the same name, in Gaston co., in the northern part of South Carolina. It is a rocky ridge, running north and south, and is elevated about one hundred feet above the ravines which encompass it. Its sides are very steep, its summit narrow, and it is about a mile in length.

The Americans at the South were experiencing nothing but reverses. On the 16th of August, 1780, their army under General Gates was defeated at Camden by the British under General Cornwallis, and two days afterward the patriots under Sumter were defeated by the enemy's troops under Tarleton at Rocky Mount. The whole South seemed to be entirely in the power of the royalists. But west of the Wateree were bands of active patriots, who spared no pains to harass the enemy in the upper country. Cornwallis, determined to crush the spirit of rebellion which was still rife, detached Major Ferguson with a strong body of men with orders to scour the upper part of South Carolina, and punish the rebellious patriots with the utmost rigor. As the British advanced through the country they committed the most horrible outrages upon the persons and property of the inhabitants, and thus aroused the patriots to the highest pitch of indignation, filling every breast with a desire for vengeance. In various parts of the country, actuated by one impulse, the inhabitants banded themselves together, and placing themselves under the command of experienced leaders, demanded to be led against Ferguson's marauders. It was decided that each of the officers should collect his men, and that the forces should rendezvous at Watanga, on the 25th of September. Accordingly on that day. Colonel William Campbell with four hundred men from Washington county of Virginia, Colonel Isaac Shelby with two hundred and forty men from Sullivan county of North Carolina, and Lieutenant-Colonel John Sevier, with two hundred and forty men of Washington county of North Carolina, assembled at Watanga, where they were joined by Colonel McDonald with one hundred and sixty men from the counties of Burke and Rutherford. They commenced their march on the twenty-sixth, and on the thirtieth were joined by Colonel Cleveland on the Catawba river, with three hundred and fifty men, from Wilkes and Surrey counties. No one officer having properly a right to the command in chief, an express was dispatched to Major-General Gates, informing him of the situation of the army, and requesting him to send a general officer to take the entire command. Meanwhile, Colonel Campbell was chosen to act as commandant till such general officer should arrive. The army marched to Cowpens, on Broad river in South Carolina, where they were joined by Colonel James Williams, with four hundred men, on the evening of the 6th of October, Colonel Williams informed the American commander that the enemy lay incamped somewhere near the Cherry Ford of the Broad river, about thirty miles from Cowpens. A council of war was held in which it was decided that nine hundred of the best cavalry should be sent in rapid pursuit at once, while the foot, and the weak horse should follow as fast as possible. At eight o'clock the same evening, the American cavalry commenced its march, and after marching all night came within sight of the enemy about three o'clock in the afternoon of the following day. The British army lay incamped on the top of King's Mountain, twelve miles north of the Cherry Ford, in the confidence that they could not be forced from so advantageous a post. Previous to the attack, the following disposition was made: Colonel Shelby's regiment formed a column in the center on the left; Colonel Campbell's regiment another on the right, with part of Colonel Cleveland's regiment led by Major Winston; and Colonel Sevier's troops formed a large column on the right wing. The balance of Cleveland's regiment led by Colonel Cleveland himself, and Colonel Williams's regiment, composed the left wing. In this order the army advanced to within a quarter of a mile of the enemy before they were discovered.*

The following glowing account of the action which followed is extracted from the oration of the Hon. S. T. Preston, delivered on the 4th of October, 1855, at the battle-ground:

"At twelve o'clock, the American army found themselves within three miles of Ferguson's camp on King's Mountain. They halted under an order passed rapidly along the line—an order, perhaps, the most laconic and appropriate ever given under the like circumstances. It was in these words:

"'Tie up overcoats, prick touch-holes, fresh prime, and be ready to fight.'

"The officers here determined to divide their force, and to surround the mountain. At this moment an express from Ferguson to Cornwallis was arrested, his dispatches opened, and read aloud to the head of the line. In them he said, "I hold a position on King's Mountain, that all the rebels out of hell can not drive me from." There was no shout or disorder when this was read; but a quiet grim smile passed along the line as they struck into a double gallop. They drew up along the bank of that little brook; they dismounted and led their horses to these trees, leaving them in charge of a small guard.

"The order of attack was hurriedly made, but with a military skill and discretion that could not be excelled. There was not an error or mistake, or even a miscalculation of marching time from the onset to the end. Each column advanced rapidly along the indicated line, all the lines tending to a common center which was the British incampment at the summit of the ridge. There began a scattering fire, for eight or ten minutes on the center column of the Americans. The patriots moved steadily until Sevier's column, on the right, passed out of the valley in full sight of the enemy. The fire then began in earnest on both sides. The mountaineers proved their skill with the most deadly effect, forcing Ferguson, at the very beginning, to resort to a direct charge. This charge was headed by a company of British regulars, and was worthy the high name and fame of that service. It was boldly and gallantly done, and forced the patriots to give back down the hill; but at that moment Cleveland and Williams appeared on the left, and poured into the charging columns such an awful fire as to stop them before Sevier was routed. The British turned from charging on Sevier, and wheeling, made a terrible dash at Cleveland and Williams on the left, and with like effect, driving them back down the ridge. Sevier, however, rallied instantly, and at the same time Shelby and Campbell appeared with the center column, rising in front along the ridge. These two columns, the center and left, then poured their fire on both flanks of the British, and stopped the charge against Cleveland and Williams. Wheeling rapidly and receiving reinforcements from within the lines, the British then made a third charge directly against the center column, and that irresistible British bayonet again told its story, and Campbell and Shelby were forced back down nearly to the valley. But Cleveland and Williams having rallied their columns, and Sevier's continuing to pour its fire from the left, the British were forced to leave the pursuit of Campbell and Shelby, turned suddenly, and themselves retreated up the ridge. Shelby and Campbell, hearing this tremendous fire on both flanks, finding the British were retreating supposed they were defeated, rallied instantly, and turned in pursuit with loud hurrahs of victory.

"The British turned immediately and attempted a fourth charge. It, however, was then too late—the blood of the mountaineers was hot; they met and repulsed that charge, and drove back the British within their lines. This enabled the three columns of the patriots to meet and literally surround the army of Ferguson. Then came the fierce rage of the battle; a circle of fire hemmed the wolf in his stronghold. The English soldiers proved their breeding in this hour of danger and despair. The regulars with their bayonets, and the Tories with their butcher-knives fastened to the muzzles of the guns, charged on this closing flame with the energy of despair. In vain! The mountain-hunters, calmly, but rapidly loading, and deliberately aiming, each at his mark, sent a death-messenger in every bullet. At every discharge they advanced a few steps, until there was one narrowing circle of flashing flames crackling around their devoted victims. At this moment, the British cavalry were ordered to mount. The order was heard by the Americans. It was the very thing for their rifles, giving a clear mark above the bushes; and as each man threw his leg over his horse, he fell dead on the other side. Ferguson, with a gallantry that seemed to rise with his desperate condition, rode from rank to rank, and from post to post, encouraging, cheering, and driving his men. At length, he found his army pressed, and actually huddled together near the summit of the mountain, and falling as fast as the Americans could load and shoot. He determined on one more charge, and, taking his position at the head of his cavalry, and with a voice that was heard loud above the roar of battle, summoned his men to 'Crush the damned rebels into the earth.' There was a pause for a moment, and one round of the Americans was stopped. Instead of the roar of their rifles, there was heard only the click of the lock—it was the serpent's low warning of coming death. The pause was but for a moment, when Ferguson and Dupoistre, horse and foot, burst like an avalanche down the mountain's side. Before they came within sixty paces of the American line, every rifle was loaded, and under deadly aim. Ferguson was in front, and fell at the first discharge, with seven mortal wounds. The patriots rushed forward to meet the shock as Dupoistre's regulars, with set bayonets, and sabers in rest, came crushing down upon them. Not Agincourt nor Cressy, with all their chivalry, ever felt a shock more fearful than that; but, had the heaven rained British bayonets, it would not have stopped these patriots. The destinies of America, perhaps of mankind, depended on their muscle. Like martyrs, they went to the death; like lions, they rushed to the carnage. Officers and soldiers, with blood-shot eyes, and parched tongues, bounded upon the huddling enemy, until their fierce glare, and hot breath, could be seen and felt by the craven Tory and his bull-dog master; and at the moment they were crouching together for the last spring, a wild terror-stricken shriek rose above the battle—a yell for quarter. A white flag was run up, arms thrown down, and God's champions shouted 'Victory! Liberty!'"

The engagement lasted an hour and five minutes. The British army consisted of 1,100 men; 240 of the British were slain, and 200 wounded. The remaining 560 were made prisoners. The Americans lost only twenty men, killed; but a great number of them were wounded. On the morning after the battle, a court-martial was held for the purpose of trying the Tory prisoners for murder, and other high crimes. Several were convicted and hanged. Thus ended the bloody tragedy on King's Mountain. The victory was of the utmost importance to the Americans, weakening, irrevocably, the power of the royalists in North and South Carolina.

KIOGE, A.D. 1807.—Near Kiöge, a town of Denmark, in 1807, a small body of Danish militia were defeated by the English troops, under the command of Sir Arthur Wellesley, afterward Duke of Wellington.

KOSSOVO, A.D. 1389.—On the 15th of June, 1389, was fought, near Kossovo, a town of European Turkey, a battle between the Serbs and the Turks, in which the former were defeated, and, with their defeat, the independence of Servia was annihilated.

KOWNO, A.D. 1812.—On the 13th of December, 1812, Marshal Ney, with Napoleon's Old Guard, fiercely fought the Russians who were endeavoring to intercept the retreat of the French army, after their disaster at Moscow, while the main body was crossing the bridge at Kowno in Russia, and by the most heroic exertions kept them back until the whole army had crossed the river Niemen.

KRASNOI.—See Smolensko.

KULM, A.D. 1813.—Kulm is a village of Bohemia, sixteen miles north north-west of Leitmimitz at the foot of the Erzzebirge mountains, which are here crossed by the pass of Nollendorf.

The Nollendorf Pass will be ever memorable in history for the decisive battle of Kulm, fought at its foot on the 30th of August, 1813, between the French, commanded by Vandamme, and the allied forces under Count Colloredo Mansfield. The former had been detached by Bonaparte, with nearly 40,000 men, previous to the battle before Dresden, with orders to cross the Elbe, to the rear of the grand allied army, and take up a position on the heights beyond Peterswalde, so as to intercept that communication with Bohemia, but with a strict interdiction against his descending to the plain. Vandamme, however, knowing the small force there was to oppose him in Töplitz, and conceiving that by a bold stroke he might gain that pivot of the allied operations, and intercept the line of their retreat, disregarded his master's orders, and, on the morning of the 29th of August, descended and vigorously attacked Count Osterman, who had been left with about 8,000 men, chiefly Russian guards, to preserve the communications, when the grand allied army advanced on Dresden. Osterman had barely time to post his handful of men across the plain, in the rear of the small village of Oriesten, his left covered by the wooded heights, while his right, composed wholly of cavalry, toward the village of Karwitz, was, as it were en air, having but an insignificant—easily turned—marshy tract in the distance, when Vandamme made his attack. Yet, though Osterman's position was an open plain, overlooked and commanded by a range of heights occupied by his enemy—though that truly brave warrior had his left arm broken by a cannon-shot early in the day—though both villages were soon reduced to ashes by a foe outnumbering his force more than four-fold—he did not for a moment quit his glorious post, nor did his furious enemy gain one inch of ground, during the whole day of incessant attack, by successive fresh forces. The only aid to this invincible handful, on this long, hard-fought, day, was given at the last effort of the French near nightfall, when the Archduke John's regiment of dragoons, forming the advance of the allied column which had retreated from Dresden with the King of Prussia, by the Zinnewalde and Eichewalde Pass, was dispatched to Osterman's support by the king, immediately on his arrival at Töplitz. The men or horses of this regiment had scarcely tasted a mouthful of food, or rested, for three days, yet they marched with alacrity, and were in time to share with their brave Russian allies in completely repulsing Vandamme's last attempt, and in obliging him to seek his bivouac in his rear, near Kulm. During the night, Count Colloredo arrived from Theresienstadt, with the Austrian force he had collected, and, conjointly with the Russian and other troops that also joined him on the morning of the 30th, early, attacked Vandamme, driving him successively from all his positions with immense loss. At this critical moment, the Prussian corps of Kleist, which was retiring from the repulse before Dresden, down the Nollendorf Pass, in total ignorance of the proximity of such a foe, most opportunely met Vandamme, flying in confused masses, midway, and, by barring the only retreat, completed the ruin of the French corps-de-armée. Vandamme, his officers and men, with all their cannon, baggage and matériel, fell into the hands of the allies—a few thousand men excepted, who, by throwing away their arms, escaped separately through the woods, across the mountains, and regained Bonaparte's head-quarters at Dresden.

KURROCHEE, A.D. 1839.—The British in 1839 took Kurrochee, a town of Scinde on the Indian Ocean, and afterward held it as a military station.

LACEDÆMON, B.C. 272.—The restless, ambitious, insatiable Pyrrhus, King of Epirus, laid siege to Lacedæmon. He arrived in the evening with all his army, and only postponed the attack till the next day;—this delay saved Sparta. As soon as night came, the Lacedæmonians met to deliberate upon the propriety of sending their wives and daughters to the island of Crete; but the women strongly opposed such a determination. One of them, named Archidamia, entered the senate, sword in hand, and addressing the assembly in the name of all the rest, she proudly demanded why the senators had so bad an opinion of her and her companions, as to imagine they could love or endure life after the ruin of their country.

It was resolved that they should not leave the city. As the men were employed, with vigor and celerity, in digging a trench parallel with the camp of the enemy, to enable them to dispute the approach to the city, the women and girls came to join them, and after having exhorted those who would have to fight, to take repose during the night, they measured the length of the trench, and undertook, as their share, a third part of it, which they finished in the course of the day. This trench was nine feet wide, six deep, and 900 long. In all the attacks which took place till Pyrrhus was constrained to raise the siege, these courageous women conducted themselves in a manner worthy of the reputation of their mothers of former days.—Robson.

LA COLE MILL, A.D. 1814.—Near La Cole Mill, three miles below Rouse's Point on Lake Champlain, in New York, a battle occurred on the 30th of March, 1814, between the Americans, under General Wilkinson, and a body of Canadians. The Americans were repulsed with a loss of 150 men, killed and wounded. The loss of the enemy was not so great.

LANGSIDE, A.D. 1568.—The battle of Langside was fought on the 15th of May, 1568, between the forces of the regent of Scotland, the Earl of Murray, and the army of Mary, Queen of Scots. The latter was completely defeated, and immediately after this battle, the unfortunate queen fled for safety to England, where she was soon afterward imprisoned by her sister Elizabeth of England.

LAON, A.D. 1411.—Laon, in France, has sustained several sieges. In 1411 it was taken by the troops of the Duke of Burgundy, after a siege of three days; in 1419 it was besieged and taken by the English; in 1429 it was retaken by the French, and in 1594 it was captured by Henry IV. In the year 1814 Laon was the scene of some severe fighting between the French and the allies. The Prussians under Blucher having occupied the town, their position was unsuccessfully attacked on the 9th of March, by the French, under Napoleon; and the Prussians having cut to pieces and dispersed the corps of Marmont during the night, Napoleon was obliged to withdraw from before the town on the 11th.

LASWAREE, A.D. 1803.—In the year 1803, the native troops of Dowlet Row Sindea, were signally defeated by the British, under Lord Lake, near Laswaree, in India.

LAVAL, A.D. 1466.—Laval in France was taken by the English in 1466, and retaken by the French in 1467. It was also the scene of military operations in the Vendean war, at the close of the last century.

LEICESTER. See Naseby.

LEIPSIC, A.D. 1631.—Leipsic is situated in an extensive and fertile plain, on the river Elster, here joined by the Pleissee and Parde, in Saxony, and is one of the most important commercial towns of Germany.

The plains of Leipsic have thrice been deluged with the blood of hostile armies; and in two instances the battles fought are among the most important and memorable struggles of Europe. The first battle was fought on the 7th of September 1631, between the army of Gustavus Adolphus, King of Sweden, and that of the Catholic German generals Tilly and Pappenheim. The army of the King of Sweden consisted of 30,000 men, of whom 13,000 were cavalry. The infantry consisted of 13,000 Swedes, and 11,000 Saxons, the cavalry of 9,000 Swedes and 4,000 Saxons. The imperial army consisted of 32,000 men, of whom 11,000 were cavalry. On the 5th of September, Gustavus Adolphus and the Elector, John George of Saxony, completed their alliance; and on the same day, the imperial army under Tilley laid siege to Leipsic. After a heavy cannonade, and a severe struggle the town surrendered, and Tilly with his troops entered in triumph. The field-marshal, it is said, took up his quarters in the house of a grave-digger, and as his eye fell upon the skull and cross-bones with which its owner had ornamented the door-way, he turned pale at the evil omen.

He was about to try his strength with the "Lion of the North;" and for the first time the unconquered general was to meet a foe worthy of his arms; but whether his conscience smote him for his cruelties at Magdeburg, or whether he really feared his formidable opponent is all conjecture; it is sufficient to know that Tilly on this occasion exhibited but little of that decision of character for which he had been so highly distinguished. On the 6th of September, Tilly moved out of the city and incamped in a fortified position, between the little towns of Mockern (the scene of Blucher's victory over Ney in 1813) and Entritzsh. There he resolved to await the arrival of Altringer who was already on the march from Erfurt. When Tilly learned that Gustavus Adolphus and John George had formed an alliance, he called a council of war, in which it was decided to give battle to the King of Sweden. Tilly, depressed in spirits, at first resolved to act on the defensive only; but Pappenheim urgently insisted on a battle, and the field-marshal at length reluctantly gave his consent. The imperial army broke up their camp, and took up a new position with Breitenfeld on the left, and Seehausen on the right. In their front lay the villages of Podelwitz, on the left the village of Grebschelwitz. John George of Saxony was anxious to expel the imperial troops from his territory; and was urgent in his entreaties that Gustavus should at once advance against Tilly. The King of Sweden acceded to his request, and on the 6th of September the army commenced its march from Duben, in two columns, the Swedes on the right and the Saxons on the left. On the morning of the 7th the allied armies arrived within an hour's march of the enemy, and Gustavus immediately made his dispositions for the approaching battle. The King of Sweden planted his army between the villages of Grebschelwitz and Podelwitz. The allied army was divided into two columns, the right consisting of Swedes, the left of Saxons. The right wing of the Swedish army was commanded by Gustavus Adolphus in person, the center by General Tueffel, and the left wing by General Horn. The cavalry was on the wings, and was interspersed with foot soldiers. The Saxon army was under the command of the Elector John George; and in advance of both armies, nearly in the center of the space between them, was planted the artillery consisting of nearly a hundred pieces of cannon. A number of light cannon were also distributed among the troops. Many of these pieces were four pounders, and some were made of iron, and others of leather hooped with iron bands. The leather cannons were very light, and were carried by the foot soldiers, interspersed among the infantry. Tilly's army was planted in a single line, with its left wing extending beyond the right wing of the Swedish army, ten men deep; the cavalry was on the wings, unsupported by infantry, and there were no reserves. The artillery, consisting of 16 and 24 pounders, was stationed in the center. Tilly commanded the right wing; the left was under the command of Pappenheim and Count Furstenberg.

The battle was opened at twelve o'clock, by a furious cannonade on both sides, which continued nearly two hours. While the King of Sweden was maneuvering with his right wing, to avoid the consequences of the enemy's fire in that quarter, Pappenheim, with his cavalry, charged furiously upon the Swedish left flank; but a withering fire from the musketeers which were stationed among the cavalry on that side, drove him back with loss. Bannier rushed from the Swedish right with a body of infantry, and fiercely assailed the imperial troops under the Duke of Holstein. The imperialists were broken before the fierce charge, and the duke was mortally wounded. Pappenheim now charged the Swedish right wing with his troops so furiously, that had not Bannier hastened to its aid, it would have been broken; but the gallant Swedes fought with such fury that the imperial cavalry was again hurled back to their own line. Meanwhile, Count Furstenberg, with his troopers, assailed the Saxons, who had just formed, and such was the fury of the onset that the Saxons were scattered in all directions, and fled frantically across the plains. The elector succeeded in rallying a few only, who took up a position in rear of the left wing of the Swedish army. Pappenheim, wishing to unite his corps with that of Furstenberg, moved across the Swedish front, from right to left, thus exposing his troops to the fire of the Swedish battery in the center, which opened upon them with fearful effect. The battle now raged furiously. Tilley's men advanced rapidly to the fight; but the Swedes gallantly maintained their ground, and, in spite of the efforts of the field-marshal, who galloped furiously to every part of the plain, calling upon his men to fight on, and encouraging them, by the example of his own valor, his army was gradually beaten back at all points; the imperial artillery fell into the hands of the Swedes, and was turned upon the retreating army, and the retreat soon became a rout. Tilly himself was wounded, and narrowly escaped being made prisoner. The victorious Swedes pursued the fugitives, with great slaughter, until nightfall, when the pursuers were recalled.

In this battle the imperialists lost 7,000 killed, 5,000 wounded, and 3,000 prisoners. The artillery, baggage, colors, and all the paraphernalia of Tilly's camp, fell into the hands of the victors. Gustavus Adolphus lost 3,000 men, in killed and wounded, of whom 1,000 only were Swedes. This battle caused the name of Gustavus Adolphus to be feared by his enemies; the victory was decisive, and the Protestant religion, for which the King of Sweden fought, was triumphant in Germany.

The second battle of Leipsic was fought between the army of the Protestant general Torstenson, and the imperial army of Saxony, under the Archduke Leopold William, and Piccolomini, on the 2d of November, 1642. The imperial troops were defeated with great loss.

Of the three battles near Leipsic, that of the 18th of October, 1813, was most remarkable for its extent and duration, the magnitude of the contending armies, and the importance of its consequences. For the campaign of 1813, the allied powers had formed the plan of operating on the flanks of Napoleon, and uniting in his rear. With this view, the movements of the Silesian army under Blucher, and of the northern army under the crown prince, Charles John of Sweden (Bernadotte), were directed to the lower Elbe, and the movements of the main army, under Schwartzenberg, to the upper Elbe. Circumstances finally determined the country around Leipsic as the place where the junction should be formed, and Napoleon cut off from the Saal. In all probability, Napoleon was well aware of this project, but expected to frustrate it. A rapid march between the Mulda and the Elbe, a quick passage over the latter river at Dessau, ostensibly with the view of advancing upon Berlin, were to deceive and retard the northern army, and give Napoleon time to turn against Schwartzenberg, and drive him to the mountains of Saxony. If he was defeated, Blucher and John were to be defeated and destroyed.

In conformity with the plan of the allies, the great Bohemian army of 120,000 men marched on the 12th of October, in three columns, against Leipsic, over the Erzebirge. Napoleon, meanwhile, assembled his forces in and around Leipsic. On the 15th of October, the French emperor mustered his army, and gave his orders to the generals. His whole force consisted of about 90,000 men, the corps of Ney and Regnier being still on the road, or employed under Marmont, in covering the country to the northward. In the case of defeat the pass of Lindenau was to be secured by the troops of Bertrand. The army of the allies was under the command of Prince Schwartzenberg, although the monarchs of Russia, Prussia, and Austria, were present. Schwartzenberg intended to attack the French position in three columns. The allied troops were put in motion at about seven o'clock in the morning of the 16th of October; they carried the French outposts at the villages of Mackleburg, Wachau, and Lieberwolkwitz. At about nine o'clock the action became general, and the thunder of innumerable pieces of artillery shook the air. The soldiers of both parties were animated by the most brilliant courage. The fight for the possession of the villages was terrible. Six times did the brave Russians and Austrians return to the attack of these villages, and six times were they repulsed by the invincible courage of the French troops under Lauriston, supported by Macdonald's corps, and Sebastiani's dragoons. At eleven o'clock Macdonald brought up his whole corps in an oblique direction from Holzhausen, and taking Klenau's attacking corps in flank, he pressed upon it so fiercely that the Austrians were driven back, and a battery which they had established on the heights of Kolmberg was taken by Charpentier's division. Encouraged by this success on his left, and deeming the enemy in front of Lieberwolkwitz sufficiently exhausted by three hours' continued and severe fighting, Napoleon, who arrived at noon on the heights behind Wachau, followed by the Guards and cuirassiers, resolved to put in force his favorite measure of a grand attack on the enemy's center. With this view, two divisions of the Young Guard, under Oudinot, were brought up and stationed close behind Wachau; two others under Mortier, were sent to Lieberwolkwitz; Augereau was dispatched to support Poniatowsky, who with a considerable body of Milhaud's cavalry, had resisted every attempt of the enemy to cross the Elster, near the village of Mark-Kleberg; and behind Augereau the Old Guard moved forward to Doelitz to support either the right or center, as circumstances might require. Finally, Druout, with 60 guns of the Old Guard, was brought to the front of the center, and these pieces moving steadily forward, soon made the earth shake by their rapid and continued fire. The allied center was unable to resist this desperate attack. Victor and Oudinot, preceded by the terrible battery, rapidly gained ground; and Napoleon deeming the battle gained, caused the bells of Leipsic to be rung in honor of victory. Schwartzenberg seeing his center so nearly forced by the impetuous attack of the French Guard, ordered up the Austrian reserve, under Prince Hesse-Homberg, from Zobigker. They were hurried as fast as possible across the river; but meanwhile, Napoleon ordered up his reserve cavalry, under Latour Maubourg and Kellerman, while an attack by infantry, under Charpentier, was ordered on an old intrenchment on a hill, called the Swedish redoubt, where the bones of the warriors of the great Gustavus Adolphus reposed, which had been won from the French in the early part of the day. So vehement, however, was the fire from the batteries on the summit, that the assaulting regiments paused at the foot of the hill. Napoleon hastened to the spot. "What regiment is that?" said he to Charpentier. "The 22d light infantry," replied the general. "That is impossible," said Napoleon; "the 22d would never allow themselves to be cut down by grapeshot, without taking their muskets from their shoulders." These words being repeated to the regiment, they were so stung by the reproach, that, breaking into a charge, they ran up the hill, and carried the post; which gave the French a decisive advantage in that part of the field.

At one o'clock in the afternoon, Kellerman, at the head of 6,000 horse, debouched from Wachau, and supported by several squares of infantry, advanced rapidly against the retiring columns of Prince Eugene, of Wirtemberg, in the allied center. Three regiments of Russian cuirassiers, under Lewachow, were thrown in the way of the charge; but they were speedily overwhelmed, and driven back with great loss. Schwartzenberg now brought up the Austrian cuirassiers of the Guard to the point of danger. This superb corps, consisting of six regiments, cased in steel, the very flower of the Austrian army, under Count Nostitz, after crossing the Pleisse, at Groben, arrived at the menaced point, at the same moment with the Guards and reserve of Alexander, which had been sent forward to the point of danger, by the advice of Jomini. The united forces bore down with loud shouts and irresistible force on the flank of Kellerman's dragoons, who, overwhelmed by superior numbers, were routed and driven back in great disorder to the heights behind Wachau, where they re-formed under cover of the batteries in the French center. Meanwhile, Latour Maubourg, and Murat, at the head of 4,000 cuirassiers of the Guard, bore down on the flank of the allied right, while Victor and Lauriston assailed it in front.

This double charge was at first attended with great success. Though the brave Latour Maubourg had his leg carried off by a cannon-shot, the ponderous mass advanced in admirable order under Bordesoult, broke by a charge in flank Prince Eugene of Wirtemberg's infantry, routed ten light squadrons of the Russian Guard, which strove to arrest its progress, and captured twenty-six guns. So violent was the onset, so complete the opening made in the center of the allies, by this terrible charge, that the French horsemen pushed on to the position where the Emperor Alexander and King of Prussia had taken their station, and they were obliged to mount on horseback, and retire a little distance to the rear, to avoid being made prisoners. Alexander ordered the red Cossacks of the Guard to charge the enemy in flank, while the reserve cavalry of Barclay were also ordered up, and the last reserve batteries directed to open their fire. These dispositions and rapidly executed orders changed the fate of the day, and the French cavalry were driven back to their own lines. At three o'clock in the afternoon, the Austrian reserves came up to the front at all points, and shortly afterward the sound of cannon on the north announced the approach of Marmont and Ney, but they were too closely pressed by Blucher to render Napoleon any further assistance than to maintain themselves against the furious attack of the Prussians. Napoleon resolved to make one more effort for victory; with this view, between five and six o'clock, he re-formed his reserve cavalry behind Lieberwolkwitz. Victor and Lauriston's corps were thrown into a deep column of attack, and preceded by a numerous array of artillery, advanced against Gossa. The French drove madly to the charge, opening their artillery as they advanced, threw the corps of Gorzakow into confusion, and took Gossa; but Schwartzenberg, bringing up the Prussian division of Pirsch, assailed the French so vigorously that the village was re-taken, and the enemy's column driven back; while a powerful Russian battery of eighty pieces of the Guard, by the precision and rapidity of their fire, arrested the progress of the French in that quarter. Excessive fatigue prevented either party from making any further efforts in the center and left, and the battle there was reduced to a furious cannonade, which continued, without intermission, until nightfall.

Late in the evening, Meerfeldt, at the head of the leading battalion, advanced to attack the French right flank near Mark-Kleberg, when he was assailed by a division of the Old Guard, and Poniatowsky's Poles in flank, and driven, with great loss, into the Elster. Meerfeldt himself, with a whole battalion, was made prisoner.

On the other side of the Elster, Giulay was engaged the whole day, with various success, against Bertrand's corps; but the French, fighting for Lindenau, their only line of retreat in case of disaster, finally drove the Austrians back, and kept the communication with the grand army free from obstruction.

Battle of Mockern.—To the north of Leipsic, a conflict took place between the armies of Blucher and Ney. Ney drew up his troops in a strong position, the right in front of a wood of some extent in the neighborhood of Brietenfeldt. The army of the French marshal consisted of about 25,000 foot, and 3,000 horse, while that of Blucher was composed of over 50,000 men. After a most desperate conflict, the French yielded to superior numbers, and retired behind the Partha, having lost an eagle, two standards, twenty guns, and 2,000 prisoners, besides 4,000 in killed and wounded.

On the 17th of October, the arms of the contending forces were permitted to repose by a tacit agreement; the allies waited for the arrival of their third main body, under Benningsen, from Dresden, by way of Grimma, and Napoleon was meditating an honorable retreat, for which purpose he attempted to open negotiations with the allies, by means of the captive Austrian count, Meerfeldt. From this endeavor the allies ascertained his weakness, and refused to listen to the proposals. Schwartzenberg, therefore, made his dispositions for a grand attack on the morning of the 18th.

Napoleon, during the night of the 17th, made considerable changes in the disposition of his troops. He had now brought up his whole reserves from Duben; and Regnier, with his Saxons, now reduced to 8,000 men, had joined the standards of Ney on the Partha. The whole army effected a change in front to the left, the left wing being thrown back, and Connewitz, on the extreme right, serving as a pivot. Poniatowsky was stationed there on the edge of the Elster. The whole army, now not numbering more than 160,000 men, was arranged in a semicircle, facing outward from the Elster, to the extreme left, which rested on the Partha to the north of Leipsic. The line, thus contracted, abandoned Wachau, Lieberwolkwitz, and the heights in their rear, the object of such fierce contention on the preceding day; it ran from Connewitz to Probstheyda, in which last village Victor was stationed. Napoleon, in person, with the Imperial Guard, occupied a central position, on the Thonberg, from which he could succor any point that might be peculiarly menaced. Bertrand remained in his old position at Lindenau.

Schwartzenberg, with his immense army of 280,000 men, made preparations to press upon the columns of the French from all sides of the narrow circle into which they had now retired.

The force of the allies was more numerous than had ever been assembled in one field during modern times; and with the assistance of their formidable array of artillery, consisting of nearly 1400 cannons, a victory over the comparative small force of the French emperor seemed certain. The grand army of Bohemia, and Benningsen's reserve from Poland was formed into three columns; the right under Benningsen was directed to advance against Holzhausen, where the French troops under Macdonald were stationed; the center under Barclay de Tolly was to advance straight upon Wachau, while the left under the Prince of Hesse-Homberg was to move forward by the edge of the Elster, from Connewitz, and Mark-Kleberg on Doelitz and Leipsic. To the north of Leipsic, the prince-royal and Blucher, now nearly 100,000 strong, had made their arrangements for a decisive engagement; the former with his own troops and the corps of Langeron, was to cross the Partha, turn Ney's right, and force him back upon Leipsic, while Blucher with his two remaining corps of Sacken and d'York, was to remain on the right bank of the Partha, and drive all before him who should remain on that side of the river.

"At length," says Alison, "the battle of the giants commenced. The 18th of October dawned, and the last hour of the French empire began to toll. At nine, Napoleon took his station on the Thomberg; the enemy's columns were already approaching with rapid strides on all sides, and their heads were soon seen surmounting the hills of Wachau, and driving like chaff before the wind, the French detachments which were stationed to retard their advance to the intermediate villages. Inexpressibly awful was the spectacle which their advance afforded to the agitated multitude who thronged the steeples of Leipsic. As far as the eye could reach, the ground was covered with an innumerable multitude of men and horses; long deep masses marked the march of the infantry, dazzling lines of light indicated the squadrons of cavalry; the glancing of the bayonets in the rays of the sun sparkled like crests of foam on a troubled sea, while a confused murmur arising from the neighing of horses, the march of the columns, the rolling of the guns, was heard like the rolling of distant thunder." The allied left under the Prince of Hesse-Homberg first came into action; the Austrians were resisted by the Poles on the banks of the Elster, under the brave Poniatowsky, whom Napoleon had created Marshal of France on the preceding day, with heroic valor; but they were unable to withstand the superior numbers and vehement attacks of the Austrians, and gave ground. Napoleon, with two divisions of the Young Guard, under Oudinot, repaired to the spot, while the Old Guard under Mortier, was stationed in the rear in the suburbs of Leipsic; the steady countenance of these veterans restored the combat; Prince Hesse-Homberg was wounded, and though the Poles were driven back after hard fighting to Connewitz, all the efforts of the Austrians under Bianchi could not dislodge Poniatowsky from that village, even with the aid of Giulay's corps, which Schwartzenberg dispatched to their support. "The village of Probstheyda formed the salient angle of the position occupied by the French around Leipsic and as such it became early in the day, the object of the most vehement contention between the opposite parties. In the first instance the progress of the allies in the center was rapid. Liebenwolkwitz and Wachau, the scene of such bloody struggles on the 16th, were abandoned after a slight combat of advanced posts; the allied artillery was hurried forward amid loud shouts to the summits of the hills of Wachau, and soon 200 pieces of cannon, arrayed along the heights, began to send an iron tempest into the French columns. But, meanwhile, Napoleon's batteries were not idle; sensible of the inferiority of their pieces in point of number to those of the enemy, the men endeavored to supply the deficiency by the rapidity of their fire, and their guns were worked with extraordinary vigor. Every cannon that could be brought to bear on either side was hurried to the front, and soon 800 pieces of artillery discharged their fire, or played on the hostile masses in a space of not more than half a league in breadth in the center of the army. In the midst of this tremendous fire, Prince Augustus of Prussia, and General Prisch received orders with Kleist's corps to carry Probstheyda. Swiftly they moved over the intervening open space, and entered the village with such vigor that they reached its center before the onset could be arrested; but there they were met by Victor and Lauriston, at the head of dense masses who combatted with such resolution that they were driven back. Prince Augustus re-formed his men and again moved into the village, followed by Wittgenstein's Russians and nearly the whole of Kleist's corps. Such was the vehemence of the onset that the French were entirely expelled; the fugitives and wounded overspread the plain which extended toward Leipsic. Napoleon instantly hastened to the spot with the two remaining divisions of the Young Guard; the steady columns made their way through the crowd of fugitives, and did not return to the Thomberg until they had entirely expelled the enemy from the village. Again the Russians under Wittgenstein and Benningsen's reserves were brought up to the attack, and dislodged the French, but a third time the invincible soldiers of Lauriston and Victor recovered their post and hurled the assailants back with frightful loss into the allied ranks."

On the right the Prussians marched against Holzhausen and Zuckelhausen, followed by a part of Benningsen's Russians in reserve. At the same time Platoff, with 6,000 Cossacks, by a circuitous sweep, turned the extreme left of the French on this side, and threatened the rear of Macdonald's corps. That general, in consequence, abandoned Holzhausen, and fell back to Stoeteritz, warmly pursued by the Prussians; but such was the vehemence of the French batteries of 100 guns, posted on either side of Probstheyda, that the Prussians were forced to recoil, glad to seek refuge in the nearest hollows from the fearful tempest. Still further to the allied right, Bubna's light horse, with a body of Platoff's Cossacks, pushed across the plain, beyond the reach of the combatants, and opened up a communication with Bernadotte's outposts, which soon made their appearance from the direction of Taucha; united they fell upon the rear of the Wirtemberg brigade of Normann, which immediately abandoned the colors of France, and ranged itself under the banners of the allies.

Schwartzenberg, finding that the resistance of the enemy, on the south of Leipsic, was so obstinate, and that the assault of the villages was attended with such a fearful loss of life, ordered his columns over the whole semicircle to the south, to seek refuge in the nearest hollows from the dreadful effect of the enemy's batteries, and for the remainder of the day confined his attack on that side to another and more powerful arm. The whole cannon of the grand army, amounting to above 800 pieces, were brought forward to the front, arranged in the form of a vast semicircle, two leagues in length, from Loesnitz by the ridges of Wachan toward Holzhausen, and during the remainder of the day kept up an incessant and most destructive fire on the enemy's columns. The French batteries in that direction, which numbered about 500 pieces, answered with unconquerable vigor, and Lauriston and Victor's men, with heroic resolution, repeatedly rushed out of Probstheyda and pushed forward toward the hostle batteries; but, as soon as they came within the range of grape-shot, the heads of the densest columns were swept away, and the broken remains recoiled behind the shelter of the houses. For four mortal hours this awful scene lasted, till nightfall; the allied batteries continuing, like a girdle of flame, their dreadful fire, while the French masses, devoted to death, still closed their ranks as they wasted away, but with unconquerable resolution maintained their ground. In Probstheyda, Vial, Rochambeau, and several generals of inferior note, were killed, and great numbers wounded during this fearful interval; but still their columns stood firm beneath the tempest, exhibiting a sublime example of human valor, rising superior to all the storms of fate. While this terrible conflict was going on to the south of Leipsic, Ney and Marmont had to maintain their ground against still more overwhelming odds on the banks of the Partha. Ney, finding himself outnumbered, adopted the same change of front which Napoleon had followed to the south of Leipsic, and drawing back his men to Schoenfeld, Sellenhausen and Sluntz, extended across to Regnier's corps, which was established at Paunadorf. Thus the whole French army was now arrayed in a circle around the city, having its right under Poniatowsky, resting on the Pleisse at Connewitz, and the extreme left under Marmont, at the confluence of the Partha and Elster, below the gate of Rosenthal. But now an incident occurred on this side, which depressed the French as much as it elated the allies. A brigade of Saxon cavalry, as soon as the Russians approached the heights of Heiter Bleik, where it was stationed, instead of resisting, passed over to the allied ranks. This example was speedily followed by two Saxon brigades of foot, with their whole artillery, and the Wirtemberg horse of Normann, as already noticed, immediately after also went over to the enemy. The Saxon cannoneers, immediately after their going over, pointed their guns against the French lines, and tore in pieces the ranks of their former comrades by a point-blank discharge. Regnier's force thus weakened, was reduced to the single division of Durutte, and threatened on the right by Bubna from the Bohemian army, and on the left by Bulow from that of the Prince Royal, was compelled to fall back to Sellenhausen, almost close to Leipsic. Ney, informed of the catastrophe, hastened to reinforce Regnier by Delmas's division of his own corps; while Marmont, to keep abreast of the retrograde movement in other points, withdrew his troops in a similar degree, with the exception of his extreme left, which still stood firm at Schoenfeld. The allied troops now pressed forward at all points to incircle the enemy, and force them back at the point of the bayonet, into the suburbs of Leipsic; while the French, roused to the highest pitch of indignation by the shameful defection of their allies, made the most desperate and heroic resistance. Napoleon, informed of the defection of the Saxons, and that Schoenfeld, almost a suburb of Leipsic, was threatened, hastened with the cuirassiers of Nansouty, and a division of the Young Guard, to the menaced point. On the arrival of these veterans, Durutte and Delmas had been driven close to Leipsic; the Swedish troops had penetrated to Kuhlgaesten on the very edge of the city; while Langeron furiously assaulting Schoenfeld, had three times penetrated into that village, and as often been dislodged by the heroic courage of Marmont's men. Nansouty and the Guards were immediately pushed forward, and rapidly made their way almost unresisted, in at an opening filled only by a cordon of light-troops between the extreme right of the army of Bohemia, under Bubna, and the extreme left of the Prince Royal under Bulow; but before it had advanced far, they were assailed with such vigor on the right by Bubna, and on the left by Bulow, supported by the English rocket brigade, under the direction of Captain Bougue, that they were forced to retire, after Delmas had been slain, with great loss.* Schoenfeld at the same time was vehemently attacked by Count Langron, and as gallantly defended by Marmont; five times did the Russians penetrate in, and five times they were driven out by the devoted courage of the French; Marmont's aide-de-camp was struck down by his side; General Campans was wounded; General Frederic killed in this terrible struggle. At length, at six at night, it was carried a sixth time, amid terrific cheers, and remained finally in the hands of the Russians; while 4,000 of their bravest soldiers, and an equal number of its intrepid defenders, lay dead or weltering in their blood in its streets.

This was the last considerable operation of the day. Both parties were so much exhausted by the long continuance of this mortal struggle, that neither felt inclined to renew hostilities. Notwithstanding his ill fortune, Napoleon had been able to fill the chasms in his ranks, and repair his disadvantages; his line was nowhere broken, nor was he even assailed in the rear, and a fair retreat seemed possible for the French. The near approach of the enemy on all sides, convinced Napoleon that the position of Leipsic had become untenable, and his ammunition being nearly exhausted, his army fatigued and weakened by defection, he felt that he could not make a successful resistance against the overwhelming army which was brought against him, and reluctantly made his dispositions for a retreat. No words can describe the state of horror and confusion in which the inhabitants of Leipsic were kept during the whole night after the battle. The prodigious multitude of wounded who had been brought in during the day had filled to overflowing every house in the city; the maimed and the dying were lying, without either bandages for their wounds, or coverings for their bodies, in the streets; while the incessant rolling of artillery wagons and caissons, on every avenue leading to Lindenau, the cries of the drivers, the neighing of the horses as the wheels of the carriages were locked together, and the continued march of the columns, kept every eye open, in that scene of unutterable woe, during the whole night. At eight, Napoleon left his quarters on the Thomberg, and took up his quarters in the hotel of Prussia. The King of Saxony, amid the wreck of his fortunes, was chiefly inconsolable from the defection of his troops during the battle, and repeatedly requested counsel from Napoleon how he should act in the crisis. The emperor had the generosity to leave him altogether unfettered in the course he was to pursue, and more than once expressed his admiration of the constancy of a prince who was the same friend in disaster as he had been when fortune smiled the brightest. Early on the morning of the 19th, the allied generals made preparations for a general attack on Leipsic. The French army was in full retreat; but there were still nearly 60,000 men in Leispic, besides an equal number who were defiling on the road to France; the barriers were all strongly pallisaded, the adjacent walls and houses loopholed; and such a force, defending house by house, the suburbs of the city so defended, could certainly, it was hoped, make good the post till the evacuation of the ammunition wagons and cannon was effected. The allies soon drew themselves around the city, like a huge serpent preparing to crush its victim with one contraction of its powerful muscles. Napoleon barely had time to escape before two of the gates were forced, and the allies entered, in spite of the determined resistance of the enemy, into the city. The French resisted with the most heroic valor; but, overwhelmed by the mighty host which came pouring upon them, they were forced back; the barriers were beaten down, and the allies rushed into the city at all points, bearing down all opposition, and driving before them an enormous mass of soldiers, carriages, artillery, and wagons, which, with the French rear guard everywhere yet fighting bravely, was rolled slowly onward toward the west, like a huge monster, bleeding at every pore, yet still unsubdued. At this dreadful moment the great bridge of Lindenau, the only remaining passage over the Elster, was blown into the air with a frightful explosion. The mine which had been run under it by order of Napoleon, had been fired prematurely. A shriek of horror, more terrible even than the loudest cries of battle, burst from the dense multitude which crowded at the edge of the chasm, when they found the arch destroyed; the ranks immediately broke; the boldest threw themselves into the river, where a few escaped across, but the greater part perished in the deep and muddy channel. Macdonald, by great exertions, succeeded in reaching the brink, and plunging in, swam his horse across and escaped. Poniatowsky also reached the side, and spurred his horse on; but his charger, exhausted with fatigue, reeled as he strove to mount the opposite bank, and fell backward into the river, where his master perished beneath the turbid water. Lauriston, Regnier, and twenty other generals, with 15,000 soldiers, besides 23,000 sick and wounded, and the King of Saxony, fell into the hands of the victors. The total loss of the French, in prisoners, killed, and wounded, during the three days of battle, was about 60,000 men. 300 cannon, and an immense quantity of baggage, etc., constituted the trophies of the allies. The loss of the allies was also great, amounting to nearly 50,000 men, in killed and wounded. At two o'clock in the afternoon of the 19th the carnage ceased at all points; the rattle of musketry was no longer heard, and a distant roar in all directions alone indicated that the waves of this terrible tempest were gradually sinking to rest. The French army was allowed to retreat unpursued, and the next day arrived near Lutzen, and on the morning following resumed their march toward Freylung. The funeral of the hero Poniatowsky was celebrated on the 20th of October, with extraordinary pomp, by the allied sovereigns, who recognized in him, although an enemy, a warrior, whose military career had been unsullied, and who, in the last extremity, preferred death to disgrace. The next day the allies commenced a pursuit of the retreating army.

LEPANTO, A.D. 1475.—Lepanto is a seaport town of Greece, government of Ætolia, on the north coast of the gulf of Lepanto, twelve miles north-east of Patros. The town is fortified and defended with a castle, built on an eminence. Being ceded by the emperor to the Venetians, it was fortified by them, and in the year 1475 stood a siege of four months against the Turks, who lost 30,000 men. Near this town, Don John of Austria obtained a victory over the Turkish fleet, on the 7th of October, 1571. Cervantes, the celebrated author of Don Quixote, fought as a soldier in this battle, and had his left hand shot off by an arquebus.

LERIDA, A.D. 1707.—In 1707, Lerida, in Spain, was stormed by the French during the War of the Succession; and in 1810 it was again taken by the French, under Suchet.

LEUCTRA, B.C. 371.—Thebes, one of the most powerful cities of Greece, and with it the whole of Bœotia, was in the possession of the Lacedæmonians. But about the year 380, two illustrious citizens of Thebes, Pelopidas and Epaminondas, formed the design of restoring the liberty of their country, by removing the yoke of bondage which the Spartans had placed upon it. Although during the whole Peloponnesian war, Sparta found faithful allies in the Thebans, yet the Spartans were ever suspicious of their strength and spirit, and not only seized their strongest castle, called Cadmea, and garrisoned it with troops to protect the nobles who governed the city, subject to the inspection of the Lacedæmonians, but they banished many of the most influential and wealthy citizens of Thebes from the city. Among these exiles was Pelopidas; but Epaminondas, being despised as a man of no power on account of his poverty, they suffered to remain. Such indignities aroused the Thebans to a high state of indignation. Epaminondas discoursed with the young men, and inspired them with a passionate desire to throw off the Spartan yoke. Pelopidas went from one exile to another, and abjured them not to leave their native city, enslaved and garrisoned by tyrants, but to return and assist in expelling the enemy. Excited to enthusiasm by his words, the exiles agreed to follow his advice. A plot was now laid for the destruction of the magistrates and generals who were charged with the government of Thebes. Every arrangement being perfected both by the conspirators and their friends in the city, a day for the execution of the project was fixed upon. On that day Pelopidas and his friends entered the city disguised as peasants, separately, and at different gates. The governors and magistrates had been invited to a supper, by one of the conspirators' friends who had managed to be appointed secretary to the magistrates, and were heated with wine when it was whispered about that the exiles had returned into the city. But the conspirators were already at the head of their men, and by a stratagem effected an entrance into the banquet-hall, and put all the guests to the sword. Leontides, one of the magistrates, who was not at the festival, was surprised in his bed. But upon the entrance of some of the conspirators he seized his sword, and made such a desperate resistance that several of his enemies were slain before he was killed himself. The doors of the prisons were now broken open, and 500 prisoners liberated. The Thebans were called upon to resume their liberty, and arms were distributed among them. All the exiles who had sought refuge in Athens arrived the next morning completely armed, and were soon followed by 5,000 foot soldiers and 500 horsemen, whom the Athenians had sent to the assistance of the Thebans, under the command of Demophoön. These troops together with others which shortly afterward joined them from all the cities of Bœotia, formed an army of 12,000 foot soldiers, and 2,000 horsemen. Without loss of time this army besieged the castle Cadmea, which was defended by 1,500 Lacedæmonians, besides 3,000 Thebans who, alarmed at the state of affairs, had taken refuge there. The besieged made a vigorous resistance; but at length the scarcity of provisions compelled them to capitulate, and the castle was surrendered into the hands of the Thebans. The Lacedæmonians now made vigorous preparations for war. To Agesilaus was given the command of the troops against Thebes. He entered Bœotia, and did considerable damage to the Thebans; but not without great loss on his own side. The Theban and Lacedæmonian armies came every day to blows, and were perpetually engaged, but not in formal battles. Yet the constant skirmishes seemed to instruct the Thebans in the art of war, and to inspire them with boldness, valor and experience. Several campaigns passed in this manner without any thing very decisive on either side. At length the armies came to an engagement at Tegyræ, which was a kind of prelude to the battle of Leuctra. Pelopidas the Theban commander, kept a strict eye upon the city of Orchomenus, one of the largest and most considerable towns of Bœotia, and still garrisoned by the Lacedæmonians, and watched for an opportunity to make himself master of it. On learning that the Lacedæmonian troops had vacated Orchomenus, he hastened thither with his sacred band which consisted only of 300 men, and with a troop of horse; but finding, when he was near the town, that other troops were coming from Sparta to supply the place of those that had marched out, he immediately turned his troops toward Thebes. On his return he found the enemy posted near Tegyræ, to intercept him. As soon as the Thebans saw the enemy, one of them ran to Pelopidas, crying, "We have fallen into the hands of the enemy." "Why so?" replied he; "Why have they not fallen into ours?" He now ordered his cavalry to advance from the rear to the front that they might be ready for the attack. Then drawing up his sacred band into a close body, he waited for the enemy's charge, feeling assured that his noble 300 would break through the enemy's ranks, however superior in number. The sacred band, which was also called the band of lovers, was the very flower of the Theban army. It was composed of 300 brave and resolute young men, who had vowed perpetual friendship to each other, and had bound themselves by the strongest ties to stand by one another to the last drop of their blood, and were famed equally for their fidelity to their country and their affection for each other.

pushed boldly on against the Thebans. At the first shock, the generals of the two armies were personally brought into the encounter. The struggle was most obstinate on both sides. The Spartan commanders who attacked Pelopidas were among the first that were slain. The Thebans fought with almost superhuman valor. All the Lacedæmonians who surrounded their generals were slain, and the whole army was so terrified by the incredible bravery and strength of the enemy, that they divided and formed a line through which the Thebans might, if they so desired, have passed in safety. But Pelopidas disdained thus to make his escape. With his gallant sacred band he charged upon the Lacedæmonians, who yet stood their ground, and made such havoc upon them that they fled in disorder and confusion. But fearing the Lacedæmonian forces which had just arrived at Orchomenus from Sparta, the Thebans did not pursue them. They were content with beating the enemy in a fair combat, and making a retreat through a dispersed and defeated army. In the year 371, B.C., the Lacedæmonians made peace with all the nations of Greece except Thebes. Cleombrotus, King of Lacedæmonia, entered their country with his army, and after taking a large compass, arrived at Leuctra, a small town of Bœotia, between Platæa and Thespiæ. The Thebans were greatly alarmed on the first arrival of the enemy. They saw themselves alone, without allies or support, while all Greece looked upon them as utterly lost. But in one man the Thebans had a whole army. That man was Epaminondas. He was appointed general, and had several colleagues joined in commission with him. He immediately raised all the troops he could, and began his march. His army consisted at most of 6,000 men, whereas that of the enemy was at least thrice that number. Pelopidas was not then in office; but he commanded the sacred band, to whom, since the battle of Tegyræ, he was so much attached that he would never part from them. Both armies having arrived at Leuctra, the generals on either side consulted whether they should give battle, and both parties, after a long consultation, decided on so doing. The two armies were very unequal. The Lacedæmonian army consisted of 24,000 footmen, and 1,600 horsemen. The Thebans had only 6,000 foot and 400 horse; but they were all choice troops, and, animated by their former successes, they had resolved to conquer or die. Epaminondas, who resolved to charge with his left wing, strengthened it with the choice of his heavy-armed troops, whom he drew up, fifty men deep. The sacred band was on his left, and closed the wing. The rest of his infantry was posted upon his right in an oblique line, which, the further it extended, was the more distant from the enemy. By this unusual disposition, his design was to cover his right flank, to refuse his right wing, and keep it as a kind of reserve, that he might not hazard the event of the battle upon the weakest part of his army, and also to begin the action with his left wing, which consisted of his best troops, to turn the weight of the battle upon the right wing of the enemy, which consisted entirely of Lacedæmonians, under the command of Cleombrotus himself. He was assured that if he could penetrate the Lacedæmonian phalanx, the rest of the army would soon be put to flight. The rest of his cavalry he disposed in front of his left wing. Cleombrotus, who commanded the right wing of the Lacedæmonian army, drew up his men in files twelve deep, in front of which he posted his cavalry. The left wing, which was composed of his allies, was commanded by Archidamus, son of Agesilaus, the famous Lacedæmonian general. As soon as Cleombrotus perceived the intention of the enemy, he began to change his order of battle, and to extend his right wing, and wheel about, with a design to surround Epaminondas. But at this moment Pelopidas came briskly up with his band of three hundred, and before Cleombrotus could execute his design, fell upon the Spartans in flank with such vigor that they were put into disorder. Epaminondas, determined to contend only with the enemy's right wing, regardless of the other troops, warmly seconded Pelopidas, with his cavalry, and the battle which followed was furious and bloody. The Thebans fought with such determination and valor, that the Spartans, in spite of their knowledge of war, were obliged, by the great slaughter committed on their ranks, gradually to give ground. But so long as Cleombrotus was uninjured the victory continued in suspense. At length, covered with wounds, the Lacedæmonian general fell dead to the ground. His troops now turned and fled. But in an instant, stung with shame at abandoning the body of their king, they returned to the field of battle, and redoubled their exertions. And now a terrible slaughter ensued on both sides. The Spartans fought furiously to recover the body, and the Thebans contested with them for victory with equal ferocity. At length the Thebans were forced back, and the Spartans gained possession of the body of their king, and carried it off. Then, elated by so glorious an action, they were about to return to the charge, which might have been successful if their allies had seconded them. But the left wing of the Lacedæmonian army, upon seeing the right wing broken, believed all lost, especially when they heard of the death of the king, took to their heels. The Spartans now despaired, and quickly joined in the flight. Epaminondas followed them vigorously, and killed a great number in the pursuit. The Lacedæmonians had never received such a blow. Their most bloody defeats till then had scarce cost them more than 400 or 500 of their citizens, and the Thebans were the first who had ever defeated them with an inferior number of men. In this battle the Lacedæmonians lost 4,000 men, of whom 1,400 were Lacedæmonians. Of the Lacedæmonians killed, 400 were citizens of Sparta, out of 700 who were in the battle. The Thebans had only 300 men killed, among whom there were but few of their own citizens. See Battle of Mantinea.

LEWES, A.D. 1264.—The town of Lewes is situated on the river Ouse, in Sussex co., England, forty-three miles south of London.

The battle of Lewes between Henry III., King of England, and Montfort, Earl of Leicester and the rebellious barons, was fought on the 14th of May, 1264. On the 4th of April, Henry, having summoned the tenants of the crown to meet him at Oxford, unfurled his standard, and placed himself at the head of the army. His first attempts were successful. Northampton, Leicester, two of the strongest fortresses in the possession of the barons, were successively reduced, and among the captives at Northampton were counted Simon, the eldest of Leicester's sons, fourteen other baronets, forty knights, and a numerous body of esquires. From Nottingham, where he had been joined by Comyn, Bruce and Baliol, the lords on the borders of Scotland, he was recalled into Kent by the danger of his nephew Henry, who was besieged in the castle of Rochester. At his approach the enemy, who had taken and pillaged the city, retired with precipitation; and the king fixed his head-quarters in the town of Lewes. On the 12th of May Leicester, having added a body of 15,000 citizens to his army, marched from London, with a resolution to bring the controversey to an issue. From Fletching he dispatched a letter to Henry, protesting that neither he nor his associates had taken up arms against the king, but against the evil counselors, who enjoyed and abused the confidence of their sovereign. Henry returned a public defiance, pronouncing Montfort and his adherents perjured, and daring the Earls of Leicester and Derby to appear in the king's court and prove their assertion by single combat. After the observation of those forms, which the feudal connexion between the lord and the vassal was supposed to make necessary, Montfort sent a new message, renouncing in the name of himself and of the associated barons, all fealty and allegiance to Henry. He then marched toward Lewes with his army divided into four bodies; the first commanded by his two sons, Henry and Guy de Montfort, together with Humphrey de Bohun, Earl of Hereford; the second led by the Earl of Gloucester, with William de Montchesney and John Fitz-John; the third composed of Londoners, under the command of Nicholas de Legrave; the fourth commanded by himself in person. Each man wore upon his breast a white cross, and all were inspired with the belief that they were fighting the cause of Heaven. On the 14th of May, the army arrived within about two miles from Lewes, and leaving his standard on the summit of the hill, Leicester with his army descended into the plain before the town. Henry's foragers had discovered and announced the approach of the enemy, and the royalists in three divisions silently awaited the attack. Leicester, having called before the ranks the Earl of Gloucester, and several other young noblemen, bade them kneel down, and conferred on them the order of knighthood; and the Londoners, who impatiently awaited the conclusion of the ceremony, rushed with loud shouts on the enemy. They were received by Prince Edward with such warmth, that in a few moments they were broken, and driven back as far as the standard. Edward with his followers pressed forward in eager pursuit; and in the heat of the chase, carried with him the flower of the army four miles from the field of battle. More than 3,000 Londoners were slain; but the advantage was dearly purchased by the loss of the victory. Leicester, who viewed with pleasure the thoughtless impetuosity of the prince, fell with the remainder of his forces on the division of Henry and his brother. A body of Scots, who fought on foot, was cut to pieces. Their leaders, Baliol, Comyn and Bruce, were made prisoners; the same fate befell the King of the Romans who commanded the other division of the royal army; and the combat was feebly maintained by the exertions and example of Philip Basset who fought near the person of King Henry. But at length, that nobleman sunk beneath a hundred wounds, and his retainers fled. The king, whose horse had been killed under him, surrendered; and Leicester conducted the royal captive into the priory. The fugitives, as soon as they learned the fate of their sovereign, came back to share his captivity, and voluntarily yielded themselves to their enemies.

Prince Edward, returning to the field of battle, from his precipitate pursuit of the Londoners, was astonished to find it covered with the dead bodies of his friends, and still more to hear that his father was defeated and a captive in the hands of a victorious enemy. As he approached Lewes, the barons came out and attacked him. At the first shock, Earl Warrenne, Hugh Bigod, and William de Valence, with seven hundred horse, fled to Pevencey, whence they sailed to the continent. Edward, with a strong body of veterans from the Welsh marches, rode along the wall to the castle, and hearing that his father was a captive in the priory, obtained from Leicester permission to visit him. The Prince opened a negotiation with the chief of the enemy, and the next morning a treaty was concluded upon, by which it was agreed that all prisoners taken during the war should be set at liberty; that the Princes Edward and Henry should be kept as hostages for the peaceable conduct of their fathers, the King of England, and the King of the Romans; and that all matters which should not be amicably adjusted in the next parliament should be referred to the decision of certain arbitrators. In the battle of Lewes about 5,000 men are said to have fallen on each side. From this time Montfort used the power he gained by this victory, so despotically, that in the end it was the cause of his own destruction. See Battle of Evesham.

LEXINGTON AND CONCORD, A.D. 1775. —Lexington, ever memorable as the spot where the first American blood was spilt in our glorious struggle for Independence, is in Middlesex county, Mass., eleven miles north-west of Boston.

Concord, in the same county, is situated six miles north-west of Lexington, and here the first British blood was shed in the Revolutionary war.

About eleven o'clock on the night of April 18th, 1775, nearly 1,000 of the best British troops were secretly conveyed up the river to Cambridge, from Boston, on their way to Lexington, for the purpose of destroying the military stores there deposited by the patriots. They had also received orders from General Gage, then stationed at Boston, to march on Concord, to seize upon the persons of John Hancock and Samuel Adams, who were foremost among those who had dared to oppose the British aggression and oppression. The Bostonians, however, having entertained suspicions of General Gage's object, sent messengers to Hancock and Adams, warning them of danger in time for them to make their escape. The British forces landed at a point called Phipp's Farm, and marched thence toward Lexington. Meanwhile, the news of their approach was spread far and near; the bells of the town were rung, cannons were fired, and the people from the adjoining country flocked toward the scene of danger in crowds. The British troops were commanded by Colonel Smith, and Major Pitcairn. The vanguard was led by the latter officer. The provincial forces which had assembled at the news of the approach of the enemy, separated during the night, and at five o'clock on the morning of the 19th, when the vanguard of the British entered the town, only about seventy-five were under arms, too small a number certainly to think of engaging the superior force of the royalists. On the entrance of the British the provincials were performing the exercises of a drill, and Pitcairn, advancing toward them, shouted, "Disperse, rebels! lay down your arms and disperse!" His command was not obeyed. The British officer, enraged at their non-compliance, discharged his pistol at them, and brandishing his sword, ordered his men to fire. His men instantly poured a volley of musketry on the provincials, killing eight men on the spot, and throwing them into confusion. But quickly re-forming, they steadily retreated, facing the enemy, and returning their fire. The British following up the enemy, marched along the road to Concord. The news of the engagement spread like wild-fire. The whole country was in arms; and armed men came to the scene of action from all quarters. As the soldiers approached Concord, the inhabitants, who seemed determined to act on the defensive, fell back to the bridge at the north of the town. Here they were assailed by the enemy with such fury that they were obliged to relinquish the possession of the bridge. The British troops spiked two twenty-four pounders, and destroyed a number of artillery wheels, together with a quantity of ammunition and flour. But the provincials were not defeated. The light infantry of the enemy, who were ravaging the country above Concord, were attacked by the Americans with such vigor that they were compelled to retire to the town. Here a hot skirmish ensued, which resulted in the defeat of the British, who retreated precipitately. Meanwhile, General Gage, hearing of the dangerous position of his soldiers, dispatched hastily another thousand men, with a large train of artillery; and they arrived at Lexington in time to support the shattered remnant of the first detachment, which had suffered great annoyance from the enemy, who, stationed behind trees, walls, and fences, kept up a constant fire on the retreating army. The two detachments joined at Lexington, and having halted a considerable time, renewed their retreat toward Boston, followed closely by the provincials, whose numbers increased every moment, and who continued to harass their flanks and rear, until they reached Charlestown, when the Americans deemed it prudent to discontinue the pursuit. In this first feat of arms, the Americans were decidedly the victors.

With a force far inferior in numbers, they had driven a well-armed and highly disciplined army, provided with heavy artillery, before them like sheep. The British lost 65 killed, 180 wounded, and 28 made prisoners. The Americans lost 50 killed, 34 wounded, and 5 prisoners.

LEYDEN, A.D. 1574.—This city was besieged in 1574. During a protracted resistance, 6,000 of the inhabitants perished of famine. The following narrative is extracted from the work of an Italian historian:

Leyden is one of the chief towns of Holland; it is seated low, among a labyrinth of channels, part of which are running, part standing waters, and which cut through the territories thereof on all sides. The Rhine runs through it with one of its branches, which now is the weakest, but hath formerly been the most frequented; though this retain its ancient name, whereas the rest, as they draw near the sea, change it into that of other rivers. So many other channels are derived from this branch within the town itself in several parts, as the space, which is there broken off by the islands, is in a sort larger than what is united to the continent. But if it be divided by so many channels, it is rejoined by many more bridges, of which there are about 150, where they may serve either for use or ornament; and the most of them are of stone. The town is well peopled; her streets are large buildings, well polished; it is well flanked round about; her ditch is everywhere deep; and in fine she is in all circumstances of such condition, as the king's men had good reason to use all endeavors to gain her, and also the rebels to keep possession of her.

The royalists betook themselves with diligence to be masters of all avenues, whereby succor might be kept from the town. The parts thereabouts (as hath been said) are full of channels and rivers: wherefore it was thought necessary to block up all passages with sundry forts, by which the city might be come to, either by land or water; so as, ere long, there were little less than sixty forts built round about it, whereby almost all possibility of relieving it was taken away. The Leydenists meanwhile were not wanting on their parts in preparing for defense. And judging that the royalists intended rather to take the town by famine than by the sword, they thought it not convenient to receive many foreign soldiers into the city; the longer to preserve their victuals, and also because they hoped they had men enough of their own to maintain and defend it.

John Douza, a famous Latin poet in those days, very nobly born, and of other high deserts, had the chief government of the affairs of the city. He failed not in acting his part well; he still encouraged the Leydenists, and fed them with hopes that other cities would speedily join with them, and relieve them. In confirmation of this, sometimes letters, sometimes messages came from without, and some news was cunningly raised within the town itself: though it were very true, that Orange and the rest of the rebels in that province labored nothing more than how to keep a place of such consequence still at their devotion. It was now the month of August; and the Leydenists began already to suffer want of victuals. Therefore the states of the country met to treat of so weighty a business, and to find out some way whereby the city might be relieved; and this affair began to be mightily earnest. The deputies differed in their opinions; some thought the town might be most easily got into by making a gallant assault by land, others held it might better be relieved by some river or channel; but the greater part concluded that there was small hopes of doing it either one way or other, the king's men having so strongly fortified themselves everywhere. Lewis Boisot, admiral of Holland, chanced to be at this meeting; a man very expert in maritime affairs, of a manlike spirit and good at execution; and one who was very well esteemed over all the province. He, while they were hottest in their variety of opinions, stepped forth to propound his, and began to speak thus:

"I wish that our own misfortunes did not too deplorably teach us how perverse the fury of the sea proves sometimes to our countries. Who sees not how we are daily inforced to oppose our industry to the threats thereof? Nor have our mountainous banks been sufficient so to curb the tempest of her waves, but that sometime she hath swallowed up whole islands on some sides, and caused miserable and unheard-of ruins in other parts. We are now to seek for remedy, in this our present necessity, from these evils which do so often afflict us. Let nature work the same effect to-day, for our good, which she useth upon so many other occasions to do for our hurt. And by those weapons wherewith she makes war against us, let us by her example make war upon our enemies. Every one knows that at the two equinoxials of the year the ocean swells extraordinary high upon our coasts; and, by the season of the year, we are shortly to expect the effects thereof. My counsel shall therefore be, that we may immediately, at the high tides, begin to let the waters loose into the neighboring ground of Leyden: greater tides will hereafter follow. And thus, turning the siege upon the besiegers, we may hope to destroy our enemies within their own works, and at the same time to free the city from all danger. It may be thought impossible to relieve it by land, or by the ordinary way of channels or rivers; whereas, by the way I have prescribed, we may believe that our enterprise will be smiled on by success. It will be in our power to let in the inundation where we please. We shall see the enemy strangely astonished and confused between the shame of abandoning the siege and the horror of continuing it. But being forced at last to fly, we shall see our own weapons and those of nature conspire together in slaughtering them on all sides; and shall see that punishment justly transferred on them which they with open violence prepared for the innocent. The country which shall be drowned will doubtlessly be somewhat damaged thereby; but who would not bear with such an inconvenience, whereby their country shall receive so great a benefit? On the contrary, whose hair will not stand on end to think, that, after the loss of Haarlem and of Leyden, the whole province will shortly remain at the cruel will of the Spaniards? We must sometimes be wicked to be good. How often do we cut off some one member for the welfare and safeguard of the rest of the body? Yet this evil will not prove finally so great, but that it will be paid with great usury. Some worldly actions prove so memorable, as they strike envy dumb and add new tongues to fame. This of ours will certainly be such, and will be everywhere highly celebrated. I, who so boldly give the advice, do as confidently pronounce the augury; and hope that the event will crown both of them with fortunate success."

At the hearing of so strange a proposition, the deputies were much confused, whether they should accept or reject it. But it is oft-times seen that need, passing into necessity, necessity passeth luckily into desperation. And thus it proved in what we shall now relate. For all of them, joining at last in opinion that Leyden was not to be freed by any other way than by what Boisot had propounded, it was resolved that at all adventures they would follow his advice. The chief banks or ditches of the Meuse and Isell between Rotterdam and Tergowe were presently cut in divers places; and at high tide the waters began to break in everywhere, and overflow all the grounds which lie between Tergowe, Rotterdam, Delf, and Leyden. At this unlooked-for inundation the Spaniards were at first much astonished; but they were soon aware of the enemies' design.

The king's forts were very many, as we have said, and divers of them were seated in the lowest places. These the inundation did quickly reach, and therefore they were quickly forsaken, and those who kept them went to join with those that kept the chiefest forts, which were so placed as they might be the more easily maintained. Meanwhile, when once the enemy had pitched upon the aforesaid resolution, they applied themselves apace to get together great store of vessels which should be fitting to relieve Leyden. They were very careful to build them with shallow bottoms, to the end that they might pass over such grounds where the water was shallowest. The greatest part of them were built in Rotterdam, by reason of the nearness and opportunity of its situation. All Holland was in great expectation what the success would prove, and therefore people flocked from all parts to help to build boats; many of which were to be in the form of galleys with oars, to the end that they might the easier get by the passes, and assault the forts, which were yet in the royalists' possession. These boats were therefore furnished with many pieces of artillery, and such people as were judged fit to fight. While they were making this preparation, the admiral of Holland endeavored, with some ships prepared for that purpose, to force certain passes, and to bring some succor into Leyden; for the besieged suffered very much for want of victuals, and did very earnestly solicit succor. But his design did not at that time take effect; for the waters were not yet so far increased as that his vessels could come near Leyden. All Holland joined therefore in their prayers, that the sea might suddenly swell higher; and that the province, by raising the siege of Leyden, might receive so desired a misfortune.

On the other side, the king's men were not wanting in securing their forts, and repairing them with earth, hay, and whatsoever else they could come by of most commodious; and hoping that the waters would swell no higher, they persuaded themselves that they should, within a few days, finish their business. They very well knew the townsmen's necessities, and that all their victuals being already spent, the affairs within were drawing to great extremity. While both sides were in these hopes and fears, the time came wherein nature, by way of her hidden causes, was likewise to work her effects. About the end of September the sea began to swell exceedingly, according as she useth to do in that season of the year; and pouring in at the high tides, no longer waves, but even mountains of waters, into the most inward channels and rivers, made so great an inundation, as all the country about Leyden seemed to be turned into a sea. It can not be said how much the rebels were hereby encouraged, and the king's men discouraged. The former came presently forth with their fleet, which consisted of about 150 bottoms, a great part whereof were made like galleys; and to these were added many other boats which served only to carry victuals. The whole fleet was thus assembled together about the beginning of October, and put to water in good order, to execute their designed relief: the galleys went on the outsides; the other greater vessels, which, if need should be, were to play upon the forts, in the midst; and those which bore the victuals in the rear. But there was no occasion of any great contention; for the king's men, having valiantly defended themselves in sundry places, considering that they were not now to fight with men, but with the elements, thought rather how to withdraw themselves into places of safety, than rashly to oppose the enemy. Yet they could not forego their fortifications, neither so soon nor in so good order, but that many of them remained a prey either to the sword or to the water. And truly it was a miserable spectacle to behold, from all parts, one slain, another drowned, and many endeavoring to save themselves in the highest places, where, when they were freed from the waters, they were inexorably slain by the enemy. It is said that above 1,500 of the king's men perished thus, and most of them Spaniards, as those who were chiefly employed in ordering the siege, and who, desirous to bear away the greatest glory, fell into the greatest misfortune. Thus was Leyden at last relieved, after five months' siege, to the exceeding great joy of the rebels and all that favored them. But, howsoever, the memory of this siege remained a long time very sorrowful in the city, for about ten thousand died within the town of hunger and other sufferings, and all the most unclean and vilest nourishment was already so consumed when the relief was brought in, and the besieged resolving rather to die than to yield, nothing was expected but that the city should give up her last breath, and, remaining a miserable carcass, should be buried within her own walls and houses.

With extreme impatience they now expected the approach of those tides which are commonly the object of their dread and terror. The situation of the besieged was become the most desperate and deplorable. During seven weeks there had not been a morsel of bread within the city; and the only food had been the roots of herbs and weeds, and the flesh of dogs and horses. Even all these were at length consumed, and the people reduced to live on soup made of the hides of animals which had been killed. A pestilence succeeded to the famine, and carried off in a few weeks some thousands of the inhabitants. Those who survived, overwhelmed with anguish at the dismal scenes which they daily beheld, were scarcely able to perform the mournful office of burying the dead. In this dreadful situation they saw from their walls the flags and sails of the vessels destined for their relief, but had the mortification to perceive that it was utterly impossible for them to approach. It is not surprising that some of the people, finding their misery greater than they were able to endure, should have entertained the thoughts of surrendering the town to the enemy. Some conspiracies were again formed for this purpose, but they were discovered and defeated by the vigilance of Douza, supported by a great majority of the people, to whom neither the pestilence, nor famine, nor death in its most hideous forms, appeared so dreadful as the tyranny of the Spaniards.

A great number of people having come one day in a tumultuous manner to a magistrate whose name was Adrian, exclaiming, that he ought either to give them food, or deliver the town into the hands of the enemy: "I have solemnly sworn," he replied, "that I will never surrender myself or my fellow-citizens to the cruel and perfidious Spaniard; and I will sooner die than violate my oath. I have no food, else I would give it you. But if my death can be of use to you, take, tear me in pieces, and devour me: I shall die with satisfaction, if I know that by my death I shall for one moment relieve you from your direful necessity!" By this extraordinary answer the people, struck with astonishment, were silenced, and their fury was for some time appeased. * * * At length, however, their heroic sacrifices were rewarded by the wished-for deliverance.—Bentivoglio's Wars in Flanders.

LIEGE, A.D. 1468.—Louis XI. had raised the Liégeois against their suzerain, the Duke of Burgundy. In an over-cunning attempt at policy, Louis had placed himself in the hands of the bold Burgundian, who, irritated by the outbreak at Liége, compelled the imprudent monarch to hoist the cross of St. Andrew, the ensign of the house of Burgundy, and lead his army against the Liégeois, whose revolt he had excited. Made aware of the storm about to break over their ramparts, the inhabitants prepared for a vigorous defense. Although reduced to a feeble garrison of 600 men, the burgesses determined to withstand with courage the efforts of an enemy who had sworn to ruin them. The Duke of Burgundy opened the trenches, and took up his lodging in one of the faubourgs. The besieged, in a vigorous sortie, killed 800 Burgundians, and put the rest of their infantry to flight. Wild, provost of Liége, who had led on this attack, died of his wounds: the loss was irreparable—no one could replace him. The duke of Burgundy and the king came up. They lodged in houses in the faubourgs, and ordered many useless attacks and assaults. Several days passed without any event of consequence. During this short repose, the Liégeois meditated carrying off the king and the duke by surprise. In the darkness and silence of night, the Liégeois marched, led by the owners of the houses in which the princes were lodged. A hollow way cut through a rock covered their march. They killed some sentinels, arrived at the lodgings without being discovered, and stopped at the pavilion in which dwelt the Count du Perche, son of the Duke d'Alençon. They missed the decisive moment. The two princes were awakened and put upon their guard. Three hundred men-at-arms were round them instantly. The tumult was horrible. The clash of arms, the uncertainty of the cause of peril, the darkness, and the cries of the combatants, augmented the confusion of this mêlée. The Liégeois, conscious of the smallness of their numbers, and feeling they must succumb, fought like lions at bay: they perished, but sold their lives dearly. The king and the Duke of Burgundy met in the street, at the head of their guards; their presence removed mutual suspicions. They separated, after felicitating each other upon their good fortune and intrepidity upon so perilous an occasion. This fruitless attempt only increased the rage of the irritable duke: he ordered an assault for the 30th of October. At the given signal, toward daybreak, 40,000 men advanced to the foot of the battlements, to the sound of warlike instruments. Nobody appeared upon the walls to defend them; the inhabitants had fled; women, children, and old men awaited in consternation and silence the evils it would please their implacable conqueror to pour upon them. The Burgundians entered without resistance. The poor remains of the population took refuge in the churches from the fury of the soldiery. The duke triumphed: but what triumph could satisfy his brutal nature? Priests were immolated at the foot of the altar; sacred virgins, dragged from their asylums, were violated and then massacred; soldiers went from house to house with the lighted torch and naked sword in their hands; they vented their fury upon defenseless women and children; plunder was the least of their crimes. The unfortunate fugitives perished in the woods of hunger and destitution, or were pitilessly massacred; prisoners, too poor to pay their ransom, were precipitated into the waters of the Meuse. The city, when changed into a desert, presenting no animated creature upon which the barbarous conqueror could exercise his cruel vengeance, he directed his resentment against inanimate objects. Four thousand men of the country of Limbourg were commanded to set fire to the public edifices, and to demolish all that the flames had not devoured. Liége soon became one heap of melancholy ruins.—Robson.

LIGNY, A.D. 1815.—Ligny is a village of Belgium, and situated 14 miles west of Namur, and is celebrated for a combat between the French and Prussians, on the 16th of June, 1815, two days before the battle of Waterloo. See Waterloo.

LIMERICK, A.D. 1691.—Limerick in Ireland, capitulated in 1691 to the troops of William III., under Ginkell.

LIMOGES, A.D. 1189.—Nothilda, queen of Richard the Lion-heart, laid siege to Limoges in France, and finally took it by storm. She then gave it up to pillage. In 1370 it was besieged and taken by Edward, Prince of Wales, known in history as the Black Prince.

LINCOLN, A.D. 1141.—This city is situated on the river Witham, in Lincoln co., England, one hundred and twenty-one miles north of London.

On the 30th of September, 1139, Matilda, widow of Henry IV., landed in England, to assert her rights to the crown of England against Stephen who then occupied the throne. She was accompanied by her brother Robert, Earl of Gloucester, and a retinue of 140 knights. With this small force she undertook to conquer the throne of her father; but the temerity of the attempt was justified by the promises of her partizans, and the dispute between the king and the clergy. Her brother Robert, the soul of the enterprise, with twelve companions left her to join his friends in the west, and by unfrequented roads eluded the pursuit and vigilance of his enemies; Matilda, herself, at the invitation of the queen dowager Alice, retired within the strong castle of Arundel, and she excited by messages her partizans to take arms in every part of England. The queen-dowager, who was now the wife of the Earl of Sussex, had expected that her daughter-in-law would have invaded the kingdom with a much greater force, and became apprehensive of danger; and Matilda, to ease her of her fears removed first to Bristol and thence to Gloucester, where she remained under the protection of Milo, a gallant nobleman of those parts, who had embraced her cause.

Soon after, Geoffrey Talbot, William Mohun, Ralph Lovell, and many other barons declared for her; and her party, which was generally favored in the country, seemed every day to gain ground upon that of her antagonist. England was now exposed to all the horrors of a civil war. The garrisons of the royal fortresses supported the cause of Stephen. The standard of Matilda was unfurled at Gloucester and Bristol, Canterbury and Dover, places which Robert held from the gift of his father, the late monarch. Each competitor had numerous partisans; but the majority of the barons, shut up in their castles, either affected to observe a strict neutrality, or under the mask of a pretended submission, maintained a real independence. The execution of justice was suspended; the defenseless were alternately plundered by the adverse parties. Many were the conflicts and sieges; but these incidents, so little memorable in themselves, and so confused both in time and place, could neither afford entertainment nor instruction to the reader. At length, in the year 1141, in an evil hour Stephen was persuaded to besiege the castle of Lincoln, which had been surprised by Ranulf, Earl of Chester, a nobleman who had offered his services to both the king and the empress, and who had been equally mistrusted by both.* Confiding his wife and family to the faith of the garrison, Ranulf escaped through the besieging army, and hastened to Robert for assistance. With 10,000 men the earl hastened to surprise, and crossing the Trent, on the 2d of February, found the royal army drawn up to receive him. Stephen, with the most trusty of his adherents, had dismounted, and placed himself at the foot of his standard; and each flank was protected by a small squadron of horse, under the command of a nobleman of suspected fidelity. At the first shock the cavalry fled; the mass of infantry, animated by the presence of the king, firmly withstood the efforts of the multitude by which it was surrounded. Stephen fought with the energy of despair; his battle-axe was broken; his sword was shivered; a stone brought him to the ground, and William de Kains, seizing him by the helmet, claimed him as his prisoner. Still he struggled with his opponents, and refused to surrender to any man but his cousin of Gloucester. The earl took possession of the captive, and presented him to Matilda. The conduct of that princess does little honor to her humanity. Though at first treated kindly, he was soon after, on some suspicion, thrown into prison, and loaded with chains. Earl Robert afterward fell into the hands of the royalists, and after some negotiation it was agreed that he should be exchanged for the king. By this revolution, the two parties were placed in the same relative position which they had occupied before the battle of Lincoln.

On the 14th of May, 1217, in the second year of the reign of Henry III. of England, the Count de Perche, with the army of Louis of France, numbering 600 knights and 20,000 men, composed of the disaffected English barons and knights, with their esquires and retainers, and a numerous body of French infantry entered Lincoln, and were received by the inhabitants, who were on hostile terms with the youthful king of England, with loud acclamations of joy. The count immediately laid siege to the castle of Lincoln, which was garrisoned by the royalists, and which was gallantly defended by a celebrated heroine, Nichola de Camville. Pembroke, who was then marshal of England, immediately summoned the royalists to meet him at Newark, and was able to number among his followers 400 knights with their esquires, 250 cross-bowmen, and a numerous body of infantry. He employed three days in marshaling his army, and in performing religious duties, and having exhorted his soldiers to fight for their God, their king, and their country, he marched from Newark on the 18th of May. The army marched in seven divisions, and each soldier had a white cross sewed upon his breast; the bowmen kept a mile in advance, and the baggage a mile in the rear. This disposition deceived the enemy, who, mistaking the baggage train for a second army, unwisely shut themselves up within the walls, and at the same time, by way of bravado, made a brisk assault on the castle. But the bowmen, who had been admitted by a postern into the fortress, thinned with their arrows the ranks of the assailants, and, by killing the horses of the knights, laid them in their armor on the ground. The rest of the royalists, wheeling around, burst open, after a sharp conflict, the northern gate, and at the same moment a sortie was made from the castle. Dismay and confusion now spread through the ranks of the barons. The most spirited, unable to withstand the torrent that rushed into the city, were carried before it; the crowd ran to the opposite portal; but the narrow winding passage was soon choked, and the fugitives were compelled to recoil on the pursuers. The meaner combatants met with no mercy; but little noble blood was shed by the victors, who, prompted by relationship, or the hope of ransom, sought not to slay but to capture their enemies. The Count de Perche alone lost his life. He fought in a church-yard till his horse was killed; and when a voice called out to him to accept of quarter, he replied with an oath that he would never surrender to an English traitor. Irritated by the reproach, a soldier thrust his pike through the eye of the count's visor into his brain. The number of captives amounted to three earls, eleven barons, and 400 knights. Two hundred others escaped by different routes to London; the foot soldiers, seeking to follow them, were massacred by the inhabitants of the villages through which they were obliged to pass. This victory, which secured the crown on the head of the young king, was called in the quaint language of the time, "the fair of Lincoln." There were few of the conquerors who were not enriched by it. As soon as resistance ceased, the city which had long been distinguished by its attachment to the barons, was given up to pillage. The fate of the women and children was most deplorable. When the gate was forced, they crowded for security into the boats on the river. Some of the slight vessels sank under the weight; others were lost through mismanagement; and of the fugitives the greater part were drowned.

* As sieges form the principal features in the military transactions of this period, a description of one of the ancient castles may not be uninteresting to the reader. The keep, the lord's residence, was surrounded at a convenient distance, by a wall about twelve feet high, surmounted by a parapet, and flanked with towers. Without the wall was excavated a deep moat, over which a drawbridge was thrown, protected by a tower, called the barrieau, on the external margin of the moat. This formed the outward defense of the place. The keep was a strong square building, with walls about ten feet thick, and five stories in height. Of these the lowermost consisted of dungeons for the confinement of captives; the second contained the lord's stores; the next served for the accommodation of the garrison; in the fourth were the state-rooms of the baron, and the uppermost was divided into sleeping apartments for his family. The only portal or entrance was fixed in the second or third story, and generally led through a small tower into the body of the keep. The ascent was by a flight of steps fixed in the walls, and carefully fortified to prevent the entrance of an enemy. About the middle stood a strong gate, which it was necessary to force open; on the landing-place was a drawbridge, and then came the door itself, protected by a huse or portcullis, which ran in a groove, and was studded with spikes of iron. It is not surprising that fortresses of this description should have often withstood the efforts of the most powerful monarchs before the invention of cannon.

LISBON, A.D. 1147.—Alphonso, a prince of the house of Burgundy, having assumed the title of King of Portugal, felt that he could not truly be considered monarch of that country while his capital remained in the hands of the Saracens. Too weak to undertake the conquest himself, he made a religious Crusade of it, and English and Flemings, who had embarked for the Holy Land were induced by the prospect of greater wealth without going so far to attain it, to take up his cause. The great historian of the Crusades attributes this dereliction to a religious feeling, which operated as well in Portugal as in Palestine. We have no hesitation in agreeing that the Crusaders were acted upon in both countries by similar motives; in this case, it was too transparent to be possibly mistaken. The new auxiliaries covered the sea with their vessels, and blockaded the city, while Alphonso besieged it by land with an army much more brave than numerous. During five months, several assaults were given and sanguinary battles were fought. Willing to make one last and great attempt, Alphonso drew up his soldiers in order of battle before the place, and, making his dispositions for a general attack, said to them: "Warriors, I am about to lead you to glory; dare to conquer, and you will triumph. Advance boldly through stones, arrows, and fire; brave death, and nothing can resist your courage. Hasten, my friends, hasten to enrich yourselves with the spoils of the Arabs. You, warriors of the Cross, whom heaven has sent, God will bless your arms; noble pay and rich possessions will be the reward of your valor." He had scarcely finished speaking, when all the soldiers rushed to the walls; scrambling over one another up and over the ruins. Alphonso nobly supported the title of their leader; the besieged vainly opposed force to force, the Christians drove them in, in all quarters, and broke down the gate called Alfama. In a moment they were spread through the city; they massacred all found with arms in their hands, pillaged the wealth of the infidels, and planted the prince's standard upon all the towers. The capture of Lisbon soon rendered Alphonso king of all Portugal.—Robson.

LISLE, A.D. 1793.—Lisle, or Lille, is a strongly fortified town of France, situated on the Deule, a canal connecting the rivers Scarpe and Lys, 26 miles north-east of Anas.

On the 14th of September, 1793, the Austrian army under the command of the Archduke Albert, attacked and completely routed the French forces which were retreating from their camp at Maulda, to the camp of Bruille, a stronger position in the rear of Maulda. Encouraged by this success, the archduke determined to besiege Lisle, one of the best fortified towns of Europe. The garrison of Lisle consisted of 10,000 men; and the commander, was a man of energy and bravery. Devoted republicans, both the commander and his men were ready to defend the city against the assaults of the imperialists with their hearts' blood. The Austrian army consisted of 25,000 men. Yet, notwithstanding his great superiority in numbers, the Austrian general could not hope to reduce the town by a regular siege. He was aware of the indomitable courage of the garrison; and endeavored to intimidate them by the terrors of a bombardment, rather than to approach the town with regular siege works. For seven consecutive days and nights he bombarded the town incessantly. The soldiers, however, were secure within bomb-proof casements, and beheld the terrible tempest fall upon the defenseless inhabitants of the town with indifference. The people, although their town was nearly consumed by fire, bore the horrors of the bombardment with the firmness of heroes; and the garrison, during the siege, having received a reinforcement of 10,000 men, so that the besiegers and the besieged were nearly equal in numbers, the Archduke Albert on the 7th of October, raised the siege and withdrew his troops from French territory.

LISIEUX, A.D. 1130.—Lisieux, in France, has been frequently besieged. It was burned by the Saxons in 1130; was taken by Philip Augustus, in 1203; by the English in 1415; by the French, under Charles VII., in 1448; by the Leaguers, in 1571; and finally the French, under Henry IV., in 1589.

LIVRON, A.D. 1574.—When Henry III. left Poland as a fugitive, to occupy the throne made vacant by the death of Charles IX., he created Roger de St. Lary-Bellegarde, one of his minions, a marshal of France. A short time after his promotion, the new general was repulsed in three assaults which he made upon Livron, a small Huguenot fortified place in Dauphiny, although he attacked it with a good army, and it was defended but by a few inhabitants. The women of the city thought him so contemptible, that, to insult him, they plied their distaffs on the breach. Henry, who passed near the city, stopped for a few hours, to display his valor. The besieged, on learning his arrival, made a general discharge of their artillery, which they followed by continual hissings and hootings, accompanied by cutting railleries against the monarch and the queen, his mother. "Ha! ha! you massacrers! you shall not poniard us in our beds, as you did the admiral! Bring us a few of your laced, ruffled, and perfumed minions; let them come and look at our women; they will see if they look like a prey to be easily taken!" Henry ordered a fresh assault to be made, but it was repulsed by the women only, and the siege was raised shortly after this disgraceful defeat.

LOANO, A.D. 1795.—Loano is situated on the gulf of Genoa, in Italy. The battle of Loano, between the Austrian army and the French republicans, was fought November 23d and 24th, 1795. The army of the Austrians, numbering some 40,000 men, occupied a strong and fortified position, its left resting on the small seaport town of Loano, and its right extending to the northern summit of the mountains, and holding communication, by a chain of fortified posts, with the strong places of Ceva, Mondovi, and Coni, occupied by the Piedmontese troops. Their position was very strong, but in case of disaster, there was no means of retreat for their left wing. The French were posted directly in front of their enemy, their right resting on the little village of Borghetto, on the sea-coast, and their right also extending to the mountains. Their army had been increased to nearly 60,000 men, and was commanded by Scherer and Massena. During former campaigns, Massena had possessed himself of all the localities of that mountainous region, and being already quite a successful general, was therefore intrusted with the command of the attack. The Austrian commander was entirely unconscious of the movements of the French army, and knew nothing of their great additions, and the increased activity which they had shown for some time, and was so unaware of any danger that he remained at La Pietra, detained by an abscess in his mouth, while his officers were nearly all at Feriole, where they were roused from a ball, by the cannon of the French, at six o'clock on the morning of the 23d of November. The right wing of the republicans was commanded by Scherer, who was general-in-chief; the center by Augereau, and the left by Serrurier. It was the intention of Massena to force the Austrian center with an overwhelming force, and having gained this advantage, to take the remainder of the line in flank and rear. After a speech to his troops, he led them to the attack. The Austrian center, commanded by Argenteau, made an obstinate resistance at the posts of Bardenetto and Melogno; but the fresh columns, brought to the assault by the French, fought with such vigor that they were compelled to retire to a second line, on the right bank of the Boninda. That position was soon forced by Massena, and by this means, he got into the interior of the Austrian lines, and was able to take all their positions in the rear. Thus, on the first day of the battle, the center of the allies was forced, and their left wing left in such a position as to be overwhelmed by the French center and right wing at any moment. As soon as the Austrian general was aware of this state of affairs, he took decisive measures to draw back his right wing. But this he was not permitted to do without great opposition. Augereau was climbing the heights of the Appenines by the break of day, while his successful battalions were driving all before them. The imperialists, in retreating, did not show much vigor or decision, which, under the circumstances, could alone save them. The consequence was, they were beset on all sides, in a ravine, which formed their only line of retreat. The head of the column, seized with a panic, was driven back upon the center, and thrown into utter confusion; and in the midst of an unparalleled scene of carnage and horror, forty-eight pieces of cannon, and 100 caissons were abandoned. By taking to paths almost inaccessible, the other column of the right wing escaped, after abandoning all their artillery also. 5,000 prisoners, eighty pieces of cannon, and an immense quantity of ammunition and magazines, fell into the hands of the victors; the total loss on the side of the Austrians was not less than 7,000, while that of the French hardly amounted to 1,000 men.

This battle was the most decisive which had been gained by the republicans since the commencement of the war, and was entirely owing to the skill and strategy of Massena. It was the first instance of the successful application by the French troops of those principles which were afterward carried to such perfection by Napoleon.

LODI, A.D. 1796.—Lodi is situated on the Adda, in Lombardy, nineteen miles south-east of Milan. The river at this place is crossed by a wooden bridge, 609 feet long.

On the 10th of May, 1796, Napoleon marched from Parma toward Milan, at the head of the French republican army. Before arriving at that city he was obliged to cross the Adda. The bridge of Lodi, over that river, was held by 12,000 Austrian infantry, and 4,000 horse, forming the rear guard of the Austrian army, which had returned to Cassano, in the neighborhood of Milan. Napoleon hoped by a rapid advance to cut off the bulk of the enemy's troops from the hereditary states of Austria, and make them prisoners; and as there was not a moment to be lost in achieving the movements requisite to attain this object, he resolved to force the bridge, and thus get into their rear. Napoleon in person arrived at Lodi at the head of the grenadiers of D'Allemagne, upon which the Austrians withdrew from the town and crossed the river, drawing up their infantry, with twenty pieces of cannon, at the further extremity of the bridge, to defend the passage. Napoleon immediately directed Beaumont, with all the cavalry of the army, to pass at a ford half a league further up, while he himself directed all the artillery which had come up, against the Austrian battery, and formed 6,000 grenadiers in close column, under cover of the houses at his own end of the bridge. The French cannon were at once opened upon the Austrian artillery, and a furious cannonade ensued on both sides. The Austrian fire soon began to slacken from the effect of the French artillery, and Napoleon, perceiving that the passage of Beaumont on the flank of the enemy had commenced, addressed a few animating words to his soldiers, and gave the signal to advance. The grenadiers responded to his words with loud shouts, and rushed forward, through a cloud of smoke, over the long and narrow defile of the bridge, with Napoleon at their head. The Austrians poured forth a concentrated fire of grape-shot upon the advancing columns. But, inspired by the bravery of their dauntless leader, the gallant grenadiers rushed through the iron tempest, which swept the whole length of the bridge, and, supported by the tiralleurs, who waded the stream below the arches, they carried the Austrian guns, and drove back their infantry. The victory of the French was complete. The Austrians fled in confusion, leaving the ground strewn with dead and dying. Their artillery fell into the hands of the conquerors.

LONDONDERRY, A.D. 1689. — Amid the difficulties which King William had to find officers in Ireland whom he could trust, he had appointed Colonel Lundie to be governor of Londonderry; a man whose fidelity was so little known, that the officer sent to him from England with the stores of war, was ordered not to deliver his charge until Lundie had taken the oaths, in his presence, to the new government. The precaution was necessary, but weak, for Lundie, having been one of Tyrconnel's officers, had quitted the interests of King James only with a view to serve them the more effectually. Lundie, as James's army advanced toward Londonderry, abandoned pass after pass, sometimes with feeble, and sometimes with no defense; and at last, upon the 13th of April, 1689, took refuge in the town.

Two days before King James could overtake Lundie, two regiments, under the commands of Colonel Richards and Colonel Cunningham, arrived from England in the lake which commands a communication betwixt the sea and the town. Their orders having been discretionary, to land the troops or not, according as the service should require, they offered to join Lundie. They urged him to march out of the town, and defend one of the passes which was still left. Lundie wrote them an ambiguous and contradictory letter; in the end of it, he told them the place was untenable, and referred them for particulars to the officer who carried the letter. The officer delivered them orders not to land the men, but to come to town themselves with some of their officers, in order to attend a council of war. To this council Lundie called only two of his own officers, thirteen of those belonging to the two regiments, and the town-clerk, whose assistance was necessary to frame the minutes of council. To these persons he painted, in the strongest terms, the weakness of the town in military stores, in defenses, in provisions; he even averred that, to his own knowledge, there was not subsistence in it for ten days. The council came to a resolution, opposed only by Richards, not to land the regiments, and that all the officers should privately withdraw from the town. The two colonels, with some of their officers, retired from the council to their ships. Lundie next called a meeting of the town-council, where it was resolved to send messengers to King James, with an offer to surrender the town next day.

It was intended to keep the result of these councils a secret. But next morning, the town-clerk, convening a number of the people, informed them of every thing that had passed. The inhabitants, and many of the soldiers of the garrison, crying out, "They were betrayed by those who were bound to defend them," rose in a fury against the governor, the town-council, and such of the officers as they suspected. They shot one of the officers, they wounded another. Hence the highest uproar of divisions; for, while some were framing the terms of surrender, others were planting guns on the walls; in one place, the multitude was pressed to yield to necessity; in another, voices were heard calling to fire upon those who proposed it.

During this state of public distraction James was seen slowly advancing with his army, to take possession of a town which had sent messengers to receive him; a sight which increased the fears of the one party, and the rage of the other. At this instant, advice was brought, that on the opposite side of the town, Captain Murray, a brave officer, conspicuous in person, and known to all, was advancing with impetuosity at the head of a body of horse, to prevent the surrender. Lundie sent him orders to retire from the view of the inhabitants. But great numbers, stretching their arms and bodies from the walls, and calling upon him by name, and upon all his followers whom they knew, to advance to their relief, he entered the place. In broken speeches he called to the multitude, who surrounded him as soon as he passed the gate, to remember glory, safety, religion, their country, themselves, their posterity, with other topics, which natural passion dictated, or the present exigency required. He pointed to different persons to secure the gates, to run to arms, to mount the walls, to point the guns. He directed all those whose voices were for defending the town to distinguish themselves by tying a white cloth round their left arm. From thence he hastened to Lundie, then sitting in a council, whom he tried in vain to soothe with flattery, or rouse by reproaches. In the mean time, the multitude, kindled by the orders they had received, fired upon King James, killed an officer by his side, and obliged him to retire.

When these violent actions were over, and the inhabitants reflected that there were no regular troops among them, fear and consciousness of what they had done, and what they were to expect, seized them. They pressed for the landing of the regiments; they offered to submit to authority, and kept even Lundie a sort of prisoner in his own house, to prevent his departure. Embracing those officers whom chance threw in their way, they conjured them not to abandon them to the rage of an affronted enemy; they flattered, encouraged, reproached, menaced; but in vain. The remaining officers of the two regiments, with many officers of the garrison, withdrew, and sailed to England. The less valiant part of the multitude, following their example, fled from the town. Lundie stole off with a load on his back; a disgraceful disguise, and suited to the man who bore it. About 7,500 militia in arms remained to defend the place against an enemy, once their sovereign, and at the head of 20,000 regular forces.

Men abandoned to themselves often exert a vigor which, while they trusted to others, they knew not that they possessed. The town was weak in its fortifications, having only a wall, eight or nine feet thick, along the face of the rampart; a ditch, eight bastions, and some outworks lately thrown up, and of little consequence. It was weaker in its artillery, there being no more than twenty serviceable guns on the works. Near 20,000 unarmed hands increased the numbers, and diminished the strength of the place. But its best defense lay in the minds of the defenders; men refined from all the dross of their party; and possessed of the valor and enthusiasm of those Scottish ancestors from whom most of the inhabitants of Ulster are descended. They offered the command of the place to Captain Murray; with the ingenuous frankness which is the common attendant of true courage, he answered, "He was better fitted for offensive than defensive war;" and offered to take the command of the horse. Major Baker was chosen governor; with that modesty which likewise attends true courage, he begged to have an assistant. The garrison, under the impressions of religion which danger excites, chose Mr. Walker, a clergyman, to assist him; a man who had a great and warlike spirit, under the most peaceful of professions. These men formed the garrison and inhabitants into a number of regiments, proportioned to that of the bastions; and, in order to create the greater emulation, they assigned different parts of the works to different regiments, which they alone were to defend. The besieged repaired their fortifications and artillery, as well as the shortness of the time would permit. They alarmed King James by continual sallies, in the day, in the night, in time of meals, in rain, in mist; they destroyed his works, or, where success failed them, they returned, contented that they had harassed his troops.

These sallies they made more formidable by a practice which pedants in the profession of arms would have disapproved. When a sally was to be made, the command was offered to whatever officer would undertake it, and the officer offered the service to whatever soldiers would attend him; hence competition among the officers; hence confidence among the soldiers, who reasoned upon the merits of those who commanded them, and followed those only in sudden services, under whom they were sure to conquer. Murray flew from man to man, and from body to body. Walker assembled them at sermons. Murray cried out, "That it was not a few military evolutions, nor the movements of arms by rule, the mere parade and foppery of war, which made soldiers; but strong bodies, stronger minds, the contempt of dangers and death; or if, in regular fields of battle, disciplined troops had the advantage over a militia, useless was that advantage here, where the defenders fought behind walls; a situation in which those who could bear most fatigue, and durst stand longest to their posts, must in the end prevail in the contest." Walker pointed to their churches—to the sky: "These were the holy fanes from which their enemies were to drive them, if they survived, with disgrace; this was the asylum prepared for them by their God, if they died with glory in his cause." The young animated the old, the old gave counsel, gave praises to the young. All were fired by hatred of the Catholic religion, enthusiasm for their own, and the dread of a vengeance proportioned to both. Perhaps, too, the spirit of competition, and the glory of defending a place which regular troops had abandoned, was equal to any of their other incitements. James continued his attacks unsuccessfully during eleven days; and then went to Dublin to meet his parliament. He left the army under Hamilton to continue the siege.

In the mean time, intelligence is received that the French had made another embarkation of stores, and some troops, for the service of their allies in Ireland. The English fleet is sent in quest of the French fleet, which was to conduct the embakation. They met, and engaged. The battle lasted most of the day, with equal success. The English fleet retired toward Scilly, and the French toward Ireland, where they landed their troops and stores.

But the accession of strength to James's party by the disembarkation from France, did not shake the resolution of the faithful defenders of Londonderry. General Kirk had been sent to them from England with provisions and a reinforcement of 5,000 men. From different accidents, he did not arrive in the lake of Derry until the 13th of June. Upon the sight of his fleet, which consisted of thirty sail, the besieged gave the usual salutations of joy; but, perceiving them received with silence, and no jovial returns made by the seamen, they looked upon each other with uncertain and foreboding eyes. Soon after, they were informed that Kirk, upon receiving information that the passage of the river to the town was secured by works, had resolved to retire to the Inch, an island six miles from Londonderry. These works were batteries along the banks, vessels sunk in the channel, and a boom which had been thrown across the river, and which was defended by forts; and all these were reported to be much stronger than they were.

Upon these sad news, the besieged made signals of distress from their steeples to Kirk, but in vain. After a short stay he set sail; the inhabitants of the town following his ships with their eyes as long as they could perceive them. Kirk chose the Inch for a station, because it facilitated the junction of the volunteers, who lay at Inniskillen with his detachment, and for that reason too he fortified it. From thence he sent a letter to the townsmen, assuring them, in terms full of affectation, that every thing in Scotland, England, and Ireland, was prosperous, and that succors beyond their wishes were speedily to join them, but he concluded with giving them in charge to husband well their provisions: a letter more alarming than all the menaces of the enemy.

But the besieged, though in a desperate condition, did not give themselves up to despair. Not contented with making sallies, and defending the old outworks of the place, they even advanced new ones, and became expert in fortification and mining, by imitating the arts which were employed against them. The women attended every service, animating the men by their cries, and often assisting them with their hands. All the spare time of the garrison, and of the inhabitants, was spent in private prayer, or public devotion; yet it was strange, amid the union created by common danger, to see religious divisions break forth. The conformists and non-conformists insisted each to have possession of the cathedral; nor could mutual slaughter have been prevented, had it not been agreed that the one class should attend service in the forenoon, the other in the afternoon. About the middle of June, when the weather grew sultry, disease at last seized upon them, cooped up in a narrow place. They buried fifteen officers in one day. Baker, their governor, died. Yet even death, in this form, more dismal than in that of war, dismayed them not. Their provisions being spent, they preserved life by eating horse-flesh, tallow, starch, salted hides, impure animals, and roots of vegetables. When their cannon-balls were near spent they made use of brick covered with lead. In this situation, General Hamilton pressed them to surrender upon reasonable conditions. Their answer consisted in asking, "If he thought they could trust one who had be-

James, tired with the tediousness of the siege, and alarmed at Kirk's arrival, sent Marischal Rosen, his commander-in-chief, in the end of June, to urge matters with more vigor. He, more skilled in attack than the Irish generals, changed the arrangements, invested the place more closely, and made many furious, but ineffectual, assaults. At length, provoked by the fidelity of the garrison, instead of humoring it, he took an unparalleled step; ordered that all the inhabitants, ten miles around Londonderry, should be driven under the walls of the town. He ordered the country to be burned, and proclaimed that, unless the town surrendered within ten days, all would be put to the sword: 5,000, some say 7,000, miserable wretches, who were collected from the country around, men, women, the old, the young, even the sick, and nurses with infants hanging at their breasts, all were driven, with drawn swords, under the walls of the town.

This device weakened the spirit of James's army by its horror, and strengthened those of the besieged, by turning a sedate into a furious valor. Many of the prisoners called to their friends on the walls above them, "To attend to their own interest, not theirs; for that a surrender to men, void of all Christian humanity, could not save those who were without, and would only involve those within in one common slaughter." The Irish officers executed their orders against their countrymen, weeping and obeying; and many of them owned that the cries they then heard rang forever after in their ears. The besieged, on the other hand, erecting a gibbet on the bastion nearest the enemy, gave orders to hang up whatever prisoners fell into their hands, and wrote to the enemy to send priests to confess them. During two days and two nights the unhappy victims of Rosen's resentment continued at the foot of the walls, without meat, drink, fire, or shelter, where many hundreds of them died. At the end of that time, such of them as were able to go away were permitted to do so. But those who died were the most fortunate: for the rest, filled with the seeds of diseases, and with dejection, as they wandered homeward, beheld, on all sides, their habitations in ashes, here and there at distances the smoke of some not extinguished; their cattle, provisions, furniture, carried off. A vast silence reigned over the land. They envied their companions who were at rest with their miseries. It would be inhuman to the memory of the unhappy to impute the disgrace of this action to James: he revoked the order as soon as he heard of it; his own sufferings had probably taught him to feel for those of others.

Kirk, in the mean time, heard the cries, and saw the fires, though enraged, and perhaps not displeased, to see his own character for cruelty exceeded. At last, receiving intelligence that the garrison, sunk with fatigues, had sent proposals of capitulation, and had only two days' provisions, he resolved upon an attempt to throw a convoy of provisions into the place, by means of three victual frigates, and a man-of-war to cover them in an attempt, upon the success of which, it was obvious to all, the loss or ruin of the town would not fail to depend.

As soon as these vessels approached the town, upon the 30th of July, the Irish army hastened to that side; some to oppose them, and the rest to gratify their curiosity. That part of the garrison which was not upon duty ranged themselves along the walls nearest the river, with eyes intent, and hands lifted to heaven for the success of the convoy. Kirk had been deceived in the strength of the enemy's works. The ship of war, too, by galling the enemy's batteries, drew their fire upon itself, and thus saved the victuallers from danger. The foremost of the victuallers, at the first shock, broke the boom, and ran aground by the turn which this gave to her course. A shout burst from the besiegers as from the mouth of one man, which echoed to the ships, the camp, and the town. Multitudes of them, quitting their ranks, flew to the shore, and plunged into the water; some pushed with their hands the boats they found there; others leaped into them; all advanced, or called to advance, against the vessel in distress. The smoke of the enemy's fire, and of her own, covered her from the sight of the besieged. During this darkness and confusion the besiegers called from the opposite side of the river, that the vessel was taken; a shrill cry of misery, like the wailings of women, were heard from the walls. The common paleness of fear appeared not upon men who had lost all sense of it: one, who was an eye-witness, relates that, in the depth of despair, they looked black in the eyes of each other. But, in a little time, the victualler was seen emerging from the smoke, having got off by the rebound of her guns; and she, and her followers, amid the tumultuous cries of both parties, sailed up to the town.

On the fortune of this convoy turned the fate of Londonderry, and perhaps of Ireland. For, next day, the enemy raised the siege, having continued it three months and a half, conscious they could have hoped for success from famine alone, not from their swords. The garrison was found to be reduced from 7,500 men to about 4,000, of which 1,000 were rendered unfit for service; and the remaining part of the garrison scarcely deserved to be called men, as, by watching and famine, they had rather the appearance of shadows. Their eyes being hollow, sunk beneath their brows, there appeared, in the expression of their looks, rather signs of resentment that their enemies had escaped, than of joy that themselves were free. Even to their friends who rescued them those dark looks seemed to mark the remembrance that relief had so often been called for in vain. Of the unarmed multitude, about 7,000 had perished by famine, disease, or the shot of the enemy. The supply of provisions was received with silent gratitude, as if it had been a gift from Heaven, not with the noisy rejoicings usual on such occasions; the garrison, in a long and devout order, repaired in procession to the church, checking the effusion of their joy, until they had returned thanks to that God who was the author of their relief.—Dalrymple's Memoirs.

LONATO, A.D. 1796.—Lonato is a town of Lombardy, and is situated about three miles south-west of Lake Garda.

On the 3d of August, 1796, Napoleon, at the head of 25,000 men, advanced upon Lonato. A feint attack of the republicans was unsuccessful, their light troops were thrown into confusion; General Pegion, with three pieces of artillery, was captured by the enemy, and Lonato taken. Napoleon, had a short time previous, driven the imperialists from the place and made 500 of them prisoners. After the capture of General Pegion, Napoleon took the command, and formed the center into one formidable body, while the Austrians were extending their troops toward Salo, in which direction Quasdonovich was stationed, so that in case of disaster they would be near him. The French general at once perceived the error of his adversary, in thus extending his forces, and made a desperate charge, with both foot and horse upon the Austrian center which being weakened so much, from the extension of the wings speedily gave way. Lonato was re-taken by assault, and the Austrians divided. One part of it effected its retreat under Bayalitch to Mincio, the other endeavored to join Quasdonovich at Salo; but Guyeaux, with a division of French already occupied that place, and the flying imperialists, pressed between the dragoons of Junot, who assailed their rear, and the infantry at Salo, who prevented them from advancing, disbanded, losing 3,000 prisoners and 30 pieces of cannon.

LOUDOUN HILL, A.D. 1307.—The battle of Loudoun was fought between the followers of Robert Bruce, the hero-king of Scotland, and the English army under the Earl of Pembroke. After a desperate battle the Scots were defeated, and Bruce was obliged to seek safety in flight.

LOUISBURG, A.D. 1758. — This little-place was once an important seaport town of Cape Breton at the mouth of the St. Lawrence. It is situated on the south-east shore of the island, about twenty miles east of Sydney. The French had erected at this place a fortress, at the expense of 30,000,000 livres. In 1758, Louisburg was the strongest fortification in America, and was the rallying-point of French power on the western continent. On the 28th day of May, 1758, Lord Amherst arrived at Halifax from England, whence he had been ordered with General Wolfe, to join the fleet of Admiral Boscawen for the purpose of laying siege to Louisburg. The whole fleet consisted of twenty-two ships of the line and fifteen frigates; the land force amounted to twelve thousand men. On the 20th of June the fleet anchored in Gabarus Bay; and on the 8th of July the troops, under a random fire from the frigates, commenced landing. The French had established several batteries upon the island without the town, and some French troops were posted behind a breastwork of felled trees. As the British were landing the enemy poured forth rapid and well directed volleys upon them; but Wolfe, who led the first division, would not allow a gun to be fired. He encouraged the oarsmen, and cheered on his men. The boats stranded on a shoal, and in spite of the surf which displayed its white teeth, as if to intimidate the soldiers, the English landed and carried the breastwork at a bound. They took the batteries, and drove the French into the town. On the same day the English invested Louisburg. Among the British officers who distinguished themselves on this day was Richard Montgomery. He was only twenty-one years of age; but he evinced that gallantry and firmness which afterward rendered him so conspicuous when fighting against tyranny under the walls of Quebec. He was attached to Wolfe's brigade, and the lovers of coincidences might find something to marvel at in the fact that both Wolfe and Montgomery met their ends beneath the walls of the same city, the one while fighting for his king, the other for the cause of liberty.* On the morning of the 12th, before daybreak, Wolfe, at the head of some light infantry and a corps of Highlanders, surprised and captured the light-house battery, on the north-east side of the entrance to the harbor. This movement completely cut off the means of escape to the French, who, alarmed at the overwhelming numbers of the British, meditated a retreat. The captured battery was turned on the town, and well-directed shots soon silenced the other batteries. On the 23d, the English battery commenced playing on that of the French, on the island near the center of the mouth of the harbor. Hot shot were also poured into the small fleet of French vessels lying in the harbor of Louisburg, and on the 21st three vessels were burned. On the night of the 25th the British set fire to a French seventy-four, the Prudent, and succeeded in cutting out and carrying off the Bienfuissant. Meanwhile the English artillery from ship and shore poured incessant volleys of shot and shell into the town, shattering the houses, and spreading desolation and ruin on all sides. The French cannon were nearly all silenced, and scarcely a spot in the place was tenable, and at the very time that Boscawen was preparing to send six English ships into the harbor, Chevalier de Drucor, the French governor, was meditating a capitulation. On the 26th of July, the French garrison surrendered, and on the following day the British took possession of Louisburg. The garrison were made prisoners of war, and with the sailors and marines, in all nearly six thousand men, were sent to England. Cape Breton and Prince Edward's Island also fell into the hands of the English, and with their fall ended the power of France on the eastern shores of America. Louisburg was deserted, and now a few fishermen's huts only mark the spot, to fortify which France once expended so much treasure.

LUNCARTY, A.D. 900.—At Luncarty, in Scotland, a battle was fought between the Danes, who had invaded Scotland, and the Scots. The battle was one of extraordinary obstinacy on both sides; but the Danes found an enemy in the commander of their antagonists worthy of their steel. By the energy and bravery of Hay, the founder of the Errol family, the Danes were signally defeated.

LUTZEN, A.D. 1632.—This little village is famous in history, as the witness of two of the most memorable battles of modern times. It is a town of Prussian Saxony, and is situated twelve miles south-west of Leipsic.

The battle of Lutzen, the last victory of the great Gustavus Adolphus, King of Sweden, the Lion of the North, and the chief support of the Protestant religion, was fought on the 6th of November, 1632, between the imperial army of Germany, and the Swedes. The town of Lutzen stands on a plain. Across the center of the road which leads from Lutzen to Leipsic, a trench is cut, which connects the Elster with the Saale. The hostile armies were posted between this trench and the village of Lutzen. The right wing of the imperial army rested on the trench, the left on the town; and the left wing of the Swedes rested on the trench, and the right on Lutzen. The two armies were divided by the street, which had deep ditches on either side. The whole imperial army occupied the north side of the road; the Swedes stood upon the south. The imperial army was commanded by Wallenstein, Duke of Friedland, and consisted of 25,000 men. Wallenstein, however, was in daily expectation of reinforcements. The Swedish army was under the immediate command of Gustavus Adolphus; and consisted of 18,000 men. The army was formed in two divisions, with a reserve; and with clouds of cavalry on each wing. Between the two main divisions in the center, were stationed eight ranks of infantry, four men deep; and among the cavalry on the wings small bodies of musketeers. In the front a battery of twenty cannon, were planted; and a number of portable cannons,* the invention of the king himself, were distributed among the several divisions of the army. The right wing was under the command of Gustavus Adolphus, the left was under Bernard Von Weimar. The center was under Brahe, and the reserve corps was commanded by Kniphausen.

The imperialists were drawn up in Wallenstein's usual order of battle. The center was composed of infantry, drawn up in four great hollow squares, the rear ranks consisting of pikemen, the front ranks of musketeers. These squares were flanked on the right and left by cavalry, and on the extreme right an eminence called Windmill Hill, was occupied by a body of cuirassiers, troopers, and footmen, posted there for the purpose of protecting the town from the assaults of the enemy. On the left was posted a body of Croats; and the ditches along the road were filled with musketeers. Between the ditch and the front of the center of the army, was planted a battery of seven cannons, and on Windmill Hill was another battery consisting of fourteen pieces of smaller caliber, planted in front of the infantry in the left wing.

Gustavus Adolphus had made his dispositions during the night of the 5th, with the determination to fall by surprise on the enemy; but the ever memorable 6th of November opened with a thick fog, and it was not until noon that the fog disappeared before the rays of the sun, and disclosed to the eyes of all, both armies drawn up in battle array. The Swedish monarch gave the signal for battle, and with a loud shout, "God be with us!" the Swedes rushed frantically to the fight. On, on they went, sweeping across the plain, driving the enemy's musketeers in the ditches before them, like chips on the teeth of a billow. They rushed into the blinding tempest which burst forth from the imperial battery in the center, and capturing the guns, advanced rapidly toward the enemy's front. They dashed madly against the first solid square, who received them with a warm fire of musketry, and loud shouts; but nothing could resist the impetuous charge of Swedes. The imperial square was broken and scattered like chaff before the wind, and the Swedes swiftly advanced toward the second. The imperialists defended themselves obstinately with the sword; but like a tempest the Swedes swept through them, and the second square shared the fate of the first. Wallenstein, who was sufferering from a severe attack of the gout, and was obliged to be conveyed in a litter, saw the disaster in the center, and hastily sent three regiments of horse, to support the third square, which the Swedes were assailing vigorously. They fell fiercely on the Swedish ranks, and the conflict raged with the utmost fury. The broken squares re-formed, and the Swedes in turn were compelled to fly across the road, leaving the captured guns behind.

While this terrible conflict was raging in the center, Bernard Von Weimar, with the left wing of the Swedish army, had been endeavoring to storm Windmill Hill. His troops had charged and charged again, without effect, when suddenly their leader was called upon to assume the supreme command.

Gustavus Adolphus, with the troopers of his right wing, had attacked and driven back the Croats on the enemy's left, when he saw his center falling back. Placing himself at the head of his favorite Finnlanders, he led them forward to cover the retreat of his center. He was accompanied by Duke Francis Albert of Saxony, a page, and a stable master. While urging his horse on at a full gallop, he received a ball in his arm, and soon afterward a second ball entered his back penetrating through his body, and he fell heavily to the earth.* The duke and the stable master fled; but the faithful page, Linbelfing, remained with his master, and endeavored to assist him to mount. A fog again covered the field of strife. The imperial horsemen made a furious charge over the prostrate monarch, and perceiving him, returned, and not recognizing him as the king, pierced him through and through with their lances, and shot him in several places. The brave page defended his master to the utmost of his abilities; but at length sank to the ground wounded so severely that he died five days after the battle. The troopers stripped the body of the king, and mangled it in such a manner, that when it was found the Swedes could scarcely recognize the features of their beloved monarch.

No sooner had Bernard heard of the fall of the king, than he desisted from his attacks on Windmill Hill, and hastened to the center. He informed Kniphausen of the disaster, and the latter advised him to return; but Bernard resolved to avenge the death of his master or die in the attempt.

He assumed the command of the entire army, and having got his troops into order again, addressed them energetically. "Swedes, Finnlanders, and Germans," said he, "the protector of your liberties has been slain. To me life is nothing, if I can not avenge his fall. Be brave, and charge the enemy vigorously; all who desire to show their love for their king, may show it now. Follow me, and conquer or die, like brave men and true soldiers!" The Swedes received his words with a shout for vengeance, which sent a thrill of terror to the hearts of their enemies, and like a mighty wave they rushed to the attack, clearing the ditches of the Austrian musketeers, and carrying for a second time the enemy's battery in the center. A shot struck Bernard's cap from his head, but unheeding the incident, he led his men fiercely against the enemy on Windmill Hill. The gallant Swedes burning for revenge, advanced steadily up the slopes in face of the enemy's fire; they attacked the gunners and drove them back, and with the battery took possession of the enemy's ammunition wagons. The Austrians seeing their cannons in the hands of the enemy commenced retreating at all points, and victory seemed to have declared for the Swedes; but at this critical moment, Wallenstein was reinforced by the arrival of Pappenheim with seven thousand cavalry, and restored the battle. The cavalry on the left wing of the Austrian army rallied, and fiercely attacked the Swedes in that quarter of the field, urged on to desperate deeds by the presence of Wallenstein, who sitting up in his litter, gave his orders with the greatest coolness. The Swedes were again driven back; the batteries in the center were again recaptured. The right wing animated by the events which were transpiring on the left, rushed forward upon the Swedes on Windmill Hill, and the latter fighting obstinately were driven back across the plain, and the imperialists recovered all their lost guns. At this moment Kniphausen, with the reserve of four regiments of horse, and two of foot, came up, and the Swedes encouraged by this reinforcement returned to the fight with renewed ardor. The fight now raged with terrible fury. Pappenheim at length fell, and his cavalry, panic-stricken, fled pressing back the troops behind them into a mass of the direst confusion. Bernard von Weimar seized this favorable moment, and by a skillful movement united the two divisions of his army, and made one final tremendous charge upon the imperial center. For a third time the battery was carried; for a third time the Swedes battled their way across the plain into the very heart of the enemy. Night put an end to the conflict. The Swedes remained masters of the field; the Austrians retreated. The united loss of both armies was 9,000 men killed and wounded. The exact loss of each is unknown; but from the stubborn valor displayed on both sides it is supposed to have been about equal. The guns of the Austrians fell into the hands of the victors.

* Puffendorf in his memoirs, says that the bullet which struck the king, was from a musket in the hands of Falkenberg, a colonel in the imperial service. There were various accounts of the death of Gustavus Adolphus; but by a letter it was satisfactorily proved that he was shot by an Austrian officer in Wallenstein's army. The conduct of Duke Albert on this occasion, was certainly cowardly in the extreme.

A. D. 1813.—In the latter part of April 1813, Napoleon, with an army of 70,000 men, was advancing toward Leipsic from Erfurth. On the 30th of April the Russian and Prussian forces, which had occupied Halle, Naumberg, Leipsic, and all the adjacent roads, were moved forward with all possible dispatch, to prevent the advance of the French army to Leipsic, give them battle in the plains of Lutzen, and drive them back in case of success into the marshes formed by the Pliesse and the Elster. On the first of May the Prussian army was posted at Roethe; Wittgenstein with the Russians was at Zwenkau; while Winzingerode and Malaradowitch, more in advance, observed the movements of the enemy on the roads of Naumberg and Chemnitz. The entire force of the allies consisted of over 80,000 men. It was in crossing the defile of Grünebach, that the head of the French column first encountered the allies, who were strongly posted with six guns on the heights of Poserna, on the opposite bank, to defend the great road which, after descending into the valley of that name, and passing the village of Reppach, ascends the opposite steep to enter the great plains of Lutzen and Leipsic.

The inferiority of Napoleon's forces in cavalry rendered it necessary to approach this advanced guard with caution, and the French infantry moved on in squares, as at the battle of the Pyramids, in Egypt. Marshal Bessières, Duke of Istria, colonel of the Imperial Guard, was among the foremost of the horsemen who advanced to reconnoiter the enemy's position, when a cannon-shot killed the brigadier and his escort. "Inter that brave man," said the marshal; and hardly had the words passed his lips when a second cannon-ball struck himself on the breast, and laid him dead on the spot.* The French were not disheartened by the loss of their leader; they brought up the artillery of the Guard, and under cover of their fire the leading square got through, and the allied vanguard retired, leaving open to the French the entrance of the plain of Lutzen. The French army occupied Lutzen and the adjacent villages, where they slept; the Young Guard bivouacked around the Tomb of Gustavus Adolphus; sentinels were placed to preserve from destruction, during the night, the trees which shaded the grave of the Hero of the North. Next morning, the French troops, being aware that they were in presence of the enemy, advanced in close order toward Leipsic, ready at a moment's warning to form square to resist the formidable cavalry to which they were opposed. General Lauriston, with his corps, the advanced guard of the army of Eugene, moved on the road from Museberg; he met with no resistance till he arrived at Lindenau, the western suburb of Leipsic; but there the streets were barricaded, and the houses loopholed; and as a serious resistance was expected, the troops halted, and the fire of the artillery commenced. Macdonald's corps followed on the same line, and neither of these were engaged in the subsequent action. The main body of the French army, under Napoleon in person, advanced in a dense array of infantry, cavalry, artillery, and chariots, on the road from Weissenfelds to Lindenau. The vanguard of the army was composed of Marmont's corps; next to him Bertrand brought up his Italians from Nossen; behind them, between Naumberg and Weissenfelds, came Oudinot's men; while the Imperial Guard and reserve cavalry were still further in the rear, and Ney's columns covered the flank of the huge array as far as Lutzen.

The allied army, on the other hand, were resolved to give battle to the enemy in the plain of Lutzen. They crossed the Elbe, therefore near Pegau, early on the morning of the 2d of May, and advanced with all their forces, directing their march toward Jena, and threatening the enemy's right, so as to keep up the communication with Bohemia and the forces of the Austrian monarchy. The plan of attack was to refuse their own right, and make no considerable effort in the center, but endeavor to force back the enemy's right, turn it, and cut him off from the Saale, and then inundate his rear with a numerous cavalry, to which he had no corresponding force to oppose. Blucher's Prussians were in front, next came Wittgenstein's

* Napoleon wrote the following touching letter to the widow of Marshal Bessières, who was inconsolable for his loss:—"My Cousin: Your husband has died on the field of honor. The loss which you and your children have sustained is doubtless great; but mine is still greater. The Duke of Istria has died the noblest death, and, without suffering, he has left a reputation without a spot, the best inheritance he could bequeath his children. My protection is secured to them; they will inherit all the affection I bore to their father."

Russians; Winzingerode's Russians, with the Russian and Prussian guards, and the cavalry of both armies, formed the reserve. In this order, the troops, after having enjoyed an hour and a half's rest, advanced to the attack at one o'clock in the afternoon.

The hostile armies thus approached each other in a very peculiar manner; for both were in open column, and actually under march, and they came into collision like two men-of-war attempting to pass each other on opposite tacks. Napoleon, aware that the enemy was not far distant, but ignorant of their intentions, and not expecting them to stand firm that day, had been on horseback since nine in the morning; and he had passed the monument of Gustavus Adolphus, when he was first roused to a sense of his situation by the sound of artillery on his extreme left, at Lindenau. Soon a tremendous cannonade arose in rear of his right, in the direction of Great and Little Görschen, and Napoleon immediately perceived that the attack was to be expected on this side. The French infantry in this quarter occupied the villages of Great Görschen, Little Görschen, Rhano, and Kaia, which lie near each other, somewhat in the form of an irregular square, in the plain between Lutzen and Pegau. The plain is there traversed by a deep channel of a rivulet called the Flossgraben, which was crossed by the whole combined army in small compact columns, and formed a support to the right, after these columns had deployed. Emerging from behind the heights, where they had taken their rest, entirely concealed from the enemy's view, the allied army, 80,000 strong, moved on in four deep black columns, with a powerful artillery in front, which immediately commenced a heavy concentric fire upon Great Görschen, which the French infantry in the village sustained with admirable intrepidity. Soon, however, it was assailed by two Prussian brigades, under General Ziethen, with great vigor. The gallant Frenchmen made a strong resistance, but, overwhelmed by superior numbers, they were forced to fly. The Prussians next attacked Little Görschen and Rhano with the utmost impetuosity, and both villages were carried with loud shouts. The two villages were set on fire, and the whole right of the field was enveloped in the black clouds of the conflagration. Aide-de-camp after aide-de-camp was sent to Napoleon after reinforcements. The French emperor's resolution was immediately taken. "We have no cavalry," said he—"no matter: it will be a battle as in Egypt—the French infantry is equal to any thing, and I commit myself, without alarm, to the inherent valor of our young conscripts."

Orders were immediately dispatched to Macdonald, who was on the left, to retrace his steps, and direct his march to the point of attack on the right. Eugene, gifted with the true eye of a general, had already stopped his advance on hearing the cannon on the right, and enjoined him to incline in that direction; orders were simultaneously sent to Marmont to hasten across the fields in the same direction. Bertrand was instructed to advance as quickly as possible on the other side; while the whole troops on the road between Lutzen and Leipsic were at once halted, and wheeled into line by a movement on the right. Napoleon himself set off with his suite in the same direction, directing his rapid course to the point where the smoke was thickest, and the cannon loudest. The Prussian general resolved to support his first attack to the utmost of his power, and direct his principal forces in that quarter, while, at the same time, he distracted the enemy's attention by a furious onset upon his center. He brought up, therefore, his second line, and a part of his reserves. This was now necessary, for Ney, having moved forward three French divisions, had, by a brilliant charge, regained the lost villages, and driven back the allies to the ground they had occupied at the commencement of the action. Again the Prussians, in superior numbers, advanced to the attack. Nothing could withstand their impetuosity. The French columns, driven out of the houses, were charged in the intervening open ground by the allied horse, and thrown into confusion. Several regiments of conscripts disbanded and fled. Seeing his attack thus far successful, Wittgenstein brought up his reserves of the Russians and Prussians. These troops advanced in good order through a driving tempest of cannon-shot from the French batteries, and pressing incessantly forward, carried the villages of Little Görschen and Hahaïoli by assault, and drove the enemy by Kaia, the key of the French right. Kaia was soon in flames, and remained burning furiously, unoccupied by either party. No sooner did Napoleon receive intelligence of these movements, than he set out at a gallop to the scene of danger. As the emperor approached, he received the most touching proofs of the devotion of his troops; the broken crowds of conscripts re-formed in haste at the sight of the imperial staff; the wounded, which were carried past in numbers, never failed to salute the emperor with the wonted acclamations—cries of "Vive l' Empereur!" broke forth from lips soon about to be silent in death, and a faint expression of joy illumined the countenances of the dying youths when the well-known form of Napoleon flitted before their eyes. Never had the French army displayed more devoted valor—never did the generals and officers evince a more heroic spirit—and never, except perhaps at Wagram, had the emperor exposed his person more than at this crisis.

Both parties, perceiving that the decisive point of the battle was to be found in the ruins of Kaia, strove, by accumulating forces upon it, to secure to themselves so important an acquisition, like two skillful players of chess, who successively bring up all their forces to support the attack or defense, toward the close of the struggle of often an insignificant piece on the board. Napoleon, placing himself a short distance behind the village, arranged the broken remains of Ney's divisions, which had been already engaged, preceded by the division of Ricard, with his aide-de-camp Count Lobau at their head, for a fresh attack. These gallant troops advanced with cool intrepidity, and now being nearly equal in numbers with their opponents, drove them back behind Kaia, and into the neighborhood of Little Görschen. Blucher's Prussians of the reserve, however, issued with the utmost vigor from that village; a furious combat ensued in the plain between the two; Gerard and Brenier both fell severely wounded at the head of their troops. While the combat was raging between Kaia and Little Görschen, the other corps of the French army came up; the Imperial Guard was now assembled close behind Kaia in reserve, with Napoleon at its head. Bertrand's forces were on the one side, Marmont's infantry issued from the willow thickets, which adjoined the Flossgraben on the other. As a last effort, Wittgenstein ordered the artillery of General Winzengerode to march forward and take the enemy, combating between the villages, on their left flank, while his infantry advanced to the support of the Prussians. This able maneuver had at first surprising success; one of his divisions debouched from Eisdorf, beyond the Flossgraben streamlet, and drove back Marchant's division of Marmont's troops; while another reinforced the Prussians, between the villages, and, with the aid of the guns on the enemy's flank, with loud shouts drove them out of Little Gorschen and Kaia, back to the Imperial Guard of Napoleon. An interesting yet melancholy incident took place in the contest for the burning villages. The young conscripts of Paris and the volunteers of Berlin met amid the ruins; both made their first essay at arms, but both fought with the courage of veteran soldiers, hand to hand, body to body, heart to heart; these gallant youths struggled with invincible obstinacy amid the flames, and nearly a half of each found there an untimely grave. Napoleon now saw that the decisive moment had arrived: all his reserves within reach except the Imperial Guard, had been engaged. He forthwith drew out that formidable host which had so often decided the fate of European fields.

Sixteen battalions of the Young Guard were drawn up in a close column, preceded by sixty pieces of its incomparable artillery, commanded by Drouot, and followed by the whole reserve cavalry. This weighty column soon made its way through the crowd of fugitives which lay in its line of advance. Nothing could withstand the swift and deadly fire of Drouot's guns, which seemed absolutely to be discharged as they moved along. Kaia was regained, and the allies forced back, still facing about and firing, to Little Görschen. The Prussian battalions fell back behind that village to re-form. There, however, the fight was renewed. Mortier had a horse shot under him; Dumoustier fell by his side; while on the Prussian side Scharnhorst was mortally wounded, the Prince Leopold of Hesse-Homberg and Prince Mecklenberg-Strelitz, killed. The Guard, still enveloped by clouds of dust and smoke, steadily advanced, and the receding sound of their artillery and the light of their guns, showed that the enemy was in retreat on the right. At the same time Eugene, who at this critical moment came up from Lindenau, fell on the extreme right of the Prince of Wirtemberg, and drew off his batteries from the flank of the column engaged among the villages; and the prince was able barely to maintain his position without prosecuting the attack, which, in the first instance, had promised so much success. The fire of the artillery was kept up on both sides until nightfall; but the allied generals, although still in possession of the ground they occupied in the beginning of the battle, felt that they could not withstand further attacks, and accordingly gave orders for a retreat on the following morning. Napoleon dispatched couriers to Paris, Cracow, Rome, Vienna, and Constantinople, to announce that he had gained the victory. At nine o'clock at night as Napoleon was riding across a part of the field of battle, toward Lutzen, where head-quarters were to be established, he was suddenly assailed by a fire of musketry from behind a hedge, followed by the irruption of a huge mass of the enemy's horse, which advanced in close order and a steady pace, almost to the imperial escort. Some esquires having now come up, and poured in a close fire on both sides, the allied horse got entangled in the darkness, in a ravine, and at length, with considerable loss, returned to their own camp. The combat at all points ceased, and the two armies reposed upon the field of battle. The allies the next day retreated toward Dresden, closely pursued by the French. The battle of Bautzen soon followed.

The loss of the French in the battle of Lutzen, was six thousand killed and twelve thousand wounded. The allies lost fifteen thousand in killed and wounded.

LYONS, A.D. 197.—Lyons is the second city of France. The greater part of the town is built upon a tongue of land formed by the junction of two large rivers, the Rhone, flowing from the east, and the Saône, from the north. The city, however, is not confined to these limits alone; but extends to the banks of both rivers, which are crossed at various points by commodious and elegant bridges.

Albinus, a Roman general, revolted against the Emperor Severus, and encamped his rebel troops near Lyons. The emperor marched against him, and the battle commenced the instant the armies came in sight of each other. The conflict was terrible, but Albinus was conquered, and forced to take refuge in Lyons. The conquerors followed him thither, and plundered and ravaged the city. Albinus, finding all was lost, plunged his sword into his own body; but as he was not dead when the adverse party took Lyons, they enjoyed the savage satisfaction of cutting off the head of a man who could not have lived an hour.

SECOND SIEGE, A.D. 1793.—A great number of the Lyonnais had witnessed the revolution of the 10th of August with regret. Devoted to commerce and the arts, Lyons must necessarily have preferred a stable and tranquil government to the storms of a revolution. Political agitations, the emigration of the nobles, the proscriptions of the rich, were at every instant drying up the springs of its commerce, paralyzing its industry, and deteriorating the product of its manufactures. When private interests were thus injured, it could not be expected that the Lyonnais should feel much revolutionary ardor; they were certain to follow the ideas of the most moderate party. The Convention was recognized, the Republic proclaimed; but the rich trembled at the opening of the clubs; they were terrified at seeing municipal powers pass into the hands of proletaires; their minds revolted at hearing propositions for murder and carnage. Their horror for the men who oppressed them was soon displaced by a desire for vengeance. Two parties declared themselves in Lyons; that of the Municipals, supported by the Montagne; and that of the Sections, composed of pure republicans and disguised royalists. Both sides assembled, and both spoke of preparations for defense and of measures for attack. Each party designated its enemies, watched its partisans, exaggerated its injuries and causes of alarm; minds were heated, and hearts divided. People became accustomed to consider as irreconcilable enemies all who did not embrace the opinions of the party they had espoused. The storm, which had been growling for a length of time, burst forth on the 29th of May, 1793. Two commissioners from the Convention, were sitting with Châlier at the municipality; they had made a place of arms of it. On their side, the Sectionaries had gathered together all their columns. There were three attempts at accommodation, but they all failed through the perfidy of Châlier. A battalion of the Lyonnais approached the municipality, sent for under the pretense of conciliation. The signal for carnage was given; Châlier ordered a discharge of artillery and musketry. The unfortunate Lyonnais were compelled to abandon the bodies of their friends; the whole city was in arms. Two columns left the Place de Bellecourt, and besieged the Hôtel de Ville, defended by eighteen hundred men and two pieces of cannon; the besiegers did not amount to two thousand. The combat lasted two hours; the Hôtel de Ville was carried. The Lyonnais had in their power the men who appeared to have meditated their ruin. There was still more carnage after the victory; the soldiers were obliged to defend their prisoners against the fury of the people. Among them were the two commissioners from the Convention; but liberty was soon restored to them, on condition of their giving an honest account of the provocations which had brought on the combat. These representatives, four days after, notwithstanding a favorable account had been given, described the Lyonnais to the Convention as rebels, and demanded vengeance for the national representation having been unacknowledged, degraded, and insulted in their persons. In the mean time the Lyonnais had chosen fresh magistrates, and these had created a commission to try the prisoners made in the contest on the 29th of May. Châlier was condemned to death; the rest were spared, and kept as hostages.

No sooner had the intelligence of the revolt of Lyons reached Kellerman's ears than he assembled 8,000 men, and a small train of artillery, to observe the place. But this force was totally unable to maintain its ground before the armed population of the city, which soon amounted to 30,000 men. The citizens of Lyons were determined to resist to the last the progress of the French republicans. They formed a military chest, and issued a paper currency which was guaranteed by the principal merchants. Great numbers of cannon were cast at the foundries within the walls; while on the heights around the city fortifications were erected under the supervision of a skillful engineer. On the other hand the troops of the republicans were daily increasing; yet they were not in sufficient force to make head against an enemy so strong and vigorous. During the whole month of August, and the beginning of September, the siege made little progress, the batteries of the besiegers being scarcely armed. During this time the besieged made proposals for an accommodation, but the commissaries of the Convention answered them in an indignant manner, saying they must first show themselves worthy of pardon, by acknowledging that they were in the wrong; they must also lay down their arms, and deliver up the keys of the city, before they could be entitled to any clemency on the part of the Convention. The Lyonnaise had no faith in the clemency of the Convention, and replied, "We expect nothing from your clemency; we shall firmly await your arrival, and you shall never capture our city but by marching over our dead bodies."

As soon as the Convention learned that the English had entered Toulon, they redoubled their efforts to subjugate Lyons, and took the most energetic measures for the prosecution of the siege. A hundred pieces of cannon, from the arsenals of Besançon and Grenoble, were mounted on the batteries, veteran troops selected from the army on the frontier of Piedmont, and four corps formed, to press the outworks on different sides of the city. In several contests in the outer intrenchments, the Lyonnaise fought with great valor, but although the success was nearly equal, the besiegers had the advantage, and the horrors of war at length fell on this devoted city. A terrible cannonade with red-hot shot, and bombardment commenced on the 24th of September, and was kept up incessantly for seven days. Day and night the flaming tempest fell on the quarter of St. Clair; the magnificent hotels of that district were burned; the splendid public buildings, and the beautiful quays of the river, were all involved in the awful conflagration. The arsenal blew up with a terrific explosion. The great hospital, a noble monument of charity, was at length reached by the hungry flames. It was filled with the wounded and dying from every quarter of the town. In hopes to avert the fury of the besiegers from this last asylum of humanity, a black flag was raised from the top of the building, but it only served as a mark for the red-hot shot, and after the fire had been extinguished for more than forty times, it was burned to the ground. These ravages increased the sufferings of the inhabitants, but in no wise diminished their means of defense. Soon after, the repeated attacks of the republicans made them masters of the heights of St. Croix, which commanded the city from a nearer position, while another detachment cut off all communication between the inhabitants and the part of the country from which they obtained their provisions. Before the end of September, 50,000 men were assembled before the walls, and notwithstanding the utmost economy in distributing food, the pangs of hunger began to be felt. The force of the besiegers received new reinforcements of artillery from Valenciennes, and also 25,000 mountaineers from Auvergne, under the command of Couthon.

The hopes of the inhabitants had rested on a diversion from the side of Savoy, where the Piedmontese troops were slowly assembling for offensive operations. But they were cruelly disappointed. The Sardinian army was driven back, after having failed to avail themselves of an opportunity which would never again occur of establishing the royalist party in the south of France. This, together with the pressure of famine, depressed the spirits of the besieged. The inhabitants, however, nobly and heroically defended themselves against a force of over 60,000 men. In vain the bombardment was continued with unexampled severity, and 27,000 bombs, 5,000 shells, and 11,000 red-hot shot thrown into the city; entirely regardless of the iron storm, one-half of the citizens manned the works, while the other half watched the flight of the burning projectiles, and carried water to the quarters where the conflagration broke forth. Notwithstanding all these efforts, the city seemed doomed. The Convention becoming exasperated at the slowness of the siege, deprived Kellerman of the command, and ordered him to the bar of the Convention to give an account of his conduct. The command of the besieging army was given to General Doppet, who received orders to reduce Lyons immediately by fire and sword. In order to hasten operations, Couthon, as commissioner of the Convention, was invested with a despotic authority over the general, and he instantly resolved to storm Lyons, by employing the whole 60,000 men. On the 29th of September, a general attack was made by General Doppet on the intrenchments of the besieged, the object of which was to force the fortified post near the confluence of the Saône and the Rhone. After a desperate resistance the batteries which commanded that post were carried by the republicans, and the bridge which connected it with the opposite side was forced. These obstacles being removed between the assailants and the city, the destruction of Lyons seemed inevitable. But Precy hurrying to the scene of danger, at the head of a chosen band of citizens, the besiegers were driven back from the plain with the loss of about 2,000 men; still, with all his efforts, the heights and the bridge were occupied by the enemy's army. A more fatal enemy was dealing destruction within the walls. Famine, with all its horrors, was staring the besieged in the face. The women renounced the use of bread, in order that the soldiers might have sufficient; but even then they were soon reduced to half a pound a day of this simple food. Many subsisted on a scanty supply of oats which were daily served out, with the most rigid economy from the public magazines. By the 1st of October their resources became exhausted, and provisions of every kind had failed; thirty sections of Lyons, driven by necessity, were compelled to nominate deputies to proceed to the camp of the besiegers. The brave Precy, disdaining even in this extremity to submit, resolved to force his way with a chosen band through the enemy's line, and seek an asylum in foreign lands.

On the night of October 9th, at the head of 2,000 men, the flower of Lyons, together with their wives and children and what little property they had saved, he commenced the perilous journey. They were arranged in two columns, and the light from their burning dwellings served to guide them on the way. Scarcely had they left their homes amid the tears and blessings of those they had left behind, when a bomb from the enemy's camp fell into one of their ammunition-wagons, and many were instantly killed. Not disheartened by this disaster, they broke the opposing division and forced their way through the lines of the besiegers, but they were soon assailed by an overpowering force in the center and rear. They found themselves surrounded on every side; all the heights were lined with cannon, and every house filled with soldiers; a dreadful slaughter took place; men, women, and infants alike perished, and of all those who left Lyons, hardly fifty forced their way with Precy into the Swiss territories.

The next day the republicans took possession of Lyons. The troops observed strict discipline; they were lodged in barracks, or encamped in the Place Bellecœur or the Terreaux: the inhabitants indulged a fleeting hope that they might be treated with compassion, but they were not aware of the bitterness of republican hatred. Lyons was not spared; it was reserved for cold-blooded vengeance. As soon as the subjugation of the town was complete, Couthon entered at the head of the authorities of the Convention, reinstated the Jacobin municipality, and commissioned them to seek out and punish the guilty. The name of the city was suppressed, the inhabitants were appointed to be disarmed, and the whole city to be destroyed, with the exception of the poor's house, the manufactories, the great workshops, the hospitals, and public monuments. A committee of five members was appointed to inflict vengeance on the citizens. At the head was the villain Couthon and Collot d'Herbois. Couthon was to preside over the destruction of buildings, and attended by a retinue of servants he visited the finest parts of the city with a silver hammer in his hand, and striking at the doors of the houses he wished destroyed, exclaimed, "I strike you in the name of the law;" upon this his agents, numbering some 20,000, immediately surrounded the dwelling and leveled it to the ground. This destruction continued for six months, and the expense was enormous, amounting to 700,000 pounds. The buildings thus destroyed were among the finest private residences in all France. But this was but a commencement of horrors. Collot d'Herbois, the proconsul, cherished a feeling of private resentment against the inhabitants, and resolved to gratify a revenge of ten years' duration. His first act was to celebrate a fête in honor of Chalier, the republican governor of Lyons, a man of the most infamous character, and who had been put to death at the commencement of the insurrection. He closed the churches, abolished the priests, and endeavored to extinguish every vestige of religion. The bust of Chalier was carried through the streets, followed by the vilest portion of their army. After them was an ass bearing the Gospel, the cross, and all the most sacred emblems of Christian worship. An altar was erected in one of the public squares, a fire was lighted, the cross and Gospel burned, the consecrated bread trampled upon by the mob, and the ass compelled to drink the wine out of the communion cup. Collot d'Herbois was devoid of even a spark of mercy. The punishment of the inhabitants was much too slow to satisfy his terrible revenge. Deeming the execution of even twenty persons in a day insufficient, he prepared a new mode of punishment. Sixty captives of both sexes were led out together, tightly bound in file, to the Place de Brotteaux, then arranged in two files, with a deep ditch on each side, which was to be all the place of burial allowed them. At the extremity of the file were placed two cannon loaded with grape. The unhappy victims beheld with composure the awful preparations, and sang the patriotic hymns of the Lyonnaise until the signal was given and the guns discharged. Few only were killed at the first fire, but being horribly mutilated, the shrieks and cries were heart-rending. A second and third discharge did not complete the work of death, and the gend'armes unable to witness their struggles, dispatched numbers of them with their swords. Day after day this bloody scene was renewed, and Collot d'Herbois, with his associate Fouché, were witnesses of the butchery from a distance by means of telescopes. The bodies of the slain floated in such numbers down the Rhone as to poison the waters, and at last Collot, for fear of disease, was obliged to bury them. In five months, more than 6,000 persons suffered death in this manner, and double that number driven into exile. After this dreadful massacre, and subjugation of Lyons, the troops were commanded to proceed immediately to Toulon to quiet the disturbance that was just beginning in that city.

MADRAS, A.D. 1702.—In 1702 Madras in India was besieged by the forces of Dahood Khan; but the British garrison made such a spirited and gallant resistance, that the besiegers were compelled to withdraw with great loss. In the year 1744, the French besieged Madras, and took it. In 1749 it was restored to the English. In 1758, it was again besieged by the French under the famous Lally; but after a siege of two months the French were obliged to retreat.

MAESTRICHT, A.D. 1576.—Maestricht is a city of the Netherlands, about four miles in circumference, seated on the Meuse, opposite Wyck, with which it communicates by a stone bridge.

The inhabitants of Maestricht, in concert with their German garrison, drove out the Spaniards in 1576. Their intention was to unite themselves with the Dutch, who had shaken off the yoke of Spain. Vargos, the general of Philip II., hastened to endeavor to regain possession of the place; of which he had the greater hopes from being still master of Wyck. The conquered, humiliated by a disgrace of which they were the more sensible from its having arisen out of their own negligence, were eager to repair their fault by instantly taking back what they had lost. As they saw no other obstacle to their doing so but some pieces of cannon placed upon the bridge which unites the two cities, they formed, to avoid this danger, a most extraordinary resolution. They placed before them all the women of Wyck. Provided with this rampart, they advanced over the bridge, and, covered with these singular bucklers, they fired boldly, and safely upon the citizens, who, not being able to defend themselves without shooting their relations, or at least the women of their party, quitted their post, took refuge in the houses, and abandoned the field of battle to the Spaniards, who thus remastered the city without receiving a single wound.

SECOND SIEGE, A.D. 1579.—Three years after this Maestricht was invested by the celebrated Prince of Parma, Governor of Flanders. This general having secured his quarters and encamped in face of Maestricht, directed a numerous park of artillery against it. Mondragone was charged with the blockade on the side of Wyck. In a short time the circumvallation was secured; and, simultaneously, the Meuse was closed, both below and above the city, by two bridges of boats, sufficiently solid to deprive the enemy of all chance of entrance to the place by water. These bridges served at the same time as means of communication to the army spread over both banks of the river. The trenches were opened. The garrison, being small, could not risk many sorties, but they made some with success. Two attacks were formed: one at the Brussels gate, and the other opposite the curtain which was between the gate of Hoxter and that of the Cross. When the trenches were sufficiently advanced, Hierges set his batteries playing. The Spaniards had already arrived at the counterscarp, and were endeavoring to debouch in the fosse, to fill it promptly and second the operations of the artillery. The Brussels gate was defended by a good ravelin and a large cavalier, which impeded the progress of the besiegers greatly. It was battered by some pieces of large cannon; but the audacity of the besieged seemed to increase with their peril. The Spaniards on their part redoubled their efforts; their ardor was indefatigable; they emulated each other in braving dangers. Within the walls, the citizens and the countrymen who had there sought refuge, vied with the most practiced soldiers in intrepidity. The women themselves became redoubtable warriors: three companies of them were formed, one of which was employed at the counter-mines, and the others did garrison duty. They appeared on the ramparts by the side of the bravest soldiers; they cheerfully shared the painful labors of the pioneers, and entered warmly into the repairs of old fortifications, or the erection of new ones. The besiegers, however, remained masters of the fosse, and the breach appeared sufficiently practicable for an assault to be attempted. A signal was given for one; but the Spaniards, after making the most courageous efforts, were constrained to retire with loss. The fire of the batteries increased; the works were perfected; all sorts of means were employed to prevent the enemy from repairing the breaches made in the ramparts of the city, A second assault was prepared. To weaken the resistance of the Flemings by dividing it, it was resolved to give the assault at the two attacks. The trumpets sounded; they rushed to the breaches; the parties met; the contest began; one side impetuously attacking, the other as firmly defending: victory remained doubtful; Herle, in the Spanish ranks, and Tappin, the celebrated defender of Maestricht, performing prodigies of valor. It was a hand to-hand fight—pike to pike, and sword to sword. Some barrels of powder caught fire, and blew up; in an instant the ground was covered with mutilated bodies. The combat ceased, and the besiegers were obliged to retreat, without having been able to gain possession of the breach. This fruitless attempt cost the Spainards very dear. But the greater part of the garrison had perished upon the walls, and the remainder were in want of every thing. Disease, fatigue, watching, and famine, made awful ravages. No more confidence could be placed in the succors promised by the Prince of Orange; and the inhabitants, determined to die rather than surrender, had no resource but their bravery. The ravelin which covered the Brussels gate annoying the besiegers greatly, the Prince of Parma determined to make himself master of it. He ordered some fresh mines, and on the 24th of June succeeded in winning it. The prince, profiting by this advantage, caused the large cavalier constructed at this point to be raised much higher, and turned the fire against the place. The besieged, being without repose, and finding safety nowhere, began to despair of holding out, without however, being at all willing to subscribe to the honorable capitulation offered them by the prince. That general fell sick; the siege appeared to suffer by the circumstance, and the attacks became weaker. In consequence of this, the exhausted citizens relaxed in their vigilance. The prince, who from his bed was still watchful, learned how matters stood, and immediately ordered an assault. On the morning of the day designed for this last effort, a soldier having crept through an ill-repaired breach, found no one on the walls but some sentinels buried in sleep. He informed the general of this. The troops were commanded to follow him: the breach was mounted, and the city taken. The carnage was so frightful that scarcely four hundred persons were spared. The life of the brave Tappin, the governor of Maestricht, was however saved, out of respect for his character. The besiegers lost two thousand five hundred men; but a booty of a million of crowns of gold, and the conquest of an important city, compensated for their fatigues and perils.

Third Siege, A.D. 1632.—In 1632 Maestricht was reduced by the Prince of Orange, and was confirmed to the Dutch in 1648.

Fourth Siege, A.D. 1673.—On the 10th of June, Louis XIV. appeared before Maestricht with an army of 40,000 men. The place was defended by a garrison of 5,000 men, and by an intrepid governor, named Farjaux, a Frenchman, in the service of Holland. On the 17th the trenches were opened, and five batteries were directed against the city. Vauban, who in this siege first distinguished himself, employed the parallels invented by some Italian engineers in the service of the Turks, before Candia. He added places of arms in the trenches, to draw up troops in battle order, and the better to rally them in the event of sorties. Louis proved himself, in this famous expedition, more particular and laborious than he had ever been. As long as the siege lasted, he was up the whole night, from ten o'clock in the evening till five in the morning. The most furious assault was that of the 24th of June, and was made at the counterscarp of the Songres gate; in it the French and the Dutch were by turns conquerors and conquered, while disputing an advanced half-moon. The first company of musketeers was commanded to fall upon this half-moon, while the second precipitated itself upon the pallisades between that post and the horn-work. "The signal was given," says M. de Sainte Foix, "they marched, and in spite of the vigorous resistance of the enemy, in spite of the fire of the fourneaux which were sprung, and the terrible reports of the grenades which were incessantly cast among them, these works were carried almost at the same moment." Four bloody conflicts were necessary; and they only triumphed in the last, after losing many men. Night separated the combatants. The action of the morrow was still more warm and murderous; it was believed that the lodgments were secured and the musketeers had returned to the camp. The enemy sprang a fourneau, which the French had not discovered in the half-moon; there was reason to think it was not the only one. Farjaux, who had placed himself at the head of the best troops of his garrison, profiting by this moment of alarm, entered the work and drove out the French soldiers. The musketeers were ordered to take it again, and they did retake it. In an obstinate and sanguinary conflict, fifty-three musketeers were wounded and thirty-seven killed, with the famous Count d'Artagnan, commander of the first company. "The musketeers who returned from this fight," says Pelisson, "had all their swords blooded up to the guards, and bent and notched with the blows they had given." So many repeated and terrible attacks destroyed the defenders of Maestricht without weakening the courage of the survivors. Farjaux in particular was determined to hold out to the last minute; he preferred a glorious death to life at the hands of a conqueror, and he formed the resolution of making one more attempt. A mine was dug, and set fire to with too much precipitation; the soldiers of Farjaux were blown up by it instead of the French. This accident so completely disconcerted the besieged, that even their bold governor was forced to think of composition. They were satisfied, on the 29th of June, with a favorable capitulation. The remains of the garrison retired with the honors of war, and the inhabitants retained their privileges. This conquest cost France nearly 8,000 men; the besieged lost more than 3,000.

Fifth Siege, a.d. 1676.—Louis XIV., aware of the importance of his victory, placed in the city a garrison of 6,000 foot and 1,200 horse. Three years after, the Prince of Orange laid siege to Maestricht with an army of 25,000 men, while the Duke of Villa-Hermosa on one side, and the Count de Waldeck on the other, intrenched in advantageous posts, watched the operations of the French, and held themselves in readiness to prevent their succoring the besieged. The Count de Calvo commanded in Maestricht, in the absence of Marshal d'Estrades, the governor. This officer was a Catalan, in the service of France; the king had not a braver soldier; but as he had all his life served in the cavalry, he was thought to be more in his place at the head of a squadron of horse than of a garrison. As soon as the place was invested, he assembled the principal officers: "Gentlemen," said he, "I have served all my life as a cavalry officer, and have very little acquaintance with the defense of cities. All that I know is that I will never surrender. Concert among you the means of an obstinate and insurmountable resistance, and I will undertake to have them executed with as much vigor as celerity." The frankness of the commander won all hearts, and the confidence he placed in his subalterns elevated and expanded their minds. There was established, without pride, mistrust, or jealousy, a communication of ideas which saved the city, and which places the name of Calvo among the few that will descend to posterity.

Calvo made a vigorous and considerable sortie, the commencement of which was fortunate. The Prince of Orange, informed of what was going on in the trenches, flew to the succor of his people with the greatest courage, drove back the French with the sword to the gates, and being wounded in the arm, exclaimed to those who had fought without spirit, "This is the way you should act, gentlemen! It is you who have caused the wound for which you appear to entertain so much regret." Calvo first introduced the use of back-handled scythes; his soldiers, armed with these in the sorties, killed three men at a stroke. The trenches were opened on the 19th of July, and the batteries were erected on the 22d: during eight days the firing never ceased. At length, a large breach was made in the Dauphin bastion, and an assault was ordered for the 30th. It was terrible, but proved useless. The Dutch retired with loss. The next day the Prince of Orange ordered a second attack, still more sanguinary and quite as unsuccessful. A suspension of arms was then entered into to bury the dead. Not at all discouraged the prince gave a third assault, and succeeded in gaining the bastion. Scarcely had he gained a lodgment, when the French sprang two mines, the bursting of which they followed up by a furious sortie: they were, however, repulsed, and the work remained in the hands of the Dutch. Some days after they took another bastion, and drew near to the counterscarp. While the Hollanders were preparing to pour their thunders upon this part of the fortifications, the powder and grenades of the besiegers were suddenly set fire to. Taking advantage of the consequent disorder, the enemy gained possession of the counterscarp; they then prepared to attack the horn-work. Twice they gave the assault, and twice they were driven back with loss. The dragoons and the cavalry having dismounted to sustain the infantry, discouraged by so many repulses, a third effort was made. It was so terrible that the covered way was choked with dead bodies, and the blood of the slaughtered discolored the waters of the fosse. But the assailants were forced to regain their former posts, after having lost a host of soldiers.

But now news was brought that Marshal Schomberg was hastening to the succor of the place, and the Prince of Orange, having already lost 12,000 men, did not think it prudent to wait for him. He decamped in the night of the 26th of August, after forty days of open trenches, and, to make the more haste, embarked thirty pieces of cannon, 500 wounded, and a great quantity of munitions on the Meuse. At daybreak, the garrison perceiving the retreat of the Dutch, pursued them and took some prisoners.

Sixth Siege, a.d. 1748.—"Peace is in Maestricht," said the Marshal de Saxe. It was with preparations for this siege that the campaign of 1748 commenced. It was necessary to secure all the passages, to force an army to retreat, to render it powerless for action, to deceive the enemy, and leave his own troops in ignorance of his secret. Marshal Saxe succeeded in all this; he only communicated his views to M. de Cremille; he made his allies believe that his object was Buda, and he went, at the head of 28,000 men, to conduct a convoy to Bergen-op-Zoom, feigning to turn his back toward Maestricht. Three divisions advanced upon Tirlemont, Tongres, and Luxembourg; and at length all four took their route toward Maestricht. The enemy quitted their posts precipitately, abandoned immense magazines, and knew nothing of the designs of the Count de Saxe until it was too late to oppose them. The city was invested, without a possibility of any succor being introduced. The siege was pushed on with vigor. The Baron d'Aylva, the governor, and the Count de Marshal commanding the Austrian garrison, displayed in vain all their skill to dispute the ground, and drive back the besiegers. They were on the point of submitting to the conqueror, when a courier, dispatched by the Duke of Cumberland, came to announce the cessation of hostilities, and to confirm the saying of Marshal Saxe with which we commenced this article.

Maestricht was besieged in vain by the French, under Meranda, in 1793, but yielded to the troops of that country, commanded by Kleber, in 1794, after eleven days of open trenches.—Robson.

MAGDEBURG, A.D. 1637.—Along the picturesque heights that embank the beautiful rivers of the German confederacy, ancient cities and castles abound, rich in historical recollections; some like the magnificent castle and decayed town of Heidelburg, are monuments chiefly of the past, while others like the capital of Saxony, the city of Magdeburg, still retain much of their ancient splendor.

This city was besieged in 1637. We select the narrative of an eye-witness, the simplicity of which proves its fidelity. It is the narrative of a minister of a church in Magdeburg. The town was assaulted at daybreak, when the garrison was most likely to be off their guard, and when it was generally thought that Tilly was about to break up the siege.

"At M. Malsio's we found many people who had fled to him in great perplexity. We comforted and exhorted each other, as far as the terror of our minds would give us leave. I was summoned thence to discharge the duties of a colonel, who lay dangerously wounded. I resolved to go, and sent my maid to fetch my gown: but, before my departure from my wife and neighbors, I told them that the affair to me appeared to be concluded, and that we should meet no more in this world. My wife reproached me in a flood of tears, crying, 'Can you prevail on yourself to leave me to perish all alone? You must answer for it before God?' I represented to her the obligations of my function, and the importance of the moment I was called upon to give my assistance in.

"As I crossed the great street, a multitude of matrons and young women flocked about me, and besought me, in all the agonies of distress, to advise them what to do. I told them my best advice was to recommend themselves to God's protecting grace, and prepare for death. At length I entered the colonel's lodgings, and found him stretched on the floor and very weak. I gave him such consolation as the disorder of my mind would permit me: he heard me with great attention, and ordered a small present of gold to be given me, which I left on the table. In this interval, the enemy poured in by crowds at the Hamburg gate, and fired on the multitude as upon beasts of prey. Suddenly my wife and maid-servant entered the room, and persuaded me to remove immediately, alleging we should meet with no quarter, if the enemy found us in an apartment filled with arms. We ran down into the court-yard of the house, and placed ourselves in the gateway. Our enemies soon burst the gate open, with an eagerness that can not be described. The first address they made to me was, 'Priest, deliver thy money!' I gave them about 24 shillings in a little box, which they accepted with good will; but when they opened the box, and found only silver, they raised their tone, and demanded gold. I represented to them that I was at some distance from my house, and could not at present give them more. They were reasonable enough to be contented with my answer, and left us, after having plundered the house, without offering us any insult. There was a well-looking youth among the crowd, to whom my wife addressed herself, and besought him, in God's name, to protect us: 'My dear child,' said he, 'it is a thing impossible: we must pursue our enemies;' and so they retired.

"In that moment another party of soldiers rushed in, who demanded also our money. We contented them with seven shillings, and two silver spoons, which the maid had fortunately concealed in her pocket. They were scarce gone, before a soldier entered alone with the most furious countenance I ever saw: each cheek was puffed out with a musket ball, and he carried two muskets on his shoulder. The moment he perceived me, he cried out with a voice of thunder, 'Priest, give me thy money, or thou art dead.' As I had nothing to give him, I made my apology in the most affecting manner: he leveled a piece to shoot me, but my wife luckily turned it with her hand, and the ball passed over my head. At length, finding we had no money, he asked for plate; my wife gave him some silver trinkets, and he went his way.

"A little after, came four or five soldiers, who only said, 'Wicked priest, what dost thou here?' Having said thus much, they departed.

"We were now inclined to shelter ourselves in the uppermost lodgings of the house, hoping there to be less exposed and better concealed. We entered a chamber that had several beds in it, and passed some time there in the most insupportable agonies. Nothing was heard in the streets but the cries of the expiring people; nor were the houses much more quiet: every thing was burst open or cut to pieces. We were soon discovered in our retirement: a number of soldiers poured in, and one who carried a hatchet made an attempt to cleave my skull, but a companion hindered him, and said, 'Comrade, what are you doing? Don't you perceive that he is a clergyman?'

"When these were gone, a single soldier came in, to whom my wife gave a crape handkerchief off her neck, upon which he retired without offering us any injury. His successor was not so reasonable; for, entering the chamber with his sword drawn, he immediately discharged a blow upon my head, saying, 'Priest, give me thy money.' The stroke stunned me; the blood gushed out in abundance, and frightened my wife and servant to that degree, that they both continued motionless. The barbarian turned round to my wife, aimed a blow at her, but it glanced fortunately on her gown, which happened to be lined with furs, and wounded her not. Amazed to see us so submissive and patient, he looked at us fiercely for some moments. I laid hold of this interval to represent to him that I was not in my own house, being come to the place where I was to discharge my duty to a dying person, but if he would grant us quarter, and protect us to our home, I would then bestow upon him all I had. 'Agreed, priest,' said he; 'give me thy wealth, and I will give thee the watch-word: it is Jesu Maria; pronounce that, and no one will hurt thee.' We went down stairs directly, highly contented to have found such a protector. The street was covered with the dead and the dying; their cries were enough to have pierced the hearts of the greatest barbarians. We walked over the bodies, and when we arrived at the church of St. Catharine, we met an officer of distinction on horseback. This generous person soon discovered us, and, seeing me covered with blood, said to the person who conducted us, 'Fellow-soldier, fellow-soldier, take care what you do to these persons.' At the same time he said to my wife, 'Madam, is yonder house yours?' My wife having answered that it was; 'Well,' added he, 'take hold of my stirrup, conduct me thither, and you shall have quarter.' Then, turning to me, and making a sign to the soldier with his hand, he said to me, 'Gentlemen of Magdeburg, you yourselves are the occasion of this destruction: you might have acted otherwise.' The soldier who had used me ill, took this opportunity to steal away. Upon entering my house, we found it filled with a multitude of plunderers, whom the officer, who was a colonel, ordered away. He then said he would take up his lodgings with us, and, having posted two solders for a guard to us, left us with a promise to return forthwith. We gave, with great cheerfulness, a good breakfast to our sentinels, who complimented us on the lucky fortune of falling into their colonel's hands; at the same time representing to us that their fellow-soldiers made a considerable booty while they continued inactive merely as a safeguard to us, and therefore beseeching us to render them an equivalent to a certain degree. Upon this, I gave them four rose nobles, with which they were well contented, and showed so much humanity as to make us an offer to go and search for any acquaintance whom we desired to place in safety with us. I told them I had one particular friend who had escaped to the cathedral, as I conjectured, and promised them a good gratuity on his part, if they saved his life. One of them, accompanied by my maid-servant, went to the church, and called my friend often by name; but it was all in vain: no one answered, and we never heard mention of him from that period.

"Some moments after, our colonel returned, and asked if any person had offered us the least incivility. After we had exculpated the soldiers in this respect, he hastened abroad to see if there was any possibility to extinguish the fire, which had already seized great part of the city: he had hardly got into the street when he returned with uncommon haste, and said, 'Show me the way out of the town, for I see plainly we shall perish in the flames if we stay here a few minutes longer.' Upon this, we threw the best of our goods and movables into a vaulted cellar, covered the trap-door with earth, and made our escape. My wife took nothing with her but my robe, my maid seized a neighbor's infant child by the hand, whom we found crying at his father's door, and led him away. We found it impossible to pass through the gates of the town, which were all in a flame, and the streets burned with great fury on either side: in a word, the heat was so intense, that it was with difficulty we were able to breathe. Having made several unsuccessful attempts, we determined at last to make our escape on the side of the town next the Elbe. The streets were clogged with dead bodies, and the groans of the dying were insupportable. The Walloons and Croatians attacked us every moment, but our generous colonel protected us from their fury. When we gained the bastion, which stands on the banks of the Elbe, we descended it by the scaling-ladders which the imperialists had made use of in the assault, and arrived at length in the enemy's camp, near Rottensee, thoroughly fatigued and extremely alarmed.

"The colonel made us enter his tent, and presented us some refreshments. That ceremony being over, 'Well,' said he, 'having saved your lives, what return do you make me?' We told him that for the present we had nothing to bestow, but that we would transfer to him all the money and plate that we had buried in the cellar, which was the whole of our worldly possessions. At this instant many imperial officers came in, and one chanced to say to me, 'Ego tibi condolo, ego sum addictus Fidei Augustanæ.' The distressed state I found myself in made me unable to give a proper reply to the condolences of a man who carried arms against those whose religion he professed, and whose hard fortune he pretended to deplore.

"Next day the colonel sent one of his domestics with my maid-servant to search for the treasure we had buried in the cellar, but they returned without success, because, as the fire still continued, they could not approach the trap-door. In the mean while the colonel made us his guests at his own table, and during our whole stay treated us not as prisoners, but as intimate friends.

"One day at dinner an officer of the company happened to say, that our sins were the cause of all the evil we suffered, and that God had made use of the Catholic army to chastise us; to whom my wife replied, that the observation perhaps was but too true; however, take care, continued she, lest God, in the end, should throw that very scourge into the flames. This sort of prophecy was fulfilled soon afterward in the self-same imperial army, which was almost totally destroyed at the battle of Leipsic.

"At length I ventured one day to ask our colonel to give us leave to depart; he complied immediately, on condition that we paid our ransom. Next morning I sent my maid into the town to try if there was any possibility of penetrating into the cellar; she was more fortunate that day and returned with all our wealth. Having returned our thanks to our deliverer, he immediately ordered a passport to be prepared for us, with permission to retire to whatever place we should think proper, and made us a present of a crown to defray the expenses of our journey. This brave Spaniard was colonel of the regiment of Saveli, and named Don Joseph de Ainsa."

MALO-YAROSLAVETZ, A.D. 1812.—Napoleon left Moscow with 105,000 combatants, 600 pieces of cannon, and 2,000 military chariots, and took up his line of march for Kalonga. Kutusoff, the Russian general, broke up his camp, meanwhile, at Taroutino, at the head of 80,000 regular troops, and nearly 30,000 Cossacks. The Cossacks were divided into irregular bands of horsemen, and were of more service in the pursuit of a retreating army than the élite of the Imperial Guard. The army was immediately marched towards Malo-Yaroslavetz, the strongest position on the new road from Moscow to Kaluga, in the hope of anticipating the French emperor in the occupation of that important position, while General Winzingerode, who lay in the neighborhood of Klin, on the road to Twer, with 10,000 men, advanced toward Moscow with 10,000 men. He marched without opposition through the ruined streets of the capital, and approached the Kremlin, and summoned the French garrison there to surrender; but he fell a victim to his imprudence, being made prisoner by Marshal Mortier, who commanded the French rear guard that still occupied its walls. The French, however, after blowing up a part of the Kremlin, retired.

On the 19th of October, Napoleon gained the new road which led straight to the Russian position of Tarowtino, through Yaroslavetz. The division of General Delzons took possession of Mala-Yaroslavetz on the night of the 23d, where they were attacked the next morning by the Russian chasseurs under Doctoroff. The French, after a spirited resistance, were driven out of the village by the superior force of the enemy; but Prince Eugene coming up shortly after with his corps, after a desperate contest, succeeded in expelling the Russians at every point from the village. Both parties displayed the most desperate valor, and the French, although victors, sustained a heavy loss. General Delzons and his brother were killed. The French brought into the conflict only about 18,000 men, while the Russians were nearly twice as strong. The loss of both armies was nearly equal, being about 5,000 men on either side. The Russian general, Dorokhoff, fell in the early part of the engagement.

MALPLAQUET, A.D. 1709.—On the 11th of September, 1709, a battle was fought near Malplaquet, a village of France, between the allies under the Duke of Marlborough, and Prince Eugene, and the French army under Marshal Villars. The armies consisted on each side of nearly 120,000 choice soldiers, and the battle was obstinate and bloody. At length victory declared for the allies; but it was dearly purchased by the loss of 18,000 men.

MALTA, A.D. 1565.—After the conquest of Rhodes by Soliman II., its knights retired to the island of Malta, which asylum was granted to them by the emperor Charles V. In the hands of this military order, Malta soon became the strong bulwark of Christendom. The Mohammedans were deeply interested in taking this island, but more particularly in subduing its defenders. Dragut laid siege to it in 1565, with an army of more than 30,000 men. Several assaults were given, which the knights sustained with their usual bravery, and the Ottoman general met with his death. Mustapha Pacha, who succeeded him, attacked Fort St. Elmo, the smallest of the city, with great impetuosity. One of the knights, Abel de Bridiers de la Gardampe, received a shot which struck him to the earth. He said to some of his comrades, who offered to carry him to a place of safety to have his wound dressed, "Do not consider me among the living; your cares will be much better bestowed in defending our brethren." He then dragged himself as far as the chapel, and having recommended himself to God, expired at the foot of the altar. The knights who were quartered there made a gallant resistance, but their cannon being dismounted, their defenses breached, and their numbers thinned, they sent a deputation to De la Valette, the Grand Master, to represent the deplorable condition of the place, that it was no longer tenable, and that sending over reinforcements to them was worse than useless, because it insensibly consumed the troops necessary for the defense of the island. Most of the Grand Crosses, who composed the council of the Order, coincided with these views, but the Grand Master was of a contrary opinion. He agreed, indeed, that the first was not tenable, and owned that he could not but lament the fate of the knights who, in so dangerous a post, were exposed to daily death; but he insisted that there are some circumstances in which it is necessary to hazard some of the limbs to save the body. The Viceroy of Sicily, to whom they looked for relief, had declared that if the fort were lost, he would not attempt to save the island. The whole safety of Malta, therefore, depended on the length of the siege, and it was absolutely necessary to protract it as long as possible. The council came over to his opinion, and with their concurrence he impressed on the garrison that the preservation or loss of the island, and perhaps of the Order itself, depended on the time that they should hold out the place, and bade them call to mind the vows they had made at their profession, and that they were obliged to sacrifice their lives for the defense of the Order. Finally, he would not fail to send such reinforcements as the smallness of the fort would admit of, and, if necessary, would throw himself into the place, and there die with them.

After various bloody assaults, from the 24th of May to the 21st of June, the garrison was much reduced. A swimmer was sent across the port to the Grand Master to request help, and five large boats were soon filled with knights. But the shore was now lined with Turkish artillery, and they could not effect a landing. The besieged in the fort being now out of all hopes of succor, thought of nothing but ending their lives like good Christians and true soldiers. For which purpose they were all night long preparing themselves for it, by receiving the sacraments of the church: when this was over, and that nothing remained but the giving up their souls to God, they embraced one another with tenderness, and retired to their several posts in order to die with their weapons in their hands, and expire in the bed of honor. Such as were not able to walk by reason of their wounds had themselves carried in chairs to the side of the breach, where, armed with swords, which they held with both their hands, they waited with a heroic resolution till such time as their enemies, toward whom they were not able to advance, should come and attack them in their posts.

The next day, the 23d of June, the Turks, at daybreak, came on to the assault with great shouts, as if they were going to a victory which it would be impossible to dispute with them. But the Christian soldiers defended themselves with invincible bravery; one would have thought that the certainty of an approaching death which they were to share in common with the knights, had put them on the same level with respect to courage. They advanced to meet the enemy with as much intrepidity as if they had beaten them, and such as could not walk fired on the enemy with their pieces; and when, by reason of their continual discharges, they had spent all their powder, they supplied themselves from the pouches of their comrades who had dropped by their side: in fine, the knights having sustained an assault for four hours together, had but sixty persons left to defend the breach; but these were something more than men, who, by a noble contempt of death, still made their enemies tremble. The commander, seeing the place on the point of being forced by the Turks, recalled some Christian soldiers, who till then had maintained themselves upon the cavalier which lay before the fort. The pacha seeing the breach fortified with this small reinforcement, discontinued the assault in an instant, as if he had again been disheartened by so obstinate a resistance, and pretended to retire, but it was only to make his janizaries seize, not only on the cavalier, which was abandoned, but likewise on all such points as were higher than the breach, and overlooked the inside of the fort. The besieged employed this little suspension from fighting in dressing their wounds, not so much for the sake of preserving the poor remains of life, as to enable themselves to fight for some moments longer with greater vigor. At eleven in the morning the Turks returned to the assault with new strength, and the janizaries, who from the top of the cavalier and other posts commanded the place with their muskets, pointed out all such persons as they had a mind to kill. The greater part of them perished by the enemy's fire; the baliff of Negropont, with most of the remaining knights and soldiers, being overwhelmed with numbers, died upon the breach, and this terrible assault was discontinued, only for lack of combatants, not ending but with the death of the last knight. It is probable that to the bravery of these gallant knights, on this occasion, the preservation of Malta was due. This fort held out so long that the pacha could not refrain from saying, as he entered it, "What will the father do, if the son, who is so small, has cost us so many brave soldiers.?" From that time he saw that the conquest of Malta was impossible, and turned his thoughts to retreating with credit. To intimidate the knights he hung the bodies of all of the Order whom he found among the dead, and more particularly those who had a faint breath of life left. He ordered them to be opened, their hearts to be taken out, their bodies to be cut into quarters, to be clothed in their soubrevestes, and, after being fastened to planks, to be cast into the sea. These mutilated bodies were carried into the city by the waves. The Grand Master, Jean de la Valette, could not restrain his tears. Animated by a just but useless indignation, he employed reprisals, and cut the throats of all his Turkish prisoners, commanding their bloody heads to be thrown into the camp of their compatriots. The preservation of Malta covered the knights with glory.

MANNHEIM, A.D. 1793. — This city is situated on the right bank of the Rhine, in Baden, sixty-six miles south-west of Frankfort. It was once strongly fortified, and, lying near the French frontier, was repeatedly the object of attack, and suffered severely during the wars between France and Germany. On the 30th of May, 1793, a battle was fought near Mannheim between the allies and the French. On the 20th of September, 1795, the city was taken by the French, under General Pichegru; and on the 25th of the same month the French army was defeated near the city, by the Austrians, under General Wurmser.

MANS, A.D. 1793. — Mans, a town of France, was taken by William the Conqueror in the 11th century; but it is chiefly memorable in history as the scene of one of the worst defeats sustained by the Vendeans during the French revolutionary war. On the 12th of December, 1793, the royalists assembled within Mans, were attacked by an army of 40,000 republicans. The Vendeans were commanded by the heroic Larochejaquelin, and although far inferior in numbers to the enemy, they made a most gallant defense. Larochejaquelin posted his bravest troops in a fir wood, whence they kept up a fire so heavy that the republicans on the left were held in check; but they were finally borne back at all points, like a torrent, into the town. There, however, they made a most obstinate resistance. The Vendean commander planted his cannon down all the streets leading to the great square, and filled houses in the streets with musketeers; night had come on, and a terrible fire arose on all sides, increasing the horrors of a nocturnal combat. But the republicans, urged on by their leaders, Marceau, Westerman, and Kleber, gained ground in every quarter. The night was spent in one continual slaughter. Larochejaquelin had two horses shot under him, and in spite of all his efforts the mighty crowd was forced out of the town, and disbanded when they reached the plain on the other side. "The scene of horror and confusion," says Alison, "which there ensued defies all description. Larochejaquelin in vain assembled 1,500 men to check the advance of the victorious columns; he was wounded and overpowered in the tumult; his bands dispersed and the republicans commenced an indiscriminate slaughter of the shrieking fugitives." Ten thousand soldiers, men, women, and children perished under their relentless swords. Youth, grace, rank, and beauty were alike disregarded.

MANTUA, A.D. 1797.—Mantua, in Austrian Italy, is situated on an island in the Mincio, twenty-two miles south-west of Verona. It is surrounded by swamps, crossed by artificial dams, which connect it with several fortified suburbs and outworks. On the 7th of January, 1797, Mantua surrendered to the French under Napoleon, after a siege of eight months. On the 30th of July, 1799, it was attacked by the Austrian and Russian army, under General Kray, to which it surrendered after a short siege. Napoleon obtained possession of Mantua after the battle of Marengo, and it remained in the possession of the French until 1800, when they delivered it up to the Austrians.

MARATHON, B.C. 490.—In the year 493, B.C., Darius, King of Persia, sent heralds into Greece in order to sound the people, and to require them to submit to him. Many of the Grecian cities, dreading the power of the king, complied with the requests of the heralds immediately on their arrival. Among these cities was Ægina, a city on a small isle opposite and not far from Athens. This proceeding of the people of Ægina was considered public treason, and ten of the principal inhabitants were conveyed to Athens, and there imprisoned. The Persian heralds who went to Sparta and Athens were not so favorably treated as those that had been sent to the other cities. One of them was thrown into a well, and the other into a deep ditch. Darius immediately placed an army of 500,000 men under the command of Datis and Aristaphernes, instructing those generals to give up Eretria and Athens to be plundered. In the year 490, B.C., this army set sail with a fleet of 500 or 600 ships. Darius had directed his generals to make all the inhabitants of both places prisoners, for which purpose they went provided with a great number of chains and fetters. The Persians made themselves masters of the isle in the Ægean sea, and then turned their course toward Eretria, a city of Eubœa, which they took after a siege of seven days. They reduced Eretria to ashes, and putting all the inhabitants in chains, they sent them to Persia. The Persians now advanced toward Attica. They landed at Marathon, a city distant from Athens about forty miles, and began to ravage the surrounding countries. The Athenians had sent to Lacedæmonia asking assistance against the common enemy, which the Spartans immediately granted; but they did not set out till some days after on account of an ancient superstition among them, which did not allow them to commence their march before the full of the moon. So great was the terror produced throughout all Greece, that only one other of the Athenian allies prepared to succor them. This was the city of Platæa, which furnished them with 1,000 soldiers. The Athenians in this extremity were obliged to arm their slaves, which had never been done there before this occasion. The Persian army, commanded by Datis, consisted of 100,000 foot and 10,000 horse. The Athenian army in all amounted only to 10,000 men. Miltiades, by the universal consent of the Athenian generals, received the entire command of this army. He drew up his army at the foot of a mountain, that the enemy could not surround him or charge him in the rear. He caused large trees to be cut down for the purpose, to be thrown on the two sides of his army, to cover his flanks, and render the Persian cavalry useless. Datis, not wishing to wait until the Spartans should arrive to the assistance of the Athenians, determined immediately to give battle to the enemy, although he was sensible that the place was not advantageous for him. The Athenians did not wait for the enemy's charge. As soon as the signal of battle was given, they rushed upon the enemy with furious valor. The battle was very fierce and obstinate. Miltiades, although he had made the wings of his army exceedingly strong, yet he had weakened the main body. Having but 10,000 men to oppose such a multitude of the enemy, it was impossible for him either to make an extensive front or to give an equal depth to his battalions. He had therefore determined to break and disperse the enemy with the efforts of his two wings, not doubting but when his wings were once victorious they would be able to attack the enemy's main body in flank, and complete the victory without much difficulty. The Persians charged upon the main body of the Grecian army, making their greatest efforts particularly upon their front. This was led by Aristides and Themistocles, who, animating their men by voice and example, dashed into the midst of the enemy. The Grecians fought long and obstinately; but at length, overpowered by the overwhelming numbers of the enemy, they slowly retreated. At this moment, their two wings, which had successfully charged upon and broken through the two wings of the Persian army, turned, the one to the left, and the other to the right, and attacked the enemy in the rear. The Greek front now again pushed against the Persians, who, attacked both in front and rear, were soon put to flight. They did not run toward their camp, but to their ships, by which they hoped to make their escape. The Greeks pursued them thither, and, ascending the sides of the vessels, mounted to the decks, and either slaughtered the fugitives or drove them into the sea. Cynægirus, the brother of the poet Æschylus, while in the act of climbing up the side of a galley, was attacked by a Persian, who cut off his right hand, and he fell into the sea and was drowned. The victorious Greeks set fire to many of the Persian ships, which were consumed, with their crews, and those who had fled to them for safety. Seven large uninjured galleys also fell into the hands of the Athenians. In this battle the Greek army sustained a loss of only 200 men, while of the Persians 6,000 were slain, not including those who were driven into the sea and drowned, and those who were consumed with the ships set on fire. Hippias, the ungrateful and perfidious Athenian, who, in order to recover the unjust dominion usurped by his father Pisistratus, over the Athenians, had implored the aid of the Persians against his native country, and had served as a guide to an army invading the land to which he owed his birth, met with a just reward. He died on the field of battle while fighting against his own countrymen, and his name has been branded with everlasting infamy.

Immediately after the battle, an Athenian soldier, still reeking with the blood of the enemy, quitted the army and ran to Athens with the news of the victory. Arriving at the magistrates' house, he exclaimed, "Rejoice, the victory is ours!" and fell down dead at their feet. That portion of the Persian fleet which succeeded in making its escape, sailed toward Athens with a view to surprise the city before the Greek army could return: but Miltiades immediately marched home with nine tribes, and used such expedition that they reached the city in one day, and the design of the Persians was frustrated. Aristides was left at Marathon with his own tribe to guard the prisoners and the spoils. He proved faithful to his trust, for, although there were gold and silver, and rich garments and other booty scattered in profusion over the field of battle, he touched none of the spoils himself, nor permitted others to do so. But notwithstanding his care some enriched themselves unknown to him. Among them was Callias, a torch-bearer. A Persian happened to meet him in a private place, and probably taking him for a prince, on account of his long train, and the fillet he wore, prostrated himself before him, and taking him by the hand, led him to a well where was concealed a large quantity of gold. Callias, no less cruel than unjust, appropriated the gold to himself, and then killed the man lest he might mention the thing to others.

The plain on which this battle was fought, derives its name from the village of Marathon, which is situate at the N. W. extremity of a valley that opens toward the S. E. into the great plain, which is quite flat, and extends along the Ægean sea from N. E. to S. W.

MARCINAGO, A.D. 1132.—Near Marcinago in Italy, in 1132, a battle was fought between the Ghibellines of Pavia, and the Guelfs of Milan, in which the former were defeated with great loss.

MARCIANS, A.D. 1555.—Near this place in Tuscany, in a battle with the French, the Tuscans gained a signal victory.

MARENGO, A.D. 1800.—Marengo, a little village of Piedmont, is memorable for the battle fought in its vicinity, on the 14th of June, 1800, between the French under Napoleon, and the Austrians under General Melas. The village stands near the Bormida in an extensive plain three and a half miles east of Alexandria.

After the battle of Montebello, Napoleon with his army proceeded to Stradella, a strong position, formed by the advance of a lower ridge of the Apennines, toward the river Po. The Austrians under Melas were concentrated in the plain of Marengo, on the Bormida, and their position was highly critical. In their front at Stradella, lay Napoleon, and his rear, under Suchet, was driving the Austrians before him like chaff before the wind, while on his left rose the awful barrier of the Alps, and on his right the ridges of the Apennines bounded by the Mediterranean sea, rendered it impossible for him to gain the hereditary states of Austria by a circuitous route. Napoleon finding that the Austrians were resolved not to attack him at Stradella, but remained grouped under the cannon of Alexandria, determined to give him battle in the plain of Marengo, notwithstanding the ground was so admirably adapted to the movements of cavalry, in which arm the Austrians were greatly superior to the French. As Napoleon advanced, the Austrians under Ott, retired across the Bormida, and the two bridges over that stream were fortified and armed with cannon. Napoleon hastened forward with the utmost speed, and fearing that the Austrians meditated a retreat into the fastnesses of the Apennines, he sent Victor in advance to Marengo, with orders to take possession of the bridges over the Bormida. The French troops under Victor carried the village of Marengo on the 13th of June, and were arrested only on the bank of the river by the heavy cannonade from the fortified bridges. The readiness with which the Austrians abandoned Marengo confirmed Napoleon in his opinion that they were about to retreat; he quickened the speed of his army and established his headquarters at Tore de Garofàla, between Tortona and Alexandria. Believing that the Austrians had withdrawn from the vicinity of Marengo, Napoleon on the same day dispatched Dessaix with 9,000 men to Rivolta. By this means his army was reduced to 20,000 men, while the Austrians had nearly 40,000 in the field. The Austrian cavalry was more than double the number of the French; the nature of the soil was favorable to the movements of large bodies of horse; thus the Austrians in the choice of ground, and in numbers had decidedly the advantage. Napoleon had deceived himself. Far from retreating, the Austrian general was meditating an attack. Early in the morning of the 14th of June, the whole Austrian army was in motion; they rapidly defiled over the bridges of the Bormida, and preceded by 300 pieces of cannon, rapidly advanced across the plain toward Marengo. At eight, the Austrian infantry under Haddick and Kaim, preceded by a numerous and splendid array of infantry commenced the attack on the French under Gardanne, who was stationed in front of Marengo.

Gardanne after an obstinate resistance, was obliged to fall back on Victor's corps, which was drawn up with its center in the village, and its wings along the hollow of Fontanone, which separated his corps from that of Lannes, which was in the rear. Against the enormous force which was hurled upon them, Victor's troops maintained their ground for two hours. The French soldiers fought with the utmost gallantry; thrice were they expelled from the village, and thrice they returned to the fight pushing back their antagonists at the point of the bayonet, and recapturing every inch of soil they had lost. At length the corps of Lannes came up, and although now opposed to nearly twice their number, the battle was more equal. The opposing columns stood within pistol-shot of each other, and at this short distance the hostile thunderbolts of the cannon darted through the ranks on either side, hewing bloody passages in their flight and strewing the earth with mangled corpses. But on both sides the most heroic courage was displayed; the gaps were filled up as fast as they were made, and fresh victims were constantly added to the bloody heaps. At length the overwhelming numbers of the Austrians prevailed over the devoted bravery of the French. Marengo was carried, and the French were driven back to a second line which they had formed behind the stream of the Fontanone. Here they made a gallant stand. The Austrians under Haddick, flushed with victory, rushed pell-mell upon the enemy; but Watrin with the right of Lannes's division, repulsed them with frightful slaughter and drove them back in disorder across the stream; but the French could not follow up their advantage; Victor's corps were exhausted with fatigue, thinned in numbers, and were in no condition to support any offensive movement. The Austrians perceived the weakness of the French, and redoubled their efforts, and Victor's corps was at length broken. The imperialists pressed forward eagerly; the French retired in good order across the open plain. The Austrians rapidly followed, preceded by 50 pieces of artillery which sent death and destruction into the retreating columns. Melas, with the center of the imperial army, established himself at Marengo; and Lannes being now entirely uncovered on his left flank, was obliged to retire, which he did at first in good order by echelon in squares. Gradually, however, the retreat became more disorderly. The imperial cavalry sweeping round the retreating columns charged them repeatedly; until they were finally repulsed by the French horse under Kellerman and Champeaux; but they could not check the Hungarian infantry, which advanced steadily in pursuit; halting at every fifty yards, and pouring in destructive volleys, while the intervals between the Austrian regiments were filled up by a powerful artillery, which incessantly sent a storm of grape-shot through the retreating masses. Matters were in this desperate state when Napoleon at eleven o'clock arrived on the field of battle with his guard. The sight of his staff, surrounded by 200 mounted grenadiers, acted like magic on the spirits of the fugitives. They rallied at St. Juliano, in the rear of those squares of Lannes which still kept their ranks. Napoleon detached 800 grenadiers of his guard, to the right of the army, to oppose the progress of Ott, who there threatened to turn its flank, and at the same time, he himself advanced with a demi-brigade to the support of Lannes, in the center, and detached five battalions, under Monier, the vanguard of Dessaix's division to the extreme right, to hold in check the light infantry of the enemy, which was there making serious progress. The grenadiers, in a solid square, first advanced, crushing their way through the enemy, while from the sides of the living square, burst sheets of flame, which seemed to devour the Austrians as it advanced. In vain did the imperial horse and foot, with repeated charges, endeavor to break this intrepid band; they were hurled back by the fierce fire of the grenadiers with great slaughter. At length, however, the square was attacked in front by the Hungarian infantry; in flank by the Austrian hussars, and being exposed to the heavy fire of the Austrian artillery, the grenadiers wavered, and fell back before their numerous enemies, upon the troops of Monier, who advancing rapidly made himself master of the village of Castel Ceriolo. The Austrians here attacked him with such vehemence that he was compelled to evacuate the village; but the French returning to the struggle with renewed ardor finally expelled the Austrians, and succeeded in holding that important post during the remainder of the day.

Although the French had repaired their disasters on the right, their left was still in a state of confusion, and the Austrians were making fearful progress in that quarter. Melas deeming the victory gained, retired at two o'clock to Alexandria, leaving Zack, the chief of his staff, to follow up his success; but the French army although broken was not defeated. At four o'clock Dessaix with his troops made his appearance. This arrival reanimated the hopes of the French. Victor and Lannes's troops were re-formed under cover of the cavalry which was massed in front of St. Juliano, a masked battery was planted under the direction of Marmont, and Dessaix advanced, at the head of his corps, to arrest the progress of the enemy. Napoleon rode to the front, and advanced along the line, exclaiming, "Soldiers! we have retired far enough; you know it is always my custom to sleep on the field of battle." This energetic and suggestive speech was received by the soldiers, with loud acclamations, and they advanced to the charge with the utmost impetuosity. Zack was advancing at the head of his column, little anticipating such an onset, when Marmont suddenly unmasked his batteries and opened a destructive fire upon him, and at the same time Dessaix debouched from St. Juliano at the head of his division. The Austrians fell back in disorder before the French; but Zack, by the most strenuous exertions, succeeded in restoring order in front, and for a moment the advance of the French was checked. The struggle now became fierce; a tempest of balls was hurled upon the French from the Austrian line, and Dessaix was struck by a bullet in the breast and soon expired. The command fell on Boudet, and the French troops aroused to fury at the fall of their beloved leader, rushed frantically on the enemy, hurling a destructive and incessant storm of lead into their bosoms, and the conflict raged with increased vigor. The Austrians replied to the French fire with vigor; neither party wavered; and the devouring tempest was maintained on both sides with unceasing energy. At this moment, when victory trembled as it were in a balance, Kellerman was ordered to charge with his cavalry. On like a whirlwind swept the noble band; passing Dessaix's division and Marmont's battery with lightning speed, they plunged headlong into the midst of the Austrians, overthrowing and trampling under foot all that opposed their progress, and cutting Zack's column through the very center. Zack, himself, with 2,000 men, was made prisoner, and the remainder fled in the utmost confusion to the rear, bearing back in the flight the other divisions which were advancing to their support. The troops of Lannes and Victor, on this, regained their former spirit and turned fiercely on their pursuers. The infantry of Kaim overwhelmed by the tide of fugitives, gave way; the cavalry were seized with a sudden panic and galloped wildly to the rear, trampling down in their mad career, the unfortunate fugitives who were flying before them. "To the bridges! to the bridges!" was the general cry; and the whole Austrian army disbanding, flew terror-stricken toward the Bormida. Marengo fell into the hands of the French, and the fugitives choking up the bridges with their number compelled the gunners to plunge into the river with their horses and pieces, where twenty cannons stuck fast and fell into the hands of the French. The slaughter of the Austrians was frightful. The French maintained the pursuit until darkness prevented them from distinguishing friend from foe. Several battalions of the Austrians laid down their arms and surrendered at discretion. The French remained masters of the field, and encamped for the night on the bloody plain. Thus ended the bloody battle of Marengo. The Austrians lost 7,000 men killed and wounded, and 3,000 prisoners. Among the latter was General Zack. The French lost 7,000 men killed and wounded and 1,000 made prisoners in the early part of the day. Eight standards and twenty pieces of cannon fell into the hands of the victors. Melas, disheartened by his defeat, proposed a suspension of hostilities, and terms of a treaty were shortly afterwards agreed upon between the two generals. By this treaty, it was agreed that there should be an armistice between the two armies until Melas should obtain an answer from the court of Vienna. That in the mean time the Austrian army should occupy the country between the Mincio and the Po, that is, Peschiera, Mantua, Borgoforte, and from it to the left bank of the Po, and on its right bank, Ferra, Ancona, and Tuscany; that the French should occupy the district between the Chiésa, the Oglio, and the Po, and the space between the Chiésa and Mincio should not be occupied by either army. That the fortresses of Tortona, Milan, Turin, Pizzighitone, Arona, Placentia, Ceva, Savona, Urbia, Coni, Alexandria, and Genoa,,should be surrendered to the French with all their artillery and stores, the Austrians taking with them only their own cannon. The evacuation of all these places, and the final retreat of the Austrian army, were to be completed by the 24th of June. Napoleon after the battle of Marengo, returned to Milan, where he was received with extraordinary demonstrations of joy. He shortly afterward returned to Paris, and nothing could exceed the transports of the people when his arrival was known. He had conquered a peace, and won the imperial crown.

MARIGNAN, A.D. 1515.—The battle of Marignan was fought on the 13th of September, 1515, near Milan in Italy, between the Swiss army, and the French under Francis I. The gallant Swiss maintained the fight with heroic valor against overwhelming odds. After losing all their bravest soldiers, they were finally compelled to fly. Upward of 20,000 men fell in this obstinate and sanguinary conflict.

MARSEILLES, B.C. 49.—This famous city of France is situated at the head of a bay on the north-east side of the Gulf of Lyons, about 200 miles south-east of Lyons. It was founded by the Phœnicians about 600 B.C., and its progress in arts and letters was so rapid that Cicero called it the "Athens of Gaul."

The inhabitants of Marseilles being under great obligations to Pompey, were not willing to open their gates to Cæsar. Irritated by this affront, Cæsar laid siege to their city. It was long, because that great general did not at first conduct it in person; but as soon as he presented himself before the place, it surrendered. The conqueror was satisfied with disarming the citizens, and ordering them to bring to him all the money in the public treasury.

SECOND SIEGE, A.D. 310.—Notwithstanding his repeated abdications, Maximian Hercules was again anxious for power, and, for the third time, to remount the throne of the Cæsars. In order to engage the Gauls to declare in his favor, he caused a report of the death of Constantine to be circulated. This report had not time to be accredited, for Constantine, at the head of a numerous army, presented himself before Marseilles, into which place Maximian had retired. He at once led on an assault, and would have taken the city if his ladders had not proved too short. Several soldiers, however, succeeded in gaining the top of the walls, but the emperor, to spare the blood of the troops and of the inhabitants, sounded a retreat. Maximian appeared upon the walls; Constantine drew near to them, and represented to the ex-emperor the injustice and futility of his proceedings. While the old man was pouring forth invectives, some of the inhabitants, unknown to him, opened one of the gates, and admitted the soldiers of Constantine. They seized Maximian, led him before the emperor, and terminated this short and foolish war.

THIRD SIEGE, A.D. 1544.—The constable De Bourbon, wishing by his services to merit the favor of Charles V., to whom that perfidious prince had sold himself, undertook the siege of Marseilles. "Three cannon-shot," said he, "will so astonish the good citizens, that they will come with halters around their necks to present me the keys." But, far from surrendering, the Marseilleise swore to defend themselves to the last extremity. The women took part in the most painful labors of the defense; their ardor was so great, that the countermines which they dug on the side of the attack were called, to perpetuate the memory of the fact, "The Ladies' Trench." A cannon-ball, fired from the city, killed two gentlemen, and a priest, who were celebrating mass. The constable De Bourbon, attracted by the noise created by this accident, hastened to the spot, and asked what was the cause of the tumult. The Marquis De Pescaira, his rival, coolly replied, "It is only the consuls of Marseilles, Monsieur, who have brought us the keys." Bourbon well deserved this raillery, for they had already been forty days before a place which he had boasted would surrender as soon as he appeared. Rendered furious by the cannon-ball and the joke, he gave orders for the fire of the artillery to be doubled, and soon a breach was made sufficient for an assault. The engineers who were sent to reconnoiter reported that there was behind it a deep ditch, filled with combustibles, and defended by a great number of soldiers. Pescaira gave a description of it to the council of war, and added, maliciously, "You see, gentlemen, that the Marseillese keep a well-spread table, in order to entertain properly all who have any desire to visit them; if you have any inclination to sup in Paradise, go there, in heaven's name; but for my part, I don't feel disposed to go thither yet. We should do much better, I think, to return to Italy, where the French may be before us." The hatred in which the constable De Bourbon was held caused this advice to be approved of. Francis I. came to the relief of the city with an army of 40,000 men. Instructed in the school of misfortune, he obstinately refused to give the imperialists battle, and contented himself with depriving them of all means of subsistence. His army destroyed all the mills: that of D'Aubagne was the only one left. Francis I. was convinced that the retreat of his enemy was inevitable if this mill was destroyed, and he ordered Barbesieux, who commanded in Marseilles, to undertake it. This general thought the thing impossible, because the post was so well guarded and so near to the imperialists. Montluc, young, enterprising, and full of resources, thought that, with courage, secrecy, and diligence, it was possible to succeed. Barbesieux laughed at what he called a fanfarronade; but as it was only at the risk of 120 men, he gave his consent. Every thing succeeded; the mill was forced and destroyed; and the detachment came off unhurt. This little expedition had a singular influence over the fate of Marseilles. Deprived of provisions, the imperialists quickly retired, and the constable had the double disgrace of failing against a place while fighting against his prince and his country.—Robson's Famous Sieges.

MARSTON MOOR, A.D. 1644.—The memorable and desperate battle of Marston Moor, which terminated so fatally for the cause of the unfortunate Charles I. of England, was fought on the 3d of July, 1644, between the parliamentarian army and the Scots, under Sir Thomas Fairfax and the Earl of Leven, and the forces of the royalists, under Prince Rupert. The field of battle was about eight miles from the city of York, near the villages of Monckton and Milton, in the vicinity of the river Ouse. Prince Rupert had marched with an army of 25,000 men, for the relief of York, then besieged by Sir Thomas Fairfax and the Earl of Leven, with an army of 25,000 men. The besiegers, observing the approach of the enemy, retreated to Marston Moor, a large open plain about eight miles distant from the city. Thither they were followed by the prince. Whitlocke has recorded with much impartiality the following particulars of this eventful day: "The right wing of the parliament was commanded by Sir Thomas Fairfax, and consisted of all his horse, and three regiments of the Scots' horse; the left wing was commanded by the Earl of Manchester and Colonel Oliver Cromwell. One body of their foot was commanded by Lord Fairfax, and consisted of his foot, and two brigades of the Scots' foot for reserve; and the main body was commanded by General Leven. The right wing of the royalists was commanded by the Earl of Newcastle; the left wing by the prince himself, and the main body by General Gormy, Sir Charles Lucas, and Major General Porter. Both armies were thus drawn up in order of battle. On the morning of the 3d of July, 1644, at about seven o'clock, the fight began. The prince, with his left wing, fell on the parliaments' right wing, routed them, and pursued them a great way; the like did Generals Gormy, Lucas, and Porter, upon the parliaments' main body. The three generals, giving up all for lost, hastened out of the field, and many of their soldiers fled, and threw down their arms. The king's forces too eagerly following them, the victory, now almost achieved by them, was again snatched out of their hands. For, Colonel Cromwell, with the brave regiment of his countrymen, and Sir Thomas Fairfax, having rallied some of his horse, fell upon the prince's right wing, where the Earl of Newcastle was, and routed them; and the rest of their companions rallying, they fell altogether upon the divided bodies of Rupert and Gormy, and totally dispersed them, and obtained a complete victory after a three hours' fight. From this battle and the pursuit, some reckon were buried 7,000 Englishmen; all agree that above 3,000 of the prince's men were slain in the battle, besides those in the chase, and 3,000 prisoners taken, many of their chief officers, twenty-five pieces of ordnance, forty-seven colors, 10,000 arms, two wagons of carabines and pistols, 130 barrels of powder, and all their bag and baggage!" This disastrous battle extinguished the power of the royalists in the northern counties of England.

MANTINEA, B.C. 363.—A war had sprung up between the Arcadians and Eleans, two nations of Greece, and this war occasioned another between the Arcadians themselves. The inhabitants of Tegæa and Mantinea, two Arcadian cities, declared war against each other, and all Greece was put into motion. The people of Tegæa called on the Thebans for aid, while those of Mantinea sought the assistance of the Spartans and Athenians. Aid was granted in both cases. There were besides several other allies on each side. The command of the Theban army was given to Epaminondas, who immediately entered Arcadia, and encamped near Tegæa. He designed to attack the Mantineans; but being informed that Agesilaus, the Spartan general, had begun his march toward Mantinea, he determined upon an enterprise which he believed would immortalize his name, and reduce the power of the enemy forever. Unknown to the Mantineans he left Tegæa in the night, and, with his army, marched directly to Sparta, carefully avoiding the road which Agesilaus had taken. He would undoubtedly have taken the city by surprise, for it had neither walls, troops, nor other means of defense, had not a Cretan informed Agesilaus of the design.

Agesilaus immediately sent a horseman to alarm the city, and hastened after him with his whole army. A short time afterward, the Thebans crossed the river Eurotas, and commenced an attack on the town. The Spartans defended their beloved city with the desperation of despair. Agesilaus, in person, fought with a vigor above his years. Archidamus his son, distinguished himself greatly, both by his valor and agility, flying through the by-lanes to meet the enemy wherever they pressed the hardest; his little band closely followed the example of their youthful commander, repulsing the enemy on all sides. But Isodus, the son of Phœbidas, presented the most extraordinary spectacle, not only to his countrymen, but to the enemy. He was tall and elegant in form and feature and just growing from boyhood into manhood. He had stripped himself of armor and clothing, and naked and newly anointed with oil, he rushed out of his house armed only with a spear in one hand and a sword in the other. He eagerly made his way through the combatants, and dealt his blows among the enemy's ranks, slaying every man with whom he engaged. In spite of his defenseless condition he received not a single wound. After the battle he was rewarded for his bravery by a crown, but he was also fined 1,000 drachmas* for daring to appear without his armor. Epaminondas having failed in his aim, hastily returned with his army to Tegæa. The Spartans and Athenians with their allies closely followed him, and encamped before Mantinea. Epaminondas decided to give battle immediately. Never before had the Greeks fought among themselves with more numerous armies. The Lacedæmonians numbered more than 20,000 foot, and 2,000 horse. The Theban army consisted of 30,000 foot, and nearly 3,000 horse. The right wing of the Lacedæmonian army consisted of Mantineans, Arcadians, and Lacedæmonians posted in one line; the center was composed of Eleans and Achæans, who were the weakest of their troops, and the left wing consisted entirely of Athenians. In the other army the Thebans and Arcadians were on the left; the Argives on the right, and the other allies in the center. The cavalry in each was disposed on the wings. Epaminondas marched toward Mantinea, in the same order of battle in which he intended to fight. He did not march directly, and with his front to the enemy, but in a column along the hills, with his left wing foremost, to make them believe that he did not intend to fight that day. When he had arrived within sight of the enemy, he ordered his troops to halt, and lay down their arms as if he designed to encamp there. The troops of the enemy in fact, were deceived, and reckoning no longer upon a battle, they quitted their arms, and dispersed about the camp. Epaminondas, however, suddenly wheeled his troops to the right, and thus changed his column into a line. Then drawing out the choice troops whom he had expressly posted in front during his march, he made them double their files upon the front of his left wing to add to its strength, and to put it into a condition to attack in a point, the Lacedæmonian phalanx, which by the movement he made, forced it directly. He ordered the center and right wing of his army to move very slowly, and to halt before they came up with the enemy, that he might not hazard the event of the battle upon troops on whom he could not rely. He took command in person of the body of picked men, which he formed in a point like a galley, and with them expected to penetrate the Lacedæmonian phalanx, which once broken, he would not find it difficult to rout the rest of the army, by charging upon the left and right with his victorious troops. But fearing that the Athenians who were posted on the left wing of the enemy's army, might come to the support of the Lacedæmonians on the left, he caused a detachment of his horse and foot to advance out of the line, and to post themselves on the rising ground in readiness to attack the Athenians in flank and rear in case they should advance to sustain their right wing. Having thus disposed his whole army, he moved on to charge the enemy with the entire weight of his column. The troops of the enemy were strangely surprised when they saw Epaminondas advancing toward them in this order, and resumed their arms, bridled their horses, and hastened to form into ranks. The Theban general now commanded the bowmen, slingers, and lancers, whom he had planted in the intervals of his cavalry, which covered his flank on the left, to discharge their weapons upon the enemy's horse. Instantly a cloud of arrows, stones, and lances clouded the air, and falling among the Lacedæmonian troopers, threw them into disorder. Then like a thunderbolt, the Theban cavalry dashed upon the disordered horsemen, who after a desperate but ineffective resistance fell back behind their infantry, with great loss. In the mean time Epaminondas had not been idle; with his body of foot he charged upon the Lacedæmonian phalanx, and the troops on both sides were soon engaged in a desperate and bloody struggle. Neither Thebans nor Lacedæmonians would yield: both resolved rather to perish than to relinquish the glory of arms to their rivals. The fight was commenced with spears; but in the fury of the combat their weapons were soon broken, and drawing their swords they charged each other with such fury and animosity that the ground was piled with heaps of slain. Neither party would yield an inch of ground, and the furious slaughter on both sides continued for hours. At length, Epaminondas, determined by an extraordinary personal effort, to force victory to declare for him. He formed a troop of the bravest and most resolute soldiers around him, and placing himself at their head, made a vigorous charge upon the enemy where the battle was most fierce and bloody. With the first javelin he threw he wounded the Lacedæmonian general. His men excited to enthusiastic valor by his example, hewed their way through the solid phalanx of the enemy, killing all that stood before them. The Lacedæmonians, dismayed by the presence of Epaminondas, and the heroism of his noble band, gave way before them. The main body of the Theban troops animated by the success of their general, fiercely attacked the enemy upon his right and left, and drove them back with fearful carnage. But some Spartan troops perceiving that Epaminondas, abandoning himself wholly to his ardor, was too reckless of his own personal safety, suddenly rallied, and charged him with a shower of javelins. While he was engaged in warding off, and shunning these darts, Callicrates, one of the Spartans, rushed upon him, and thrust a javelin into his breast through his cuirass. The head of the lance broke off in the wound, and Epaminondas fell to the ground in excruciating agony. And now the battle raged around the fallen general with redoubled fury. The Lacedæmonians used their utmost endeavors to take him alive, while the Thebans were equally determined to save him. The dead were piled in heaps around him, and the ground was soaked with gore. At length the Thebans by an almost superhuman effort drove the enemy from the spot, and remained masters of the field and of the slain. In the mean while the Athenian cavalry attacked the horsemen on the left wing of the Theban army; but being received with a shower of darts and arrows from the bowmen and lancers posted in the intervals of the Theban cavalry, they were galled so extremely, that they could not resist the rude charge of the horsemen, but were obliged to fly.

After thus repulsing and dispersing the enemy's cavalry, the Thebans, instead of pursuing them, attacked the Athenian foot, which they took in flank, put into disorder, and pushed with great vigor. At the very moment when the Athenians were about to take to flight, the general of the Elean cavalry, who commanded a body of reserve, hastened to their support. They charged the Theban horse, who were awaiting them, and who received them so warmly that they were forced to retreat. The Athenian cavalry, which had been routed at first, finding they were not pursued, rallied, but instead of going to the assistance of their foot, which was roughly handled, they attacked the Thebans upon the heights without the line, and, routing them, put every man to the sword. After these various movements, the troops on both sides stood still, and rested upon their weapons. Shortly afterward, as if by mutual consent, the trumpets of the two armies sounded the retreat, at the same time. Both parties pretended to the victory, and each erected a trophy on the field of battle: the Thebans because they had defeated the right wing, and remained masters of the field of battle; and the Lacedæmonians because they had cut the detachment in pieces. And from this point of honor, both sides refused at first to ask leave to bury their dead, which, with the ancients, was confessing their defeat. The Lacedæmonians, however, first sent a herald to demand permission, after which the rest had no thoughts but of paying the last duties to the slain on their respective sides. After the surgeons had examined the wound of Epaminondas, they declared that he would expire the moment the head of the dart was drawn from it. These words sent sorrow and affliction to the hearts of all present. Epaminondas alone was unmoved. His only anxiety was as to the result of the battle. His shield was shown him, and he was assured that the Thebans had won the victory. His countenance bespoke his joy, and after addressing a few words of consolation to those around him, he drew the head of the javelin out of the wound, and instantly expired.

MAYENNE, A.D. 1429.—The siege of Mayenne, in France, by the English, under the Earl of Salisbury, took place in 1429, and, after enduring three months, was ended by the capture of the place by the besiegers.

MAXEN, A.D. 1759.—The battle of Maxen was fought A.D. 1759, between the Austrians and the Prussians. The Prussians were defeated.

MEERUT, A.D. 1018.—Meerut, a town of British India, was taken by Mahmoud of Ghizuee, in 1018, and in 1399 by Timour.

MEGASPELION. — The Turks, under Ibrahaim Pasha, besieged the convent of Megaspelion, in Greece, but were repulsed by the Greeks, with a loss of several thousand men, in 1825.

MENDAVIA, A.D. 1507.—An insignificant action took place in Mendavia, in Spain, in 1507, in which Cæsar Borgia was killed.

MERGUI, A.D. 1824.—Mergui, in British India, was taken by storm by the British in 1824.

MERIDA, A.D. 715.—Merida, in Spain, was taken by the Moors in 715; in 1229 it was recaptured by the troops of Alonzo el Sabio, and afterward remained permanently attached to the kingdom of Castile.

MESSINA, B.C. 264.—The power of the Romans had struggled during nearly 500 years against the people of Italy; and it was not till after many and severe toils that they succeeded in laying the foundations of an empire which was destined to embrace nearly the known universe. Rome, mistress of those vast countries which extend from the Rubicon to the southern extremity of Italy, became anxious to carry her conquests abroad. She ventured to attack the forces of Carthage, at that time the most flourishing republic in existence. The union of the Carthaginians with Hiero, King of Syracuse, for the destruction of the Messinians and the siege of Messina, were the pretexts for the first war between these two ambitious republics, while the conquest of Sicily was the real object. Messina having placed itself under the protection of Rome, Appius Claudius was ordered to march to the succor of that oppressed city; but a strait of the sea had to be crossed, and the Romans, without maritime experience, had nothing but boats, rudely constructed, very much resembling Indian canoes. Was it possible for such a fleet to resist that of the Carthaginians, well equipped and numerous, besides being accustomed to the domination of the seas? Appius at once perceived his weakness; and yet it was necessary that he should arrive at Messina quickly, as the enemy was pressing it very closely. In this embarrassment, the consul had recourse to an ingenious strategem: he pretended to endeavor to cross the strait, but seeming to be terrified at the sight of the Carthaginians, he took to flight suddenly, and feigned to abandon the enterprise. The Carthaginians fully persuaded that he would not return, but was gone back to Rome, retired, as if there was nothing more to be feared. Appius, taking advantage of this belief, crossed the strait in the night time, and arrived safely in Sicily. The place at which he landed was close to the camp of the Syracusans; and the consul exhorted his troops to fall at once upon the enemy, promising them an easy victory;—in fact, it proved so. The army of Hiero could not sustain the impetuous shock of the Romans: it fled and abandoned the entrances of Messina to the conquerors. The consul was received like a liberator from heaven; and the joy of the citizens was the greater, from their having been in utter despair. Appius, taking advantage of his victory, attacked the camp of the Carthaginians; but he was repulsed with some loss, and forced to retreat. He was pursued, which was what he desired and expected; he faced about, and fortune seemed to change with the situation of the place. The Carthaginians could not stand against the courage of the Romans, but took to flight in their turn, after losing many men. And thus Rome commenced the first Punic war.

Second Siege, A.D. 1282.—Stung almost to madness by the celebrated Sicilian Vespers, Charles of Anjou collected all the troops in his power, set forward on his march, accompanied by an apostolic legate, and invested Messina, which he pressed closely. The unfortunate inhabitants, upon the point of having their city carried by assault, offered to capitulate. They promised to return to their duty, if the monarch would forget the past, and engage not to give to the French either places or magistracy in their city. Charles replied that he intended to govern as to him should seem best; and that, if they did not promptly submit, they might prepare to be treated in the same manner as they had treated the French. The Messinese, irritated by this disheartening reply, swore that they would rather devour their own children than become slaves forever. It was in vain that endeavors were made to bring them back to a more prudent line of conduct; the most terrible menaces were equally vain; they would listen to nothing; they declared that it would be better to die like brave men, than to be given up to the executioner like base malefactors. Old men, women, and children, all took up arms in the common cause. The king continued to press the siege very warmly, but the Messinese, animated by a generous despair, defended themselves with such heroic valor, that they gave Don Pedro of Arragon time to come to their succor. This prince, at the head of a fleet of fifty galleys, which had for admiral Roger Doria, the greatest seaman of his age, advanced into the strait of Messina, for the purpose of carrying off the French fleet, which lay there without defense. Charles, being informed of this project, thought it evident he should be ruined if he continued the siege; so he retreated without obtaining his revenge; but he could not save his vessels, of which the enemy took 29, and burned 30.

This war lasted many years, and was almost always unfortunate for the house of Anjou, which was at length obliged to share Sicily with that of Arragon, and to content itself with Calabria, Apulia, the Terra di Lavoro, and the Abruzzi, under the title of the kingdom of Naples.—Robson.

MESSOLONGHI, A.D. 1823.—Marco Bozarris, celebrated by Halleck, the American poet, at the head of a small but gallant body of Greeks, met, fought, and signally defeated an overwhelming force of Turkish troops, near Messolonghi, in Greece, during the Greek revolution in 1823. But the victory was dearly won; Marco Bozarris, the hero, was slain in the action.

MEXICO, A.D. 1520.—The ancient city of Mexico, or as it was called, Tenochtiltan, was built on a group of islands in the lake Tezcuco. The city was connected with the mainland by three principal causeways of stone and earth, about thirty feet in breadth, and extending from two to six miles over the surrounding marshes. The causeway of Iztapalapan approached the city from the south, that of Tepejucal from the north, and that of Tlacopan from the west. The causeways were pierced by several canals, which were provided with draw-bridges.

Cortez, upon his first entrance into the Mexican capital, was entirely satisfied with his reception by Montezuma, and feeling that he had secured the friendship of the Mexican emperor and nobles, set out for Cempoalla, for the purpose of securing his alliance with the Cempoallans. He left behind him in the city 150 Spanish soldiers, and 10,000 Tlascalan warriors, under the command of Alvarado; and by the rashness of this officer the hostility of the citizens was provoked to an extent that soon threw the whole city into a state of insurrection.

It was the custom of the Aztec nobles to hold an annual festival, in the month of May, in honor of their god of war; and they requested Alvarado to allow them to hold it in the court in the vicinity of the Spanish quarters. The Spanish general granted their request on certain conditions, one of which was that they should come unarmed. Accordingly, on the appointed day, the nobles and the principal men of the city, to the number of 600, met together in the place named, dressed in their richest attire. Meanwhile Alvarado had concocted a scheme, so infernal in its character, that his name has been handed down in history, branded with infamy and disgrace. His soldiers were to be present at the festival, fully armed, some being directed to mingle with the crowd, while others, as if by accident, were to gather around the gates of the courtyard, and at a signal from him they were to fall upon and slay all before them.

The festivities were at their height; the nobles engaged in dancing and music heeded not the presence of the Spaniards: the signal was given; instantly every Spanish sword leaped from its scabbard, and like demons the soldiers rushed upon the unarmed nobles, hewing them down to right and left, until the pavement was piled with dead, and streaming with blood. Amid their gayety and innocent diversion, this joyous company was furiously assailed by the treacherous Spaniards. In vain they strove to escape. Foes encompassed them on all sides. Some met their doom in stern inactivity; others sprang toward the gates, and were impaled on the lances of the soldiers; and others endeavored to scale the wall, and were shot down or cut to pieces by their enemies. The court-yard, lately resounding with mirth and joyful music, was now filled with groans and cries of despair. At length all was silent. The cruel work was finished; all were slain; and now, glutted with slaughter, the Spaniards with blood-begrimed countenances, fell upon the mutilated corses, like vultures, and rifled them of their jewels and precious ornaments.

The tidings of the butchery spread rapidly throughout the city. Exasperated to madness, the citizens flew to arms, and on the following morning at daybreak, they assailed the Spanish quarters with vengeful energy. With desperate zeal they repeatedly attempted to scale the walls, but were as often repulsed by the Spaniards. They succeeded, however, in setting fire to the works, and probably would have stormed the place had not Montezuma himself interfered. Mounting the battlements, the Mexican king besought his subjects if they valued his own safety, to desist. Moved by the entreaties of their monarch, the mob ceased further active hostilities, but throwing up works around the palace, they changed the siege into a blockade. The Spaniards being cut off from supplies of either provisions or water, were reduced to the utmost extremities.

Intelligence of this state of affairs at Mexico being conveyed to Cortez, who was still at Cempoalla, that general immediately set forth on his return to the capital.

The Siege of the Palace of Axyacath.—The arrival of Cortez in Mexico did not materially alter the disastrous state of affairs into which the Spanish soldiers had plunged themselves. The populace were still in a ferment; they refused to furnish the Spaniards with supplies, and murmurs of indignation and threats were heard on all sides. Cortez, vexed with himself, his general, and with every body around him, vented his displeasure upon the Mexican emperor, accusing him as the cause of the insurrection, and treating him in the most contemptuous manner even before the very faces of the Mexican nobles.

In order to conciliate the populace he released the emperor's brother Cuitlahaua, who had been imprisoned on a charge of assisting in a former revolt; but being the heir-apparent of the throne, Cuitlahaua, was appointed by the people to act as their sovereign, during the captivity of Montezuma. He eagerly accepted the position, and full of anger toward the invaders of his country he made active preparations for future operations against them. And soon the result of his preparations was to be seen. Cortez confident in his power to check the progress of the insurrection, little dreamed of the storm which was about to burst with the fury of a hurricane upon him.

But soon he learned his weakness. The citizens, under the direction of their experienced commander, had formed themselves into an immense army, and the Spanish general was awakened from his delusion by the intelligence that the city was in arms, and that an immediate assault upon his quarters was meditated. Soon, like huge serpents, the masses of the infuriated populace were to be seen advancing through the various streets toward the palace, and, as if by magic, the house-tops in the vicinity were covered with armed men, who, wildly brandishing their weapons, howled forth their defiance to the Spaniards.

The palace of Axaycath, which was occupied by the Spaniards, stood in the center of a large court-yard which was inclosed by a stone wall of a moderate height. This wall was strengthened by towers erected at equal distances from each other. The palace itself was one story high; but from the center arose a number of turret-shaped apartments. Cortez had set aside the palace for the accommodation of his Spanish soldiers, while his Tlascalan allies were lodged in sheds roughly constructed, erected in the court-yard. The artillery was mounted in embrasure on the parapet, which was also pierced with loopholes for the use of the musketeers. However confident the Spanish general might have been of his ability to overawe the Mexicans, he nevertheless did not relax for an instant the strict discipline which he had ever maintained in his army. The intelligence of the approach of the enemy was no sooner received than the trumpet sounded to arms, and in an instant every man was at his station.

In dense masses the Mexicans continued to concentrate their forces in the square in front of the palace. They were armed with spears, slings, and bows and arrows; and their gaudy banners, and gay head-dresses presented a strange spectacle as they rushed forward in tumultuous eagerness toward the enemy Onward like a tempest they rushed amid the sounds of their rude instruments of warlike music. As they neared the Spanish works they stopped, and delivered cloud after cloud of arrows, stones, and lances, which fell thick and fast upon the besieged, who were also annoyed by a constant rain of like missiles from the neighboring house-tops. The Spaniards reserved their fire until the front ranks of the besiegers had arrived in close proximity to the inclosure. Then volley after volley of artillery and musketry was opened upon the Mexicans. Shattered and torn by the terrible discharges, the besiegers wavered, but soon recovering from the confusion into which they had been thrown by the furious fire of the enemy, they rushed forward with wild cries over the heaps of carcases which strewed the pavement before them. Again and again were they received by withering discharges of artillery and musketry, and again were they obliged to fall back. But, aided by their comrades on the roofs, who continued to pour terrific and deadly clouds of missiles upon the Spaniards, they again advanced under the very muzzles of the guns, and endeavored to scale the parapet; but no sooner did they elevate their heads above the breastwork than they were shot down by the musketeers from within, or pierced through and through by the thrust of a Tlascalan lance.

Yet, with obstinate valor they pressed onward, mounting over the bodies of their slain and wounded companions, and grappling the walls with hands and feet, strove vainly to scale it. Defeated at all points, they changed their method of attack, and endeavored to effect a breach in the walls by the aid of battering-rams. But the wall was strong and resisted every attack of the assailants. Throwing aside their huge beams, the besiegers endeavored to set fire to the Spanish quarter by casting burning missiles upon them. The palace, however, was built of stone, yet the besiegers succeeded in firing the wooden sheds used by the Tlascalans, in the court-yard. In vain did the besieged endeavor to quench the flames, the sheds were consumed, and some of the outworks connected with the parapet took fire, and could only be checked by throwing down a portion of the rampart itself. This was done, and a formidable breach was laid open. By Cortez's order this breach was protected by a battery of heavy guns and a company of musketeers, who maintained a constant fire from the breach upon the besiegers. The Mexicans rushed toward the opening with shouts of exultation. But as they entered the withering storm of lead and iron, they sank before it in heaps of dead and dying. Yet they maintained the conflict; fresh warriors supplied the place of the slain only to meet a like fate, and night alone closed the terrible strife. Within a stone's throw of each other the besieged and besiegers spent the night; but not in sleep. The Spaniards busied themselves in repairing their works, while the Mexicans, in a mass, swayed back and forth like the waves of an ocean recovering from the effects of a recent storm, and occasionally giving forth a shout of defiance, and casting a stone or lance over the parapet.

At length the laggard night opened and admitted the expected day. The early dawn had just announced the approach of light when the Mexicans resumed the offensive. During the night they had received reinforcements from all quarters of the city, and they presented to the eyes of the besieged a force of far greater magnitude and power than that of the day before. Lances, stones, arrows, and darts were hurled from all sides upon the Spaniards. Cortez now determined to make a decisive sortie. A general discharge of artillery and musketry opened a bloody gap in the midst of the enemy, and before they could reorganize the gates were opened, and the Spanish cavalry, supported by a large body of Tlascalan warriors, rushed out, and charged down upon the Mexicans at full gallop. Little expecting such an attack, the Mexicans were thrown into the utmost confusion and made but little resistance. On through the masses of the enemy the Spanish cavalry plowed its way, strewing the plain with corses. The enemy fled in all directions. The Tlascalan infantry followed up the attack of the cavalry with the utmost vigor, and the Mexicans were for the time being entirely routed. But soon they arrived at a breastwork of timber, which they had thrown across the principal street. Behind this they rallied, and replied to the frequent charges of the enemy by clouds of arrows and stones, which checked their further progress and threw them into disorder. But now Cortez ordered up his heavy artillery, and having placed it in position, opened a fire upon the enemy's work which in a short time swept it away, and cleared a passage for his army. But the Mexicans kept their ground with surprising obstinacy. In vain did the Spanish horse charge down upon them; they were driven back, and being also attacked in flank by fresh battalions of the enemy which came in from adjoining lanes and streets, victory seemed hung in a balance. Attacked in front, rear, and flank by swarms of an enemy whom hatred had inspired with a desire for vengeance, which nothing but the accomplishment could quench, the Spaniards fought with the sullen ferocity of despair. Shoulder to shoulder they battled against the human tide. Cortez exhorted them not to separate; but in spite of their efforts several were divided from their companions, dragged from their horses, and either slaughtered on the spot or hurried away to furnish a victim for the sacrificial altar. Cortez saw the danger of his position, and acted with promptness and decision.

In order to clear the streets of the enemy, he directed his men to set fire to the houses. Although constructed of stone, still the interior of the buildings contained great quantities of combustible matter. Hence, they were readily fired, but as each house stood separate from its neighbor, the progress of the Spaniards in their work of destruction was slow. Seven hundred houses with their inmates were consumed, and the enemy was driven from that quarter of the city. Yet, although defeated at all points, the Mexicans kept the field. Dispersed in broken squadrons in the various adjacent streets, they nevertheless continued to battle against the furious charges of the Spanish horse. When broken, they would soon rally behind some temporary works, which had been thrown across the streets, and resume the fight with undiminished ardor, until the barrier was swept away by the enemy's artillery, and a passage cleared for the cavalry. And thus, retreating and rallying, the Mexicans kept up the fight, until the Spaniards, sated with carnage, and weary with their exertions, sounded a retreat, and returned to the palace. The Mexicans followed, close at the heels of the retreating enemy, pouring showers of arrows and stones in upon their rear, and harassing them by every means in their power. The Spaniards at length reached their quarters, and seeing them again established within the palace, the Aztecs resumed their original position before the wall, and encamped for the night.

Late in the day Cortez was wounded severely in the hand; many of his officers were also wounded, and some were slain. Of his men, too, numbers of them were slain, and many of them were grievously wounded. The Spaniards also lost some of their best horses. The Mexican loss must have been enormous, yet they could afford to sacrifice hundreds where the Spaniards lost one.

At early dawn the Mexicans renewed the assault with redoubled vigor; with almost superhuman courage they faced the terrific fire of the Spaniards, and working their way over the carcasses of their slain enemies, in fact using the bodies as stepping-stones, they succeeded in scaling the wall, and effecting an entrance into the interior of the court-yard. But as fast as they entered they were encountered by the desperate defenders, and slain; yet they pressed on, and for a few moments it seemed as if the place would be carried, and the Spaniards overpowered by the mere weight of the assailants. At this critical moment, Cortez sent a messenger to Montezuma, with a request that he would interpose with his people in favor of the Spaniards. The captive monarch at first refused; but upon being assured by Cortez that he would gladly depart if his enemies would permit him, the emperor consented to entreat his people to cease further hostilities. Accordingly, Montezuma, clothed in his imperial robes, presented himself upon the central turret of the palace, in the sight of his people. At the instant he was recognized, the fierce clamor of war, among the Mexicans, ceased, and a deep silence pervaded throughout the whole of the vast assemblage. Montezuma, in a voice which, although calm and full of dignity, was heard by the whole of the Mexican army, expostulated with them, saying, that he was a friend of the Spaniards; that they were his guests; and that it was his wish that they should at once disperse and return to their homes. But his words did not produce the intended effect. Enraged at the cowardice and weakness of their monarch, the Mexicans turned their wrath upon him. He had scarcely ceased speaking, when the air was darkened by clouds of arrows, all directed toward the unfortunate monarch, who fell beneath them dangerously wounded. And now, the Mexicans, shocked at their own sacrilegious deed, set up a melancholy and universal howl, and scattered, fear-stricken, to their various dwellings.

Storming of the Temple of Huitzilopotchli.—Near the palace stood the great temple of Huitzilopotchli, which from its extreme height commanded the Spanish quarters. This temple was occupied by a body of about 600 Mexican nobles, who discharged such immense numbers of arrows and javelins into the court-yard, that the Spaniards could not leave their cover without running the greatest danger. On the other hand, the Mexicans in their lofty tower were completely protected from the fire of the enemy. Cortez, therefore, determined to storm the temple. He selected for this purpose 100 of his most experienced soldiers, whom he placed under the command of Escoba; but that officer, after repeated trials, in which he was invariably repulsed with great losses, was obliged to return unsuccessful. Cortez then selected 300 Spanish soldiers, and several thousand Tlascalan warriors, and buckling a shield over his left arm, which was wounded, he sallied forth at their head. His entrance into the court-yard of the temple was hotly disputed by a large body of Mexicans, who were waiting his arrival. The Spaniards charged them vigorously, but the pavement was so smooth that the cavalry was crippled in its movements, and they were obliged to retire before the natives, who witnessed their discomfiture with shouts of derision. The horses were sent back to the court-yard of the palace, and Cortez again led his men against the enemy. Overpowered by the superior numbers of their foes, the Mexicans were compelled to flee, and a free passage was opened for the Spaniards to the great temple. This structure was in the form of a pyramid. It was about 300 feet around the base, and was at least 150 feet in height. The summit was gained by five terraces which passed around the building, and were connected by flights of stone steps. The summit of the temple was flat, forming an open area about 200 feet square. On this area, at the side of the temple directly opposite the entrance, stood two stone towers, forty feet in height; and in the center arose the huge sacrificial stone. No other impediments marred the surface of the area.

No sooner was the court-yard cleared than Cortez, at the head of a body of his soldiers, rushed up the lower staircase, while a file of musketeers, and a strong corps of Tlascalans remained in the court-yard, to prevent any movement on the part of the enemy, against the temple. The first gallery, as well as those above, was crowded with Mexican warriors, who met the advance of the besiegers with showers of stones, arrows, and darts, which the Spaniards, protected by their thick cotton armor, heeded but little; but as they advanced up the staircase the Mexicans cast huge beams, and rocks, and burning timber upon them, which, crashing through their midst, carried death and destruction in their path. For an instant the Spaniards wavered; but urged forward by their brave commander, they sprang forward, and a gallant few eluding the enormous weapons of the enemy, gained the first landing, where, with almost superhuman courage, they drove back the Indians to the second staircase, thus affording their comrades below an opportunity to join them. The Spaniards having gained the first gallery, prepared to assail the second staircase, and aided by the fire of the musketeers in the court-yard, to which the Mexicans were now exposed, they gradually drove them upward, until at length the besieged were glad to retreat to the open area which formed the summit of the pyramid. The Spaniards eagerly pursued, and both parties stood face to face upon the flat surface of the area. And now a battle ensued which is without parallel in the history of man. Imagine a huge monument, 150 feet in height, 300 feet square at the base, and about 200 feet square at the summit, which formed an arena capable of containing 1,000 men, and then imagine this arena filled with armed men engaged in fierce conflict. Look upon the strange spectacle. The Spaniards stream from the entrance of the topmost staircase, and rush toward the Indians who, crowded together at the extreme verge of the monument, await the approach of the enemy with the sullen aspect of despair. Among them you perceive the black-robed priests, running from man to man, urging them to fight for their country and their gods. But why urge them? They see death staring them in the face. Nothing but courage can save them. All sides of the lofty platform are unprotected by parapet or wall. Beneath the combatants lies the city with its magnificent domes and towers, glistening in the rays of the sun, while a black cloud hovering over a certain portion, marks the spot where the flames of the Spaniards are doing their destructive work. Observe the masses of Mexican soldiers which crowd the square and all the principal streets. How silent they are! All eyes are turned toward the aërial battle-field. The contending parties close in mortal strife. Their battle-shouts fall faint upon the ears of the thousands of anxious spectators beneath. The sharp rattle of the Spanish fire-arms sounds dull, yet the lurid flashes of the pieces, and the clouds of smoke which hang like a pall over the summit of the temple, proclaim that the mighty weapon of the European is dealing its work of death. We gaze upon the field of strife. With compressed lips and fixed eyes the stern warriors battle fiercely, neither asking nor giving quarter. Man to man they fight like demons. They close; they hold each other in mortal embrace, one endeavoring to throw the other over the verge of the monument. The stronger hurls the weaker from the giddy height, and frequently two warriors firmly fixed in each other's embrace, roll together down the sides of the pyramid.

Cortez himself is grappled by two strong men; they hold him fast, they drag him toward the edge, and in an instant more the great general would have been dashed to pieces with his stalwart foes, and Mexico, for the time being, would have conquered; but, with almost superhuman strength, he releases his arm, and with a blow strikes one of them dead at his feet, and with one mighty effort hurls the other far into the air over the side of the temple. For three hours the battle rages. The number of the Mexicans is rapidly diminishing, and now the Spaniards are equal in strength with their enemies. They continue the fight with renewed ardor. One by one the Mexicans fall beneath the unerring blows of the Spaniards. At length the tumult of battle ceases. The arena is strewn with the bodies of the slain; all of its gallant defenders have fallen, save two or three priests who are led away in triumph by the victors. The Spaniards rush into the temples. What a horrible spectacle meets their vision. Upon the altars stand the figure of the Mexican god, and before him lays a fearful array of smoking hearts, freshly torn from the breasts of living victims. With shouts of rage the Spaniards seize upon the grim image, and hurl it to the ground, and then apply the torch to the bloody building, which is soon enveloped in flames. Having done this good work, the soldiers pass unharmed through the crowds of the amazed and terror-stricken Mexicans, and reach their quarters in safety.

In this conflict the Spaniards sustained serious losses. Forty-five were killed, and scarcely one escaped unharmed. The 600 Mexicans who defended the temple, were slain to a man. During the night, Cortez followed up the blow by a sortie on the town, burning three hundred houses whose inmates perished miserably in the flames.

The Battle of the Bridges.—Deeming that the Mexicans were now sufficiently cowed to listen to terms, Cortez, attended by his interpreter, and his principal officers, mounted into the turret of the palace, and by signs informed the Mexicans that he wished to communicate with them. The multitude listened to the gentle voice of Marina, who, interpreting Cortez's words, assured them of the folly of longer opposing the Spaniards. She pointed out the fearful punishment they had already received for their rebellions, and threatened to reduce their city to ashes if they continued in their opposition, at the same time promising that if they would lay down their arms, and return peaceably to their homes, the past would be forgiven. But the Mexicans would promise nothing. They desired war. They answered Cortez, by stating that he was the one who would submit; that he would eventually fall into their hands, for they had cut off all his supplies of water and provisions, and had effectually guarded against his escape by breaking down all the bridges. At the conclusion of their reply, they discharged a cloud of arrows into the group in the turret. None were injured however, and before the enemy could send a second volley, Cortez and his attendants had descended and sheltered themselves behind the defenses. The Spanish general now saw the necessity of evacuating the city at once. His soldiers, dispirited by the dangers which surrounded them, murmured, and seemed upon the point of open insubordination. Cortez, however, with his usual self-possession, immediately commenced making preparations to lead his soldiers out of the city. He selected for his road out of the city, that of Tlacopan, which seemed better suited for his purpose, for the reason that the causeway by which it crossed the lake was but two miles in length, much shorter than the causeways by which the other great avenues of the city, crossed the lake. In order to reconnoiter the ground, before his final departure, Cortez determined upon a sally toward the causeway of Tlacopan. He caused to be constructed under his immediate superintendance, three wooden towers, which consisted of two inclosed apartments, one over the other. The sides of these chambers were pierced with loop-holes for the use of musketeers. The towers were mounted on wheels, and furnished with strong ropes by which they were to be dragged along the streets. The towers being completed they were filled with musketeers; the ropes were manned by Tlascalan warriors, and at the command of the general, the enormous machines were dragged into the square. Preceded by the Spanish horse, the machines went thundering through the streets, striking terror to the heart of the Mexicans, as they vomited forth fire and smoke on all sides. As they advanced the Mexicans everywhere receded; those on the house-tops alone endeavoring to harass the movements of the Spaniards by continued discharges of arrows, stones and lances; but by bringing the towers close under the walls of the buildings the Spaniards were enabled to drive the enemy from the houses, either by the fire of musketry, or by assaults over a light draw-bridge with which each machine was provided, upon the roof where they closed with the enemy in fierce hand-to-hand combats. The loftier buildings, however, were too high to permit of the use of the towers; and from the roofs of these houses the Mexicans hurled large beams and stones upon the machines, shaking them to the very center. At length, however, the towers, although not materially injured, were rendered completely useless by the intervention of a canal, the first of seven which crossed the street of Tlacopan. The Mexicans had demolished the bridge; and Cortez at once ordered the towers to be abandoned, and the canal to be filled with timber, stone, and other material procured from the ruins of demolished houses. The Spaniards obeyed their commander's directions with alacrity; but their work was much retarded by the incessant flight of arrows, and stones, discharged by the Mexicans on the opposite side of the canal.

At length the ditch was filled, and the Spanish horse, riding across, charged the enemy with such impetuosity, that the Mexicans precipitately retreated to the second canal, where they again came to a stand. Here the Spaniards also found the bridge destroyed; again they filled the ditch with rubbish, amid the galling discharges of bows and slings; again they drove the enemy back to the third bridge; and again the Mexicans made a stand. At each canal the same operations were performed on both sides; the Spaniards filling the ditches, and the Mexicans striving gallantly to retard the work, until driven back by the furious charge of the Spanish horse. In each engagement the Spaniards suffered considerable loss. The Mexican loss was enormous, when compared to that of the enemy; but they had reason to rejoice if a single Spaniard should fall, even though his death should cost them a thousand lives. The Spaniards were engaged in this work two days before the last canal was bridged. A strong body of infantry was planted at each bridge, and now Cortez saw himself master of the road, from the palace to the causeway. The Mexicans now sent a messenger to Cortez asking a parley. Cortez, eager with joy at the intelligence, selected sixty of his men from among those who guarded the bridges; and, accompanied by Sandoval and Alvarado, hastened to the palace. There he held an interview with the Mexican chieftains who proposed that the two priests whom he had captured in the great temple should be returned to them to act as agents in conducting the negotiation. Cortez immediately complied with their terms, and anxiously awaited the result. But the wily Mexicans having secured the safety of their priests, returned with renewed energy to the conflict. They furiously attacked the bridges, and before Cortez could receive intelligence of their operations drove back the Spaniards from three of them, and commenced to destroy them. Cortez was soon informed of the state of affairs, and boiling with rage, he mounted his horse and rode at full gallop to the scene of strife, followed by his gallant comrades. With the fury of a tornado that little band of horsemen rushed into the compact mass of the enemy. The Mexicans recoiling before the terrible charge, scattered, and fled in disorder. On rushed the Spanish cavalry, sweeping the street free of the enemy, and regaining the three bridges. But while the cavalry was driving the enemy before them in the direction of the causeway, fresh bodies of Mexicans, streaming from the by-streets and lanes, fell upon the infantry at the bridges. Nearly exhausted by their arduous exertions the Spanish soldiers at one of the bridges were unable to maintain their ground against their numerous enemies. Surrounded by the Mexicans on all sides, this noble band fought with the valor of despair. Perceiving their danger Cortez hastened to their relief. Fresh swarms of the natives poured in upon them, and now both the Spanish cavalry and infantry were upon the verge of destruction. Yelling like demons the Mexicans sprang upon their enemies, embracing the foot soldiers in their sinewy arms, and grappling the horses of the cavalry by their legs and mane, heedless of sword or musket. The air was filled with stones, lances, and arrows, which falling among the Spaniards brought many a warrior to the ground. Cavalry and infantry were mingled in wild confusion, and the shouts of the combatants and the rattle of the musketry added to the terrors of the scene. The Spaniards thought only of securing a retreat to the palace. Backward they fought their way, facing first to the right then to the left as new enemies presented themselves to oppose their progress. For a season their destruction seemed inevitable; but at this critical moment Cortez himself alone, preserved his army. Striking his spurs deeply into the heaving flanks of his weary charger, he vaulted boldly into the very midst of the swaying mass before him. With a shout which sounded loud above the din of battle, he cheered on his men, and striking to right and left with his sword, he hewed a bloody circle around him, and spread terror through the ranks of the Mexicans. And it was not until the last soldier had crossed over the canal that he ceased his exertions; then with a single bound his horse cleared the ditch, bearing his noble rider in safety through a shower of stones and arrows. Night approached and the Mexicans according to their custom dispersed, and the fiercely disputed bridge remained in the hands of the Spaniards, who, bleeding from numerous wounds, and faint with hunger, thirst, and fatigue, with shattered weapons, and bruised armor, slowly and sadly returned to their quarters. On their arrival their despair was increased by the intelligence of the death of Montezuma. The last link which bound them to the respect, if not to the affections of the Mexicans, was snapped asunder.

THE BATTLE OF THE CAUSEWAY. — From the extremity of the street of Tlacopan stretched a causeway across the lake, connecting the city with the mainland.

This causeway was pierced by three canals, whose bridges had been destroyed by the Mexicans. By this route Cortez, with the advice of his officers, determined to evacuate the city. It was decided that the night would be preferable to the day-time for the hour of departure. Having provided for the safe transportation of the greater bulk of the royal treasure, Cortez bade his soldiers to select as much of the balance as they saw fit for their own use, at the same time warning them not to overload themselves. His own followers followed his advice; but the soldiers of Narvaez displayed less judgment, and loaded themselves with the glittering dust until they could scarcely walk beneath their burdens. The general next causing a portable bridge to be constructed, to be laid across the breaches, proceeded to arrange his order of march. In the front he placed two hundred Spanish infantry, commanded by Sandoval, and supported by about twenty-five cavaliers. At the rear were stationed the greater portion of the infantry and artillery, under the command of Alvarado and Leon. Cortez stationed himself in the center of the line of march, having under his immediate command a hundred men, selected from his own followers. A few of the heavy guns, the prisoners, and the treasure were also in the center. The Tlascalans were distributed along the line in bodies of nearly equal strength, between the three Spanish divisions. The bridge was intrusted to the care of forty men, selected from among the most experienced soldiers of the army. They were under the direction of an officer named Mazarino, and they all swore to defend the bridge to their last gasp. The army was called to arms at midnight. It was the first of July, 1520; the night was dark, and a fine rain filled the air with a drizzly mist. The city was silent. After hearing mass, the army slowly wound through the gates of the palace court-yard, into the deserted square. Onward through the street of Tlacopan marched that line of nearly seven thousand men. Their measured tread and the rumble of the artillery resounded along the road like muffled thunder; yet the inhabitants of the city slept on in silence. At length the van of the line emerged from the city, and advanced upon the open causeway. The band of forty prepared to lay the portable bridge. As they gazed forward in the darkness they saw the white garments of several Indian warriors flit athwart the causeway, and disappear like phantoms in the night. With loud shouts the Mexican sentinels fled toward the city, arousing their comrades as they ran. The large drum in the temple of the war-god sounded in sonorous notes the alarm, and a murmur of preparation was wafted from the city, on the breeze, to the ears of the retreating army. The bridge was laid across the canal, and while the long line passed over, its gallant guardians remained around it, ready to defend the passage with their hearts' blood. The van and the center, with Cortez and a portion of the artillery, had crossed the bridge, when the Mexicans came suddenly upon them, springing as it were from earth, air, and water. The lake was alive with boats, and the causeway was lined with men, whose cries arising from all quarters seemed to curse the very air with one universal howl of hatred and revenge. As rapidly as they arrived the Mexicans commenced discharging their bows and slings upon the enemy, until the slight shower of missiles with which the attack began increased to a perfect tornado, filling the air with arrows, stones, and lances. And through the scathing tempest the apparently doomed army marched with steady tread. The van reached the second breach before the rear had crossed the first, and there, amid the peltings of that cruel storm, the soldiers stood awaiting the arrival of the bridge by which they were to cross the gap before them. Emboldened by the apparent confusion in the ranks of the enemy, the Mexicans approached the verge of the causeway, and poured into the unresisting mass before them cloud upon cloud of deadly missiles. Many, dashing their canoes against the dike, leaped into the midst of the enemy, and grappled them in a hand-to-hand conflict, anxious to die in the death-embrace of their antagonist. As the rear of the retreating army pressed forward to cross the bridge, they crowded against the center, until the soldiers were wedged together in one disordered and inactive mass, and against this portion the Mexicans directed their assaults with terrible success. At length the rear-guard crossed the first breach, and the band of forty prepared to remove it to the front; but to their dismay they found that the weight of the moving army, and especially that of the heavy guns had embedded the timbers into the mud to such a degree that it was impossible for them to extricate them.

With yells of triumph, at the sight of the useless endeavors of the Spaniards, the Mexicans crowded around the bridge, advanced and attacked the despairing workmen with the utmost fury. From water and land came a storm of stones and arrows, falling upon the Spaniards with terrible effect. The brave forty melted beneath the withering storm, until they were on the very verge of annihilation; yet they toiled on, for without the bridge the army was lost. But their efforts were fruitless; the timbers remained firmly imbedded in the miry banks. Human exertion could do no more, and, with a cry of despair, which conveyed the dismal tidings to their comrades, they abandoned the work, and fled from the blows of their determined enemies. As the fearful intelligence spread from man to man, a wail of despair ran through the line, until the whole army united in one universal cry of horror. The infantry in front plunged madly into the breach, and struggled despairingly in the briny waters for life, while their companions, rushing eagerly upon them, formed with their writhing bodies a temporary bridge for those behind. And amid this struggling mass of human beings, the horses of the cavaliers plunged madly, striking many of the soldiers dead with their hoofs, and crushing others beneath the weight of their bodies. Sandoval and Ordaz, and other of the cavaliers, succeeded in gaining the opposite bank; but many of their comrades had met their death either beneath the water or by the clubs or lances of the Indians, who, from their canoes, dealt deadly blows on all sides upon the drowning Spaniards. Along the whole line the carnage was fearful. Ranged at a safe distance in their canoes, the Mexicans, lining each side of the causeway, discharged incessant volleys of stones and arrows into the black line of the enemy, while immense numbers of their comrades on the causeway were fighting furiously with club and spear. Howls of rage from the furious natives, screams of pain from the wounded; the cries of women, and the hoarse voices of command, were mingled together along the whole extent of the causeway in discordant confusion; and the thunders of the Spanish cannon in the rear, added to the terrors of that fearful night. Meanwhile, a dismal bridge had been formed across the break in the causeway. The bodies of men and horses, bales of rich stuff, ammunition-wagons, boxes of gold, and heavy guns, had been forced into the opening, until they formed a structure over which the army gradually passed. Thinking only of escape, the Spaniards, throwing away their arms, and abandoning their baggage and artillery, pressed forward, each caring only for his own safety. The stronger, hurling aside the weaker, passed on, regardless of the fate of his companions; the wounded were left behind, where they were either pierced by the lances of the Aztecs, or dragged on board their canoes as a victim for a future sacrifice. Cortez himself found a fordable place, but his voice, lost in the din of strife, could not be heard, and he was compelled to press forward, accompanied only by a few cavaliers. Yet he was surrounded by enemies, and before he reached the van, his favorite attendant, a boy named Salazar, was slain at his very side. Arriving at the front, he found Sandoval and his comrades standing on the brink of the third breach, urging their men to cross the stream. At this point, the Mexicans were not so numerous as at the other passages; but the water in the canal was deep and wide. The horse first plunged into the breach. They were followed by the infantry, in one indiscriminate mass, some striking out singly for the shore, and others grasping the tails and manes of the horses of the cavalry, while others, clinging to each other in an embrace of terror, sank beneath the water. A sad remnant gained the opposite shore, and, led on by Cortez and his officers, advanced along the causeway. They were rapidly nearing the main land, when a report reached the ears of the general that the rear guard would be totally destroyed unless immediately succored. With one impulse, the noble cavaliers halted, and, without a moment for deliberation, they turned their horses' heads, and hastened toward the scene of action. Pressing through the throng of fugitives, they swam the canal, and charged into the thickest of the fight.

Cortez found Alvarado on foot, surrounded by a slender body of followers, battling for life against an overwhelming number of the enemy. His horse had been shot under him, and the gallant officer himself was wounded in many places, yet with voice and example he had cheered on his handful of soldiers, who fought with an energy which strewed the causeway with heaps of the enemy. Yet the Mexicans confident in their strength, had pressed forward, pushing the Spaniards down the sides of the bank to the waters' edge. Assailed in rear by the Mexicans in the canoes, and exposed in front to the murderous weapons of a greatly superior force, the little band would have been cut off to a man, but for the timely appearance of Cortez and his comrades. Like a bolt from a bow, the cavaliers in one compact mass dashed into the midst of the enemy, while the artillery thundered upon their dense array with terrible effect. The Mexicans wavered; Alvarado's men with desperate energy charged upon them, and they fell back in disorder. But recovering from their confusion, like a huge billow, the Mexicans returned the charge with so much impetuosity, that the Spanish horse, infantry, and artillery were engulfed in the flood. No time was to be lost. Abandoning their guns the artillerymen leaped into the water; but a few only escaped, their companions either perished miserably in the lake, or beneath the blows of the Mexican clubs. Cortez and his comrades plunged into the lake, and attempted to swim their horses to the shore; but assailed on all sides by the natives in the canoes many of them were slain. Alvarado, deserted by his followers, remained alone in the midst of the enemy. For a moment he hesitated. The natives rushed at him from all sides. Glancing quickly around he saw by the dim light of the breaking day, that the surface of the lake was covered on both sides of the causeway as far as the eye could reach with canoes filled with armed Indians. That glance satisfied him, that to plunge into the water was certain destruction. With the rapidity of thought he set his long lance firmly on the bottom of the water in the canal, and with an almost superhuman effort, he sprang forward, and at a single leap cleared the breach. Regardless of the clouds of missiles which fell around him, the gallant Spaniard hastened to the van of the army, where he found Cortez and his officers directing the movements of the troops who were marching in disorder off the causeway. At length the sad remnants of the army reached the mainland, and defiled unmolested through a neighboring village. Dismounting from his horse, Cortez seated himself on the steps of a temple, and sadly surveyed his shattered army as it passed before him. Bruised and bleeding from a hundred wounds, the soldiers marched by, a disordered mass of unhorsed cavalry and disarmed infantry. Cannon, baggage, ammunition, muskets, all were gone. Nothing of their equipage remained, except their hacked swords, a few damaged cross-bows, and twenty-three jaded and crippled horses.

On this fearful night, the Spaniards lost out of an army of about 800 men, 450 killed, of whom 46 were cavalry. Their Tlascalan allies were reduced to one fifth of their original force, 4,000 warriors having fallen during the struggle. Of the Mexican loss, we have no account; but it could not have equalled that of the enemy who fought only on the defensive.

A. D. 1521.—A year has rolled by since the disastrous defeat of Cortez on the causeway, and his glorious victory in the plains of Otumba. We now find him on the borders of the lake of Tezcuco, at the head of an army of 900 European soldiers, of whom eighty-seven were admirable cavalry. His men were well-armed, and in excellent spirits. His artillery consisted of three large iron cannon, and fifteen smaller pieces of brass. His supplies of powder, shot, and balls, were abundant, and he had caused 50,000 copper-headed arrows to be made after a pattern furnished him by the natives. During the past year Cortez had won the confidence of the nations tributary to the emperor, to such a degree, that, anxious to throw off the yoke of bondage, they had flocked to the standard of the invader by thousands. Aside, therefore, from his Spanish army, he could depend upon the active co-operation of an immense body of Indian warriors. He was also master of a fleet of twelve brigantines of various sizes, on the lake of Tezcuco, which had been transported over land in pieces on the shoulders of a great number of Indians, from Tlascala, where they had been constructed by Lopez the carpenter. The fleet was manned by 300 men, and each vessel carried a piece of heavy artillery. Cortez established his head-quarters at the city of Tezcuco, which was located at about two miles from the lake, with which it was connected by a canal constructed by Cortez to facilitate the landing of the brigantines. Before commencing operations against the city of Mexico itself, Cortez made several reconnoitering excursions around the lake, in which he reduced the towns and cities upon its borders. In his attacks upon these places he met with considerable resistance from the inhabitants; at Xochimilco, one of the most powerful and rich cities of the valley, especially, his entrance was hotly disputed. By observations made during these tours, Cortez formed his plan of operations against the capital. He determined to begin the siege by distributing his army into three divisions, each of which was to occupy the extremity of the principal causeways. The city of Tacuba, which commanded the causeway of Tlacopan, was assigned to Alvarado, with a force consisting of 160 Spanish foot, thirty horse, and twenty-five Tlascalan warriors. A second force of like strength, under the command of Olid, was to occupy Cojohuacan, at the extremity of a small dike which connected with the causeway of Iztapalapan. The third division, under Sandoval, was to take its station at Chalco, whence it was to march on Iztapalapan, and complete the destruction of that city, before taking up its position on the causeway of Tepejucac. Cortez himself was to take command of the fleet. The Indian allies were sent forward in advance, with directions to await the arrival of the Spaniards on the borders of the Tezcucan territory, on the 10th of May; the three divisions of Olid and Alvarado commenced their march around the lake, taking a northerly direction, while Sandoval was to march toward the south. After gaining possession of Tacuba, Olid and Alvarado, were to march on Chapultepec, and destroy the aqueduct in that place, which supplied the capital with water. Without molestation on the part of the enemy, the Spaniards continued on their march, and took possession of Tacuba, which was entirely deserted by its inhabitants. Having established themselves in their quarters, they next proceeded to Chapultepec, to demolish the aqueduct. The Mexicans had assembled in a large body to protect this important work, and a sharp battle ensued in which the Spanish were the victors. The aqueduct was partially demolished, and the water turned from its channel. The next day the two divisions advanced to the causeway of Tlacopan, for the purpose of securing the first bridge. The dike was swarming with warriors, and the lake was covered with canoes. Marching to the head of the causeway, the Spaniards were met by such a storm of missiles, that they wavered. But urged on by their commander, they recovered and advanced through the terrific hail. Soon their progress was checked by a barricade, which, after an obstinate struggle, they scaled; but barricade after barricade rose in rapid succession, retarding the movements of the cavalry; and the Spaniards surrounded on every side by enemies, assailed from water and from land, by clouds of deadly missiles, were compelled to turn and fight their way back to the main land, which they reached diminished in numbers, and covered with wounds. The next day Olid withdrew his forces, and took up his post at Cojohuacan.

Sandoval now received orders to advance against Iztapalapan. His route lay through a friendly country, and on his arrival at Chalco, he was joined by the Indian allies who were there waiting his coming. Without delay he marched directly on Izatapalapan.

A large body of the enemy was posted before the city to oppose him. An obstinate conflict ensued; but the Indians, after a brave resistance, were defeated, and the Spaniards entered the place in triumph. Immediately on the departure of Sandoval from Tezcuco, Cortez set sail with his fleet, and passing through the canal entered the lake. A body of Indians occupying a large solitary rock, near the southern shore of the lake, greeted the fleet as it sailed by with showers of arrows and stones. Cortez immediately landed, and with 150 men, clambered up the steep side of the rock, and fiercely attacked the natives, who fought until all were slain. A beacon-fire was burning on the summit of the rock, and as Cortez glanced over the lake, he saw it had called forth a mighty concourse of canoes, which were advancing swiftly toward the fleet. Cortez hastily returned to his vessels, and prepared for action. But a dead calm chained his vessels to the spot, and he had the mortification of seeing his enemies almost within his reach while he was powerless. But soon a light breeze sprang up from the shore, and extending his line of battle, with every sail set, he bore down on the enemy's flotilla.

The Mexicans rested on their oars, and gazed in astonishment at the swift-rushing vessels. On like winged monsters, the vessels dashed into the very midst of the pigmy canoes, crushing them beneath their bows, and sending their crews to the bottom. Here and there through the dense mass, the Spaniards steered their ships, discharging their guns to right and left, overturning and crushing the frail vessels of the enemy until the lake was covered with the wrecks of canoes and boiling with the struggles of drowning men. With yells of despair the survivors without returning a single shot, paddled for shore with all their strength. But borne on the wings of the wind, the Spanish fleet pursued, and dashing to and fro in the midst of the enemy, dealt death and destruction at its ease. The few canoes that escaped entered the various canals of the city, and found shelter in the harbor, where the shallow water prevented further pursuit. At evening Cortez came to anchor at a fort called Xoloc, located at the point where the dike from Cojohuacan meets the causeway of Iztapalapan. This place consisted of two stone towers, surrounded by walls, and at this time was occupied by the Mexicans. The garrison was not strong, and Cortez by one assault carried the place. He here fixed his head-quarters. He then sent orders to Olid to join him with half his force, and directed Sandoval to quit Iztapalapan and proceed to Cojohuacan. Upon the arrival of Sandoval at Cojohuacan he was to detach fifty of his best soldiers to Cortez's camp. Cortez now removed the heavy guns from the vessels and planted them on the causeway; and then busied himself in strengthening his defences at Xoloc. We find the besieging army was now posted around the capital as follows:—Cortez with 450 Spanish soldiers, and 10,000 Tlascalan warriors occupied the causeway of Iztapalapan, at the fort of Xoloc, which was about a mile and a half from the city, in a southerly direction, the causeway in front of the fort being curtained by a battery of twelve pieces of artillery. Sandoval with his men, and the balance of Olid's force, was stationed at Cojohuacan, which was united with Xoloc by a short dike, while Alvarado occupied Tacuba at the western extremity of the causeway of Tlacopan. The third great causeway, that of Tepejacac, on the north, was still unoccupied by the besiegers, and afforded the Mexicans a means of communication with the main land. This causeway might be termed a continuation of that occupied by Cortez; for it issued directly from the principal street which, running north and south through the heart of the capital, terminated at its southerly extremity at the causeway of Iztapalapan. Cortez, by the advice of Alvarado, sent Sandoval with a large force to occupy this causeway; and that officer without molestation took possession of the extremity of the dike, thus completing the blockade of the city. Meanwhile the Mexicans had annoyed the besiegers with repeated attacks. They sallied forth both by day and night, assailing the Spaniards from water and land; but they were invariably defeated and driven back with great loss. Having completed the blockade, Cortez determined to support it by repeated assaults, and thus distress the besieged and hasten the day of its surrender. He accordingly fixed a day for a general assault. At early dawn on the appointed day, the Spanish army on the three causeways was in motion. Cortez, on foot, led his column in person. The infantry marched in the rear; and the brigantines sailing on each side of the causeway, kept opposite the column as it advanced. They had marched but a short distance when they were brought to a dead halt, by a canal which crossed the dike. The bridge had been destroyed, and on the opposite bank was a strong breastwork of stone. Behind this rampart a numerous body of Mexicans was stationed. As the besiegers halted on the verge of the canal they were saluted by cloud after cloud of arrows. They opened a brisk fire of musketry and discharges of cross-bows in return; but secure behind their works the Mexicans shouted in derision at the futile efforts of the enemy to dislodge them. Cortez now ordered two of the vessels to take stations which would enable them to enfilade the enemy's position. This being accomplished the brigantines opened their artillery upon the breastwork, and thus exposed to two fires, the Mexicans were obliged to fall back. The vessels were brought near the dike, and the soldiers leaping to the shore, clambered up the sides of the dike, where they were joined by Cortez and his troops who had crossed the breach unmolested. The Spaniards eagerly pursued the rapidly retreating Indians, who fled until they arrived at a second canal, which they swam, and took up a position behind a second rampart of stone. Here they maintained their ground until the brigantines again compelled them to recede. Again the Spaniards pursued, and again the Mexicans came to a stand behind a third breastwork which faced another canal. In like manner the Spaniards dislodged them from this position; and thus pursued the enemy from breach to breach until they were masters of the entire length of the causeway. The Spanish general now caused the breastworks to be demolished, and the breaches to be filled. Having halted until the rear guard had come up with him, Cortez entered the great avenue which, running through the city from north to south, connected the two causeways. The tops of the buildings on each side of the street were black with Mexican warriors, and in the distance great crowds of combatants were seen advancing to dispute the entrance of the besiegers.

Amid a terrific storm of stones, and arrows, and heavy missiles, the Spaniards, slowly but steadily, advanced along the avenue. As they proceeded, the houses along their line of march were demolished by their Indian allies; and the sounds of the crashing timbers, and the yells of the infuriated Mexicans, mingling with the roll of musketry, created a turmoil of noises which deafened the ear and stunned the senses. And on, through clouds of dust and smoke, and a perfect tempest of deadly missiles, marched the Spaniards, driving before their destructive volleys crowds upon crowds of the enemy, until they arrived at the bank of a wide and deep canal which intersected the street. The few planks which still remained of the bridge were quickly broken by the Mexicans, after they had crossed, and a solid rampart of stone, on the opposite shore, defended by thousands of the enemy, effectually checked the further advance of the besiegers. In vain did the Spanish musketeers pour volley after volley on the enemy; their bullets glanced harmlessly from the rampart of stone. The heavy guns were now brought forward, and a brisk cannonade opened on the breast-work, which soon crumbled, beneath the storm of cannon-shot, into a wide gap, through which the Spaniards poured destructive volleys on the dense masses of the enemy behind. The Mexicans, unable to withstand the terrific storm of lead and iron, which, crashing through their midst, swept them down by scores, heaping the pavement with slain, and deluging the street with blood, which rushed like a crimson rivulet through the water-courses of the street, turned and fled in the utmost disorder. The Spaniards, leaping into the shallow water of the canal, crossed the breach, and advanced rapidly along the avenue, driving the enemy before them. Nor did they halt until they arrived at the great square of the palace of Axaycalt. Without delay, the Spaniards entered the court-yard of the palace; and a small party hastened to the summit of the temple, whence they hurled the priests, and despoiled the effigy of the Mexican god of war of its jewels. The Mexicans, aroused to madness at the sight, rushed on the Spaniards with the fury of a hurricane. Unable to stand against the overwhelming flood, the Spaniards, abandoning their cannon to the enemy, retreated in the utmost disorder to the principal avenue. There, mingling with their allies, who crowded the streets, they spread an alarm, which added tenfold to the confusion. Like a flock of frightened sheep, without a leader, the Spaniards and Tlascalans rushed pell-mell along the avenue, while storms of missiles met them on all sides. At this moment, the Spanish cavalry, coming from an adjoining street, plunged into the mass of the enemy. With courage almost superhuman, these brave cavaliers rode fiercely through the crowd, striking down all that came in their path; and the Mexicans, to whom the horse was an object of superstitious terror, were thrown into confusion and ceased their pursuit. Cortez saw his advantage, and, with a shout which recalled the valor of his followers, turned upon the enemy. His men, recovering from their confusion, followed him, and with one tremendous charge, drove the enemy back into the court-yard. Then, securing the cannon, which had been left in the square, he ordered a retreat to be sounded, and the Spaniards, in good order, slowly retired toward the causeway, protecting the rear of the allies, who were now marching in the van. The Mexicans followed, with howls of futile rage, until the rear guard of the column had gained the causeway. Then, without further molestation, the army returned to its quarters at the fort of Xoloc.

Alvarado and Sandoval, in their assault, experienced like difficulties. The causeways were pierced by canals, strongly defended by barricades, and occupied by numerous bodies of natives. They succeeded in expelling the Mexicans from their strongholds on the dike, but did not penetrate into the city. Their operations, however, were of the utmost advantage to Cortez, who, without them, would probably have met with a much stronger opposition from the enemy. Shortly after this assault, Cortez's forces were augmented by the arrival of 50,000 Indian warriors, whom Ixtlilxochitt, Prince of Tezcuco, had raised. These new allies were distributed among the three divisions of the besieging army. Meanwhile, the besieged were not idle. Gautemozin, who, on the death of Cuitlahan, had succeeded to the Aztec throne, was an energetic prince, and, for a Mexican, a skillful general. The hatred of the Mexicans for the invaders was unquenchable, and they all, to a man, seemed actuated with the desire to save their beautiful city from the hands of the Spaniards, or perish beneath its ruins. No sooner had the Spaniards evacuated the city, than hordes of Indians issued out on the causeway, and with indefatigable energy removed the material with which the canals had been filled, and constructed new ramparts in the place of those destroyed; and, therefore, when the Spaniards made a second assault, they were obliged to go over the whole ground again. Cortez made his second assault shortly after the arrival of the Tezcucans.

The Indians contested every inch of soil, as they slowly retreated over the causeway, with an obstinacy which hitherto they had not displayed. For seven hours they battled with the enemy—making a stand behind each rampart—until they were driven to the very extremity of the dike. There the enemy succeeded in gaining a foothold in the suburbs of the city; and, as the Spaniards had demolished the buildings, the Mexicans had no alternative but to meet the enemy face to face. They received the charge of the Spanish cavalry with showers of arrows and other missiles, and it was not until after repeated charges both by horse and foot, accompanied with destructive volleys of musketry that they began gradually to fall back. Sullenly retiring before the deadly weapons of their adversaries, the Indians still maintained a bold front, and fairly covered the enemy with incessant flights of deadly missiles, which although comparatively harmless to the Spaniards, nevertheless told with fearful effect upon the allies. The Mexicans retreated to the palace-square whence after a desperate struggle, they were expelled by the Spaniards; and Cortez, intending to intimidate them, set fire to the palace—his former quarters—and the adjoining buildings. The fire spread rapidly, and soon the buildings were wrapped in flames. Having accomplished their work of destruction, the Spaniards sounded a retreat. Filled with horror and fury at the sacrilegious outrage, the Mexicans howling forth their rage, rushed on the Spaniards, filling the air with missiles, and grappling the horses' legs, dealt their furious blows at the riders until struck to the ground. Thus, fiercely fighting they hugged the enemy's rear, until it had entered the causeway. So furious had been the conflict that when Cortez reached his quarters, few of his men only had escaped unwounded. Meanwhile Sandoval and Alvarado, on their respective causeways, had pushed their assaults with the utmost energy; but they met with such determined resistance on the part of the besieged, that they could not gain a footing in the suburbs. For nearly a week Cortez made daily assaults; and with the same success. One day he advanced some distance down the street of Tlacopan; and, in the hopes of opening a communication with Alvarado who was posted on the causeway bearing that name, he pushed on and destroyed three bridges. Alvarado, however, had not penetrated further than the suburbs, and the Mexican forces at that point were so strong that Cortes was obliged to return without accomplishing his object. As often as the Spaniards retired to their encampments, which they did after every assault, the Mexicans emerged and filled the breaches. The breaches filled by Alvarado, however, were undisturbed; as that indefatigible officer, after each assault, placed a strong guard at the breach nearest to the city, and thus effectually prevented the Mexicans from re-opening them. After these repeated assaults, the Spaniards for a time remained on the defensive only. But their vigilant enemy did not give them one hour's leisure. Day and night they were obliged to be on their guard against the repeated and vigorous sorties of the besieged. Meanwhile the inhabitants of the city were reduced to a state of the utmost distress; one by one the various towns in the neighborhood cast off their allegiance, and refused to furnish the supplies which thus far they had continued to smuggle into the city, notwithstanding the vigilance of the besiegers. From these towns Cortez received large reinforcements, which he employed either in foraging the country for provisions, or in reducing places still hostile to the Spaniards. Cortez, although certain that famine alone would in time compel the city to surrender, could not restrain the impatience of his soldiers, and at the request of his officers called a council of war, in which it was resolved to make a decisive assault. The assault was to be made simultaneously by the divisions of Cortez and Alvarado. Of Sandoval's force, 70 picked men were to be detached to the support of Cortez, and with the balance, that officer was to join Alvarado. Having perfected these arrangements the two forces, the one on the causeway of Ixtapatapan, commanded by Cortez, and the other on the causeway of Tlacopan, under Alvarado and Sandoval, advanced toward the city. The Mexicans on their side were prepared for the attack. The organization of their forces was perfect to a degree. Governed by the head of the army, they moved as with one impulse. Supported by all the brigantines and a flotilla of canoes which was to force a a passage up the canals, too shallow to admit vessels of greater burden, the Spaniards, followed by their numerous allies, slowly advanced toward the city, carefully filling the breaches in the causeway as they proceeded.

The rain poured in torrents—it was in the rainy season—and the soldiers wading knee-deep in mud, and hindered at each breach, made slow progress. At length they gained the suburbs, and having expelled the enemy from that quarter, Cortez halted in order to dispose his forces for the attack on the city itself. From the suburbs three streets led to the city; the center one being flanked on either side by deep canals. Cortez caused his forces to be divided into three divisions; the first, under the command of Alderete, was to advance along the center street; the second, under Andres de Tapia and Jorge de Alvarado, was to march along one of the parallel streets; and the third, under Cortez himself, was to occupy the other. A small reserve, consisting of a body of horse, and three pieces of cannon, was stationed in the square in front of the street of Tlacopan, which was to serve as a general rallying point. Having completed the preliminary arrangements, the three divisions simultaneously moved along the three parallel streets. The Mexicans, however, made such little resistance that Cortez, suspecting danger from the facility of his success, brought his column to a halt; but the impetuous Alderete pressed forward, rapidly driving the Mexicans before him, until he had penetrated into the very heart of the city. Contrary to the explicit directions of Cortez, he had neglected to fill the ditches and canals as he crossed them; and Cortez, receiving intelligence of this neglect, hastened to the principal street to repair the damage ere it was too late. He had advanced but a short distance when he arrived at the margin of a deep and wide canal, which intersected the two canals on either side of the street. Cortez saw at once that Alderete had fallen into the snare which the wily Mexicans had laid for him. He immediately commenced filling the ditch, but his men had scarcely began their labors, when the sullen roar of battle fell upon the ears of the Spanish commander. Alderete, having advanced to the very center of the city, was driving the Mexicans before him like chaff before the wind, when suddenly the horn of Gautemozin sounded, and the Mexicans, obeying the signal, turned with the fury of a whirlwind upon their pursuers, and rushing upon them in one mighty mass, threw them into complete disorder. Borne back by the overwhelming flood, the Spaniards, striking blindly at friend and foe, retreated toward the ditch. On, like a river they rolled toward the canal, and soon the foremost ranks plunged into the water, and vainly strove to swim to the opposite shore, whence Cortez and his comrades were gazing in horror on the destruction of their countrymen. The Spaniards, in one body, poured over the bank into the deep canal, falling one upon the other, and struggling in each other's death embrace. And upon their rear, the Mexicans, with shouts of triumph, poured incessant volleys of deadly missiles, pushing them forward to the ditch, and forcing themselves into the midst of the disordered mass of white men and Indians, striking them to the earth, or dragging them away as prisoners. Cortez did not desert his men in their extremity. With his own hand he rescued many of his followers from a watery grave.

When the enemy recognized him, he became a conspicuous target for their missiles. Stones and arrows fell in a thick shower around him; and it was not until he had received a severe wound in the leg, that he allowed his followers to bear him from the field of strife. The Spaniards, at length, after a fearful loss, and with the utmost difficulty, succeeded in effecting a retreat to the causeway of Izatapalapan. During this bloody conflict, Alvarado and Sandoval had on their side penetrated far into the city; but meeting the Mexicans returning from the pursuit of Cortez, they were obliged to retreat before the overwhelming number of the enemy. The Mexicans followed the Spaniards to their very intrenchments; but the heavy artillery of the brigantines and the batteries on the causeway was brought to bear on them with such precision that they were compelled, after sustaining immense losses, to retreat to the city. Besides the long list of killed and wounded, in this conflict, sixty-two Spaniards and a great number of Tlascalans were taken prisoners by the Mexicans. Two pieces of cannon and seven horses also fell into the hands of the victors. During the afternoon, the Mexicans, leading their victims one by one to the flat summit of the temple, sacrificed them all in the view of the Spanish soldiers, who thus saw their companions perish miserably before their very eyes without the power of aiding them. The Mexicans, highly elated by their victory, sent the heads of several of their victims to the neighboring towns, calling upon them to return to their allegiance. The priests also assured the people that at the expiration of eight days the god of war would deliver the Spaniards into their hands. Dispirited by their recent defeat, and alarmed by the proclamation of the Mexican priests, the Indian allies—not even excepting the Tlascalans—withdrew from their alliance, and departed from the Spanish camp. But after eight days had elapsed, and they were informed that the Spaniards still maintained their position around the city, the greater part of the Indians returned, and entered into a new alliance with the Spanish commander. Cortez now determined to resume hostilities. But to insure success he concluded not to advance a single step without securing the ground over which he marched both for retreat and for future operations. The breaches and canals were all to be filled in such a substantial manner that they could not again be disturbed. The materials for this purpose were to be drawn from the ruins of the buildings, all of which were to be demolished as the army advanced.
